"Unless the college goes further than training for current jobs and goes out to meet and cooperate with the community in such a way that the man awaiting and prepared to do a necessary future work for the community can be employed now according to his capacity; unless this is done, the college program is fatally handicapped and the community expanision is crippled. The same thing applies to work which although needed is not now available for Negroes and may not be during the present generation. In that case a careful survey of the possibilities among fourteen million people might give an opportunity to create such jobs within our own group or by cooperation with others. This even more than the other case, involves a broad study of the economic conditions among Negroes and possibilities of their organizations. It would call not simply for the efforts of one college with its immediate community or its state, but the cooperative efforts of the Negro educational institutions of the South.

"This leads us to the fact that if the college is to make real and advantageous approach to its community, either its local or its general community, it must be helped by a careful, broad and continuous study of the social and economic set-up of that community; that is, we must know as we do not know today, the existing occupations of Negroes; not in the vague and general and necessarily inaccurate report of the decennial census, but by minute and complete survey and study of counties, towns and cities where the Negro po pulation is resident. We must take such a beginning as Charles Johnson's regional study of Southern counties, extend the data to 1940 and then complete it and carry it on continuously from year to year. We must have a group to group and persnn to person knowledge of the condition of the laboring masses, of their opportunities and hindrances. And this kind of study ought to be made in accordance with the latest scientific techniques and on a national basis. There is no reason why a study like that of Allison Davis, "The Deep South", should not be made over the whole South so that we could paint with descriptions, facts and figures, the real social condition of the American Negro. The interpretation of this knowledge and its interaction with past history and current trends must be the continuously and critically examined conclusions of the best trained students of the social sciences. We must not depend on the narrow experience and conventional standards of business men; me must not resort to untried panaceas or emotional utopias. This study must be increasingly a matter of science, carried out to its inexorable and tested conclusions.

"We need in sociology, a race regionalism which will narrow and concentrate on our Negroes the general regional studies of the South. Instead of the occasional snapshot of social conditions which was the social study of yesterday, we must aim at a continuous moving picture of ever increasing range and accuracy.

"A national planning institute must annually gather up and compare and interpret this great body of facts. There must be provided for this work, sufficient research. And finally through a central office, there must be wide and carefully edited publication of results.

"It is not only illogical but it is an indictment of the Negro college that the chief studies of the Negro's condition today are not being done by Negroes and Negro colleges. The center of gravity as well as the truth of investigation should be brought back to the control of an association of Negro colleges; and this not for the purpose of creating aNegro science or purely racial facts; but in order to make sure that the whole undistorted picture is there and that the complete interpretation is made by those most competent to do it, through their own lives and training.

"Under the leadership of these same colleges, the communities must proceed to act, explore, experiment and build. They must organize their spending power to the last dollar, realizing that a carefully and intelligently spent dollar is a more powerful ballot than a vote for a coroner. Advantage must be taken of decentralized cheap power like the TVA to push a new era of home manufactures and producers' cooperation. The churches can branch into real social work; they might organize free legal defense for every accused Negro; the secret orders can further transform their regalias, rituals, and parades into orphanages and student aid. We can have cooperative medicine and dentistry and field hospitals to replace private practice. We have an enormously fertile field for economic experiment; here on the threshold of a new industrial era. All it needs is scientific study, personal character and coordinated intelligence guided by the colleges. It is for the inception and carrying out of this program that I am appealing to you today."

I proposed that this body agree to the following general plan:

1. A continuous and intensive study of the Negroes of each Southern state by each of the Negro Land-Grant Colleges.

2. Preparation for ability to do this scientifically by strengthening the division of Social Sciences in each institution (History, Political Science, Psychology, Anthropology, Sociology, Economics) and provision of time and funds for study and research.

3. Inauguration of a general program of subjects and methods of research, with annual conferences, at which experts and representatives of other colleges should be present. Periodical integration, interpretation and publication of results.

I suggested the following detailed program for each Land-Grant College:

1. A division of the "Social Sciences," teaching History, Anthropology, Sociology, Economics, Psychology, Political Sciences.

2. The integration of this teaching into one closely articulated study of

In each state.

B. Social Sciences

Social Institutions	) (	Modern world
Anthropology	) (	United States
Economic Organization	) (	among Americans
Government	) (	among Negroes
Psychological reactions	) (	among Negroes in this State

3. A study of the facts concerning the Negroes of the state by counties, subdivisions of counties, villages, towns, cities, wards, blocks and households. The study to be carried on by professors, instuctors, fellows, social workers, volunteers and affiliated organizations.

The study to include: number of individuals, family groups, character of homes, location of homes; occupation of persons, incomes, expenditures, age, marital relations, education, property and recreation.

4. The scope of this study will include the observation and measurement of all facts and situations which have to do with the status of the Negro population in the state; becoming as funds and facilities increase, more and more intensive and comprehensive, until at last it virtually means a checking of every Negro family in the state including their activities, institutions and organizations.

5. The study will use all available data as the basis of its work, including the federal census of 1940, all state censuses, all reports of the state, the county and its subdivisions, concerning education, occupation, dependency and delinquincy.

SPECIAL STUDIES OF

6. All organizations of Negroes or working with or for Negroes: details of work, including churches, lodges, cemeteries, clubs, etc; their property and budgets.
7. All business conducted by Negroes and among Negroes; character, amount, approximate money value.
8. Commercialized recreations, movies, billiard rooms, gambling, prostitution, etc.
9. Public recreation; parks, playgrounds, etc., number, upkeep.
10. The participation of Negroes in government as voters and officials; tax - payers, property holders; officials and administrative methods.

METHODS, INTERPRETATION AND PUBLICATION

11. The methods and scope of these studies to be outlined by an annual conference, with each college represented and outside experts.
12. The resulting studies to be collected, interpreted and made public for an annual state meeting and for a public museum and laboratory of the social sciences with maps, charts, models.
13. All the college reports to be brought together, studied, tabulated, analyzed and interpreted and integrated into an annual joint report.

THE NORTHERN NEGRO

14. Arrangements to be entered into with private Negro instituions to join with departments of the social sciences in Northern colleges to make similar studies of northern Negroes.

RESULTANT BODY OF KNOWLEDGE

15. This body of knowledge, continuously added to, checked and reviewed; improved in method and object; tabulated, interpreted, and integrated, to be used as the basis of raising the standard of living and cultural pattern of American Negroes through education, work, law, and social action.

RESULTANT WORK FOR SOCIAL UPLIFT

16. For every social problem, institutional failure, or individual maladjustment made evident, located and measured, organizations will then attempt to discover or promote in the locality and state, remedies in EDUCATION: special kinds and specific methods; private, industrial, grup, state and national efforts.

SOCIAL UPLIFT WORK: by hiring thoroughly trained social workers; by group effort; by voluntary effort.

HEALTH: by physicians and dentists; by group medical care; by hospitalization; syphilis; by childbirth and child welfare efforts.

RECREATION: music, a folk theatre, playgrounds, library facilities, sports.

17. But of all these efforts, the college and community should concentrate their first and chief attention upon the problems of earning a living among Negroes, since these are fundamental to practically all other efforts. Attentinn should be paid especially to work now available, to openings for earning a living which may be made available, and for general economic re-organization, such as is involved in consumers' and producers' cooperation; whereby not only intelligent saving can be made in the expenditure of income, but that new occupations, especially in home industries and small manufacturers, can be established among Negroes.

18. Every attempt should be made to use existing institutions and organizations among Negroes, for undertaking efforts at social reform as outlined above: churches, fraternal lodges, women's clubs, schools, and in many cases, private businesses, can be used for increasing employment, finding new employment, furnishing legal defense, furnishing direct relief, improving health, organizing recreation, furnishing student aid and promoting consumers' and producers' cooperation.

FIRST STEPS

19. An immediate attempt on the part of the college in each state to reorganize their budgets so as to provide a gradually increasing minimum of funds for this program:

    A. For teaching the Social Sciences;

    B. For giving trained teachers, time and funds for investigation.

    C. For providing, at the earliest moment, for the employment of social workers and fellows for investigation and social uplift.

    D. For a publication fund.

    E. For laying down a present program with plans for future expansion.

20. Minimum requirements for initiating the program:

    1. One or two teachers of History.

    2. One or two teachers of Anthropology and Sociology.

    3. One teacher of Economics.

    4. One teacher of Psychology, with laboratory.

    5. A teaching Fellow with some time and funds for field work.

    6. A Social Worker with whole time for investigation and advice.

The Presidents of the Negro Land-Grant Colleges received this proposal with favor and adopted this general plan, June 12, 1942:

To initiate a series of cooperative studies of the social condition of the American Negro and more especially of his economic situation during and after this war.

For this purpose they propose to use in their institutions the division of the Social Sciences including history, anthropology, sociology, economics, political science, psychology, and other cognate subjects so as to give their students unified knowledge of social conditions and modern trends.

In addition to this they propose to recommend the use of one or more of their qualified instructors, with sufficient time and funds for a series of social studies, whose subject, methods and scope shall be determined after conferences with executives and investigators in other institutions, and with outside experts in the social sciences, including students of conditions among the white population. This proposal is subject to the approval of the governing boards in the various states.

The ultimate object of such conferences and studies shall be to accumulate a body of knowledge, intensively pursued according to the best scientific methods, continuously added to, checked and reviewed; improved in method and object; tabulated, interpreted and integrated to be used as the basis of raising the standard of living and cultural pattern of American Negroes through education, work, law and social action.

We propose that the results of these studies by each college in its own state or section of state, shall be brought together, periodically compared, edited and published annually in some convenient form for the use of students legislators and social reformers.

For these purposes of conference, investigation and publication we propose to set aside in our annual budget such sums as may be approved by the various state authorities.

This was signed by the Presidents of 20 Negro Land-Grant Colleges and eventually by the Presidents of Atlanta, Fisk and Howard. Representatives of War Production Board, the American Council of Education, the North Carolina Institute for Research in Social Science commended the plan as did School and Society and the Journal of Higher Education.

The Journal of Negro Education said in an article:

"Briefly, Dr. W.E. B. Du Bois' proposal, agreed upon by the Presidents of the Land-Grant Colleges, assumes first a core of social studies in each of our Negro colleges and graduate schools. It assumes that by internal administrative and staff effort these may be internally unified and coordinated for a joint, continuous attack upon the problem of the study of the Negro population in the area surrounding each college. It assumes that, pouring into a central headquarters, yet to be designated, for review and analysis by a central board, yet to be chosen, there would be a continuous flow of raw data and completed studies. It assumes central coordination, synthesis and report of these studies. It assumes that by this great increase in knowledge, sound and rich and full, we would have materials wholly convincing as to the needs of local, regional, and national Negro populations. It assumes that with this knowledgewe could so increase our wisdom as to be able both to make Negro higher education very much better than it is in all aspects and we would have the facts at last on which to base valid requests for support from foundations, individuals, and local, state, and national governments. By knowing what the problems are we could know also how to arrange them in priorities and further , much better than we know now, how to attack them each in turn with some expectation of success.

The plan was finally implemented by this vote of the Conference of Negro Land Grant College Presidents on October 28, 1942:

1. That Dr. W.E. B. Du Bois be designated the official coordinator of the proposed sociological studies to be instituted by the various land-grant colleges.
2. That each President appoint from his faculty a liason officer to serve as the agent for continued implementation of the project. This officer to report progress and seek further cooperation from the administration and faculty: preferably, though not necessarily, he should be a social scientist.
3. That each President agree to try to find funds in the college budget to permit attendance of liaison officer at a methodological conference to be called by Dr. Du Bois at a convenient time and place, after appropriate correspondence should have further clarified various issues.

4. That the Executive Committee at this meeting address itself to possible ways and means of further financing said study, conference or other aspectsof the program.

The 26th Atlanta University Conference met at Robert Hall, Morehouse College, Atlanta, April 19 and 20, 1943. It became the first conference of the Negro Land-Grant Colleges, for coordinating aprogram of cooperative social studies. Among those present were:

E. Franklin Frazier, Library of Congress

Charles S. Johnson, Fisk University

Howard W. Odum, University of North Carolina

E. B. Reuter, University of Iowa

T. Lynn Smith, Louisiana State University

Edgar T. Thompson, Duke University

Donald Young, Social Service Research Council

Thirty four persons attended, representing thirty institutions. The sessionss lasted two days and consisted of exhibits, reports, addresses and conferences.

By special invitation , there were present at the conference, eight well-known sociologists, from leading American institutions. These persons, after observation and consultation, have written the following opinions on the possiblities of this agreement. The names are arranged in order of academic seniority.

Howard Washington Odum, Kenan Professor of Sociology, and Director of the Institute for Research in Social Science, University of North Carolina:

"It seems to me that in two or three ways a strong, integrated program for research in the land grant colleges would constitute an important step forward. In the first place, the area in which they work is still virgin and important, and their laboratories are adequate for genuine research and experimentation. They have a fine opportunity to combine the social studies with the physical sciences and to implement them in practical programs."

Edward Byron Reuter, Professor of Sociology and Chairman of the Department College of Commerce, University of Iowa:

"The plan for cooperative studies to be carried on by the Negro Land Grant Colleges seems to me to be a very wise development and one that may lead to increasingly important results. It will make possible a pooling of resources -- of time, staff, and funds --to discover and make known information that now gets too little public notice."

Edward Franklin Frazier, Professor of Sociology and Head of Department, Howard University; Consultant in Negro bibliography, Library of Congress:

"To my mind, the Conference was significant because it represented the broadening and deepening of the stream of a great tradition which owes much to you. Moreover, the Conference was a distinct success in that it brought together and stimulated men and women who have generally been forced to work in isolation. Even if no other conferences were held, I am sure that many of those who attended this one would return to their work with a feeling that they were engaged in a worthwhile endeavor and that they had the support and appreciation of their fellow workers.

Charles Spurgeon Johnson, Director of the Department of Social Science, Fisk University; Trustee of the Julius Rosenwald Fund; Chairman of the Race Relations Committee of the American Missionary Association:

"The fact that so large a number of persons were present without direct financial aid from an outside source pointed to a reserve of interest that might be counted on to carry along a coordinated movement among the colleges. Not to be overlooked, however, is the prestige of an established and admired scholar in this field who has served as an effective catalyzing agent."

Donald Ramsey Young, Research Secretary of the Social Science Research Council:

"I have no doubt whatever concerning the value of your objective. There is need for the encouragement and guidance of social and economic research at the Land Grant Colleges, both in terms of the benefits which should be derived thereform by the institutions and their faculties and also in terms of the practical social utility of the anticipated results."

Edgar Tristram Thompson, Associate Professor of Sociology, Duke University: "I feel that you have a ood idea and that you deserve support in your efforts to carry it out. I appreciate your including me among the invited sociologists and I feel that my efforts to contribute to the conference have taught me something."

William Earle Cole, Professor of Sociology and Head of the Department, University of Tennessee; Acting Chairman of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation:

"I think you are starting somet ing which is very fundamental and which should go a long way in improving not only the Negroes of the South but other peoples as well. I was greatly impressed with what the Negro colleges have been doing and the prospects for the future."

Thomas Lynn Smith, Professor of Sociology and Head of the Department, University of Louisiana:

"I think well of your plan for promoting research work on the part of the social science personnel at the land grant colleges for Negroes.

"The advice of sociologists at institutions for whites should be sought from time to time as the work goes along; but not the extent that there is any tendency at any institution for the white man to determine, even by suggestion, what shall be done by the Negro."

A second Conference was planned for the Spring of 1944, and I wrote in July 1943:

"This whole plan will comeup for discussion and modification in the Second Land Grant College Conference in the Spring of 1944. The main consideration is this: The economic situation of the Negro during and after the present war is a matter of critical and vital importance. There is going to be increased race friction and finally want and unemployment in the midst of violent social change. At such time we want accurate and carefully made social measurements, tested techniques and the machinery for further investigation. There will be neither time nor disposition during times of turmoil to initiate new and calm investigation. If now we begin this nationwide study of economic and social conditions, it can be continuously pursued through storm and stress and after the post-war calm form a priceless guide to social survival and lasting peace."

Many other commendations came from across the nation, from white and black. Especially was the new cooperation among Negro institutions noted with Atlanta University as the acknowledged head and center of work.

Then at the moment of triumph of this carefully thought out and carefully planned scheme, came catastrophe. Without notice to me of any kind, I was retired from my professorship and headship of the department of Sociology at Atlanta University.

This was not merely a personal disaster. It was removing from leadership the one person who because of age and long experience; because of works published and a wide acquaintanceship based on the relation of teacher and student, happened to be the person to whom the presidents of Negro Land Grant Colleges and other Negroes of influence were willing to entrust this cooperative venture. President Clement of Atlanta University had quarrelled with the Land Grant Colleges a few years past. So that many of them did not like him personally. Most of the others did not know him but they did know Atanta University and they knew me. They were willing to put this plan into thse hands but they would not consent to co-operate with President Clement. There were doubtless at other Negro institutions persons capable of doing this job, but they were not as well known and in any case my selection gained unusual agreement and Atlanta University unprecedented prestige as the center of this venture.

My sudden retirement then savored of a deliberate plot, although this cannot be proven. The retirement age at Atlanta University was sixty-five. But I was sixty-five when President Hope called me to the University. Nothing was said between us about the conditions of eventual retirement--due to my usual neglect of financial considerations and because my good health gave me no thought of stopping work at any near time. Hope must have mentioned the matter to Florence Reed, treasurer, but they reached no decision that I knew of. Later I opposed Miss Reed's election as president to succeed Hope; and the new plan gained me wide acclaim. Even the General Education Board which handled Rockefeller funds favored my plan. President Clement while supporting the plan was not enthusiastic. As a new young unknown president, perhaps he saw my reputation overshadowing him. Letters came to me; visitors asked for me and no doubt Miss Reed encouraged his jealousy. I was conscious that this might occur and tried to be careful. On all my plans I consulted him. All invitations went out in his name. His delays and small objections seemed petty and I said so. Perhaps I was too brusque and not diplomatic enough in this and did not take into account his inexperience and lack of understanding. Doubtless too he had no desire to stop the development of the plan, but had no idea that I was at least for the time being so necessary for its firm establishment.

Neither Miss Reed nor President Clement said a word to me about retirement; but at the meeting of the Board of Trustees in 1944, Miss Reed proposed that I be retired. President Clement seconded the motion and apparently with little or no objection the Board passed the vote. Presumably most of the members assumed that the matter had been discussed with me and had my agreement. [redacted]

At any rate without a word of warning I found myself at the age of 76, without employment and with less than five thousand dollars of savings. Not only was a great plan of scientific work killed at birth, but my own life was thrown into confusion. I felt the world tottering beneath my feet and I fought back in despair. Finally the trustees gave me ayear's full salary in lieu of my never having been given notice of retirement. Also after offering me a pension of $100 a month, they finally granted me $1800 a year for five years and $1200 a year thereafter.

A word from thepoet Sara Teasdale expressed my mood:

"When I can look life in the eyes,
Grown calm and very coldly wise,
Life will have given me the Truth
And taken in exchange -- my youth."

My youth? I laughed grimly. It was not my youth that I was losing; it was my old age; and old age was worthless in the United States.

There were some earnest attempts to carry the proposed program on. It was transferred to Howard University, with E. Franklin Frazier in charge. An excellent conference was held in 1945. But Frazier was not given funds for continuing the project and the Land Grant Colleges gradually ceased to cooperate. The whole scheme died within a year or two. It has never been revived.

The result of this action was disastrous; not merely to me but to the American Negro. Up unitl this time the Negro himself had led in the study and interpretation of the condition of his race in the United States. Beginning with 1914, with accelerated speed the study of the Negro passed into the hands of whites and increasingly Southern whites. There were colored sociologists and historieans but they worked without coordinated plan, without adequate funds or under superiors who were not interested. Finally many Negro writers found it profitable to write what Business and the Government demanded and not the whole truth. Until in the last decade 1949 to 1959 with increasing unanimity, the thesis has been defended in a thousand books and papers that the Civil War was not a struggle to preserve and spread the slavery of black workers, but a holy crusade to maintain the superior civilization of white folk and today current historians can treat American history and take no account of American Negroes and their activities in the Twentieth century.

There was another loss in the giving up of this plan, which I have never mentioned. Here was an unprecedented chance for an experiment in Sociology; for measuring and classifying human action, on a scale never before attempted; it would be reasonably sure of adequate funds and the best of trained cooperation and nationwide if not worl-wide criticism. On such a base a real science of Sociology could have been built. The opportunity was surrendered and the whole science of Sociology has suffered. Indeed today there is no recognized field of Sociology; almost no one calls himself a Sociologist and few institutions grant a degree in sociology. I even had projected a path of scientific approach: I was going to plot out beside the world of physical law, a science of Sociology which measured "the limits of chance in human action." If this field proved narrow or non-existent, world law was proven. If not the resultant "chance" was what men had always regarded as "Free Will." Meantime as students of human action hesitated and waited, Psychology measured nervous reaction; Physics merging with Chemistry rose to enormous accomplishment and helped by the vast prevision of mathematics, recast our whole conception of the universe. Finally Biology revealed new realms of what we now can regard as nothing but Chance beyond the area of conscious mind. Sociology has been by-passed, and reduced to Social Work.

A Few Notes Concerning Christianborg Castle

The land on which Christianborg Castle is built was acquired by th4 Danish Government on the 18th August 1661. It was the then Ga Manche, none other than Okai Koi, whose cruelty to his people resulted eventually in his assassination, who sold the land to the Danes for the sum of seven gold marks - a transaction which was concluded twenty years, almost to a day, after the Dutch had acquired the site of what is now called Ussher Fort.

Consideable delay took place in construction of C.C. as much of the material had to be brought from Europe and it was not ready for occupation until 1670 - the yar of the accession of Christian Fifth to the crown of Denmakr, after whom the castle was called. The ground plan of the original building - i.e. the portion situated on the sea side (the dungeons) - is the same today as when the Castle was built, except that on the land side the castle then extended only as far as to the foot of the present staircase (then nonexistent) where a wall crossed at right angles and enclosed a small court-yard.

This court-yard contained one remarkable feauture, viz; an underground water-tani. The entrance to this tank can still be seen under the present staircase. It is described by a co temporary writer as having been faced with tiles, and cement, extending to 11 feet square to 6 feet in depth and being capable of hold ng 400 barrels of wager. It is probably one of the first, if not the first, water tank constructed in West Africa. Later a second underground water tank was built and this one is probably familiar to most visitors who enter the castle for it bears on one side of the curious dome-shaped erection built over it an inscription in Danish which recounts its history. In 1752 the Danish Governor died and one Dr. Carl Engmann, a native of Stociholm, who had retired from the practice of medicine in Osu and taken up trade, was appointed Acting Governor in his stead. In those days a Governor was merely a Commandant of a fort and his principal duty consisted of buying dold and slaves in exchqnge for European goods. One month before Engmann's appointment six Europeans and severl mulatto soldiers had died of disease in Christianborg Castle and in 1753 seven Europeans and seven soldiers died there. This mortality was largely due to dysentery, and Ehgmann with the advantage of ten years residence in Osu behind him as well as medical knowledge to guide him, at once proceeded to remedy this state of affairs. He dug another undergr und tank outside the co fines of the castle, connected it by a pipe with the tank situated within the old court-yard and within a year his reputation as a benefactor to mankind was established, onlt two Europeans and two artisans died in 1754. It is true that his catchment area was not above reproach. Roof gutters were unknown in these days and, as a result, the tanks were filled by the rain water which fell on the bastions and batteries; but even this was much better than the brackish, contaminated water which had hitherto been collected from holes in the sandy beach east of the cast.e

The inscription outside Engmann's tank is unfortunately sadly mutilated. It gives the interior measurements of the tank, but the figures for length, breadth and depth are indecipherable; the dates upon which it was commenced (March 2, 1753 and completed, May 31st, 1753) can be read, while at the end of the inscription can be clearoy seen the Governor's name, Carl Engmann. This tank as well as the older one were filled with sand in 1915 in order to prevent mosquito from breeding in them.

Little more is known of Engmann. His action in placing his Chief Factor under arrest in 1756, for what is politely referred to as a "shortage" nowadays, resulted in his falling under the Danish King's displeasure and he was recalled on the 27th of August in that year. It is, however, probable that he is the author of the flattering poetical effusion with which Roemer's "Description of the Coast of Guinea" opens, and which is signed Carl Gustav Engmann, as he and Roemer were together in Osu for some years. The court-yard in which Engmann's tank is situated was only gradually enclosed in after years. Thus, the battery on which the present dining hall is erected was completed in 1734, the wall contai the entrace gate was built in 1790 and the chapel in 1791.

37 castles and forts in territory built before 1800 - No traces of 8

Castles and forts almost the only visible remains of the History of the Gold Coast for at least three hundred years. There are a few late 18th century houses in such towns as Elmina, Cape Coast and Sekondi which are fast decaying and shold be cared for, but before that time there is very little indeed except the forts. They illustrate the country's history and for that reason they should be preserved and used in the country's educational system.

Neglect of whitewase. "On a tropical shore with the blue of the sea, the yellow sand and the green coker-nut palms, he staring whiteness of the buildin is needed to complete the picture. It used to do so, it should do so again in all castles and forts which are used. Absence of whitewash makes Cape Coast castle so depressing.

Christiansborg Castle - History

In about 1500 King John II of Portugal formed a Guinea Company which set up new stations, including one at Christiansborg. They are said to have founded the castle, but this is undertain. It was taken by the Swedes in 1645, but then seems only to have been a fortified house, called Ursu Lodge (native Ursu or Osu) In 1657 it was captured by the Danes under Sir Henry Carlof. Two yars later enlarged and given its present name.

In 1679 the Portuguese were trying to recover lost ground. Danish Governor of the castle (John Olricks or Cluckstad) had a Greek, Peter Bolt, as an officer. He conspired with the natives, who murdered the Governor and installed Bolt in his place. Bolt sold it for 224 pounds to Julian de Campo, Barette, ex-Governor of the Portuguese Island of San Thome. The Portuguese supplied small garrison and made improvements, recalled it the Castle of St. Franci Xavier. "They raised the curtains and batteries another 3 feet; built a small chapel inside the castle where mass was said by a black priest who had been ordained by the Bishop of San Thome. They maintained a garrison of 45 white men, but employed no natives, as they were so well hated all along the coast that they could get none to serve under them". The castle is called St. Francis Xavier in an engraving of 1682.

In 1682 Baretoo, the Portuguese Governor of Christiansborg Caste, was made a prisoner by his own garrison, who rose against him and kept him confined in the tower of the cast.e. Barbot, who had known him in Prince's Island three year's before, went to visit him, but was only allowed to salute him at the window from a considerable distance. The Portuguese Factor, who had refused him admission told Barbot that he was prepared to justify what he had done, but that if the prisoner wished to return with him, Barbot to Europe he might

by W.E.B.D u BOIS

Never in the modern world has there been such an a no amalous situation as in Germany. The Soviet Union at overwhelming cost won the Second World War and saved Europe from the domination of Hitler. In return it was admitted that the Soviet Union was due reparations for her frighful losses and and that Germany should never again be permitted to disturb the peace of the world. But the West feared the sucess of Communism more than they feared War. When then they sat down to make a treaty of peace, no treaty was made; for now sixteen years and still today, remains unmade. Yet in anticipation of a rapid treaty of peace the four powers temporarily divided the capital city of Berlin into three four parts, As a permanent arrangement this was unthinkable and was never so planned. It was like giving France the right to carry on a goverwment in London, (or Cuba in New York) meantime the real work of peace was neglected. The Soviet Union was given almost nothing to pay for her losses (in life and property). The United States gave her no help Loan after the war as she gave England and France, but demanded quick repayment of what the Soviet Union owed her. United States capital and her labor unions (under Meany) united to make recovery from the results of war difficult in East Germany. The former followers of Hitler gradually took over control of West Germany and she rapidly recovered from her defeat. She soon was rejoining America and West Europe, and uniting with them again against the Soviet Union , China and East Europe. Finally it was proposed that the West arm Germany against with atomic weapons. If the world wants peace this is the end. Germany must not a third time bring disaster on mankind. The Soviet Union disspite her losses between 1917 and 1945, has risen to lead the world in education, technology, science and progress in industry. She presents mankind a program of peace. She proposes peace this year in Germany and her proposal should be carried out, despite the opposition of the United States, the hesitation of West Europe and the threats of West Germany. Peace shold be made with East the Democratic Republic Germany, and all foreign troops withdrawn. Berlin should become a united normal city, with such fair terms to its inhabitants who do not desire to live in East Berlin. Or even as the Soviet Union generously offered as organized under special arrangements, but no longer as a West German center of spying, and sabotage, and propaganda The e is really no choice: either War soon if present conditions continue, ~~Or war if West Germany rules West Berlin~~, or World Peace this year.

This is the most astounding triumph of the human mind which modern man has seen. The Soviet Union has shown what Commnnism can do for peace in t the spread of knownledge rather than by arms. Cannot the West meet this challenge by something more than threat of futher war

If we could just get over our American habit of Big Talk! We have done some big things in the past; and some mighty small ones as Indians and Negroes can testify

The enthusiastic answers of the President, cousin Cousins, Thurgood Marshall , Philip Randolph xxx Norman Thomas and Donald (Warrington & Thomas Lamont) very much resemble the well-known reply of another surprised person: "he named a california town, ~~xxxxxxxx~~ I thi k it was "Ubadamn"!

The rare restraint of President Kennedy in repressing his natural enthusiasm for the greatest accomplishment of the human mind over the forces of nature which the Communist Titov has made. I hope many other Americans wil follow the President's example. Norman Thomas, Phillip Randolph, Thurgood Marshal will hereafter at least keep still; little cousins Cousins will accept Peace with Soviets and the Pentagon will stop needless boasting

Not by threat of war but by the most astounding triumph of the mind of man over over thepowers of nature has the Soviet Union shown the world its superior social organization. Cannot the reply of the West be something more than a threat of more arms for more destruction of men and property

SIX WEEKS IN RUMANIA

by W.E.B.Du BOIS

I have been in Rumania six weeks seeking to have my old age treated by Dr. Aslan. I do not speak Rumanian and have seen but a small portion of your city of Bucarest and your beautiful country. This gives me but ~~small~~ NARROW basis to judge your ~~country.~~ But I have been asked to put down some impressions. I consent because in my long life I have travelled widely, and perhaps can make some valuable comparisons. First I was born in America , in the northeast part of the United States from black Africans whom Dutch had kidnapped in West Africa and sold in slavery in New York. My great-great- grandfather, with the Man who had bought him, wandered east from the valley of the Hudson to the next valley which was still wilderness and began farming. Later the people of this country began to complain of THE way in which the British treated them and soon started rebellion. My great-great grandfather fought with them and for this was recognized as a free citizen. There was plenty of free land around and he and his descendents became small farmers. Eventually his granddaughter married a man who was born in the West Indies of ~~a descendant of a~~ French Huguenot and a local mulatto woman. Their grandson returning to America was my father.

Thus I was born in a capitalist country, ~~who~~ which had never heard of Socialism. There was land enough for everyone and each individual provided for his own needs. However in time changes came about. Land, especially good land and land well-located became scarce and was seized by the richer and stronger folk so that the group divided into classes consisting of the Rich who were few in number; a vast number of poor folk and a middle class of people who were striving to make a living and not ~~starve~~ sink to poverty.

As a child my widowed mother strove to give me an education so that I could grow up and make a decent living. She had a hard struggle but at last died just after she saw me graduate from High School. Then by earning scholarships I finished college and graduate school and finally came to Germany to finish my education in 1892. Then and later I visited the chief capitalist nations of West Europe. I saw them developing into powerful nations determined to use the mass of poor people in Europe as workers for the support and luxury of the rich. The rich were regarded as the nation and the poor existed for their comfort. But Socialism was arising to oppose this scheme. I studied Karl Marx. In 1917 I heard of the Russian Revolution. In 1926, 1936 and 1949, and 1958 I visited ~~Russia~~ the USSR . I was six months in China and this year I have been six weeks in Rumania.

What now do I notice most? The people of Rumania are happier than the people of the United States. MOST Americans are well-fed and housed; ~~for the most part~~. But some are not and large numbers are unemployed. And all, whether leading a comfortable life or not are worried, even frightened of eventual poverty, sickness and a ~~poverty stricken~~ helpless old age. They are so worried that they spend most of their life in a bitter struggle to make money by any method possible, often even by cheating, stealing , murder and war. Rumanians on the other hand, seem to me to be ~~happy~~ content. They do not to be sure have everything they want, but they do not fear poverty, hunger, sickness or an old age of neglect. They have far more physicians in porportion to population than Americans and fine hospitals. They marry young when marriage is natural and can afford to have children, whom the state educates, trains for making a living, and sees that a job is open when the youth is ready. All this does not work perfectly, but it is getting better every year and Rumanians are happy and hopeful. On the other hand Americans get high wages but the cost of living is enormous. Rumanians pay 150 to 300 lei for a pair of shoes which cost us 1200 to 3600 lei; your home telephone costs you 35 lei a month; mine costs me ~~1400~~ 160 lei; you can rent a small apartment for ~~200~~ 100-150 lei a month. Your bread is better than ours and costs but half as much. I must pay at least 2000 a month. To live well therefor, Americans must earn a ~~huge~~ large wage for he pays a tremendous cost of living and this is the reason for his bitter struggle to ~~xxx~~ gain income and wealth. As compared with Rumanians we have more things for which we pay much more and worry ourselves to death getting the money to pay with. You have less, for which you pay less and need not worry over sickness and age. Our taxes on income and property are ten times yours. But this is not the worst of the situation: Americans and west Europeare still obsessed by the idea, that no state can care for the mass of its people as the USSR., Poland, Czechozlovzkia, ~~and~~ China, and Rumania are doing and suceeding increasingly well; but the West insists that for civilization to progress a few rich and powerful people must make the mass of people work for their support and comfort. If now the ~~labor of the~~ workers at home are dissatisfied with such conditions, then labor of weak and defenseless lands can be compelled to work for the stronger nations, and ~~then~~ the rich rulers of these nations can then divide the spoils of exploitation. Thus workers in England, France, and the United ~~Sta~~ States get higher wages by sharing in the theft of the labor of Asia, ~~the West Indies~~ Africa, South America , Cuba And Mexico. In return for this, these laborers tax themselves for war and send their sons to ~~fight~~ die. Thus in our age, two vast world wars have been fought by the West to ~~make~~ enslave the labor of the peoples of Asia and Africa. Today the Communist lands seek peace not for conquest of other peoples but to forward civilization: to abolish poverty, educate youth and heal the sick. At present Socialism leads the world in science, technique and social progress; while the United States , Great Britain and France which might use their wealth and power for such objects, are wasteing millions on millians for war and preparation for war. Thus they compell Rumania to spend on defense what she needs for pushing forward the ideals of Socialism ,

Rumania strikes the visitor even of a short time as a sucessful Socialist state: under discipline and requiring sacrifice, and yet ~~with~~ by hard work, it is increasing plenty, spreading democratic methods and progressing in culture and civilization; a well-dressed, well-behaved, intelligent folk, who after years of horrible war, desperately desire Peace. Here, despite theory, I see Socialism at work: the short eight-hour day from eight to four; no unemployment; higher wages: (10% increase or more next September;) cheap , good entertainment; adult education which lets the scrub- woman study medicine. Thus today the Future works.

One cannot finish an article on Rumania, without a special word on Bucarest. I have seen most of the leading cities of the World; I can truly say that the capital of Rumania is one of the most beautiful: its breadth of plan and unity of concept; its public buildings and stately monuments; the gracious width of its streets, with flowers and trees; its wealth of parks and surrounding acres of deep forests, where all may rest and play; and its palaces turned into museums where all may learn; blocks of new housing, no slums. All this makes a city one cannot never forget. Especially in my case, my dark skin and curled hair, evoked here none of that contempt and fear which they call up in America. Rather in these few days I leave behind friends whom I love.

SIX WEEKS IN RUMANIA

by W.E.B.Du BOIS

I was born five thousand miles west of Bucarest in New England which is in the norteastern part of the United States of America. It was a small town of only five thousand persons and noone in town had ever heard of Socialism. The land all belonged to individuals, and because there was much land and not many people the land was cheap. My folk were black and had been kidnapped in Africa and sold here as slave workers. But my great-great grandfather and the man who claimed to own him had wandered east from the valley of the Hudson into the wilderness of the neighboring valley and there began to farm land. Then the folk of New England began to fight against Great Britain and my great-grandfather fought along with them and thus became a free landholder. My father descended from French Huguenots came here and married my mother and thus I was born.

My town of peasant landholders, became capitalist because they knew no other way of life. Everybody ran his own farm, although at times they heped each other out. Some lost control of their land and worked for others. My folk kept their land, but gradually began to work for richer neighbors when the land did not yield enough. When I was a young boy my folk had to worry about sickness, accidents and posible loss of jobs, Especially did they worry about how they would live when they became too old to work. ~~I was a smart boy a d my mot or especially wanted me to be educated~~ so that I might earn a good living, but we were poor and she worried much lest I should not be able to ~~go~~ to school.

From such a childhood I come in my ninety-third year to Rumania. I have previously visited ~~the~~ Great capitzlist nations of the world and also such Socialist countries as the Soviet Union, China,Poland , East Germany and Czechoslavia. Now for six weeks I have been her e, and for a short space I want to contrast this nation ~~and~~ the capitalist lands. Everybody in Rumania is not perfectly happy. Many see things which they could wish better. But on the other hand they have some extraordinar advantages: first, noone is hungry; this is a marvel- contrast to most people in the world. Even in capitalist nations, even in rich United States there are thousands of hungry workers. All Rumanians do not yet hav all the food they would like, but none are hungry. Rumanians still lack sufficient homes; but compared with their faters they are beginiing to be well-housed and the rapidity which is building them mod rnconvenient homes is astonishing. Most of the people in New York where I live have plenty to eat and good homes but not all. Thousands are undernourished, live in wretched houses and earn too little to live decently. Moreover thruout the United States, four or five mill io workers can get no work at all and must live on charity. Moreover of those who comfortable with good income, all are worried: worried as to how they will live

Everybody assumed that the poor existed for the benefit of the rich and that the state existed for its upper classes, w ile the mass of people were of little account. But I was a bright boy and my widowed mother was determined that I should be educated

The difference between a Western capitalist country and a Socialist country is not a difference in gover ment or change of land or peopled. It is deeper than this. It is so complete a reversal of thought and object that at first one can hardly explain. Take an example: two friends came to Rumania and ma de an excursion to Sinaia, where the palace of the lately dethroned Michial. It is a magnificent building, beautifully furnished in magnificent taste. In sheer elegance it surpasses Versailles of Lovis XIV, since it portrays the technique and art of two centuries which built their glory on the Eighteenth century. My friend were overwhelmed with its sheer artistry, but they said hesitatingly, "its open to thepublic;" the masses of workers are free to visit it. Now that did not mean as it would have in New York, dirt, noise, disorder; no, the place was spotless the behavior was orderly, not a scrap of paper nor a ruined flower -- but can one conceive a palace for the public, even if the public is disciplined? Can I really enjoy something if every one else is just as free to enjoy it as I? Can the object of a nation be the mass of the nation's people and not mainly the best, the select of the pepole? Otherwise will not inevitably the level of the nation be lowered, despite all that discipline does to counteract the result In other words, my friends asked, Is it possible to have an upper class without a lower class, and without an upper class what becomes of Civilization?. Yet the answer is Rumania. This is a beautiful, civilized nation, with, education, technik, science and art; with moden homes, theatres, museums and libraries with trees and flowers and miles of magnificent parks. So are all the Rumanians satisfied and happy? O no. There is endless criticism; there is complaint; there is injustice, overwork and underpay; there is failure to recognize desert and undue reward of some ability over other. In other words, Rumananians are still human beings and not angels; their discipline is not perfect and they continual mistakes. But, and here is the miracle: the existence, the food and homes, the education and Art of the mass of the people of the state does not depend on the hunger, degradation, sorrow and murder of the great mass of people pressed down beneath the feet of the aristocratic, wealthy and powerful few. The masses are the object of the existence of the state and not the Cultured few. It is possible even probable that it will take a long time to raise 18 million people to a fair average of decent living and content; that a few might with the same work be made an example of magnificence and wealth in a shorter time but at the expanse of war, poverty and ignorance for the vast majority. This is a fact that the world does not believe of what Eastern Europe, USSR or China does when old; what they will do if they lose their job; what they will do in sickness or accident. Those who earn high wages must pay high prices to live. In Rumania, everyone is sure of a job as long as he can work; old folk are sure of support when they can nolonger work; there are hospitals for the sick where service is free and more physicians to give there service than in America in proportion to population. Rumanians pay from 150 to 400 lei for a pair of shoes Americans pay from 1200 to 3600 lei. You home telephone costs 35 lei a month mine costs 14,400 lei a month. You can rent a small apartment for 200 lei a mont and this includes light and heat. A modern small apartment in New York costs at least 2000 lei a month. To live well then an American must earn high wages and therefor the fierce struggle for income and wealth is the most noticeable thing in our life. We are tempted to steal, overwork, cheat and murder inorder to be secure in old age, cared for in sickness and safe if we lose our wealth or present job.

Now Rumania has found another path to safty and happiness. Instea of leaving the individual to make his own living alone, Rumania tries to make the security, health and happiness of all the people the object of a scientific organization of the state , so that the people are the object of everybody's effort. I see then less worry in Romania; the mass of folk seem happier. They are not near as rich as many Americans; their wages are in many cases not a tenth of ours but they seem more secure. Young people get married at the age when mar- is physically and spiritually best. A sucessful American man does not dare marry before he is forty and then cannot afford children. Rumanians marry at twenty five and the state pays them to have babies.

Moreover in the capitalist nations the itch for wealth leads to crime of many sorts, but especially the Crime of Crimes, War. We are living today in an age which has been ruiened by two world wars fough to enable capitalist nations to control the work and materials of poor defenseless peoples and build civilization on theft and exploitation. For this object the growth and devel- of Socialism in Rumania and other Socialist nations has been kept back by brite force, and the wealth of America is being used for war instead of being used to build great Communist nations. Thus Socialism grows slowly, because it has to waste so much energy in self-defense. And Civilization dies in the western world because they are committing suicide in selfish fight for individual wealth and income.

In these few weeks which I have spent in Rumania, I have seen a happy people, who rather be poor than build wealth on poverty and ignorance; whose streets are lined with flowers and who haved saved and not murdered their beautiful as we have in America. For this they pay in sacrifice and discipline; but how lovely it is of a holiday to see thousands filling the abundnatx and blooming park spaces, without scattering a scrap of dirt or paper or spending handfuls of money which they have not honestly earned. I am convinced that all Rumania are not perfectly happy but that far more Rumanias are content and unworried than among the struggling peopling peoples of New York.

W. E. B. DU BOIS -- UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

It is unfortunate that on the "second day of the world", September 27, it is impossible to tell the world much that is taking place in America to forward the peace movement of the world. I believe every thinking person in the United States wants peace and fears war, knows that the fantastic preparation for war in this country is the greatest threat which faces the world today. And yet, much as we fear war, much as we stagger under unreasonable taxation and waste our vast resources, there is something we think we fear more and that is "Communism", which we describe or have described to us, whether we will or no, as a crime and a conspiracy directed particularly against the United States. We do not all believe this fabrication, but few of us dare to take steps against it.

Linus Pauling on this "second day of the world" sent out an appeal. He said:

"The world is now in great danger. A cataclysmic nuclear war might break out as the result of some terrible accident or of an explosive deterioration in international relations such that even the wisest national leaders would be unable to avert the catastrophe. Universal disarmament has now become the essential basis for life and liberty for all people."

This appeal was signed by leading men of forty nations, including the outstanding leaders of American thought. There are other indications that this great nation is slowly but surely coming to its senses and realising what harm it has done to the world by its insane opposition to Communism and by its treatment of Cuba, the peoples of South America, and the peoples of Negro descent still living in the United States.

It is difficult to judge a nation. There are so may people and they differ in such infinite ways. It is seldom that a person knows the different parts of a nation so thoroughly that he can speak of it as a whole. Usually, unconsciously, he is talking about his family, his class, the part of the nation in which he was born or lives. In my own case I have two advantages in talking about this, my country. I am first of all, a part of America, born on its soil, and steeped in its culture. And at the same time and almost simultaneously, because of my dark skin and crinkly hair, I am apart from the nation and belong to a special minority with peculiar problems. I can look upon this country not simply as mine, but can see it in some vital respects as a stranger looking on.

It the next place I have done much travelling. Beginning as a student in my twenties I went to Europe and have made sixteen or more trips to all parts of Europe during my life. I have been to the Soviet Union and, in a sense, have seen it grow from 1926, in 1936 and in 1959. I have been to Japan and twice to China, in 1936 and in 1959. I have been to West Africa in 1923, in 1958 and in 1960. Once I circled the globe; I have been to Canada, to the West Indies and have glimpsed Mexico. And so I can speak not as one knowing one locality and judging the rest from this, but as one knowing many localities with some chance at comparing them.

My travel has also included all parts of the United States. I have been in every State and in some I have lived for long periods so that I am well acquainted with New England where I was born and where I received my earliest education; I know the mid-west where I lived, taught and travelled. I have lived in the South, in former slave states for twenty-five years. I have repeatedly visited the far west. So that here, again, I can see this great land, not from a single point of view but much of its breadth and differences.

I believe the United States is facing grave disaster; not immediately, not inevitably, but certainly unless soon it radically changes its present course. This disaster is not from abroad, but from within.

It is illustrated by a recent extraordinary happening: This country deliberately planned to invade Cuba after the Cuban people had driven out the dictator whom we encouraged and financed, to invade this revolutionized land in order to help the counter-revolution, whom we expected to rise up and assist us. It was a crazy, ill-judged scheme. The work that Castro is doing in Cuba is marvelous and inspiring and the mass of people utterly support it. Yet, all this we misjudged. We secretly planned an invasion while publicly righteously denying it. Then, to our own surprise, but to that of no one else, we were roundly beaten. The Cuban people did not rise to support us. Communism ~~did not~~ had not invented poverty and ignorance so as to exploit them as we seem to say. Our failure was a set-back for the new administration and the young president, picturing himself leading the nation to a new day, was utterly astonished. Some of his followers had dissented and tried to dissuade him from backing this enterprise, but he had gone stubbornly on. His representative in the United Nations, Adlai Stevenson, to the last minute persisted in saying that the United States had absolutely no part in this invasion. He did this publicly, with sneering repudiation of those who insisted that the United States was openly backing it. When the attempt failed and the truth was out there was one thing for Stevenson, as a man of honor to do, and that was, as Rockwell Kent wrote him, to resign. He did not. He chose to remain "loyal" to the President, and did not retract a single word. In fact, he has recently accepted from a United States organization the designation, "Father of the Year".

The President hesitated. At first he seemed to say that we were immediately going to assist another invasion; then he added that we would have no more to do with the Cuban counter-revolotionists and summarilly dismissed its leaders. Finally, he declared that he would come to no terms with Castro and practically asserted that Cuba might choose any form of government it wanted, so long as it did not choose Communism.

Yet here he faced Castro, triumphant, with the overwhelming support of his people and with 1200 prisoners belonging to a group which had trusted in the armed support of the United States. And with Latin America looking on. More than this, it was at this time that President Kennedy had planned to meet with President de Gaulle of France and talk of arming Nato and freeing Algeria. Also, to the dismay of the President's friends, he arranged to meet directly after the head of the U.S.S.R., as a step toward a new Summit Conference, which we had ruined in 1960 by an unprecedented breach of international faith and then lied about it.

It was quickly pointed out that of all times for coming to terms with the Soviet Union this moment of defeat was the worst. The President therefore felt impelled to take some act or say some striking word which would at one bold stroke, range behind him the public opinion of the United States and, at the same time, show Nikita Khrushchov the absolute invincibility of the United States. This explains the speech of May 24th. I was too astonished clearly to listen to it. I could scarcely believe my ears and I wondered about its impact on the rest of this nation and the world. Americans are not a stupid people. They are a keen and eager folk. They want, or at least they want to want the best, the highest, the most intelligent path to success. But, before this speech of the President, they are silent - or if not completely silent - there is nothing of the recoil, that I would have said, knowing America as I do, recognizing its mistakes as well as its triumphs, was bound to come.

The President sounded childish; he asked to put an American on the moon before the Russians reached it. He tried to assert that this was not mere national rivalry, but he said nothing on the other hand, which showed or tended to show for what particular reason the people of the United States of America needed to have a man on the moon. He talked about the Moon, but he said no word on what the people of the nation and of the world saw going on that minute in Alabama; namely the nation which proposed to lead the world to Freedom, denying with arms, clubs and bricks to a fifth of its citizens, the elementary rights of citizens. And this was not something new. It prolonged Little Rock and celebrated the abolition of slavery in the "Land of the Free and Home of the Brave". At this time, in spite of the government's own laws and law-enforcement officers, ~~he was~~ the President was able to take no vital step or say a definite word concerning Alabama. He talked about the moon. He proposed to spend on exploration of space, on increased armaments, on new devices for defense, nearly two thousand million dollars this year and so on in increasing sums until the total might well reach nine billion dollars. Such a sum might well involve the expenditure of money which could wipe out cancer and heart disease from the world; it could abolish poverty in India, could educate all African youth from kindergarten through college.

That such a sum would be spent was not specifically promised but permission to start its spending was demanded. I should have thought at least the silence of the best classes of America would have been broken, that increasing numbers of people would have begun to ask to be heard in this day of crisis. I listened for this on the radio; I tried to find it in the morning paper. It was not there. There were, to be sure, some indications that the limits of propaganda and mis-education had been reached and that courage had again raised its head in America. But the signs are not many. Some people are asking where is all this money to come from: in a country that has seven million unemployed citizens, where the cost of living is rising and business bankrupcy is reaching a record, where our exports fail by a billion dollars a year to pay for what we buy abroad, where large numbers of its masses earn less than is necessary for a decent living and where even our so-call prosperity is built on increasing debt and widening fear.

I remember having tea with a citizen of Western Europe two years ago, who said to me, watching America, "I will give this country ten years; then disaster, unless meantime something drastic is done." What drastic has been done? There are three things that all men know must be attended to before the world can stand on its feet and think of walking forward. One is to clear up the unholy mess in Berlin which is a bequest of the Second World War stations a foreign armed enemy in the midst of a city making its normal life impossible. This has been done because the United States has systematically refused to end the war. Secondly, we have got to take our hands off Asia where, after the failure of France, we promised to let Southeast Asia do as it wished and then interfered and are interfering. We have deliberately supported Chiang-kai-Chek, whom we ourselves have called a murderer and a thief, and recognized him and his few million serfs with him as "China", while we will not see the triumphant efforts of 670,000,000 Chinese to stand in a world which for centuries has tried to ride on their backs.

These three matters must be settled. Instead of this we are determined to send a man to the moon. Why is this? It is not because Americans are evil. It is because they are ignorant. It is the result of systematic propoganda from 1945 to this day telling the American people that the effort to achieve Socialism and Communism in Russia, in Eastern Europe and in China is a crime and conspiracy and not a struggle toward progress.

This an extraordinary number of American people believe. They have no opportunity of hearing the truth. Their papers, the radio, and television persist in this propaganda. It is worse than anything that Hitler ever did. It will lead to worse consequences unless this nation awakens and lives again as it once did when its eyes saw "the glory of the coming of the Lord" in the abolition of Negro slavery which began in 1863 and is not yet finished. As a result of this prolonged and persistent propaganda, scientifically guided and spread by an increasingly monopolized press and radio, the average American citizen lives in fear. He believes that the U.S.S.R. is ready to attack us at any moment, secretly and by deception. Subtly by television, story and news report this belief is spread: regularly sirens scream to pedestrians and herd them underground, arresting those who disobey; the President recommends that we spend millions to dig holes in which to hide.

We cannot meet this propaganda by reason and reply. There is in the United States no respectable daily paper which would publish this article of mine, not because it is false, but because it is "subversive": it answers the propaganda which those in power want us to believe. Ten years ago, when in my innocence, I talked publicly of Peace and distributed the Stockholm Appeal against ~~aerial~~ atomic warfare I was arrested, charged with treason and threatened with five years imprisonment and five thousand dollars fine. I was handcuffed and fingerprinted. I was finally freed after paying costs of $30,000, not because I was found innocent, but because the judge admitted that the absurd charge was not proved although he said it might be true of people pleading for Peace!

We are afraid not only of attack from without but from collapse from within. We are gambling so outrageously on the stock market that twice recently the president of the stock market warned the nation. Yet we trade five million dollars of shares a day. We gamble at "bingo", a game of chance until the government is starting to investigate. Our cost of hospital care is frightening the sick to death and yet our physicians are spending millions to fight "Social Medicine."

From fear of others the nation turns to fear of itself. We glare at each other on street and subway. We suspect our neighbors and we hate foreigners and folk whose skins are colored. We have lost the joy of living. We want to "get rich quick", we think we can buy anything with money.

Americans were born as a nation with an inferiority complex. They came mainly from serfs and working classes and wanted desperately to gain recognition from aristocrats. England long looked down on us and patronized us. Then Germany gave better learning and France had better art and manners. Now the Soviets are outstripping us. Sputnik showed that they had better engineers and, with a shock, we saw that their educational system was better than ours. Consequently, we do not seek better education, better health, Peace on earth, but to beat the Russians to the Moon!

The hope that still shines is the Negro: shall the nation treat him as a man or give up its Freedom and Democracy? This question holds us back from World War. It helps keep us sane. We try to bribe the Negroes not to complain. When Negro newspapers do complain they lose white advertisers. We send Negroes abroad to atte[redacted]isfaction and then come Little Rock and Alabama! The President's brother, with one hand prays Mississi pi to lessen the punishment of citizens who dare travel, and on the other hand screams to the World that all is well, a Negro may yet be President! In this turmoil and contradiction the Moiseyev dancers show crowded houses the joy of life under Communism. Perhaps this cultural understanding can yet save America.

NEGRO HISTORY, 800-1961

In the Seventh century Asia was alive: the great Tang dynasty arose in China, was overthrown by the Tatars and they by the Mongols, until in the fourteenth century arose the mighty Mings. In Arabia to the west Mohammed was born; his religion swept east to meet Asoka's Buddhism in India and west to challenge Europe at Tours. Arabs began a literature and science which swept over Africa in the Ninth and Tenth century and started a renaissance in Europe. Europe in the Fifteenth century turned to Science, as the Arabs took Constantinople. Europe began to strain against religious dogman in the Sixteenth century and in the Seventeenth turned to the rising riches of Asia and looted India. This in the Eighteenth century led to the rape of Africa to establish slave labor in America.

The wealth which thereupon poured in on Europe made her master of the world. She used her science to harness the powers of nature, to encourage invention and monopolize land and its fruits. She forced labor to sell its future results by contract which meant poverty for most workers and wealth for the few employers. Labor revolted: white labor at home, black labor in the West Indies; indentured labor in North America joined with those who dreamed of an American democracy. France arose in revolution, from the ignorant and poverty stricken serfs to the merchants and traders who were growing rich on slavery. The capitalists won and crying "Freedom" proceeded in the next century to thrive on stolen land and labor the world over and made war universal, using European labor to enslave the labor of the world. The conscience of the world protested. It said that Progress must not be built on Poverty, but on a new Socialism.

In the middle of the Century, Karl Marx put a doctrine of Communism in writing and the world listened. The capitalists of the world, who now held the political power, abolished the African slave trade in order to center their power on actual political control of Asia and Africa. They allayed unrest among white laborers at home by giving them education, political power and teaching them their innate superiority over colored folk and their consequent duty as soldiers to conquer the world for the white race. This ushered in a century of world war, and the white West unable to conquer each other were compelled to appeal to the colored world for help. As a result India demanded her freedom. China made similar demands, was ignored and finally took freedom into her own hands.

In the United States were in 1945 some fifteen millions of acknowledged African descent. In the Eighteenth century they had regarded Africa as their home to which they would eventually return when free. They named their institutions "African" and themselves started migration to Africa led by Paul Cuffee, who at his own expense took 38 migrants to Africa in 1815. In 1817 the American Colonization Society was formed by prominent whites, headed by a nephew of George Washington. Soon the American Negroes were sadly disillusioned: first, their immigrants to Liberia found that Africans did not regard them as Africans; and then it became clear in 1830 that the colonization society was a device to rid America of free Africans so as to fasten slavery more firmly. Negroes therefore slowly turned to a new ideal: to strive for equality as American citizens, determined that when Africa needed them, they would be equipped to lead them into civilization. Meantime however, American Negroes learned from their environment to think less and less of their fatherland and its folk. They learned little of its history or its present conditions. They began to despise the colored races along with white Americans and to acquiesce in color prejudice.

Meantime a great change was sweeping the earth. Socialism was spreading: first in theory and experiment and then suddenly in 1917, in Russia where a Communist state was founded. The world was startled and frightened. The United States joined 16 different nations to prevent this experiment which all wise men said would fail miserably in a short ime. But it did not fail. It defended its right to try a new life, and staggering on slowly but surely, began to prove to all who would look that Communism could exist and prosper.

What effect did this have on American Negroes, By this time their leaders had become patriotic Americans, imitating Americans almost without critism. If Americans said that Communism had failed, then it had failed. And this of course Americans did say and repeat. Big Business bought up the press and news gathering agencies and declared Communism a crime and Communists and Socialists criminals. Some Americans and some Negroes did not believe this; but they lost employment or wnt to jail. Meantime, many thoughtful white Americans, fearing the advance of Socialism and Communism not only in Europe but in America under the "New Deal" conceived a new tact. They said the American color line cannot be held in the face of Communism. It is quite possible that we can help beat Communism if in America we begin to loosen if not break the color line.

The movement started and culminated in a Supreme Court decision which was a body blow to color discrimination, and certainly took the wind out of the sails of critics of American democracy. To the Bourbon South it was said, don't worry; the law will not be enforced for a decade if not a century. To the Negroes the government said, it will be a fine thing now if you tell foreigners that our Negro problem is settled; and in such case we can help with your expenses of travel. A remarkable number of Negroes of education and standing found themselves able to travel and testify that American Negroes now had no complaints.

Then came three disturbing facts: first the Soviet Union was forging ahead in education and science and it drew no color line. Secondly, outside the Soviet Union, in England, France, and all West Europe especially Scandinavia, Socialism was spreading: state housing, state ownership of railroads, subways, busses and other public facilities; social medicine, higher education, old age care, insurance and many other sorts of relief. Even in the United States, the New Deal was socialism no matter what it was called. Thirdly, the former slave South had no intention of obeying the Supreme Court; most Negroes still cannot vote, their schools are poor and the black workers are exploited, diseased and at the bottom of the economic pile. Trade unions north as well as south still discriminate against black labor. Randolph who had red-baited loudly at the command of Meany was ordered to "shut up" when he asked justice from the American Confederation of Labor. But finally a new and astonishing event was the sudden rise of Africa.

My own study had for a long time turned toward Africa. I listened to Bishop Turner, and then heard first from Franz Boas a commencement address at Atlanta, the astonishing story of the Negro empires of the Sudan. I began to read African history; I planned a series of charts in 1900 for the Paris Exposition, which gained a Grand Prize. I planned an Encyclopaedia Africana and attended a Pan-African conference in London at the invitation of a West Indian barrister. I was made secretary of this meeting and drafted its resolutions. I secured names of many distinguished scientists for my encyclopaedia.

In 1911, the Ethical Culture societies of the world called a races congress in London and made Felix Adler and me secretaries for America. At that meeting I met for the first time Africans of education and stature and I conceived a dream; but alas, World War killed it. However in 1915, I published my first book on African history and while funds were not forthcoming for my encyclopaedia, nevertheless there was much interest and discussion. I seized on the idea of having the German colonies in Africa, form the nucleus of a free Africa, but none listened. When the NAACP sent me abroad after the armistice in 1919, to examine the treatment of Negro soldiers, I planned a Pan-African Congress, but got little support. Blaise Diagne of Senegal whose volunteers had saved France from the first onslaught of the Germans, induced Clemenceau to allow the Congress despite the opposition of the United States and Britain. It was a small meeting, but it aroused a West African Congress the next year which was the beginning of independence for Ghana and Nigeria. In 1921 I called a second Pan-African Congress to meet in London, Paris and Brussells. This proved a large and influential meeting, with delegates from the whole Negro world. It spread a demand for treatment of people as civilized despite race or color. It received wide attention and especially aroused the fear of the colonial powers. They were determined to stop the movement. Nevertheless the wide publicity gained by the Second Congress led to the organization of congresses in many parts of Africa by the natives. At the same time the movement of black peasants in the West Indies and in the United States led by Marcus Garvey gained listeners for his demand of "Africa for the Africans". Our attempt to form a permanent organization located in Paris was betrayed but I succeeded in assembling a small meeting in London and Lisbon in 1923, and I myself for the first time saw Africa as Special Minister Plentiary of the United States. I tried a fourth Congress in Tunis but France forbade it. I tried to chart a ship and cruise the West Indies, holding a roaming congress. No boats were for hire. So at last in 1927 helped by a committee of women I called the Fourth Pan-African Congress in New York. It was fairly well attended by American Negroes but few Africans. The Second World War approached and I gave up.

Meantime methods changed and ideas expanded. Africans themselves began to demand more voice in colonial government and the Second Wrold War had made their cooperation so necessary to Europe that at the end actual and unexpected freedom for African colonies was in sight. Moreover there miraculously appeared Africans able to take charge of these governments. American Negroes of former generations had always calculated that when Africa was ready for freedom, American Negroes would be ready to lead them. But the event was quite opposite. The African leaders proved to be Africans, some indeed educated in the United States, but most of them trained in Europe and in Africa itself. While American Negroes for the most part showed neigher the education nor aptitude for the magnificent opportunity which was suddenly offered. Indeed it now seems that Africans may have to show American Negroes the way to freedom. How has this happened? The World is going socialistic. Most people today live under Socialism and half the world looks toward Communism as its goal. Not all will go as far as the Soviet Union or China but none will long lag behind Britain and Scandinavia. Since the New Deal, [illegible] Education did not study the situation but maligned and accused [illegible]th and Communists of being criminals and conspirators. Vicious propaganda kept honest people from studying the situation on pain of jail, hunger or [illegible]. Nevertheless Socialism spread and Communism began to be successful. Today a majority of the inhabitants of the world are socialistic and the trend toward Communism is growing. The Communistic countries are leading in education and sciences and the threat of destructive war led by the United States is [illegible] before the clear hope of peaceful competition as the one goal of man.

The Depression had meantime led to my resignation from the Crisis and returned to study and teaching until 1944 when I was retired. I was recalled by the NAACP and one of the conditions of my return was the reorganising of the Pan-African Congresses. There was still not much enthusiasm in the board of directors. Judge Hastie who was on the committee expressed his doubt of the future of Africa or its relation to American Negro progress. But the invitation from Padmore in 1945 to preside over a Fifth Pan-African Congress in England was eventually accepted and I went.

The rise of Africa in the last fifteen years, has astonished the world. Even the most doubting of American Negroes have suddenly become aware of Africa and its possibilities and particularly of the relation of Africa to the American Negro. The first reaction was typically American. Since 1910 American Negroes had been fighting for equal opportunity in the United States. Indeed Negroes seem faced a curious paradox. For centuries they had fought for equal citizens[illegible]th white Americans. Now equality began to be offered: but in return [illegible] equali[illegible]. testifying to Negro progress. In many cases their expenses were paid by the Department of State. Meantime Negro American colleges have ceased to teach Socialism and the Negro masses believe with the white masses that Communism is a crime and all Socialists conspirators.

Africans know better. They have not yet all made up their minds what side to take in the power contest between East and West but they recognize the accomplishments of the Soviet Union and the rise of China.

Meantime American Negroes in their segregated schools and lack of leadership have no idea of this world trend. They have realized the effort to give them equality has been over-emphasized and some of our best scholars and civil servants have been bribed by the State Department to testify abroad and especially in Africa of the success of capitalism in making the American Negro free. Yet it was British capitalism which made the African slave trade the greatest commercial venture in the world; and it was American slavery that raised capitalism to its domination in the Nineteenth century and birthed the Sugar Empire and the Cotton Kingdom. It was new capitalism which nullified Abolition and keeps us in serfdom. The Africans know this. They have in many cases lived in America. They have in other cases been educated in the Soviet Union and even in China. They will make up their own minds on Communism and not listen solely to American lies. The latest voice to reach them is from Cuba. Would it not be wise for American Negroes themselves to read a few books and do a little thinking for themselves? It is not that I would persuade Negroes to become Communists, Capitalists or Holy rollers; but whatever belief they reach let it for God's sake be a matter of reason and not of ignorance, fear, and selling their souls to the Devil.

MY TREATMENT BY DR. ASLAN

This is an institution with some 200 hundred patients and a hundred physicians, technitians, nurses and helpers. As a hospital it is not organized as efficiently as one of ours: the plumbing is not as good, the system of communication is not as prompt, business matters lag. On the other hand the proportion of physicians and trained personel to patients is extraordinary. I have been visited daily by at least two physicians; most of my injections have been given by Dr. Aslan herself. The whole lower floor is occupied by laboratories and trained analysists with the latest machines and drugs. There is no general ward, but each patient is housed in a little room 8 by 12, with high ceiling, a big window, bed, easy chair, table, radio, clothes closet and clothes rack. There are 100 old people and 100 sick. The long halls are carpeted with clean strips of carpeting covered with clean strips of cotton.. The baths are adequate but not elaborate. Patients are constantly tested for blood pressure, urine analysis and pulse. Less often electroradiograms are taken and blood drawn for analysis. The injections are given usually every other day. They tingle a bit and give a sort of drugged feeling of varying intensity. There are gardens to walk and sit in but not much conversation except in Rumanian. French followed by German are the chief foreign tongues; without these foreigners better stay away. The underlying idea seems to be rest, restoration fo functions by careful attention to week spots. Most Americans would complain bitterly and in vain of the food; the vegetables are fresh and curiously cooked or raw. I never ate so many tomatoes raw, such mixtures of egg-plant, and quantities of rice and maccaroni; the meat is tough but fresh. There is some fruit in season. The hospital is for Rumanians, mostly poor and humble folk. There are few foreigners and fewer Americans.

AMERICA - THE VIEW FROM AFRICA

It will be difficult to make clear to Americans what Africa hears and learns about their land. I am an American, born and bred. I read everything that I can get about my country. But in later years, even when I lived in New York, I have found it increasingly difficult to be sure of what is going on in my country. More and more I realized that I could not trust the newspapers; I could not be sure that if The Herald lied or was deceived, the Courier would, in the long run tell the truth. No! Quite likely The Herald bought the Courier and then, what happened to the Truth? In matters at home and in things I was vitally interested in I could always ask friends to write; or better, I could travel to Mississippi or Texas and see for myself. When, however, it came to far-off lands and strange peoples, to unpopular customs and different civilizations, whence could truth come? The gathering of news became a business and the guiding of public opinion a profitable enterprize. I realized more and more that knowing the truth from foreign countries was difficult if not impossible. The news that came from Poland to Britain was what certain folk in Britain wanted the British to believe. And what they wanted the British to believe was anything that preserved or increased British income.

I have been in Ghana, west Africa, four months; I am eager to know what is taking place in America. Curiously I find this almost impossible. The newspapers contradict each other; and I know that what is printed is what powerful interests want printed. The mail is slow, cables are lost or not delivered.

Then, the flat lying and contradictions are amazing. Last night at an American club in Accra, a meeting of invited guests was held - white and black and colored, British and American. A prominent Negro American spoke, Judge Clancy of Iowa. He assured his audience how fast Negro Americans were progressing and how race discrimination was disappearing; it would allow a Negro President within a generation. Then a Ghanaian asked: But why was Dr. Du Bois arrested. He was not, replied Clancy, firmly. But, another Ghanian insisted, he was arrested, searched, finger-printed and handcuffed. He was released on bail but his trial lasted two months. Then, another colored American named Davis, a cultural attache at the American Embassy, interrupted: O yes, he recalled, Du Bois and four others were accussed of trying to overthrow the government, but after their release, their defence, according to American custum, cost nothing. On the contrary, a Ghanaian insisted, He was not accused of violence but only of being an agent of a foreign power advocaging Peace and he was released because the judge said the accusation was not proven. His trial cost $30,000 which Dr. Du Bois had to beg of sympathetic friends. Here the meeting broke up in confusion.

Today, the world over the truth about America is difficult to know and deliberate lying is forced on confused readers by fear or bribery. Ghana, and all Africa views America with dismay. Is the United States spending ninety billions of dollars mostly for war to get cheap labor or is it helping to feed, educate and clothe the poor and enslaved Africans? Does the United States want South Africa a republic or a dictatorship of color? Who owns the mines of South Africa and Rhodesia and reaps the enormous profits from cheap, black labor? America does not know whether Africa is becoming free and independent, is hating all white folk, is going communist.

What the world wants as never before is the Truth to make it free.

THE QUEEN AND THE PRESIDENT

I have seen the slim white Queen of Britain meet and greet the black, young President of Ghana. Many such sights I have witnessed. Once in Berlin I saw a German Emperor kiss an Italian king as they cemented anew the Triple Alliance. I have seen an American citizen ride down Pennsylvania Avenue to the Presidency of the United States. In London I saw a king ride to his coronation. In Moscow I saw the army which rid the world of Hitler march through the gates of the Kremlin. But none of these sights were more thrilling than Elizabeth of England clasping hands with Kwame Nkrumah of Africa as one hundred thousand black folk roared their happiness.

Yet, one fact marred this meeting and that was the determination of the white British press to lie about it, to distort it, deliberately to misrepresent it. The American press allowed a fairer picture to emerge because Big Business fears that additional dislike in Africa just now might add to our forced retreat in Germany and the Far East.

Ghana is in revolution. This the world knows. Yet this meeting and celebration was orderly far beyond all expectation. A statue of Nkrumah was smirched a week before; there were some minor disorders in the streets, but not near as many as daily occur in London or Paris or New York. With thousands of autos there were traffic jams but only fourteen accidents in four days. The visitor was astonished at the good nature and universal good will. Yet, The London Telegraph printed on its front page a picture of a laughing crowd, which it labelled a mob, being lashing by a "policeman" dressed as no policemen in Accra ever was uniformed. The Observer dismissed the great celebration with a short notice. The mass of white Western world believes today that this visit of the Queen to West Africa is a failure, or even as one daily sneers an "outrageous" royal gesture. It is not. It is a marvelous triumph. I know it! I saw it! What ails white civilation which makes it fear truth?

What we are witnessing is the last ditch effort of the west to hold on to colonialism until economic domination through investment and trade can make it possible for the white west to continue to live on the poverty and ignorance of the darker peoples of the world as well as on such white labor as still submits. It will be a hard struggle and long, but it will fail.

Not since the initiation of Negro History Week can it be observed with such significance or so proudly as in this year of 1962. Today universities throughout the world are turning their attention to the histories of black people. The arrogant assumption that the children of Africa should be grateful for the crumbs of civilization and culture which fell to them from the white man's table has been blown away by the hurricane of change sweeping over Africa itself.

One hundred years ago the United States was engaged in a Civil War, testing the proposition that our nation or any nation can survive half slave, half free. Today, the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of those slaves who were emancipated by Abraham Lincoln are leading the struggle of Americans - black and white, workers and intellectuals, native and foreign-born - who must in our time resolve the same question: CAN OUR NATION SURVIVE HALF SLAVE, HALF FREE?

I hail our present-day Freedom Fighters from Africa where Negro History began more than two thousand years ago. I am in the ancient land of Ghana, which name once designated most of what is now West Africa. It was a land of plenty, abundance of food, hills covered with fine woods, lakes and wide rivers besides which dwelt happy and prosperous peoples. Traders came and went; from the city of Kumasi caravans of goods traveled across the northern plains to Tunis, to Alexandria, through Tashkent to Peking. Order and justice and peace reigned in Ghana. Then, on an evil day came ships from the north - Porteugese, Spaniards, Danes and later English. These newcomers saw the gold ornaments worn by the people of Ghana, gazed in amazemen at the golden stools of their chiefs and the fine casting of bronze pots. Greedily they fingered the gold nuggets with which the children played and soon terror stalked the land. Old maps perserved in the archives show the land as El mina, one huge mine of wealth. They tore and gutted the earth, butchered the people, quarreled and fought among themselves. For a long time gun smoke hid the sun, rivers and brooks turned red with blood, forests were destroyed until west Africa was a vast arid waste through which wandered a few old men and homeless children. Black men and woman had either died fighting or were driven into the holes in the ground to dig and dig and dig. The conquerors divided the land among themselves and the British called their section the "Gold Coast".

Now I lift my eyes and look out across the waters of the Gulf of Guinea. Beyond the park space a white beach shimmers in the sun. This is a week day so the beach is empty; Ghanaians are at work but all day Sunday the wide stretch of the beach was black with people disporting themselves in the water, being tossed about by breakers and generally having a good time. Off where the beach gives way to wharves, several ships are riding at anchor. In the distance the modern city of Accra lifts itself proudly against the sky.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND THE NEGRO

by

W. E. B. DU BOIS

In most respects Lincoln's attitude toward Negroes was that of other average white Americans. He did not really know them. He had no Negro acquaintances until after he became President of the United States. As a poor white he did not even have the ties that bound employer and servant. He saw black folk from afar as comical, shiftless and ugly. But Abraham Lincoln was a man of deep sympathy and he had the rare courage to change his mind as he grew and learned. When, therefore, he saw a colored girl on the auction block in Louisiana, he said that this sale of a human being was unjust not only to the girl but to those who sold her. When as President he came to know Negroes as men he dared to treat them as such.

He began his life work in Illinois at the age of 19 under the Presidency of Andrew Jackson. At that time Illinois had only 2500 Negroes and 30 years later they had increased only to 7500. They formed therefore no problem and probably took little of Lincoln's attention. But he had seen slavery on trips to the South and wrote to a friend:

"You may remember as well as I will that from Louisville to the mouth of the Ohio there were ten or a dozen slaves shackled together in irons. That sight was a continual torment to me, and I see something like it every time I touch the Ohio or any other slave border. It is not fair for you to assume that I have no interest in a thing which is, and continually exercises the power of making me miserable."

When he became a lawyer and entered the legislature his attitude toward slavery was that if the South wanted to keep the institution they had a legal right to do so since slavery was recognized by the Constitution.

In the North free white laborers demanded free soil on which to make a living. Then as Lincoln was forced to take a stand he began further to rationalize the problem of Negroes. He was against social equality. It did not seem to him probable that white and colored people would ever intermarry and he certainly himself would not want a Negro wife. Moreover free Negroes were undesirable. They could not become a part of the nation and if the slaves were freed they would want to live elsewhere and the nation would want them to. Then came the long drawn out controversy over slavery in the territories which finally resulted in war. His debates with Stephen A. Douglass forced both of them to declare and clarify their positions on slavery. The War, Lincoln declared was not a War over slavery. However, he opposed its extension in the nationally owned territories; and then as war actually started he settled on a somewhat different thesis: the War was over "Union" and here he was following the great words of Daniel Webster: "Liberty and Union, now and forever."

But what, as a matter of fact, was this "Union" which became the leading word of the war? What was there in the "Union" of states in itself which was worth fighting about? Lincoln answered and most Americans have followed him that this was a moral question; a question of right and wrong; of communities banding themselves together because of friendship, blood relations and common ideals. Something of this was true but here as in so many other instances history and philosophy assume a moral issue and neglect the foundation of it. The foundation here as usual was economic. It was a matter of income and profits. The original union that resulted in the United States was based on the protection of the trade and profits of merchants who wanted free trade with the West Indies and a part in British trade elsewhere. And so in 1860: the North rushing rapidly into manufactures of textiles and machines wanted a wide market for the sale of these things and particularly they wanted to monopolize the cotton of the South which formed half of the natural exports; that is half of the wealth by which they could buy manufactures abroad. If now the country were divided into North and South, the South would monopolize cotton, would buy British and French products with it and thus cut down its use by the North. Northern manufactures would be ruined, nor could the tarfff legislation favored by the North stop the import of cheap manufactures into the South. Here then was a question not so much of sentiment as of monopoly of raw material based on cheap slave labor. This slave labor was not about to be abolished by the North. Quite the contrary. It profited by slavery. On the other hand this slave labor was not suitable for Northern use and if the North allowed it it would gain the enmity of white workers and especially white immigrants . To hold the white labor vote it must fight against the extension of slavery into the territory where white labor demanded free soil. On the other hand to keep its monopoly of cotton it must not allow the slaves who raised the cotton to be free.

This clear economic aspect of the Civil War was not by any means recognized by all, but the cry of Union served to allow the Nation to bypass the moral question of human slavery; and the North could be aroused to war by an appeal for a fight to preserve the Union. Opposed to Lincoln on this attitude toward slavery had been Stephen Douglass who was a capitalist. It was Douglass who began giving to the railroad corporations land which ought to have gone to the farmers; and those corporations began to build the great lines of railway which united the Nation into an organized industrial unit transporting goods North and South and East and West to the vast profit of land monopolists.

On the other hand the Northern abolitionists did not come out of the controversy altogether with clean hands. They were opposed to slavery but they were willing to compromise if they could be rid of the responsibility of owning slaves. Garrison, Greely and others wanted to "let the erring sisters go in peace," that is to let the South have its slaves and even extend the slave system over the West Indies and Central America into Latin America so long as the rest of the United States was not a part of this organized evil. To this Lincoln answered firmly that he was not going to war over slavery but for union of the country into a closed industrial power. If he could get this union by leaving slavery alone he would do so. If he could only get it by abolishing slavery he would do that, if he could legally. His one objective was to preserve the growing power of this union.

Great Britain on the other hand speaking in the interests of its ruling class saw clear advantage in encouraging the breaking up of the commercial union between the North and South. If secession succeeded Great Britain would have a splendid market in the Confederacy for selling her manufactures and importing cheap cotton and other materials. Opposing, however, the interests of the aristocracy was the increased voting power of the British workers and the British workers had been tremendously moved not only by Garrison and the other Abolitionists but especially and dramatically by the story, words and the appearance of Frederick Douglass, Charles Remond and other Negroes. They bought the freedom of Frederick Douglass from American Slavery when England was on the edge of recognizing the Confederacy.

The South faced the problem of slavery not as a moral question but as a question of property. Robert Lee for instance having sworn allegiance to the United States deliberately broke his oath because he said frankly he had to stand by his state and his property, and his property was mainly slaves. So in the case of the South as a whole it was the state and the state powers which it favored because the state defended property and slavery was a matter of property--of property in human beings and in the cotton and other materials which the slaves produced.

Abraham Lincoln called upon the growing commercial power of the North and the desire of the white workers for free land, without the competition of black labor, to volunteer to subdue Southern secession. He found himself at a tremendous disadvantage because Southern leaders had had military training and Northern leaders had not so that it was nearly impossible to get Generals for the Northern armies. Not only that but Northern white workers were not disposed to volunteer in the numbers needed. Gradually, therefore, right in the beginning of the War nothing but strong moral appeal could bring power to the Northern armies and that moral appeal was freedom of slaves, which drew the artists and writers much more than the workers.

As then the trained military leadership of the South began to overwhelm and put to flight the Northern armies the cry of freedom grew stronger and a demand spread to let Negroes fight for their own freedom. But to Lincoln this was impossible as everybody knew that Negroes would not fight otherwise why were they slaves? Then the facts of the case began to assert themselves. Negroes had begun to drift into the Northern armies as they moved into the South and had become indispensable stevedores, servants and even guards. Lincoln soon recognized that here was an advantage that could not be ignored. Slaves were actually armed in South Carolina to hold points captured by the Northern armies but which there were not enough white soldiers to hold. Lincoln agreed to use Negroes as laborers, stevedores and guards. He ~~became~~ later ready to admit that without the work of Negroes as spies, laborers and armed guards the North could not win the war.

As the fighting increased in intensity and the tremendous cost of the war and the human suffering began to mount Lincoln easily was brought to concede that the emancipation of slaves was the only way to stop the fighting and to maintain that union of power which was to be the United States.

He was strengthened in this by coming to know men like Frederick Douglass and women like the black Sibyl, Sojourner Truth. He saw future difficulties if the slaves were not freed by mutual agreement between North and South. What would be their status after emancipation? Manifestly they could not live as free American citizens because not only white Southerners, but even white Northerners shrank at such a thought. He therefore began to consider two things: how the South could be brought to agree to emancipation and how the Negroes after freedom could be induded to migrate. He tried especially in the border states to bring about voluntary emancipation with reasonable payment for the slaves emancipated. Also later he gave much time and thought to colonization of Negroes to the West Indies and Central America. The repeated offers of compensated emancipation were refused. The attempts at colonization failed, but a miracle was happening that opened Lincoln's eyes further. The Negroes were not only stevedores and armed guards, but they fought. They fought fiercely. They left 70,000 bodies on the battlefields. In addition to perhaps the quarter of a million black laborers there were another quarter of a million who actually bore arms at various critical places and times. They became the soldiers who turned the tide and won the Civil War. Moreover, in addition to those who had enlisted there were millions more willing to enlist.

This tremendously impressed Lincoln. He knew as did others how much Northern victory owed to black sacrifice and as the War began to come to its bitter and bloody end, he wrote a significant letter. I have seen its original in a museum in New Orleans. He wrote to the Governor of Louisiana who was beginning the reconstruction of that state for readmission to the Union: "I barely suggest, for your private consideration, whether some of the colored people may not be let in, as, for instance, the very intelligent, and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks. This would probably help in some trying time in the future to keep the jewel of Liberty in the family of freedom." This was Lincoln's last word before he was murdered--before he was succeeded by Johnson, the poor white, the man who had begun his career by trying to give free land to the workers and who ended as a drunkard, seduced and misled by the conquered planters who flattered and cajoled him. He became a traitor to the working class both black and white.

One wonders what Father Abraham thought, as he marched through Richmond, that long-sought goal of a mighty war, accompanied by regiments of black soldiers singing, "John Brown's body lies a mouldering in the grave, but his soul goes marching on."

Paradox and Portent in Africa

by

What does Europe want in Africa? Historically, Europe was curious to see and know strange people and buy occasional wares; then it imported African labor, - for itself, and for its New World plantations; the demand suddenly expanded with new and widely used crops until it became one of the efficient causes of the Industrial Revolution. The horrors of this trade aroused the conscience of many men and a desire to recompense Africa by converting and uplifting the Negroes. A crusade followed; a faint dream of an independent, autonomous Africa, quickly succeeded before men knew by a widened demand for further raw materials, by new reasons for exploiting black labor, heightened by that very world trade which the slave trade began, and by the Industrial Revolution which slave raised crops started. Colonial monopoly of territory and labor followed, with industrial development and investment for profit.

Singularly few folk have seen the inherent paradox and contradiction in these successive demands. In many minds slavery and religious conversion marched happily hand in hand; back of slave trade suppression lurked colonial imperialism; and when Mwanga killed Bishop Hannington most men saw only heathen savagery and nothing of a national fight for freedom and independence. Today as Africa becomes swiftly and increasingly an area of investment for Europe and America, of exploitation of land and labor for profit in the production of food, clothing, material for further manufacture, and luxuries, it is not easy for the world to realize the increasing contradiction between money-makers and missionaries, between rulers and philanthropists; between education and subjection. Perhaps least of all do missionaries, white officials and black students see the fundamental stresses.

The basic difficulty of posing the present problems of Africa, arises partly from the varieties of men who have represented the white world in Africa, and on whose testimony our present conceptions are based. We have sent holy men like Livingstone and Colenso; civil servants like Johnston and Guggisberg; free booters like Lugard and Jameson; imperialists like Rhodes and Delamere, and endless commercial pirates who regarded neither God nor man. Out of these diverse strands we have sought to weave a single fabric of philanthropy and reason; but of fundamental weight in our judgments, has come lately, swiftly and increasingly, the overwhelmingly powerful influence of Africa as a source of income, as one of the foundation stones of world industrial organization.

Why are white folk in Africa today? There are two answers: economic enterprise and missionary effort and of these two without any doubt economic enterprise is dominant. Just at the time when public opinion in Europe and America is beginning with difficulty to realize that property and profit must be limited by considerations of the public weal, we are developing African colonies on the laissez faire economic philosophy, and in accord with 18th century racial theory and 19th century biology. It usually does not enter our thought that this colonial development in Africa and Asia, must in the interdependence of industry, powerfully condition all economic, political and social reform in the white world.

The Negro Race

First of all the precedent to all understanding of present Africa, the lag between science and popular opinion on the subject of "Race" must be bridged, not only among ignorant masses but in the thought and action of educated men. By taking into consideration certain inherited physical characteristics like skin color and hair form we may loosely divide mankind into three great stocks: the Caucasic, the Mongoloid and the Negroid.

If however we add to these characteristics other physical data like head form and the proportions of the bony skeleton we get different classifications which give no broad groups; if our knowledge enabled us to add mental and cultural differences between human beings we would get hundreds, perhaps thousands of groups which cannot today be ranged into any small number of main races, nor have we any knowledge of the laws of heritage which enables us to designate any of these smaller groups as a "race".

The present population of Africa is probably about 130 million with its greatest density in the Valley of the Nile and its least in the region south of the Sahara. Cultural differences exist not only between Europeans and Africans but within Africa itself. What we must mean then when we speak of the peoples of Africa is a hundred or more clans, tribes or small nationalities, biologically much mixed; belonging predominatly to the darker or Negroid stock of mankind, but fading imperceptibly into the other stocks by a long history of ancient and modern intermingling. The Africans are divided into a number of tribes and groups each of an individual type and within these groups are variations caused by history, environment and intermarriage. For thousands of years streams of foreigners and foreign cultures have flowed into Africa from the outside as indeed into Europe and Asia. As a result there is in Africa today "an extraordinarily large diversity". Through migration and other influences they vary greatly in type, appearance and culture. As a mass they are physically well developed and have a rich and interesting culture.

The Asiatic penetration of modern Africa began in the Nile Valley four or five millenium before Christ and then spread from the seventh and fifteenth century after Christ across North Africa and down the east coast. The European penetration started with the fifteenth century on the West Coast and in South Africa and later in modern times in East Africa, and the Congo basin. The earlier Asiatic penetration formed new groups of mingled Asiatic and African blood and carried on trade in produce and slaves. It did not interfere with land tenure but widely influenced indigenous culture. A modern Asiatic penetration from India was one of laborers and traders forming an unassimilated group which added to the problems of Africa in Kenya, Tanganyika and South Africa.

Ancient Europeans and Asiatic penetration of Africa brought only cultural distinctions between Europeans, Asiatics and Negroes. In ancient Egypt there was long and bitter feud between cultural Egyptians and barbaric central African tribes but no color line because many Egyptians were black and most had mingled Asiatic and Negroid blood. Even when the Arabs invaded Africa and initiated a vast and organized trade in black slaves the distinction between Asiatic and Africans was religion and culture and never mere skin color. So early the Portuguese explorers drew no color line.

When however modern Europe touched Africa, and mainly for trade not settlement the obivious and vivid contrasts in skin color between Europeans and Negroes was early rationalized ~~not~~ with stigmata of a deep and eternal racial difference which justified slavery. In the century of the ~~Rennasance~~ Renaissance, of militant Protestantism and re-born Catholicism, a new human slavery had to be justified in order to be permitted and an incipient revolution in industry spurred men to seek such justification when by swift strides slave labor in America began to pay. Thus the modern Color Bar arose. Europeans developed an economy in which increased profit went pari passu with color caste. This was exhibited by the steps in which various European nations became industrialized. The Portuguese, whose industrial development had not begun in the 16th century, treated the Negroes as prospective equals, intermarried with them and offered some of them chances for education and political development. The Spaniards did the same until the economic interests of their overseas empire over bore their European interests. On the other hand, the Dutch and the English, from the first, had their main interest in their purchase and sale of Africans as workers, and found it safer and more profitable to treat them as an inferior creation. The growth of American slavery and the vast economic interests built upon it, led to a rationalization of this increasingly profitable form of race relations, in the modern form of the doctrine of racial inferiority.

For a century science wasted time and stultified itself in seeking sanctions for a line of inter-racial conduct, which in reality had its only justification in the immense profits which Negro slavery brought to white Europe and America. Color, head form, brain weight, comparative anatomy, and psychological reactions, were in turn feverishly evoked, explored and distorted, to put a scientific foundation under a structure of plain, selfish profiteering, and thus to ward off the increasing threat of the awakening conscience of Christendom, and the eventual development of a labor movement.

Race Relations in Modern Africa

When the African problem changed from a matter of seizing and exporting black labor to methods of making use of labor in Africa for the raising of raw materials, the problem of the relation between whites and blacks in Africa gradually increased in complexity. During the slave trade, with some exceptions, the whites did not attempt settlement, land ownership or dominion on the continent. Portugal tried this at first but Portuguese enterprise did not develop into a chattel slave trade. The Dutch, English and French established temporary "factories" on the coast, acknowledged the independence and suzerainty of the Negro states and carried on trade with them.

When the abolition movement increased in power with the decreasing profit of the American plantation system, there came a period of hesitation when many thought that the best policy both for business and philanthropy was to leave Africa to the development of independent states both native, and artificial like Sierra Leone and Liberia, and to look forward to eventual trade with them. But the demand of world industry was too insistent and the policy of forcible partition and domination ensued. In this way the nations of Europe found themselves established more or less insecurely in Africa, with the necessity of working out a policy of relationship between whites and blacks.

One might envisage three types of race policy in Africa: individual development of whites and natives in parallel segregated areas. This answer will not suit those who wish to exploit Africa for profit for one cannot physically segregate labor and capital. A second proposal might be a development of both races in a common economic structure toward which each would make a contribution. This would call for European technique and capital and for native land and labor. But the maximum profit for whites could not be obtained unless the land was monopolized and native labor controlled; and maximum profit has usually been the goal of the imperialists. A third development would be a native economy built and controlled by the natives with the temporary guidance and advice of whites. This would be an ideal development but it would yield a minimum of private profit and call for extraordinary and costly philanthropy.

Or to put the problem in another way. What shall be the relative weight of the three forces impinging on Africa today: the missionaries representing philanthropy; the administrators representing political control, and industry aiming at profit? And maximum profit was the goal of the most insistent imperialists. A third development would be a native economy built and controlled by the natives with the temporary guidance and advice of whites. This would be an ideal development but it would not yield a maximum of profit at any rate in the present.

Or to put the problem in another way, suppose white men settle and live in Africa, what will be their method and object? What shall be the relative weight of the three forces impinging on Africa today: the missionaries representing the church, the administrators representing political control, and industry aimed at profits? Concentrating our attention upon this matter of economic policy, shall we try to have two lines of economic development in Africa: one for whites and one for blacks with a line of segregation between them; or shall we have them built into a single economic structure; or shall we think of African economic development with the European as temporary adviser and teacher? Due to varying conceptions and adaptations of these policies, and always impelled forward more or less blindly by the demand for income on the part of European investors there has arisen in modern Africa a series of paradoxical situations and conflicting ideals. They may be briefly summed up as follows: 1. A region of white settlers farming land which they largely monopolize, with black tenants and laborers who have few political rights and little cultural autonomy. This was the situation in the older South Africa and in present Kenya. 2. Plantation crops with land monopoly and landless black labor deprived of political rights and cultural autonomy. This was the situation in the Belgian Congo and is still largely true. It has also been in use in parts of Portuguese Africa, in former German Africa and in French Equatorial Africa. 3. White absentee investors with local white managers owning land and mining rights, using white skilled labor and black semi-skilled and common labor. The blacks are without political rights and with little cultural autonomy and political rule completely or nearly so is in the hands of the whites. This describes the situation in Northern Rhodesia, and the mining regions of South Africa. 4. White land monopoly and political domination with black labor. The blacks are allowed some local autonomy. This is the case in Southern Rhodesia. 5. White domination and general control but land still in native hands and cultivated by natives, the natives with local autonomy and some political rights. This is generally the case in French and British West Africa and in Uganda. These different situations are naturally not matters of theory but have arisen in practice throughout the effort to organize industry and obtain profitable investment of capital in Africa.

Raw Materials and Labor Reservoir

The study of the African Negroids and their relation to the white world might remain a matter of leisurely scientific study but for one arresting fact; and that is that in an age of unprecedented economic development and a world knit together by industrial interdependence and torn even to the threat of cultural extinction by wealth rivalry, Africa is looming each year as a greater and greater reservoir of labor and materials. The tensions, jealousies and fears over the ownership and direction of this potential wealth is not only a direct world threat to peace, but an indirect hindrance to economic adjustment in culture lands. We have fared far since the day when Africa was valuable chiefly as a labor reserve for the sugar and cotton plantations of America. It cannot be too strongly emphasized that today, it is the economic significance of Africa, and not the racial, that looms largest in the action of the world.

Today the possibilities of investment in Africa, investment in labor, land and materials, is not only attracting capital but the imagination of capitalists and statesmen. As Lord Olivier has pointed out diamonds, one of the largest and most valuable products of Africa, are peculiarly the sign of kept women and pawn brokers with a value entirely emblematic and for this reason "the most appropriate foundation imaginable for a policy of commercial imperialism." But beyond this, today Africa furnishes nine-tenths of the vegetable oils so widely used now in manufacture; over one-half the gold; over one-third of the phosphates; nearly one-fifth of the chrome ore; over one-fifth of the copper; fourteen per cent of the asbestos; 8.6 per cent of the tin; 14.4 per cent of the manganese; 10.9 per cent of the platinum; 7.5 per cent of the graphite and a slowly but regularly increasing amount of cotton, wool, rubber, bananas and a large proportion of spice. Thus of the basic raw materials of modern industrial life - metals, other minerals, rubber, textiles and vegetable oils Africa looms large in actual production and possibilities. Of foods, one-half of the cocoa comes from Africa; $5 million worth of ivory is still exported annually from Africa.

This is but part of the story. The world is increasingly aware that the possibilities of Africa in production have only been lightly touched. Frenchmen like Guernier look upon Africa as a possible extension of agricultural and industrial Europe. They see wheat and corn for all Europe raised in Africa; cereals, fruits and vegetables as preponderant crops; the banana crop could surpass the West Indies. Vegetable oils in huge quantities might sometime replace mineral oils. The cotton crop could excel the American not to mention other vegetable fibres. Cattle and sheep, hides and wool can be indefinitely expanded. Not only copper but iron, radium and the rarer minerals can be found while possible African power production is among the greatest of all the continents. Most significant in this respect is the argument which Germany with increasing vehemence is putting forward to prove the necessity of African colonies for any European state. Germany, it is reiterated, is obliged to import food and raw material in order to feed and clothe the population and maintain the activities of industry. Tropical and sub-tropical countries are of increasing importance as sources of supply. Before the World War they accounted for nearly one-half of Germany's total imports. Germany's own colonies supplied only a small proportion of these imports but that was due not to lack of capacity but because they were only in the early stages of economic development.

Fat, rubber, fibres, minerals, timber, cocoa, coffee, bananas, tea, lemons and tobacco are instanced as necessary supplies from Africa and it is pointed out that the German colonies were rapidly being developed to supply these needs.

The recent and frantic efforts of the German four year plan to supply "ersatz" for needed raw material is designed not simply for development of materials in Europe but even more clearly for the development of tropical fields.

The white oligarchy in Kenya in 1923 drew this picture of the economic possibilities of Africa. "The development of British territories in Africa opens up a vista of commercial expansion so endless that calculated description is difficult. The bare facts are that the area of these territories is 4,000,000 square miles, as compared with India's 1,900,000; that India's overseas trade is about 350,000,000 pounds sterling, and British Africa's (excluding Egypt) is about 292,000,000 pounds; that the non-self-governing territories, whose total area is 2,628,498 square miles, already produce an overseas trade of 76,500,000 pounds sterling, although their development can hardly be said to have begun; that the average fertility and mineral wealth of their soil are at lease equal to those of any other great land mass; that they hold an intelligent fast-breeding native population of about 60 millions, waiting for guidance to engage in the production of the raw materials of industry and food stuffs; . . ."

MY EUROPEAN EDUCATION

I repeat here an outline of my education in Germany. It was first published in a book called DUSK OF DAWN in 1940.

I sailed in the summer of 1892 on a Dutch boat, the old "Amsterdam," landing in Holland. I wrote gaily, "Holland is an extremely neat and well-ordered mud-puddle, situated at the confluence of the English, French, and German languages." My first memory of it is inextricably interwoven with the smell of clover and the sight of black and white cows.

Europe modified profoundly my outlook on life and my thought and feeling toward it, even though I was there but two short years and my contacts limited and my friends few. But something of the possible beauty and elegance of life permeated my soul; I gained a respect for manners. I had been before, above all, in a hurry. I wanted a world, hard, smooth, and swift, and had no time for rounded corners and ornament, for unhurried thought and slow contemplation. Now at times I sat still. I came to know Beethoven's symphonies and Wagner's Ring. I looked long at the colors of Rembrandt and Titian. I saw in arch and stone and steeple the history and striving of men and also their taste and expression. Form, color, and words took new combinations and meanings.

My introduction to Europe had some characteristic incidents. In my journey up the Rhine I found myself with a Dutch family: a lady, two daughters about my own age or a little younger, and a girl of ten or twelve. They were white and I therefore avoided them; when they strolled to one end of the deck I strolled to the other; but at last they approached and introduced themselves. They spoke both English and German, and I ended by having a delightful trip and by feeling more at home with cultured white folk than I had before in my life. This experience was continued when I spent a summer with Oberfarrer Dr. Marbach in Eisenach. There were other boarders, German, French, and English, boys and girls; we had a delightful time. There was only one false note, when an American husband and wife from the West came, and were so alarmed about my social relations with German girls that they solemnly warned the Marbach family against racial intermarriage. The warning was quite unnecessary. I had already told the daughter, Dora, with whom I was most frequently coupled, that it would not be fair to marry her and bring her to America. She said she would come "gleich!" but I assured her that she would not be happy; and besides, I had work to do.

In the fall I went up to Berlin and registered in the university. In groups of one hundred we went into a large room with a high ceiling ornamented with busts of Berlin's famous professors. The year's Rector Magnificus was the widely famous Rudolf Virchow. He was a meek and calm little man, white-haired and white-bearded, with kindly face and pleasant voice. I had again at Berlin as at Harvard unusual opportunity. Although a foreigner, I was admitted my first semester to two seminars under Schmoller and Wagner, both of them at the time the most distinguished men in their line; I received eventually from both of them pleasant testimony on my work. That work was in economics, history, and sociology. I sat under the voice of the fire-eating Pan-German, von Treitschke; I heard Sering and Weber; I wrote on American agriculture for Schmoller and discussed social conditions in Europe with teachers and students. Under these teachers and in this social setting, I began to see the race problem in America, the problems of the peoples of Africa and Asia, and the political development of Europe as one. I began to unite my economics and politics; but I still assumed that in these groups of activities and forces, the political realm was dominant.

But more especially, I traveled; living cheaply, I saved good sums for the numerous vacations. I went to the Hansa cities; I made the celebrated Harzreise up to the Brocken in the spring. One Christmas vacation I spent in making a trip through south Germany along with a German-American and an Englishman. We visited Weimar, Frankfort, Heidelberg and Mannheim. Over Christmas Day and New Year's we stopped in a little German "Dorf" in the Rheinpfalz, where I had an excellent opportunity to study the peasant life closely and compare it with country life in the South. We visited perhaps twenty different families, talked, ate and drank with them; listened to their gossip, attended their assemblies, etc. We then went to Strassburg, Stuttgart, Ulm, Munchen, Nurnberg, Prague and Dresden. In those places we stayed from one to five days following our Baedekers closely and paying much attention to the Munchen and Dresden art galleries. The whole trip cost about eighty dollars. Later I went down to Italy; to Genoa, Rome and Naples, and over to Venice and Vienna and Budapest; up to Krakau, where the father of a fellow-student was the head of a Polish library. From this friend, Stanislaus von Estreicher, I learned of the race problems of the Poles. Then by Breslau I came back to Berlin. In 1940, von Estreicher died in a German concentration camp, after he had refused to be one of Germany's puppet rulers of Poland.

I received a renewal of my fellowship and spent a second year in Germany. By that time I knew my Germany well and spoke its tongue. I had associated with some of the lower nobility, many of the "Gelehrten," artists, business men, and members of the Social Democracy.

I returned to the United States by way of Paris where I stayed as long as possible and then, having reduced myself almost to the last cent, took passage to the United States in steerage. It was by no means a pleasant trip, but perhaps it was good introduction to the new life; because now at last at twenty-six years of age and after twenty years of study I was coming home to look for a job and begin work.

SOCIAL REFORM AND THE BIBLE

The Bible is a series of books of different origins. The Old Testament dates from about the second century and is composed of various forms of Hebrew literature: poetry, history, the Law as laid down by Moses, lyrics like the Psalms, proverbs, fiction like Job and songs and drama like Ruth and also and most important for our purposes the words of social reformers called prophets.

There were three chief prophets: Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel and 12 other prophets. To illustrate what they meant by social reform the celebrated 53rd Chapter of Isaiah is perhaps the most important, the first 7 verses and the 12th verse:

"Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?
For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground: he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him.
He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not.
Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted.
But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed.
All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.
He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth. . . .
Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors."

The New Testament appeared in its present form about the fourth century and the English translation which we know best was made in 1611. It was based on manuscripts purporting to give the sayings of Jesus Christ and the rest of the apostles. In its present form it consists of 4 gospels of which Mark is the oldest and upon this gospel is based, more or less, the other gospels: Matthew, Luke and John.

Then there are the Acts of the Apostles, the various letters of Paul to the early Christian churches and the Apocalypse.

The words of Jesus as one of the great social reformers are of most importance to us and we may select the well-known Sermon on the Mount as illustrating his social philosophy: (Matthew 5:3-10)

"Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

"Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted.

"Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth.

"Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled.

"Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy.

"Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.

"Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God.

"Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

The need of sacrifice. The world demands sacrifice from ordinary people, from the poor, from folk who are not personally attractive as well as from others. This sacrifice will call for the endurance of insult, sorrow, loneliness, pain, silent patience and hard work for the benefit of other people even to the extent of death. The reward for this is vast but it may not come while the man who is making the sacrifice lives. Eventually the sacrifice will make him a co-worker with the great and the strong even though his name is forgotten.

The people in this world who count are not the proud and happy and arrogant. On the contrary, they are the humble, sorrowful and the meek. They are those who desperately want to do the right thing, who are not revengeful, who keep clean in body and mind and who will not fight but are willing to endure pain without retaliation.

BIBLE TODAY

TOM WATSON 1906 - 1920

Tom Watson said that in Ga. they did not dare to disfranchise the Negro because the men who control the Democratic party machine in Ga. knew that a majority of the whites were against them. They need the Negro to fight us. (The white primary could be shelved any time they needed the Negro vote.

Tom Watson's magazine, Mar. 1905

offered the Democrats to support any anti-machine candidate running upon a suitable platform that included a pledge of a change in our constitution which will perpetuate white supremacy in Georgia.

"the white people dare not revolt so long as they can be intimidated by fear of the Negro vote. Once the bugaboo of Negro domination was removed, every white man would act according to his own conscience and judgment in deciding how he should vote." Held balance of power in Democratic party.

1905 Sept. 12 came out for Smith and spoke for him -

Watson attacked corporations and railroads - Howell defended them. Hoke Smith won (with 90,000 Populists) but not Watson's own county. In this campaign he was viciously anti-Negro. Riot of 1906 was probably incited by his writings.

Watson said, "Everybody knew that the disfranchisement issue was the causeof our success." Papers were filled with anti- Negro sentiment. Lynching was openly advocated and frequently practiced. Watson anti-Negro in speeches, too. Editorials against the Negro. Broke with northerners - who sent letters objecting, (such as Upton Sinclair). Withdrew from editing his "Tom Watson Magazine" Oct. 1906 - besides ideological disputes he had arguments with the Northern mag. office - Mann accused him of being dictatorial and he suspected Mann of financial shenanigans. When he withdrew N.Y. magazine gave up.

New Magazine in Jan. 1907 (Watson's Jeffersonian Magazine) published at Hickory Hill, all Watson - Watson horseback, three generations of Watson, Watson's servants, etc. The October 1906 "Weekly Jeffersonian" was changed to Jefferson Weekly.

Was very difficult to get along with as is seen in many complaints throughout his correspondence.

Hoke Smith friendly now - sent his son to visit at Hickory Hill. Watson cont'd to endorse his administration - said Smith whipped the corporations! Watson, having supported and helped Smith in, was constantly consulted on appointments, bills, advice. The RR Commission was increased, utilities put under supervision, prohibition passed, disfranchisement passed (thru registration requirements). Smith sent set of Voltaire to Watson.

Case of Arthur Glover - a supporter (ignorant, illiterate) of Watson's, killed woman worker. Asked Watson for help. Watson knew Boykin Wright, persecutor of Glover, had been in Augusta ring that almost killed Watson during one former campaign in 1892. He asked Hoke Smith to grant clemency. Smith refused. Watson was embittered against Smith, sent Voltaire volumes away from Hickory Hill. Wrote against Smith in January 1908.

Watson secretly supported Joseph Brown of Marietta in 1908 in reprisal against Smith. Brown was son of millionaire railroad promotor, against labor and Negroes etc., and had attacked Smith in 1906. The panic of 1907 came and Smith was blamed for it. Gradually Watson attacked Smith that he hadn't made enough reforms. Hardwick pleaded with him to stay with Smith, but Brown gave $2674.10 for a "campaign issue" of the Jeffersonian and Brown won a majority of 12000.

August 1908 he wrote his wife that he would be with her more. He dined with President Roosevelt 1907, wrote complimentary letter to Roosevelt Dec. 18, 1907.

Both parties took his platform in 1908 - last convention of Populists. Nominated Watson president. Watson into "white supremacy", against corporations. Brown ran as governor FOR corporations. Watson claimed it was farmers vs. corporations and poor CAN get land. When confronted with tenant farmers he said some "prefer to rent."

In 1904 he had $258000.

Many populists deserted him for the socialists. Tom Watson then wanted to "explode" socialist theory, though he was for STATE socialism, but against ~~x~~x socialism of "private property". Said socialism would never make white women safe from the lust of the Negro. Also, he said Marx and Engels were JEWS! Private property ~~xxxxxxxx~~ sacred. Daniel De Leon attacked him 1910.

He returned to the Democratic Party (to clean it out). Smith vs. Brown. Watson didn't take sides - wanted to mend his fences. Thomas Hardwick, Watson's lieutenant for 8 years left him and sided with Smith. Smith won. Brown got the "faithful 17,000" of Watson's.
Watson made a speech of reconciliation ~~xxx~~ but was a flop.

Hated Smith now. spread rumors and scandals and sex gossip about Smith. "Atlanta Georgian" printed refutation of these rumors after an examination of them. Watson attacked Seely, editor of Georgian. Seely concocted a rumor about himself, let Watson get hold of it. Watson spread it and then Seely exposed the fraudulence of it.

In 1910 Watson invested $100,000 in publishing. Mrs. Alice Lytle helped him on the magazine. A large vigorous woman, Irish, admired Watson, separated from her husband, moved to Hickory Hill (but gossip about relations with Watson unfounded). Watson became dependent on her. She was against Catholics and Negroes.

Watson had a big party at Hickory Hill, spent $232.31.

He published scandals mostly, now (a down period for him), was radidly against Negroes and Catholics - published sensational stuff about what went on in convents, Negro priests, ruination of nuns, ets. However, he sent a daughter to a Catholic school for a short period. He was afraid of assasins during this period. ~~In 1912~~ He became rabid. In 1912 he attacked a Catholic man in the lobbey of Kimball House, Atlanta, on no provocation.

Catholics boycotted him and his advertisers. He lost $50,000 being against Catholics.

U.S. charged him with sending obscene publications through the mails. He was arrested June 3, 1912, case called Oct. 1913. He had it quashed. It went on for 4½ years. Had one mistrial. The third trial in Nov. 1916 finally acquitted him. He had publicized it and made himself a martyr through his publication. Trial was crowded with people.

Wanted to regain state dominance after 1910 defeat. He was against Wilson - didn't like the history book Wilson wrote -- too Tory and New England instead of for the South, and it kowtowed to Catholics. Also, Wilson had sent Washington a message when BTW had some scandal.

Watson supported Underwood (he was more of a Southerner) for President. In 1912 he went to the Atlanta convention - throngs met him. He proposed to take the Democratic leadership from Bryan. They compromised on a delegate to national convention between Howell forces and Watson's. The Underwood manager gave Watson credit for his victory, all the big shots came to his hotel room to consult with him. He lost interest and didn't attend national convention. First he was for Champ Clark, then Wilson, and then against Wilson. Finally he BOLTED the Democratic ticket to Roosevelt! The Democrats still wooed him. News of his favor or disfavor would make or break a would-be candidate. Governors were elected by him, but he exacted such subservience that usually they turned against him and he would be vituperative against them.

In 1914 Smith elected - against Brown who Watson came out for. Watson then said Smith had supported Leo Frank who was a JEW!

Leo Frank - case - I have notes if necessary.

Case of Leo Frank. He was a Jewish superintendent and when Mary Phagan, a fourteen year-old girl in the pencil factory was murdered he was accused. Because he was a northerner and Jewish, public opinion was against him. He had a 30 day trial with mobs at the court and outside. Editors of papers raged against him. He was found guilty. Tom Watson declined $5000 to defend him. Early in the case he said the man didn't have a chance if the case was tried in Atlanta. Mar. 1914 asked for retrial, ~~x~~ Hoke Smith came out for Leo Frank so Tom Watson then became vitriolic against him (Frank). Tom Watson wrote sensationally ~~xxxx~~ against Jews with all the worst lies. ("Journal" had asked for retrial but when Watson roused public they dropped the case). ~~xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx~~ June 22, 1915 set as date of execution. Slaton, governor, signed commutation just before he left the governorship, in spite of Watson's threats. Then he needed martial law protection against the mob. 5000 marched on ~~his~~ Slaton's home and wounded and disabled 16 soldiers ~~xxxxx~~ who fought to protect Slaton.

The Frank case jumped Watson's subscriptions to "Jeffersonian" from 25,000 to 87,000 (sensational, lurid, prejudiced, etc.) by Sept. 1915. Profit was ~~xxxxx~~ $1,123.75 a week. The price also went up.

He wrote against Slaton and Frank.. so that ~~by~~ August 16 a mob took Leo Frank from the state pen. ~~xxxxx~~ and hanged him. Ground heel in his face,

After this Watson wrote a medical friend: "A ... nervous trouble returns to me about once a month and for several days I am so despondent and distressed about nothing that it is difficult to live." conscience ???

Government had case against Watson on articles on Frank case inciting - ~~He~~ Watson sent man to Governor Harris to go to Atty. General. Harris did, and then a delegation went to Atty. General. Case was dropped. against Watson

instead of Harris

In spite of promises, Watson then supported Dorsey (who had persecuted Frank as ~~pty~~ atty. for state). they won't All Watson's cronies were given the spoils -- His vice-president of publishing house was made Commissioner of Agriculture.

In 1915 KKK had a new inauguration and started again. Perhaps due to the Watson prejudicial ~~xxxxfx~~ editorials? (after Frank case)

During war Watson was against Wilson and intervention. Then when patriotism rose, he was for intervention - for allies. Then against the war as war of commercialism. Against sedition laws, military service, etc. In June 1917 the U.S. govt. stopped his paper under the "Espionage Act". He wrote "Why are we fighting against conscription and encouraging of soldiers to enlistment for foreign service?" article. For draft resistance. He announced he would fight the constitutionality of the Conscription Act May 18, 1917.* Checks to help the fight poured in - $100,000. For the fight he selected a case of two NEGROES who hadn't registered. August 18 was the hearing. Act was upheld.

* [He made address against conscription at Thomson June 22, 1917. (under Sedition Act?) or Espionage]

In August Postmaster General complained, that his paper shouldn't be sent through mails. Watson asked for injunction which was ~~xx~~ rejected. The last number of his publication was August 23, 1917.

Low period of his life. Frustrated. His last daughter died one week later. He took to drugs and drinking heavily. January 1918 he went to Florida. His last child, a son, died in April. Watson went out of his mind, was found wandering and muttering - mostly his old speeches. Drank. His temper became worse. Grief.

In July 1918 he got better. Brought out "The Guard" which was also suppressed. He became scared after Debs was put in prison and wrote to Atty. General telling of his poor physical condition, that his children had died and he was grief-stricken. Promised "no further criticism of the administration" if he wouldn't be molested. Gov't. dropped the charges.

In 1918 he himself ran against Carl Vinson for Congress. His first public appearance was at home of Alexander Stephens! He was still morbid and melancholy.

He said war was not right but should be ended successfully since we were in it. (I have notes about his contesting something and state convention refused to consider it -I don't know what it was about). Congressional ticket ?

He put out a new paper after the Armistice. "Columbia Sentinel" 1919. Against Wilson (because his paper was banned this paper had to be posted in another town). He was for repeal of war legislation, for free speech and civil liberties (he had been hit). For amnesty, for prisoners and Debs. "What Were American Troops doing in Russia" he wrote (for Russia). Against the Palmer raids of 1919.

September 1919 a crowd of 7-8000 heard his speech at Thomson. He spoke for three hours. Denounced also the League of Nation!

Mrs. Lytle at this time said he was in good health. The circulation rose. In 1920 Palmer was Democratic presidential candidate at Georgia primary. Tom Watson for Senator James A. Reed. He was anti-Wilson, anti-League. But he withdrew for Hoke Smith and Tom Watson still bore a grudge against Smith. Watson then ran himself against Smith and Palmer.

votes:	Popular votes	county	convention
Palmer	48,460	55	148
Watson	51,977	56	132
Smith	45,568	43	104

Watson won in an alliance with Smith. But at National Convention which was Wilson dominated, Palmer won. So Watson might have been Pres. candidate

American Legion in 1920 for Dorsey (who had broken with Watson like most people did eventually) They hekkled Watson. He attacked Legion as "rich officers" who had murdered Rosa Luxembourg in Europe, and were cruel to our boys in the army under them, etc.

Ran against Smith for Senate. Made three auto trips. In Buford Watson couldn't sleep, threw a book at noisy card players in the hotel. An officer came to arrest him. Watson resisted, he was mishandled and spent the night in jail (1920). He had been attacked as Red and Bolshevik and he scoffed at "Red menace". He revived the Catholic menace. He was for civil liberties. At his Atlanta speech 10,000 were turned away!

Watson was elected with 111,723 popular votes, 102 counties, 247 county units. Dorsey got 72,885 pop., 38,county, 103 county unit Smith got 61,729, 14 and 34.

He went to Washington as Senator. Lytle bought him a dress suit. He was very disgusted at Harding's reactionary administration and he was a lone "Red". He was moody. Drank. Had terrible ashhma. Senate librarian said he read voraciously. Spoke a lot. - in senate. They gave him very few committee appointments. He presented a resolution requesting that David T. Blodgett, Iowa, be pardoned. He was in prison for ~~reprinting~~ printing Watson's speech. This resolution was not reported out of committee.

He defended USSR. For soldiers bonus, against prohibition; against U.S. Steel and American Legion, and coal mine operators.

Made charges of army cruel treatment of soldiers. This was investigated (he always exaggerated). Mrs. Lyte went to Coolidge to ask the investigation be dropped and it was. Watson challenged to combat senators, army man.

He was against H$_o$over (said his accounts should be looked into). Melancholy and drinking. In 1922 the heat was bad, asthamabad, ill but still went to office. Sept. 17, 1922 had bad attack of asthma. His last request was to have the letters from evicted miner families reprinted in the Congressional Record. Sept. 25 he had bronchitis and ashhma and died of cerebral hemorrhage at 2:40 Sept. 26.

7-10,000 at his funeral at Hickory Hill. KKK cross was there. Debs wrote mrs. a letter of condolence praising Watson.

I got the impression that he usually tried to get popularity by getting on the bandwagon if he thought he couldn't do otherwise. Wrote very scurrilous articles, lied, exaggerated, sensationalized.

GOVERNMENT OF GEORGIA

1920 Hardwick is elected governor and TOM WATSON elected senator.

1922 Walker was elected governor and was re-elected in 1924, serving as governor 1923--1927.

1926 Hardman, a physician and businessman was elected governor and served two terms, 1927--1931. In 1930 Atlanta University system was established. During his administration Warm Springs was established as a sanitarium.

(1930) RICHARD B. RUSSEL served as governor 1931 - 1933. Under him in 1931 the University system was established with one university, six senior colleges, six junior colleges and three Negro institutions. RUSSEL was elected U.S. Senator in 1933.

Under him the state was re-organized so as to be made up of 19 instead of 90 boards, departments, etc.

Under the acts of 1931 and 1933 the University Board of Regents was to receive all money appropriated for the university and its branches.

The Engineering Dept. of the University of Georgia was consolidated with the School of Technology.

1932 Eugene Talmadge was elected governor and served two terms, from 1933 - 1937.

1936 Rivers was elected governor and served for two terms. He defended the New Deal.

Talmadge tried to secure nomination for U.S. Senator in 1938 but failed.

(1940) 1941 - 1943 Talmadge became governor again.

1943 - 1947 Arnall was governor. He was succeeded by Talmadge. Talmadge died before inauguration and his son, Herman, became governor.

During his second term, 1935-37, Harry Hopkins refused to dispurse federal relief funds through the state and Talmadge became violently opposed to the New Deal. He tried in 1936 and 1938 to be nominated for the U.S. Senate but failed. He became governor 1941-3 and in 1941 interfered with the state University system and in 1942 was defeated by Arnall who became governor 1943-7. Talmadge was elected again in 1946 but died before inauguration.

When the election of senators came up, former Governor Brown was in the lead, but the planters were bitter with Brown because he had co-operated with the Republicans and they threw the revolt away from him and Stevens and elected Josiah Hill and the Republican Bledgett, by the help of the Negro votes.

The campaign for Governor in 1880 was stormy. Gordon resigned from the Senate and Colquitt appointed Brown to his place, probably through a political bargain. Brown was rich enough and Gordon wanted to make some money. It was said that Brown's course during Reconstruction had given him standing and influence with financiers in the East.

The first sign of political revolt arose in the western half of the Northern mountain area of the state where a Bullock Democrat selected by Brown, Gordon and Colquitt, was beaten by a country doctor who was sent to Congress. This was in 1874 and by 1878, the Independent movement against the Democratic machine had captured about one-fourth of the state.

In 1880 Grady supported Colquitt. Colquitt with the capitalists beat Watson's candidate Norwood. The Negroes liked Watson's attack on the convict lease.

In 1880 the International Cotton Exposition. The building was afterward converted to a cotton factory, and between 1880-85 the number of cotton spindles in Atlanta doubled.

In 1880 Brown gave $50,000 to the University of Georgia.

In 1881 in Watson's district there were 5,500 Negroes and 3,300 whites. Watson came out for free schools and against the convict lease.

Grady was very popular. His ideas were endorsed by A.C. McClure, and Pig Iron Kelly.

Cleveland visits Atlanta.

1887 the Farmers Alliance enters Georgia and sets up cooperatives.

1888 the Jute bag Trust is formed in St. Louis. A meeting of 800 farmers in Thomson start a boycott

1889 Watson enters the race for Congress against the rich Major Barnes, 22 months before the primaries in the 10th congressional district.

1890 Watson is nominated for Congress by the Farmers Alliance and in six out of 10 congressional districts. The Democratic candidates lost their seats, and in the other four districts compromised. The Alliance controlled the state convention, chose the governor, wrote the platform, elected 3/4 of the Senators and 4/5 of the Representatives.

1890 all over the south and the west the Alliance was victorious.

1890 it was necessary to elect a Senator to succeed Joe Brown. Brown had succeeded Gordon in the Senate. Gordon now wanted to go back to the Senate. He joined the Alliance and although the Augusta Chronicle said that he was "visionary, profligate, unreliable and unbusinesslike, he succeeded in beating a grandson of John C. Calhoun, and with the support of Watson won the nomination. Calhoun was a railway attorney.

1890 Ocala meeting of the Farmers Alliance, turned toward a Third Party movement.

1891 Cincinnatti meeting of the Peoples Party.

THE FUTURE OF GERMANY

By W. E. B. Du Bois

When I received my first academic degree in 1888, I chose "Bismarck" as the subject of my oration. I was twenty years of age and of course had never been outside the United States. But I had read of the Franco-Prussian War and I was tremendously impressed with the character of Bismarck so far as I could learn about it. Later I came to know more. From 1892 to 1894 I was a student of the social sciences in the University of Berlin. During my vacations I took every opportunity to see as much of Germany as possible. I spent a summer at Eisenach. I attended meetings of the Social-Democratic Party in Berlin. I visited the Hanse cities, made the Harzreise, spent Christmas in a village in the Rheinpfals, visited Leipzig, Breslau, and Muenchen, and had glimpses of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and Hungary. Later in my life I again saw Germany after the First World War. I was in Berlin and Stettin in 1926 for several weeks. Then in 1936 on a Fellowship supplied by a German-American organisation I spent five months in Germany at the beginning of Hitler's reign.

From this basis of knowledge I venture as a foreigner to say something to the German people concerning their future in this day of crisis for the whole world. I can conceive pretty clearly the kind of German state which Otto von Bismarck had in mind. It was a closed, unified state with a common cultural heritage, one language, and a magnificent literature. He proposed that this state, able to defend itself from all aggressors, situated in the midst of Europe, would develop and grow and make a still greater center of civilization than it was at the end of the nineteenth century. It would support itself by agriculture and industry, make the things which it needed, and following the great example of the Hanseatic League, make also some of the best and most useful articles which it would sell to the rest of the world for things Germany could use. The course of this cultural development would be guided by an aristocracy not simply of birth but of training, using not simply hereditary German elements, but contributions from Jew and Slav and importations from the ends of the earth.

At the time I first saw Germany this goal seemed to be in ready reach. Under the second Wilhelm, there was, to be sure, foolishness, show, and distorted ambition, but nevertheless the mass of the German people were educated; they had among their great leaders some of the best brains of the world; their writers were listened to everywhere; their scientists led civilization; and the average German was satisfied with life and hopeful of it.

There was, of course, the great mass of artisans and of working people, of peasants and forgotten folk who were not yet conceived of as an integral and indispensable part of the German people and the source of future ability and ideal. But even here there was movement and I could feel it in the meetings of the Social-Democracy, and in the efforts of the state to protect the worker.

But there was one thing which Germany did not realise, and that was that the modern world at the opening of the twentieth century was being deliberately divided into two great parts which were looked upon as being permanent and necessary. The one part led by the British Empire conceived of the modern world as building civilisation upon a white Europe which was going to depend for its culture, food, clothes, luxury, and comfort mainly on the land and work of the rest of the world. These colonial and semi-colonial regions, inhabited for the most part by people of more or less colored skins, were regarded by reason of their natural gifts and possibilities to be the servants of the white folk of the earth, and that their land, labor, and material would serve as the foundation of future civilisation. Moreover, the white peoples of the modern world who were to conduct this vast operation and determine the division of the world's income, were not necessarily all of the white peoples, but were especially the English, who started colonial imperialism, the French, who with some difficulty forced themselves into a position of sharing, and later the English-speaking peoples of North America.

In the first quarter of the twentieth century, this meant that the center of world rule was in the hands of Britain, France, and the United States, and that Germany and Austria, with Italy on the fence, precipitated the First World War in order to compel Britain, France, ~~and~~ and the United States to grant them a larger share of the colonial loot in Asia, Africa, and South America.

Thereupon the second part of the world that had been neglected and taken for granted; the peoples of Asia, Central America, and finally of Africa began to insist that as their price for helping the imperialists during their struggle for income, they themselves be recognized as having some degree of independence and autonomy. The result was the rise of the first Socialist nations in the world with a concept of civilization higher than industry, trade, and military force and based on the ultimate concept of income produced by the training of ability and distributed according to human need. In the bitter effort of Western Europe and the United States to prevent any such organization of the world as would stop the leading nations of civilization from fattening on the ignorance, poverty, and disease of most of the world, Germany was cut in two.

Now comes the problem and the pressing problem, not only for Germany but even more so for the world: first, how long and how far shall Germany remain divided into two parts, the one under the control of the still powerful Western concept of holding most of the peoples of the earth as serfs to feed, clothe, and amuse the more powerful peoples; and how far Germany shall make common cause with the mass of the world's population, the workers of Europe, the poverty-stricken, diseased, and ignorant masses of the rest of the world who are today struggling to their feet and determined to become an independent part of the modern world and of future civilization. The main question which will settle this matter is the question of war. As the war of civilization upon the backward people during the nineteenth century placed most of the world in slavery to the rest, so today the military power of the West built upon a new and miraculous technique is in a position to keep most of the world in slavery if it insists on following the leadership of the United States, Britain, and France. If on the other hand there should arise a united Germany which refuses to take part in further world wars, which insists on industry for the welfare of mankind and for trade to advance democratic equality among all peoples; and which insists that having itself once based its existence on the most perfect military machine of its time -- such a Germany would have the brains to learn that civilization is not a matter of force and would have the courage to declare that war must stop; and that it will have no part in a Third World War which can mean nothing less than suicide.

Germany must realize that outside of this one main question, as to whether she is willing to join the colonial imperialists or side with the Socialist leaders of peace, there is absolutely no question which need divide the great German people from a new and unified culture.

AMERICAN NEGRO POLITICAL ACTION 1840 - 1860

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

When Abraham Lincoln was born there were a million Negroes in the United States. As he looked around him as a boy every fifth person he saw was of Negro descent. A half century later when he was elected President in 1860 there were four and a half million Negroes in the country, or 14 per cent of the population. They formed a much larger proportion of the workers. Something between one-fourth and one-third of the American citizens were Negroes belonging to the working class. That means naturally that history takes little account of them because history has been used to telling about the dictatorship of property--the people of wealth. Concerning them it records minute details: the way they dressed and lived, their words, their marriages, their family. But of the people doing the work necessary to support the community it has only been lately that history has made any record. And even today the record is faulty.

Moreover, in the United States 1850 to 1860 in addition to the black workers, the white workers increased rapidly. Twenty three thousand immigrants arrived in 1830; while in 1855, 500,000 were coming in annually. These were the people who built America and they were not as history might let us believe merely a mass of unthinking clods. The Negroes were active and their activity impinged on politics. In the South they raised cotton and with black labor and free rich land toward the West, cotton became king. One-half of our exports was cotton lint going chiefly to England. Not only did Negroes hoe cotton, but there was in the South a class of upper Negro servants who raised and nursed the children and who conducted the aristocratic households of the plantation owners whose political power ruled the United States and so impressed the world. In addition to that Negroes were the chief artisans of the South. They built the home and the public buildings, the roads and thoroughfares. They did the beautiful craftsmanship in iron and wood and in New Orleans their artists published the first anthology of American poetry. Negro music became the first American music.

In religion the Negroes became an influential part of the white churches and then organized their own churches sending leaders like Allen to form the first Negro organizations which began to take political action. The Negroes themselves led in efforts toward migration and especially in ~~the organized effort that~~ inducing slaves to run away. This matter of fugitive slaves became in the 40's and 50's one of the great political questions. It is usually discussed as the "Underground Railroad" where the work of the white philanthropists who helped the fugitives on their way North is emphasized. But of course the chief actors in this drama were the slaves themselves who escaped from the South into the North; and into Canada where they procured the invitation and help of the British government. This called not only for individual slaves willing to dare the fearsome risks of running away but leaders to encourage and guide them. Such persons appeared. There was Harriet Tubman, frail and sick, who led three hundred slaves or more to freedom and on whose head the South placed a reward of $40,000. There was Josiah Henson, Elijah Anderson, John Mason, and William Mitchell. How many slaves thus escaped no one knows but Governor Quitman of Mississippi declared that between 1810 and 1850 the South lost 100,000 slaves valued at more than $30,000,000.

This was of tremendous importance in a capitalist country. The land was there rich and almost free. ~~Slaves were~~ Labor was absolutely necessary, but their price (of slaves) was rising because of the laws against the African slave trade. These laws were not all enforced even as late as Lincoln's inauguration. Indeed he hanged the first slave trader. But the price of slaves rose; their keep became more expensive because while in the West Indies it was cheaper to work them to death and buy new importees, in the United States, they had to be better fed and housed. This made a domestic slave trade from the Border states to the lower South and the higher prices supported the aristocracy of Virginia. On this situation came the run-away slaves and the South was in quandary: did happy slaves steal away? Of course not, but capital was disappearing and the nation must stop it. Free Negroes were organising to bankrupt slavery and a drastic law to make kidnapping easy was passed. The whole nation was in hysterics.

Negroes were prominent in the abolition movement and gave that movement reality and status both in the Northern United States and in Europe. It was the living, speaking Frederick Douglass that made people see just what slavery could mean and WALKER'S APPEAL as early as 1829 was a bitter call to Negroes to realize their degradation.

Charles Remond and his sister, Frances Harper, Henry Highland Garnett, and William Wells Brown in addition to Sojourner Truth became great leaders in the Abolition movement. It was black men even more than whites whose appearance in England and France during the 50's kept Europe from supporting the South during the Civil War. Douglass, Pennington and Samuel Ward all were received by crowds of listeners and in the end were even more influential than William Lloyd Garrison in making English workers hate slavery.

Negro newspapers began to appear from 1827 when Russwurm published FREEDOM'S JOURNAL to Frederick Douglass' NORTH STAR which affronted Garrison. Not only were Negroes influential as individuals but their organized effort was of great importance. They established settlements in Canada, in Northern cities like Cincinnati, Philadelphia, New York and Boston. They called conventions from 1830 up until the very eve of the Civil War. They met in Rochester, Cleveland, New York and Philadelphia. In 1853 they formed a National Council of Colored People and sent out a Manifesto saying, "with the exception of the Jews under the whole heaven there is not to be found a people pursued with a more relentless prejudice and persecution than are the free colored people of the United States."

In 1848 the Citizen's Union of Pennsylvania was organized to fight for first class citizenship. In 1852 the American League of Colored Laborers was formed in New York. In 1857 a Negro convention in Philadelphia denounced the Dred Scott decision.

Several Negro conventions opposed colonization and Martin R. Delany denounced the American Colonization Society as arrant hypocrites and one of the Negroes' worst enemies. Delany organized Negroes for migration to upper Canada. Lott Carey led a group to Liberia as early as 1821. An organized effort at migration began in 1853 with the formation of a national council of leading Negroes which attracted representatives from as many as twelve state conventions. Negroes had become sondivided on this question that only those who believed in colonization were invited. Among those who attended were William Webb and Martin R. Delany of Pittsburgh; Dr. J. Gould Bias and Franklin Turner of Philadelphia; Augustus R. Green of Allegheny, Pennsylvania; James M. Whitfield of New York; William Lambert of Michigan; Henry Bibb and James Theodore Holly of Canada; and Henry M. Collins of California.

Frederick Douglass who was opposed to colonization was critical. "A convention to consider the subject of emigration," he said, "when every delegate must declare himself in favor of it beforehand as a condition of taking his seat, is like the handle of the jug, all on one side."

James M. Whitfield, the writer of verse, came to the defense of his co-workers, continuing a literary duel with Douglass for a number of weeks.

Three parties appeared at the convention of 1853, one led by Martin R. Delany who wanted to go to the Niger Valley in Africa, one by James M. Whitfield whose interests were in Central America, and the third by Theodore Holly who advocated settling in Haiti. These men were commissioned to go to these various countries. Holly went to Haiti and discussed the question of admitting Negroes from the United States.

Evidence of considerable interest in emigration began to appear. Illinois and Indiana sent out commissioners and strong sentiment was expressed by delegates attending the Cleveland Convention in 1854.

A colonization convention was held at Chatham , Canada West, in 1856. Holly reported on his trip to Haiti at this meeting and from this meeting Martin R. Delany proceeded on his mission to the Niger Valley in Africa. There he concluded a treaty with eight African kings, offering inducements to Negroes to emigrate. Eventually two thousand emigrants went to Haiti in the first expedition in 1861, but they were unprepared and the climate unfavorable, so not more than a third remained.

In addition to all this Negroes took part in political movements. Indeed it was the American Anti-slavery Society in which Negroes had prominent membership that was back of the Liberty Party organized in 1840 which polled 60,000 votes in 1844. But abolition of Negro slaves was not enough to attract any large numbers of Americans at the time. White American labor would not recognize Negroes as fellow workers but rather as dangerous competitors. The growing flood of immigrants especially the Catholic Irish regarded the Protestant blacks as enemies and attacked them repeatedly in riots and street fights in Philadelphia, New York and Cincinnati.

The free land which the nation owned in the West attracted the white immigrants. Therefore, in the West the movement against slavery was directed against black labor, free or slave and for free land. A Free Soil Party was organized but it attracted white laborers who were willing to fight for free soil, but unwilling to encourage freedom for black labor. In 1848 the Free Soil Party together with the remnants of the Liberty Party attracted 300,000 voters but the nation elected the slaveholder Taylor as President.

In the meantime various happenings in the United States began to change the face of affairs. Abraham Lincoln as a member of the Illinois legislature had to make note of slavery. He said it was unjust and unwise as a system, but he was sure that the Abolition Movement only made matters worse. Living in the North he saw slavery ~~but once~~ face to face on an excursion down the Mississippi and he said bitterly, "If I ever get a chance to hit slavery I will hit it hard." Meantime there came the terrible panic of 1857, perhaps the worst in our history. Then came the Dred Scott Decision with Taney's celebrated obiter dictum: that the Negro had no rights which the white man was bound to respect.

Harriet Beecher Stowe's UNCLE TOM'S CABIN went round the world. The attempt to seize Cuba, then in insurrection under the cooperation of Negro leaders, and before these events, the momentous discovery of gold in California and the rise of manufacturing. Capital invested doubled during the decade 1850 to 1860. Perry began colonialism in Japan and Cotton was king.

But Frederick Douglass said of the Dred Scott decision, "We, the abolitionists and colored people, should meet this decision, unlooked for and monstrous as it appears, in a cheerful spirit. This very attempt to blot out forever the hopes of an enlsaved people may be one necessary link in the chain of events preparatory to the complete overthrow of the whole slave system."

Two years later John Brown was crucified. Six years later Abraham Lincoln declared the slaves under federal control "henceforward and forever free."

PROPERTY AND LABOR

BY

W. E. B. DU BOIS

Prperty is a legal concept, and legal concepts are made and changed by laws, legislatures and the votes of laborers. Property is the legal control of wealth. Now wealth is not and never was entirely the result of indivudual effort; it always involved some measure of group cooperation. And today more than ever before wealth, is the result of social effort added to the bounty of nature. Property is the legal right to use wealth; the wealth may stem from your own effort or from the effort of oth rs; it may come from siesure of gambling; from theft. There is nothing sacred about property; everything depends on the social welfare involved in its use.

This means that property and its use are proper subjects of political consideration and of election decison. Ther has been in America too much cheating and theft in the acquisition of property and too much injustice in its use. Where property has been acquired by hard work and sacrifice, its owners' right to enjoy it, should be recognized and protect d and no labor party has asked anything else. But this has not been the record of American business. Huge properties have been accumulated by highway robbery, monopoly of natural resourses belonging of right to all; and even by transgressing the very laws to protect the rights of the public.

Our present economic problem, stems from the fact that while production is increasingly a social process, the distribution of its results still remains largely a matter of the individual judgment of persons who happen to have or who seize the power to decide; and on the basis of concepts of property and income which no longer correspond to fact.

The paradox which consequently upsets the labor orld, is that despite the indispensable cooperation of laborers, managers, and capitalists in current industry, when the restults and increasingly valuable results are distributed, most of the laborers get less than is necessary for decent life, while many of the capitalist get more than they need or can spend. And particularly capitalists get the power to direct the use of the residue for any purpose which they choose.

The age-long explanation of this is that goods are so scarce that with the best effort some folk must remain in poverty and need. It is this alleged fact that the 20th century laborer is disputing. He maintains that a more just distribution of the results of industry could eleminate poverty, disease and ignorance among the working class. For this purpose he has been organizing labor unions and trying by appeal, bargaining and if necessary by strikes, picketing and legislation to raise his standard of living to decency and comfort. He does not want in this contest to deprive manager or owner of his just reward for saving, planning and direction, but he insists that he, the laborer as partner in production, should have some voice in deicding what is just. He rejects certain age-old excuses for present conditions. When the National Association of Manufacturers advertises that the "more we produce the more we will have," he knows full well that this depends on who does the dividing and who gets the shares.

The conventional answer to this contention of labor is that the essential capital to employ labor can only be had if its owners are attracted by large profit to invest their wealth instead of consuming it. Once this was true. In the 17th and 18th centuries most of the rich did not save; they spent conspicuously and extravagentely; and industry could only secure their cooperation by the gambler's bribe of high profit.

Today the situation is far different; there is capital in so great abundance that it begs opportunity for investment and indeed cannot be used in any other way. Also the risk of loss in legitimate industry is now small and might be reduced nearly to nil by intelligent and scientific planning. Moreover most of the curennt capital comes not from the rich, but from the comparatively poor, who save for old age and a rainy day. But the huge profits of industry to not to them but to the financiers who as middle-men handle their funds, giving them 2% in savings banks while this wealth in foreign trade often reaps 50%. Small w nder Big Business fights and schemes and drafts the 18 year old youth. Profit is thicker than blood.

This had led many a social thinker to point out that capital for all real human want and improvement could easily be taken from production and leave sufficient income for all consumers, provided of course that individual consumption wa so limited that no man had cake if any man lacked bread; that mink coats for the rich were not allowed, if the poor had no shoes. And of course here's the rub. This compulsion which socialism proposed long before Lenin as the only way to decent human life, raises shrieks of protest if hinted at today in the United States. Remember what hap ened when Roosevelt proposed to limit incomes to $25,000!

What church of the lowly Jesus, who railed against the rich, would for a moment admit or preach such doctrine? And yet, is it strange that the poor and hardworking laborers of the world, without sufficient food, shelter and clothes; fearing old age and sickness more than the flames of hell--is it strange that they by overwhelming majority are demanding this regulation of production and consumption; and that this is not Russian imperialism but American commonsense?

You cannot stop this line of thought from growing in an intelligent world even if you kill all the youth and dye the oceans' red with blood. Social control of production and distribution of wealth is coming as sure as the rolling of the stars. The whole concept of property is changing and must change. Not even a Harvard school of business can make greed into a science, nor can the unscrupoulous ambition of a Secretary of State use atomic energy forever, for death instead of life.

THE POSSIBLE FUTURE OF AMERICAN NEGROES

by W.E.B. Du Bois

Attempted prophesy is a thankless task, and one which long since I have tried to give up, ~~and~~ yet the demand for it rests upon the unquestioned fact that long experience with the past actions of men give at least some idea of what the future will be. For this reason I have tried prophesy many times, and usually have been largely wrong in what I have forecast. Nevertheless, I am almost compelled continually to try again, and perhaps with ever widening background my percentage of failure will be less. There are three periods which we may consider, only one of which belongs to the future, and ~~that is~~ there are the last 50 years of the 19th century, the first 50 years of the 20th, and the last 50 years which lie before us.

In the latter half of the 19th century, the task of the American Negro was comparatively clear so far as object and method were concerned, but exceedingly difficult because of the obstacles faced. We ~~faced~~ had a set determination on the part of most white Americans to keep the Negro "in his place" as a low-paid worker and servant, a disinfranchised citizen, and a person without social recognition, living under caste conditions.

Many Americans opposed this program, and among them were the founders of the NAACP. Even among these founders, however, most of them drew the line of Negro progress strictly at what was called "social equality". It was the object of the Negro leader, therefore, at the time to fight for the enforcement of the Constitution; to explain the results of disinfranchisment, not only on Negroes but on whites; and to argue for social equality.

In the first half of the 20th century the world was so upset by war and depression, that even the United States could not keep its attention centered on Negroes, because of the ~~It is~~ their absorption in world problems which compelled it to yield and progress so far as Negroes were concerned. Moreover, and of most importance, the demand for negro labor was so great and increasing so fast, that employers demanded it, and labor unions had to recognize it. Thus, by and large, the first half of the 20th century showed distinct advantages in the legal and economic status of American Negroes.

But the Negro was not and is not free, and the peril today is that he ~~might~~ may not recognize that the problems which he faces in the second half of the 20th century are quite different from those which he faced in the 19th. He is going to become a voter in the United States, but that does not settle the question as to how he is going to vote. It really poses for him new and absorbing political problems. He is going to secure, certainly for a considerable number of the group, a more substantial economic position, with larger income, but this again raises the question as to what he is going to do with his income; by what methods he is going to earn and increase it, and what the relation of his wealth is to the wealth of the rest of the world.

And finally, and to increasing extent, he is going to be able to meet his fellow Americans on a plane of friendship and cooperation, but what is that cooperation going to be for, and with what kind of Americans is he going to cultivate friendships? His danger is that of becoming more American than the Americans - loud, greedy, boastful

The world facing American Negroes in the 20th century is a world revolutionized from that of the 19th. In the 19th century our cure for all problems was education and earning a living. These problems have not been settled, but the question today is, what is going to be the content and object of education, and just what kind of a living is going to be earned? American Negroes must face in their own group the answers to these questions, and the problem of education is not simply the matter of learning to read and write and cipher. These are but preliminary techniques for the acquisition of knowledge. That gaining of knowledge is not simply knowledge of how the forces of nature can be used, but more importantly what kind of machines human beings themselves are, and what they can come to be, and what they have done in the past.

American Negroes facing these problems are today seriously handicapped. First, their ~~people~~ children are not learning to read, write and cipher well, not only in their segregated schools, but even in the public schools where there is no segregation. Beyond that, history is neglected. We learn the conventional history of the United States and Europe and, even more sketchy history of slavery ~~of~~ and the American Negro. We know almost nothing of the history of Asia and Africa. ~~and the history of Europe is poorly taught.~~

In the schools and colleges Economics is hardly taught at all, because the industrial organizations of the United States controls Education, and do not want people to learn of the transformation today of individualism into socialism. It is going on all about us, even in the United States, and yet we do not understand it. That means that in the last half of the 20th century, American Negroes as well as the majority of American whites, are going to follow the economics of the middle ages, when people "made money", ~~when they~~ "saved" it, ~~when they~~ and "invested" for profit, instead of realizing that what men do is to work for what they need to satisfy their wants; ~~to~~ distribute these satisfactions justly, to consume all that is produced except that part which is needed for future production; and that future production is also solely for ~~consumption~~ satisfying human needs

In the Negro group we are going to develop, and indeed have developed, economic classes, whose interests clash — the rich, the well-to-do, the poor. Unless we stop present trends, the rich are going to exploit and ~~keep~~ cheat the poor, and bitter enmities are going to rise between these inner groups, so great as to disrupt all inner unity or what we used to call "Race Loyalty".

On the other hand, if we keep this class distinction down to a minimum, and if we understand the new socialistic conceptions of work and income, we will find new alliances among the white people of America, and among the peoples of the world, and these alliances can be used, if we are wise, to improve the condition of men and to transform the world from a world of war, force and oppression to one of mutual striving toward the progress of all peoples and all classes, so as to loose for future civilization the vast energy and potentialities of the mass of human beings now held in thrall by poverty, ignorance and disease.

A THEORY OF HUMANITY

I say "a theory" instead of "the theory". The latter would mean something which was scientifically proven and could be assumed as final. On the other hand, a theory is merely an assumption which may be true and may prove to be inadequate. I think of the development of human-beings from the great apes which walked on their hind legs and who, from the great rifts and bottomless lakes of Central Africa down the Nile, founded one of the first human cultures. Their skins were black from the blaze of the sun: their hair was ~~trickled~~ from the influence of sun and weather, but there were some kind of human beings as ~~that~~ developed elsewhere in the world.

In China a group of human beings also developed and for 2000 years or more, established an astonishing culture and made many of the great inventions which human-beings use like the compass, gun-powder, printing and others. This long and proven history was never known by the West; so, today, we think of the history of human-beings as ~~an integral part of~~ the history of China, ~~not of course mentioning~~ and the history of the West. In this way, we ~~can~~ approach ~~in~~ a ~~more complete~~ picture of the culture of human-beings and the way in which men tried to meet problems of living. It happens today that, having failed to make ~~this~~ an integration of these two ~~kinds~~ of history; so that, ~~we can see more often that~~ we assumed the history of human-beings as divided into two or more parts which have nothing to do with each other. This is, of course, untrue. Men developed in different ways, but all the development of human-beings resulted or should have resulted in one development of human- culture.

Human labour which was common increased with the discovery of free land and tremendous resources in America. This led to the increased and systematic skill of human labour, and to the African history which robbed Africa of millions of its people and into directions which changed human culture. We will try to explain this. Assuming that there ~~must have been a~~ new different kind of human-beings which we call races, there were, of course, differences between groups and different efforts to solve the problems of living. But that did not mean that humanity was divided into different kinds of beings, rather it meant one general kind of human folk, trying various ways for solving their problems. Difference of method does not necessarily mean a difference in the kind of humanity which is trying out ~~xxx~~ these methods.

American history changed the course of African history and ruined the internal efforts towards solving the problems of living. The re continued and are still continuing efforts to suppress the revolution of China. The slave trade which was an attack on the African developed country transferred the centre of economic culture to America. In Asia came a magnificent development of human culture. The culture was not separated from or influenced by the culture in the South. There are two sides of the same effort group -- two kind sides of efforts to solve the problems of human living; to fight back the enemies of life; to change methods of thought and action. Human history is ~~known in the sense that~~ it is a continued and varied efforts of the same kind of human-beings to settle all their ~~differences~~ problems.

NON-VIOLENCE AND WAR

by W.E.B. Du Bois

The greatest philosopher of our era pointed out the inherent contradiction in many of our universal beliefs; and he sought eventual reconciliation of these paradoxes. We realize this today. Our President asks the largest expenditure for war ever in human history made by a nation, and proclaims this as a step toward Peace! We have larger endowments devoted to peace activity than any other nation on earth, and less activity for abolishing war.

As I look back on my own attitude toward war during the last seventy years, I see repeated contradiction. In my youth, nourished as I was on fairy tales, including some called History, I quite naturally regarded War as a necessary step toward progress. I believed that if my people ever gained freedom and equality, it would be by killing white people. Then, as a young man in the great afflatus of the late Nineteenth century, I came to believe in Peace. No more war. I signed the current pledge never to take part in War. Yet during the First World War, "the war to stop war," I was swept into the national maelstrom and begged my fellows to "close ranks" and fight. After the Depression I sensed recurring contradiction. I saw Gandhi's non-violence gain freedom for India, only to be followed by violence in all the world; I realized that the hundred years of peace from Waterloo to 1914 was not peace at all, but war of Europe on Africa and Asia, with troubled peace only between the colonial conquerors. I saw Britain, France, and America trying to continue to force the world to serve them by using their monopoly of land, technique, and machinery, backed by gunpowder, and then threatening atomic power on all who did not bow to "free democracy" as defined by John Foster Dulles and Anthony Eden.

Then Montgomery in Alabama tried to show the world the synthesis of this anti-thesis. And not the white Montgomery of the Slave Power; not even the Black Montgomery of the Negro professional men, merchants, and teachers; but the black workers: the scrubbers and cleaners; the porters and seamstresses. They turned to a struggle not for great Principles and Noble Truths, but just asked to be let alone after a tiring day's work; to be free of petty insult after hard and humble toil. These folk, led by a man who had read Hegel, knew of Karl Marx, and had followed Karamchand Gandhi, preached "Not by Might, nor by Power, but by My Spirit," saith the Lord. Did this doctrine and practice of non-violence bring solution of the Race Problem in Alabama? It did not. Black workers, many if not all, are still walking to work, and it is possible any day that their leader will be killed by hoodlums perfectly well known to the white police and the city administration, egged on by white councils of war, while most white people of the city do nothing.

All over the Lower South this situation prevails. Despite law, in the face of drooling religion and unctuous prayer, while the nation dances and yells and prepares to fight for peace and freedom, there is race war, jails full of the innocent, and ten times more money spent for mass murder than for education of children. Where are we then and whither are we going? What is the synthesis of this paradox of eternal and world-wide war and the coming of the Prince of Peace?

It lies, I think, not in the Method but in the People concerned. Among normal human beings, with the education customary today in most civilized nations, non-violence is the answer to the temptation to force. When threat is met by fist; when blow follows blow, violence becomes customary. But no normal human being of trained intelligence is going to fight the man who will not fight back. In such cases, peace begins and grows just because it is. But suppose the beings are not human? Suppose they are wild beasts or wild men? To yield to the rush of the tiger is death, nothing less. The wildness of beasts is nature; but the wildness of men is neglect and often our personal neglect. This is the reason beneath our present paradox of peace and war.

For now near a century this nation has trained the South in Lies, Hate, and Murder. We are emphasizing today that when Robert E. Lee swore to serve the nation and then broke his word to serve his clan, his social class, and his private property -- that this made him a hero; that although he did not believe in human slavery he fought four long years, with consummate skill, over thousands of dead bodies to make it legal for the South to continue to hold four million black folk as chattel bondsmen -- that this makes him a great American and candidate for the Hall of Fame. We have for eighty years as a nation widely refused to regard the killing of a Negro in the South as murder, or the violation of a black girl as rape. We have let white folk steal millions of black folks' hard-earned wage, and openly defended this as natural for a "superior" race. As a result of this, we have today in the South millions of persons who are pathological cases. They cannot be reasoned with in matters of race. They are not normal and cannot be treated as normal. They are ignorant and their schools are poor because they cannot afford a double school system and would rather themselves remain ignorant than let Negroes learn.

Remedy for this abnormal situation would be education for all children and education all together, so as to let them grow up knowing each other as human. Pre cisely this path, these abnormal regions refuse to follow. Here, then, is no possible synthesis. So long as a people insult, murder and hate by hereditary teaching, non-violence can bring no peace. It will bring migration until that fails, and then attempts at bloody revenge. It will spread war and murder. Can we then by effort make the average white person in states like South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana normal, intelligent human beings?

If we can, we solve our antithesis; great Gandhi lives again. If we cannot civilize the South, or will not even try, we continue in contradiction and riddle.

Criticism of these things we fear because of secret police, encouragement of gossip and tattling and spying and an official list of persons under suspicion who are liable to discrimination and punishment without trial. A young Negro actor was invited to dine with us at the Soviet Exposition showing in New York; he refused unless he could secure the consent of the State Department. A Negro newspaper editor wanted to secure a gifted young man as assistant. He first consulted the Department of State. They refused because the young man had a record of criticism and had Communist friends. He was not appointed. Newsgathering services have been bought up by Big Business. Magazines are owned by banks and corporations. Radio and television are monopolies and bookstores are under police inspection. Great publishing houses only issue books which the State Department approves; otherwise they fail to share in government subsidies.

If we can, we solve our antithesis; great Gandhi lives again. If we cannot civilize the South, or will not even try, we continue in contradiction and riddle.

WORLD SERVICE BY PROMOTING RACIAL EQUALITY

The first question is do we want race equality? I take it that most people in the United States think of this as a rather academic question of no immediate importance. From that point of view they neither want racial equality nor oppose it. Other things being equal they prefer to associate with their own folk and not with people who look and act differently. Such an attitude assumes that the peoples of the world can on the whole be kept separate and yet we have only to look at this global war to realize that this is no longer possible. We all have to meet and mingle more or less.

Then this brings us to the vital question that if races are not equal, does that or need that affect us? The war that is upon us and the war which went before were both based on the relation of races. In the first World War there was an attempt to have more equal access to raw material on the part of Germany and other nations and this access to raw material was demanded because investment in cheap labor and even forced labor and the use of raw material which it raised or which was the gift of nature made great profit possible to the colonial imperialisms of the day. The first World War then was a war of competition for the profits of investment in col red labor and raw material; that involves competition between col red labor and white labor, not always direct but sometimes as between copper miners of Africa and America it is direct. But always it is indirect and always there is the increased power of employers based on profits made by use of colored labor and that increased power of employers makes democracy even in politics, certainly in industry, impossible. There came now the question of limiting the competition between white and colored labor so that cheap colored labor would not keep down the wage or interfere with the power of white laborers. Our chief hope there lay in the natural inferiority of colored labor both in efficiency and brain power. The doctrine by which nations were conceived of as composed of classes some of whom were natural rulers and some natural slaves was transposed and the colored line put the darker peoples in the place of the subjects and the white people in the place of rulers. And then we went on to invest in this inferiority of the colored people and out of that arose colonial imperialism and out of that rose the first World War.

The manifest difficulty of this doctrine of inferiority is that there are too many exceptions: exceptional persons of Negro and Asiatic descent are continually arising both in America, Asia and Africa; and they can progress by education and knowledge of technique. It was this situation that brought on a second world war. If the first World war was a war between investors the second World War was a war between this concept of controlling labor and different ideals of its control. And no sooner had it come than it became a war insensibly between East and West and then a war between colored and white. And into this war which was a war of technique even then more than into the first World War came colored troops taking part.

Considering these facts we face a struggle of racial and cultural groups for equality or autonomy and we must either plan between these groups a future of peace and development or of war and struggle.

I am presenting a plan: autonomy for China, India, Japan and some other colored countries. Then benevolent and scientific guardianship for other colored groups; such guardianship being carefully limited against motives of private profit by equitable distribution of the land, by education, control of all investment by democratic methods. This will involve the restraint of Europe and white America. It will involve for all men freedom of art.

Socializing the Professions

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

Several times in bits that I have written I have been interpreted as attacking or at least not fully appreciating colored professional and business men. This, of course, is not true. No one better appreciates the tremendous pioneering work that these people have done. I have tried to contribute to this work in my study of the Negro in business which was the first systematic attempt to evaluate the role of the Negro entrepreneur done forty years ago and my two studies of the Negro college graduate was real y an exposition of facts in defense of the Negro in the professions.

On the other hand, the time has come, not only for Negroes but for white people, when a change must be envisaged in the role of these persons. In order to preserve ultimate individualism and gift in various lines, the primary role of men in business and in the professions must be socialized. The business men have got to change the ideal of private profit into the larger ideal of public weal, of production for use instead of production for temporary social advantage. This is being realized by ever widening circles of men. But similar implications in the professions have not yet received so wide adherence.

Take, for instance, the position of the physician. His present status is based upon the assumption of a clientele with both intelligence and income who turn to the physician for advice. There will, of course, be numbers of people who are not intelligent, who will employ quacks or take patent medicine or wholly neglect themselves. But our present theory assumes that this class should be small and gradually lessening.

Now as a matter of fact the vast majority of people in a country like the United States including large numbers of average education and intelligence are not receiving proper medical advice, care and hospitalization. The tremendous and epoch making advances in knowledge of the human body are not being made use of in the case of most men. On the other side and correlative to this, physicians are finding it hard to make a proper and dependable income in the majority of cases. Their services are asked for and patients neglect or even refuse to pay them and there is continual dispute in the case of advice and in delicate and difficult operation as to how much a physician ought to charge. A surgeon may earn a fee of $500 apparently by a half hour's work when as a matter of fact the skill which he put into that operation required years of study and practice not only on his part but on the part of thousands who have contributed to his knowledge.

Now what is the solution of this grave problem of public health? It is not that we should have fewer physicians or that the average income of physicians should be lessened. It is that medicine should become a public socialized service; that everybody in need of advice and care concerning his health should receive it as the contribution of the public to him, not in charity, but in self defense and for social uplift. The national loss through sickness, inefficiency and premature death is simply staggering. It must be lessened and it can only be lessened by an increased number of well paid and well trained physicians whose duty is to the public and who are paid by regular salary and not by individual fees; whose chief function is not to heal but to keep the public in health and prevent disease.

At first blush everywhere there is bitter opposition to such a proposition and the opposition falls into two parts: one a general dislike and suspicion of increased governmental function; and the other the desire on the part of the physician for individual development and individual pay as contrasted with social control and social obligation.

The first objection is one which must disappear before the facts. Increased functions of government are something that we have got to face and not simply argue about. It is manifest today that to a larger and larger degree government must interfere and guide in actions and fields where it did not used to function. This is an inevitable development. Governments of the world today are guiding science, business, agriculture, income, expenditure and art. They will do more of this tomorrow. Of course, there comes the very difficult question of the efficiency with which the government can do these things. But the answer to this is clear: if they can be done efficiently by private persons, they can be done efficiently by public organizations. It is simply a matter of the applying to public work the standards and high ideals which private enterprise can now command.

So far as individualism in science and art is concerned, we must remember that the socialization of both works in the end for a higher and freer individualism by making certain that the work done is done on the widest scale with adequate return. Most physicians today do not get proper pay or have proper opportunity. It is only the few that reach the peak. With socialized medicine larger and larger numbers would have time for study and opportunity for experience and investigation which they cannot now get. Not in Ivory Towers, but in wide social service, individual genius will in the end gain widest freedom for peculiar development.

Socialized medicine has come to an increasing degree in England and throughout Europe. It is the ideal that faces America. Negro physicians must take it seriously into account. We ought to begin immediately by the establishment of cooperative groups who would hire and pay physicians to guard their health and serve them in sickness.

The same facts and outlook apply to dentists, to musicians and especially to actors as has been shown by the Federal Theatre Projects; and also to lawyers.

The case of lawyers has not been adequately discussed but it cries for attention and solution. Every Negro church in the United States ought to have on its staff a first class salaried lawyer whose business it is to advise members of the church and the community which it serves; to defend especially the poor and ignorant in court and to stop the outrageous manner in which Negro criminals are being manufactured through sheer ignorance and lack of knowledge of the law. In the South particularly the field for this kind of work is endless.

I trust that groups of colored people in churches and clubs will begin to discuss the socialization of medicine and the professions and to work out adequate norms and methods by which this great revolution can be best and most efficiently accomplished.

The South Beautiful

Southward the mouth whole world with one accord has ever turned for beauty: & the great flower strewn fields of Italy, & the scented shadowy east, & the Indies, east & west, & the shores of our own carrying gulf. Proof of beauty still comes to us from our own South, in roses and magnolias, jessamine and orange blossoms, and great fleecy billows of white cotton. And yet withal the legend never ends. Across the Potomac or the Ohio westward a growing sense of utter ugliness, withered a protest and a wonder at the barren loneliness, the straggly unkempt

A social problem must ever be recessed and re-stated in terms of current attitudes, else it can not properly be understood. This is notso much because of any ~~xxxxxxxx~~ change in the essential facts, as because of continuous change in current beliefs. Such re-statement of the problems surrounding the American Negro I am attempting now.

Whether or not we call this a race problem, depends on what we mean by race: if we follow the I9th century definition and think of race as a biological group, set off from similar groups by distinctive and hereditable physical and psychological acter charistics, then even if such races exist in fact, the American Negro is not one because he is the offspring of many different strains of men. But if we mean by race, a group of folk, who by long juxapositi tion, common experiences and common memories, continous intermarriage and wide community of thought, feeling and action, have become a social entity such a cultural concept of race describes fairly well the position of the American Negro. Today

Naturally in the course of the the half millenium since Africans appeared in America this group has differed both in its own composition and in its relation to its social environment. Its members appeared first as straggling servants and adventurers accompanying Europeans; then in larger numbers they came asa group of laborers to fill a ~~an emergency created by~~ demand for the hard labor necessary for exploiting mines and transporting goods. All this was temporary and incidental to an unusual emergency. Then in succession came three crops -- ~~xx~~ cane sugar, tobacco, and cotton -- a drug and sweetening; a new luxury and a cheap clothing. All Europe, from king to peasant wanted these goods and the land suited to raising them was abundant in America. Only labor was wanting, and after a period of spasmod ic efforts to furnish such labor, English merchants in the I8th century organize the African slave on a systematic basis. The profit from this effort attracted so many ships that the imported slaves overflowed the West Indian and South American demand and the surplus was dumped into North America amid much protest. But before this protest became effective, the North American experiments in cotton raising in the new , rich land stretching from Carolina to Mexico, created an increased demand for ~~slave~~ labor. The new American democracy counter- this by forbidding the African trade, which they were confident in 1787 would kill the slave system in time. But this did not happen, because of slave smuggling, the increasing domestic slave trade from Virginia and the border stetes and because of the slow development of the Negro group into an increasingly effective labor force. By I820, the income from the slave system was too large and too widely distributed to easily be cut off. The slave power ~~not only~~ had strong

hold on Northern trade and British manufacture, ~~but had imporialist dreams of extending into Mexico, the Carribbean area and South America.~~ and thus on the Church and aristocracy

This aro used opposition in the North from free labor, free Negroes and from followers of the democratic ideals of the French Revolution. Thus the Church and society, business and commerce came to grips with Abolitionists, Free Negroes , city laborers and small western farmers. Substantial agreement was reached by the mid-century on a policy of containment for the slave system south of Mason and Dixon line and east of the Mississisippi , but this understanding was broken by the growing exhaustion of Southern soil under the wasteful slave culture and the increased demand for cotton. The Cotton Kingdom thereupon came to have illusions of gr grandeur based on extending its system and its profits into Mexico, the Caribbean area and central and South America. To reinforce this economic urge came the new theories of Evolution, the doctrine of race superiority. Phenomenal increase in the Southern cotton crops in the fifties drove the Southern radicals into determination to force slavery on the nation as a legally recognized labor system.

The North reacted with force, not to abolish slavery in the area where it was established, but to prevent its extention to the rest of the nation and to hold intact the whole United States as an industrial and commercial entity. Thus the war "for Union" began Two truths soon emerged: it is impossible to conquer a large group of people and force them to do what they are unwilling to do; second, the fatal weakness of the South was its black labor force on which it dependes for support in war. This labor force began to desert to the Northern armies; first in driblets, then in vast crowds which taxed the camps; and finally as armed soldiers taking part in behind the line defence, then as front line shock troops. This ended the war,although few writers even now acknowledge. But it clear: as soon as slaves in any numbers stopped raising food for the Southern armies; as soon as 200,ooO Negro troops were armed, with the possibility of arming a million more, Southern resistence was futile. Moreover as black troops lessened the necessity for Northern drafted whites, the longer those whites in well-paid war industries would be willing and able to finance the war

The next effort on the part of the South was to return to the pre-war status. This was impossible. The war after I862 had been fought to "free the slaves", so that the slaves cohuld save the Union. The nation had posed before the world on this platform and thus kept England and France from aiding the South as their economic interests dictated. Slavery then had to be abolished after Appomatox. But the South offered compormise; parial emancipation with some property and civil rights, but no political rights. This the North was willing ing to accept, but the South made further demands: increased political power, based on free but disfranchised Negroes; and some compensation for war costs and loss of slave property To this the West added scaling of the inflated public debt and lower tarif duties. When South and West threatened to unite in these demands, the North went into action: they enfranchised the freedmen to neutralise the increased Southern representation in Congress, supported the public debt at full value, refused to pay for Southern slaves or war costs and raised instead of lowering the tarif on which the new Northern manufacturing depended

Immediately the two parties came to terms: the South withdrew its demands for compensation and low tarif, while the North winked at the disfranchisement of Negroes, firsr by force and fraud and later by law ~~which the Supreme court promptly supported~~.

But the main peoblem still remained: how were four million workers, without capital, land, clothes or food, going to live and work as modern wage laborers? War emergencies answered this in part: the Negroes wrked in army camps, they raised cotton at a dollar a pound and they got hold of some abandoned land. ~~But this was but a drop in the vast bucket: soon the mass was reduced to peonage and sank to crime and disease~~. Many Americans by I870 were hopeful that the race would soon die out. Then the Negroes and an increasing number of white friends began to fight back: the white friends, especially in the insurgent and democratic churches established Negro schools in the South and the Negroes liberally filled them; in a generation most Negroes could read and write. They began to hammer at the democratic ideal. The North responded by offering a program of economic advancement which Booker Washington voiced and the South agreed to. But this program was never implemented: industrial schools were not provided to teach the newer and better paid skills; unions excluded Negro artisans and the South disfranchised even Negroes of education. Race hate flourished, lynching spread and wide-spread pessimism reigned over any solution of this race problem. This was accentuated by colonial imperialism in Europe which was built on the assumption that the white race was going to rule the World.

With new organization the American Negro began a new fight in I9I0. Helped by two world wars which crippled the white nations and set them murdering each other, the American Negro began to regain the ballot, forced himself into labor unions and bit by bit gained civil rights and recognition of his right to be regarded as human. The effort was costly. It made the group provincial, over self-conscious, and only partly willing to recognize white folk as at least partially human. But normalcy will gain if the world stops organized murder and if the United States in particular ceases to mistake Profit for Progress.

The interval of Reconstruction when for a brief interval the Negro was as free as his ~~ignoran~~ poverty and ignorance allowed and when under courageous leaders he gave the South public schools and new social legislation ~~and even escaped in part~~ the dishonesty and corruption of the whole nation, gave the whole race a lift and short head start. But only a start: the bulk of the race was still in semi-slavery, still in ignorance, still sick and diseased.

COLONIES

Modern Colonialism is the child of slavery and is in essence slavery without a foreign slave trade. When humanity forced the abolition of the slave trade vested interests turned from stealing slaves for the American plantations to controlling labor in Africa and Asia. Ordinary trade became forced trade and treaty relations changed to political control. Thus Imperialism arose on the ruins of the slave trade and masqueraded as effort to bring civilization and christianity to the heathen. Gradually it dropped pretense and became primarily a system of investment and exploitation, in which the well-being and progress of the natives was subordinated to the profit of the mother country, and forced labor , deprivation of land and denial of all voice in government, was accompanied by limited education and enough missionary effort to appease philanthropy at home.

The First World War called on colonial troops for both sides and was followed by the Mandates system, designed to start the abolition of the colonialism. It was never allowed to work, because of the increased value of colonial labor and materials, in an impoverished world. The mandated areas were incorporatedinto the colonial system of Great Britain, France and Japan.

The Second World War resulted through Japan, in the revolt of Asia and the beginning of the end of colonialism. This was met by a determined effort by the British, French and Portuguese and Belgians to concentrate an intensified colonialism in Africa. This was backed by increasing American colonial investment.

In our preoccupation with the menace of the Atom bomb, we may easily forget the threat of continued colonialism and the attempt to intensify enslavement of black folk. Already African troops are being used to repress insurgent Asia and even to cow labor in Europe. Low wage in mining, transport, agriculture and primary processing of materials in Africa, will inevitably depress wages in Europe and America, and put wealth and power into the hands of monopoly. In lands like Liberia, Haiti and Bolivia, expolitation of natural resources, by American capital in conjunction with local politicians and capitalists, may build a new colonialism and result in such strikes and repressive murder as rectntly occured on the Firestone rubber plantations.

The Charter of the United Nations unequivocally promised to seek the "political economic , social and educational advancement" of all subject peoples, whether in colonies or other non-self governing territories and to work for their "progressive development toward self-government or independence."

Unfortunately, however, the Trusteeship council was deliberately so constituted as to give colonial governments power to block most efforts to advance the colonial peoples or obtain reliable knowledge of their condition. The United States for the most part has joined with the colonial powers in this obstruction. It is the first duty of men of vision and progress to stop human slavery forever by abolishing the whole colonial system in accord with the Charter of the Unites Nations, and to stop once and for all this persistent attempt of modern culture to fatten and thrive on the slavery, poverty, ignorance and disease of millions of colonial peoples.

COLORED ADVERTISERS

In speaking about THE CRISIS and its advertisers before a branch meeting of the N. A. A. C. P. in Washington, Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois made some statements which have been misunderstood. We, therefore, send out an authentic résumé of the speech:

"In the past, many people have not realized that advertising in colored papers is a business proposition. They have thought of it as charity to help along a worthy enterprise, or as blackmail to keep Editors from captious criticism. This era has now past, and many periodicals, and THE CRISIS especially, is trying to make colored businessmen realize that advertising is an investment which brings not only direct returns in purchases, but indirect returns through the psychology of repetition. Colored people have got to be made to realize things which it is easy to forget. That there are colored insurance societies which are soundly own; that there are colored banks, and that the percentage of failures is no greater than among white banks; that colored people are manufacturing things and hiring colored workers, writing books, conducting colleges, and keeping hotels. As colored advertisers realize the paying investment of advertising, they will make it possible for the colored periodical to depend more for support on its advertising pages, and to give the subscribers more for their money. Many readers do not realize that the actual income from subscriptions to THE CRISIS, and especially to large public periodicals, is only a small part of the return. THE CRISIS might lose all its subscribers in a city like Washington and still suffer small loss in income, except as the reduced circulation influenced the advertisers. We must, therefore, in any effort to help periodicals, like THE CRISIS, not only ask for readers, but influence the colored business world to use this well-tried and effective method of increasing the number of colored buyers through advertising."

THE STRUGGLE OF BLACK FOLK FOR CIVIL RIGHTS IN THE UNITED STATES

By W. E. B. Du Bois,

Editor of THE CRISIS.

Quite apart from our personal ~~interest in~~ connection with it all, the struggle of persons of Negro descent to become full-fledged American citizens is a story of exceeding interest. When Negroes first came to the United States their status was no more fixed than the status of the whites who came. That is: it was not determined by their race and color, but by their condition. Moreover, in the English colonies there was no legal status of slavery, but only of "service" or indenture. Negroes then landed as "servants". But this was also true of white folk. Large numbers of whites came as indentured servants and very often when their term of service was up they were not freed and became slaves in effect. The laws about servants applied to black and white alike, and if the development in the United States had gone on naturally and logically, black servants would have gained their freedom just as white servants eventually did; would have become land owners and property holders, citizens and voters. This development actually took place here and there in nearly all the colonies, so that the Constitution was adopted by the vote of black people in many of the colonies where there were black folk born free or freed who held land and other property.

The desire, however, of England and other countries to make money out of the slave trade forced the colonies to buy more slaves than they wanted. The colonies tried often to resist the slave trade. Many of them, even South Carolina, sought to stop the importation, or at least to tax the imported slaves so heavily that they would cease to come. But England overruled them.

A new status, therefore, had to be envolved for Negroes and they became "servants for life" and then simply "slaves". W

When the United States became an independent country, there was the chance to check the slave trade and to allow those Negroes already here gradually to develop into free men with full civil rights. Two things prevented this. First, the large number of Negroes already in America, which meant that if they were absorbed into the body politic, there would be eventual inter-marriage and economic and political equality. The second reason was even more potent, and that was, that slave labor once established created a demand for more slave labor. While the country then in the early part of the 19th Century hesitated at the crossroads as to whether they would have more freedom and civil rights for Negroes or more slavery and color caste, the Cotton Kingdom arose; that is to say, the cotton crop raised by slave ~~trade~~ labor became so valuable that slavery was established on an economic foundation.

From 1820-60, thirty years, the fight was to prevent slavery from being permanent and universal in the United States. This was accomplished finally by the economic bankruptcy which arose from the impoverishing of cotton land and the consequent labor controversy and Civil War. After the war, the nation started again with the old question of civil rights for Negroes. An attempt was made to declare the Negro a citizen; give him a vote and make all discrimination in civil rights illegal so far as the United States was concerned. This legislation was nullified because the freed Negro had no real economic foundation. As long as in work and wages he remained a slave, he could not in politics and civil life become a free man. Negroes themselves saw this.

"The "Negro party" platform of 1876, in one state, advocated "division of lands of the state as far as practical into small farms in order that the masses of our people may be enabled to become land-holders." In the Constitutional Convention of South Carolina, a colored man said: "One of the greatest of slavery bulwarks was the infernal plantation system, one man owning his thousand, another his twenty, another fifty thousands acres of land. This is the only way by which we will break up that system, and I maintain that our freedom will be of no effect if we allow it to continue. What is the main cause of the prosperity of the North. It is because every man has his own farm and is free and independent. Let the lands of the South be similarly divided. I would not say for one moment they should be confiscated but if sold to maintain the war, now that slavery is destroyed, let the plantation system go with it. We will never have true freedom until we abolish the system of agriculture which existed in the Southern States. It is useless to have any schools while we maintain the stronghold of slavery as the agricultural system of the country."

That greatest of our statesmen, Charles Sumner, tried to make the United States furnish the Negro with free land and a small amount of capital—"40 acres and a mule"; but the nation was impoverished: the politicians were stealing and grafting as never before, and it was impossible to get funds to establish a real and permanent Freedman's Bureau.

The civil rights of the Negro, therefore, had to follow his slow, economic emancipation. Most of the states introduced Civil Rights Bills which had to do with intermingling in hotels and theatres and restaurants. Through judicial interpretation most of these became dead letters, although in our day, a new set of more carefully drawn laws are very effective, particularly in the state of New York. These covered, of course, the less important part of civil rights. The greatest of civil rights has to do with work and wages, travel and treatment in the courts.

In the South, travel was restricted, not only by the insult of the "Jim Crow" cars, but by every device to prevent labor from seeking higher wages and better conditions. ~~In the South,~~ work was so hedged about by new legislation that the freed man became a peon in the Mississippi bottoms ~~Louisiana, Georgia and other states~~ and the lower South, and unskilled workers at low wages in most of the country districts. In most states to leave a job was to go to jail. Only in the cities and larger towns did the Negro achieve the right to work as a skilled worker at something like decent wages.

In the North, the Negroes for a long time had little chance to acquire technical skill and they became ~~the~~ chance laborers and servants; they were carefully excluded from the organized labor movement and herded into slums.

Both North and South the Negro suffered in the courts. A distinct set of laws and customs made him in the South either the victim of excessive punishment, even extending to mob law and lynching, or what was just as bad, a victim of no punishment so long as his delinquency was confined to his own people or one that made him more easily exploitable by the whites. In the North, like all laborers, he suffered in the courts chiefly because of his poverty, although in some cases he received savage sentences.

Out of this morass the Negro has gradually but steadily made his way. It has not been a matter of better laws but gradual rise in the respect of the community. It has become increasingly difficult to classify all Negroes in a lump and discriminate against them. The economic power of Negroes as consumers has risen so tremendously that their wishes must be regarded. Slowly, ~~then~~ almost imperceptibly the Negro, therefore, is gaining his civil rights. He has gained more defenders in the courts through his own lawyers and interested whites. The very precariousness of his situation before the courts in the South has so reacted that Southern courts either must reform themselves or white civilization is in serious danger.

The World War brought the Negro his first chance since freedom to sell his labor on a wide scale to the nation at a decent price and the Great Migration resulted in bringing thousands of black laborers to places where they could get better wages and treatment and even pound open the sealed doors of some of the labor unions.

Every advance, however, brings new areas of oppression in civil rights. Particularly ~~did~~ in recent years prejudice found expression in residential segregation as well as in the boycott and riot after the migration. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has been particularly engaged in breaking down segregation laws and bringing the matter before the courts both North and South.

Today the individual Negro who has achieved economic emancipation: that is, who has good employment at reasonable wages, and who lives in the more civilized parts of the United States, can enjoy a fairly full measure of civil rights as an American citizen. Of course, when he travels South he may find still the "Jim Crow" car compulsory in certain regions. If he wishes to build a house and move into a new residential district at home, he may find difficulty about the purchase and the terms. He would have difficulty in sending his child to a private school, and if he lives in Gary, Indiana, even to a public high school.

If such a man lived in the South and in the country districts he would be under severe civil restrictions; he might possibly vote, live in a good neighborhood and be protected in the courts; but he would always live in fear of unprovoked aggression; he would often find no decent schools for his children. In the city, schools for colored children would be more crowded and less well-equipped than those for whites. The Southern city Negro achieves independence and civil rights by erecting a more or less complete city within a city; he is only hindered by the economic jealousy and greed of the whites who thus lose a large part of the most exploitable class. Whites strive for colored stores, theaters and real estate developments run by whites. Negroes contest this and political power determines the issue.

On the whole, the battle for civil rights which the Negro has been fighting for a century or more, while not entirely won, has had an astonishing series of victories and gained so large an amount of territory that today there is no question as to the legal rights of American citizens in the North. It is a case of enforcing the laws and insisting on Justice on the part of those who can afford it. Throughout the South it is more and more a problem as to how Negroes can be kept from a reasonable and increasing enjoyment of the more important civil rights.

While then there is much to do in the future, the experience of the past gives us every reason for hope to see in time for a black American citizen with full civil rights.

The Church and the Development of the Negro Race

Three things American slavery gave the transplanted Negro - the Christian religion, the English language, and the habit of systematic toil. And even though these gifts were accompanied by the debauchery of the home, the destruction of social organization and the loss of self-respect yet they were of vast influence. Indeed it has so happened that today among Negroes the church organization is the greatest and most characteristic experience of their group life and is in many respects stronger as it is undoubtedly older than the monogamic Negro home. Nor is this singular if we cut off one limb of the animal, there developes added strength and dexterity in the other limb, so that nature in turn counter-balances the loss to a degree. So in human society: when the slave trade destroyed the African home and tribal life, it left the religious life largely untouched and transplanted to the West Indian plantations the African priest with his wierd rites and incantations. This inchoate group gradually developed as the only purely African institution on American soil changing from the Obeah sorcery to a semi-heathen Christianity, then to a definited part of the white Christian Church and then to separate Negro organizations. Not only did it thus grow but it took to its own strength the weakness of the home and tribal government destroyed by the slave regime: it usurped the home as a centre of social life and the tribal functions as a center of intelligent group striving of all sorts, and finally when fully Christianized the church became the fullest expression of Negro group life.

THE SECRET EMPIRE OF SCALAWAG AND CARPET BAGGER

Georgia had had a different history from the beginning than Virginia and the Carolinas on the one hand or Louisiana on the other. The result has been that in this state a compact between northern capital and southern race prejudice has takenplace which has been unusually successful and has set an example to the whole south. This pact represents a treaty of peace between that part of the poor whites who have succeeded the slave holders in the domination of the south with that part of the north formerly represented by the carpet baggers and these two together are exploiting white and black labor. In order to do this they must keep the laborers divided, pitting white and black against each other. The best and easiest method of doing this is to encourage race prejudice. Race prejudice therefore in Georgia, so far as the real leaders of the state are concerned, is an artificial thing kept up for revenue only.

On the other hand, so far as the great mass of the laboring whites is concerned, it is a thing of passionate belief and concern which is kept at fever heat by vested interests and at the same time not a single institution in the state, either church nor school nor newspaper nor lecture platform is prepared to teach the mass anything different. Even the labor union is inhibited. The result is a much more hopeless situation so far as race prejudice is concerned than as though the thing rested on natural likes and dislikes of ordinary, uneducated people.

The prejudice of Georgia is today a part of a regular system. On it is built religion, political life, education and amount of income. To support this system the leaders are more and more forced to extreme measures. They must both encourage and placate the mob. They must allow a certain number of lynchings. They must craftily spread stories of outrages. They must encourage the mummery of secret orders and along with this must go pretense at democracy among the whites. The white masses must be joyfully welcomed to certain common meetings and actions and at the same time warned that any radicalism on their part will lead to assumptions on the part of the Negroes.

In this way the state comes to be ruled by a single political party although in compensation for this the degree of decentralization in local rule is carried to such an astonishing extent that in most matters the state government is practically non-existent. Thus the northern southerner formerly called the scalawag sings the Star Spangled Banner and upholds national life on the old ground of state rights and the southern northerner formerly called the carpet bagger, defends the southern attitude toward the Negro and lauds the black mammy.

The only difficulty in this scheme is the Negro, who continually seeks to climb out of his place. Too much mob law is bad for business while too little allows the Negro to become a property owner and even wield some political influence. This brings the necessity of a certain amount of secret alliance with the Negroes who have property and influence and on the other hand a second source of difficulty are those representatives of the old master class and the educated and modern white man who see the injustice and foolishness of the present situation and who will now and then speak out. They are kept from agitation by strong social pressure , the threat of race difficulties and influence upon their incomes.

Such then is the secret empire of scalawag and carpet bagger in Georgia and the only hope of breaking it is through the fighting, educated black man in conjunction with two possible classes of whites, the educated and thinking whites and the white labor leaders.

In this way the state comes to be ruled by a single political party although in compensation for this the degree of decentralization in local rule is carried to such an astonishing extent that in most matters the state government is practically non-existent. Thus the northern-southerner formerly called the "scalawag" sings the "Star Spangled Banner" and upholds national life on the old ground of state rights and the southern-northerner formerly called the "carpet bagger," defends the southern attitude toward the Negro and lauds the black "mammy."

The only difficulty in this scheme is the Negro, who continually seeks to climb out of his place. Too much mob law is bad for business while too little allows the Negro to become a property owner and even wield some political influence. This brings the necessity of a certain amount of secret alliance with the Negroes who have property and influence; and on the other hand a second source of difficulty are those representatives of the old master class and the educated and modern white man who see the injustice and foolishness of the present situation and who will now and then speak out. They are kept from agitation by strong social pressure , the threat of race difficulties and influence upon their incomes.

Such then is the secret empire of scalawag and carpet bagger in Georgia and the only hope of breaking it is through the fighting, educated black man in conjunction with two possible classes of whites: the educated and thinking whites and the white labor leaders.

POSTSCRIPT

To the Almighty Dead, into whose pale approaching faces, I stand and stare; you whose mistakes and stupidities and utter evil, have made wise with all wisdom, good with all experience and strong with Truth. In every name of God, bend out and down, you who are the infinite majority of all mankind; and overwhelm, and outvote and coerce the dwindling remnant of living beings, who in their fleeting days imagine themselves the best and wisest and most modern of men. Whither with wide revelation their stinking pride and empty boasting, whose recurring lies you know too well. Jeer at this last civilization which they have sought vainly to build on color or skin and curl of hair, on want and ill, rather than on decency of heart. Teach these willful fools all the things you well knew and forgot, dreamed and ruined, did and undid. Hell lies before us in our age; we push blithely into its flame and stench. Suffer us not to stew the world in unending Hell -- the Hell of South Africa, the Hell of our lower South, the Hell of Hells which is Europe today. Reveal, Ancient of Days, the Present in the Past and prophecy the End in the Beginning. Rebuke the blind who think they see that what is, will be forever; and what is not, can never be. Tell us, Forever Dead, there is no hope but Deed; there is no Dream but Memory.

AFRICA AND THE NEW PEACE

by W. E. D. DuBois

Not the Peace of Versailles but that of the Prince of Peace is the one that ought to engage the rapt attention of the Christian World today. And this because of a curious kink in our modern Christian ethics: we have long insisted that the individual must do right but we have without protest let the group do wrong. We easily condoned group brutality, theft and murder because we had assimilated "Sociology" and learned that apart from individual action there was an action of the group - an action which was presumbly ruled by inevitable natural laws and was therefore not amenable to wish, will or moral precept.

Today gradually but surely we have risen out of this mediaeval scholasticism into the scientific common sense of realizing that there is no "group" action which is not the action of individuals and that no mere synchronizing of effort can change murder to patriotism simply because in one case one man did the shooting and in another case a hundred thousand.

The degree of individual guilt may of course vary widely in the two cases and its more terrible incidence be hard to fix; force both of "Public" opinion and even of physical compulsion may vary the degree of guilt. But guilt it is and blood guilt and if the world is to make any real moral advance we must take up seriously this matter of group ethics and the share of individual blame for business immorality, race hatred and world catastrophes like the Great War.

One indication that we may be preparing to do this is the application of the best methods of group efficiency to religious work so that organized drives and large planning and clearing house methods are coming to be familiar in church effort. But how far does this indicate a similar orientation by which we are coming to judge the effect of group efforts by the standards of Christian ethics or even by decent every day morality.

The indications of this change of ethical attitude are mostly outside the church. The intelligent secular public has largely come to the place where it recognizes that Big Business as carried on 25 years ago was nothing more or less than organized highway robbery; that much of this spirit and rule still remains and that just as the dashing Gentlemen of the Road despite their picturesque personalties had to be curbed by stern measures and public police in earlier days, so today group highwaymen -Captains of Industry- must be policed by the public and made to submit to some code of individual Justice.

This therefore is peculiarly the problem to the church today: how far is the Christian Church today prepared to recognize and punish individual guilt in group action and to apply the high moral code of Jesus Christ to business to national life and to international relations. And above all how far will the church apply the new ethical attitude to race relations.

Consider for a moment the ridiculous paradox of present conditions: here is a world empty of human population save in a few centers. We need men, we need work, we need goods. We need too everywhere, in Europe, Asia, Africa and America, advance progress, upward striving-human development to the utmost. There is need- there is room, and yet - we fear each other; we fear each others' growth, physical expansion, mental alertness, spiritual ambitions. We assume continually complacently, in social classes, in nations, in races, that YOUR advance hurts ME or will hurt me.

Is this true? It is as false as hell and every decent individual knows it is false; and yet he helps raise and support armies to fight Japan and Mexico, he erects protective tariffs to starve Germany, he refuses to say a word and do an act to free from Chains Ireland, Egypt or India and at the same time calls himself a christian and sends missionaries to Africa!

How can an intelligent Christian square such extraordinary action with his conscience? We will admit that today he is having difficulties with his conscience in regard to most of the cases mentioned but probably not with Africa. You see AFRICA is quite a different case. In the first place Science teaches us -

Right here let us pause. Let us remember that the Great War enriched our vocabulary with many words and our eye with new methods: Propaganda is very old but the world saw it working in 1914-18. It has now only to remember that because American Negro Slavery needed energetic defense, unanswered, unquestioned propaganda against Negroes and Africa has had full sway in the civilized world for nearly 400 years! Conceive the status of the German in human estimation and even in science if the anti-German propaganda of 1918-1919 had been continued 100 years!

Curious has been the effort of this systematic Negro hatred. For instance, there is no scientific proof that the Negro brain is smaller or weighs less than the White brain or that absolute brain weight has any direct correlation with mental capacity. Yet the fact is asserted with absolute conviction certainty again and again that the Negro race is naturally and inevitably inferior to the white without the shadow of a retort. This white myth rests mainly on 190 brains weighed by Topinard. Since his day the total Negro brains measured are less than a thousand and on the contradictory testimony of these measurements - for in some series the Negroes out-weighed the whites- 206,000,000 human beings have been incontinently sentenced to something worse than death- a policy of compulsory and eternal debasement.

Equally crass has been the verdict of history. Any school boy can tell you that Africa has no history and this despite the well known story of Egypt and Ethiopia, the kingdoms of the Songhay, and the Mellestine, the art and culture of the west coast and the agriculture of Zymbabwe.

That Negroes were a large and important element in Egyptian civilization, that they discovered the use of iron, the beginning of all modern culture; that their industry, commerce and art ranked high in value and meaning before the coming of the foreign slave trade- all this is known to every honest investigator.

Today then the civilized Christian world faces Africa. What shall it do with the Ancient of Continents. The answer is easy: The world owes Africa a Mission of Human Culture:

First, HEALTH. As Johnston says, "Africa is the chief stronghold of the real Devil - the reactionary forces of Nature hostile to the uprise of Humanity. Here Beelzebub, King of the Flies, marshals his vermiform and arthropod hosts-insects, ticks, and nematode worms - which more than in other continents (excepting Negroid Asia) convey to the skin, veins, intestines, and spinal marrow of men and other vertebrates the micro-organisms which cause deadly, disfiguring, or debilitating diseases, or themselves create the morbid condition of the persecuted human being, beasts, bird, reptile, frog, or fish." The inhabitants of Africa have had sheer fight for physical survival comparable with that in no other great continent.

The modern world has done much in tropical medicine, but hitherto its effort has been to protect the white merchant and not the black native. A systematic mobilization of medical missionaries could clean the fever coast, banish the tsetse fly, curb sleeping sickness and render the jungle and the swamp habitable not simply for white men but for all men.

Second, INDUSTRY. Africa is one of the greatest sources of raw material needed in modern industry, and it is a potential hive of necessary human labor. These facts have been the tragedy of the Dark Continent, for with singular accord the white world has been determined to secure this raw material at the least expense and to compel the Negroes to work for the benefit of whites at small wages or none at all.

The result has been mutual disaster, and disaster on a scale which should stagger humanity if humanity realized the truth: it overthrew the kingdom of the Askias, a Negro empire two-thirds the size of the United States with written records going back a thousand years, and an organized industry and commerce: it subjected the art and culture of the west coast to bloodthirsty Dahomey and Benin; it brought chaos to the valley of the Congo in the past, and even in our day it cost twelve millions native lives. "The land was confiscated by the state and farmed out to private Belgian corporations. The wilder cannibal tribes were formed into a militia to prey on the industrious, who were taxed with specific amounts of ivory and rubber, and scourged and mutilated ff they failed to pay."

"Europe was staggered at the Leopoldian atrocities, and they were terrible indeed; but what we, who were behind the scenes, felt most keenly was the fact that the real catastrophe in the Congo was desolation and murder in the larger sense. The invasion of family life, the shattering of every tribal law, the introduction of criminal practices which struck the chiefs of the people dumb with horror- in a word, a vertiable avalanche of filth and immorality overwhelmed the Congo tribes."

The slave trade cost Africa one hundred million souls, it caused death strife and upheaval all over America while in our land it caused our Civil War. It made our missionary effort even when sanctified by a Livingstone, fall to the place where the Church of England was willing to make blood vengeance on Mwanga an excuse for seizing the land and liberty of nations. First missionaries, then gin, then annexation and slavery has been the Progress of "Christianity" in Africa for nearly a half millenium. Finally the effort of Germany, England, France, Portugal, Spain and Italy to monopolize land, materials and labor in Africa in the twentieth century was the prime cause of the greatest catastrophe the world ever saw-the World War.

Have we not paid enough? Can we not now seek to organize industry in Africa primarily for the benefit of the Africans and not for making English, French and American millionaires? It is not a task of great difficulty. For centuries the African has been an artisan and trader, a planter and hunter. We have simply to secure him in his possession of the land, encourage his best wants, introduce gradually new tools and methods and above all return to him the full measure of his earnings without exploitation or cheating and without sadling him with those ficticious and dishonest returns upon invested capital which strangle and madden civilised labor. That this can be done the cocoa and palm oil industry of Nigeria easily prove.

Third, GOVERNMENT. Local self government carried out by democratic methods is as indigenous to Africa as Germany. A Mission of Culture could strengthen these local governments, federate and enlarge them, induct natives gradually into office until modern representative self-government emerged. There is no question here of brains and ability- it is merely a matter of social technique. Africa can govern Africa as well as Europe governs Europe, once it has a chance to learn. In the past we used every ingenuity to harass native governments, deceive and cheat them embroil them in war and involve them in debt. Verily we have had our reward.

Fourth, EDUCATION. Revenues from Judicious taxation on industry could easily support government and a system of universal education for children. Natives of Africa are today taxed at an outrageous rate to support white officials on a European grade of income. The same rate of taxation laid on increased industry and on an encouraged and enthusiastic people could transform Africa in a generation. Universal education is a practical possibility. The mere fact that we have not educated millions of white civilized children is no argument that we cannot educate millions of black savages. We can do both or either if we want to. We are victims of a system of Christian ethics which premits us not to want to abolish ignorance for fear we may lose some of our own privileges. But is this real Christianity?

Fifth, RELIGION. For centuries our conception of carrying religion to the heathen has been that of inducting them into the mysteries of sectarian Theology and interfering impudently with their established life and customs. Even in the shining cases where this has not been true, there has remained that sense of helplessness before organized industrial aggression which has made the missionaries mute forerunners of Wall street methods. This must be changed. The future missionary of religion should be sent with peremptory orders to regard every custom and belief as sacred which is not patently unsanitary hurtful and degrading. It should be his work to introduce the principles of a moral life and not the cult of a new belief. Through the Deed the power of the Word should gradually penetrate and that Deed must include not simply personal moral cleanness but group honesty, national Justice, international respect and inter racial decency.

If someone should answer we cannot teach this, then the rejoinder is plain: - we cannot teach religion.

One has only to enumerate these five points of a Commission of Culture to the African heathens to hear a chorus of "impossible"! But it is not impossible. It is simply that the modern white world is not at present disposed to help the darker world in any such way. And in addition to that is can say to itself with a certain justification; if such adminstration of cultural uplife is possible for the heathen why is it not possible for our own submerged masses?

The answer is clear. It is possible and imperative for the disinherited classes of white nations. It must be undertaken. That is the duty of the day - it is the New Politics. But unless at the same time we carry our social settlements and our Social Uplift not simply to the slums of London and of New York but also to the world slums of Africa and Asia, these world slums will drag us down into jealousy and war. Out of a thousand proofs of this fact let me adduce just one: France today is arming Africa because she fears parts of Europe. Her bitter experience has taught her that she has reason to fear Europe. This fear is built on the military preparations of Europe. These military preparations would not be possible without the consenting votes of the working people of Europe. By this same vote the armies and navies of Europe have overridden Asia and Africa. Suddenly out of Africa at the call of France appears the black man armed. How will he be used? To overawe the white workers of Europe - of those parts of Europe which France fears, of other parts of Europe yes even of France itself. When white Europe out its depths shrieks out against this "barbarity" - Africa may answer "Who kept us barbarous but you?" Who for 400 years has stood by consenting to our degradation by slave trade, land-theft, murder deception and slavery? What do we owe you that you do not owe us?

In other words the uplift and safety of the submerged classes of Europe and America depends on the uplift of Africa for otherwise Ignorance and Brutality will come out of Africa armed to keep the laborers of Europe in their places. Does this reasoning seem strained and frantic? It is not. It is grim and present truth and if the Church even dimly sees her mighty mission she will face this gathering problem before it becomes a mad and cruel fact.

In 1884 an English bishop, Hannington, is consecrated. The Mohammedans are also strong in the land. King Mwanga decides that both Christians and Mohammedans are disintegrating his country. He kills the bishop and persecutes all foreign religions. The Christians and Mohammedans combine and drive him from the throne. Civil War ensues between the two religions and the Christians invite Mwanga to return. The Mohammedans are overcome but the Catholics and Protestants proceed to civil war. Suddenly an armed English expedition without legal authority is sent in 1890.

his expedition massacred the Catholics, completed the overthrow of the Mohammedans and compelled the King in 1892 to cede his country to the British East Africa Company. Thus Christianity was established in heathen Uganda!

Surely such "missionary effort" must, clear. The future missionary of religion should be sent with peremptory orders to regard every custom and belief as sacred which is not patently unsanitary, hurtful and degrading. What France is doing all Europe is contemplating. An English Imperialist wrote during the war:

"The demand for so large accessions of [colonial] territory, though justified also on commercial grounds, rests essentially on the second factor which has emerged in the course of the war, the realization of the military potentialities in the training under modern conditions of the natives of Africa."

In other words the uplift and safety of the submerged classes of Europe and America depends on the uplift of Africa, for otherwise Ignorance and Brutality will come out of Africa, armed, to keep the laborers of Europe in their places. Does this reasoning seem strained and frantic? It is not. It is grim and present truth and if the Church even dimly sees her mighty mission she will face this gathering problem before it becomes a mad and cruel fact.

The impartial historian will probably shrink from any attempt to estimate the relative degrees of savagery, bloodthirstiness, and brutality which the several nations of Europe imported into their task of spreading civilization and acquiring Empire. That cannot be done by making a scapegoat of our enemies, by sending them out into the wilderness with all their and our own sins upon their backs, and by seizing the opportunity of dividing their "possessions" among ourselves. It can only be done if, in some way or other, both for Germany and ourselves and for the whole world of European States, we destroy the colonial system, founded upon economic imperialism, in Africa, and set up in its place some system of Government which will cease to make of Africa a mere farm-the live-stock human beings-for the stock-markets and marts and needy adventurers of Europe, which will assure to the Africans the rights and privileges of human beings, and which will cease to make colonies, from Cameroon to British East Africa, a mockery of our professions and our civilization.

Take the case of Uganda. "Uganda was known to be one of the richest and most advanced kingdoms of Africa." In 1876 the English "Church Missionary Society sends a mission. In 1879 a French Roman Catholic Mission enters.

In 1884 an English bishop, Hannington is consecrated. The Mohammedans are also strong in the land. King Mwanga decides that both Christians and Mohammedans are disintegrating his country. He kills the bishop and persecutes all foreign religions. The Christians and Mohammedans combine and drive him from the throne. Civil War ensues between the two religions and the Christians invite Mwanga to return. The Mohammedans are overcome but the Catholics and Protestants proceed to civil war. Suddenly an armed English expedition is sent in 1890. This expedition massacred the Catholics, completed the overthrow of the Mohammedans and compelled the King in 1892 to cede his country to the British East Africa Company. Thus Christianity was established in heathen Uganda!

The demand for so large accessions of territory, though justified also on commercial grounds, rests essentially on the second factor which has emerged in the course of the war, the realisation of the military potentialities in the training under modern conditions of the natives of Africa.

Labor and Capital.

More than in most social problems, the argument surrounding labor and capital is a matter of words. If we change these indefinite and shifty terms and speak clearly of labor as effort and sacrifice; and of capital as tools and materials, we have taken a great step toward understanding. First of all, we include all work—whether of laborer, manager, or seer—under effort and sacrifice; and we easily recognize that all income of every sort is due to this cause, and this alone. On the other hand, as income is and must be personal, no income is due tools and machinery as such, but is only due the person who made or bought them by effort and sacrifice.

As long as men make that which can be immediately consumed or enjoyed, the problem of income is simple: one's income is what he makes or what he buys with what he has made. Property, under such a simple economic regime, is a social institution for insuring the equitable distribution of income, according to effort. Even in the case of land and natural resources the supply is so large that their enjoyment can be considered the result of the effort of discovery. Of course, they suffer whose efforts find no corresponding wants; and the old and maimed may go uncared for.

But with Health and Justice, private property under such circumstances, and helped out by Charity, was a beneficient institution.

Revolution came, however, when the manufacturing process began to prolong itself and the things which men made to satisfy their wants required years and decades - even centuries, instead of months and days and hours, as formerly. A new sort of goods, subject to ownership, appears,- namely, machinery and materials in various stages of manufacture. This kind of production called, not only for extended time, but also for wide individual cooperation among workers. In other words, social, as distinguished from individual, production became the rule of our industrial life.

Social production brought new problems and emphasized old ones.

1. The monopoly of land and raw materials.
2. The value of the finished product.
3. The ownership of the materials and product.

1. Concentration of industry and new demand for raw materials gave a monopoly value to some land which was, not the result of individual effort, but rather of general social growth. Yet this "Unearned Increment" went to swell the private fortunes of those who held title of certain lands or who had access to raw materials.

2. The value of food to me today or tomorrow is fairly easy to determine; but what can we say of the value of cocoa to the inhabitants of New York City a year hence? Puzzling questions arise of the number of born and dying in the next year; the migration to and from New York; the habits of drinking; the cost of other food; the income of individuals; the rent of houses, etc.

Yet if cocoa is to be had next year, we must begin now, at the latest, to provide it. Somebody must, therefore, guess at the future, using such knowledge as he can get to study his conclusions. It is this guessing at the Future value of goods, whose manufacture must begin now, which has made gambling in "futures" so large and fatal a part of the modern industrial process. Unearned increments in the value of products, due to changes in human life and thought, have become vast prizes, given to the daring and unscrupulous rather than to the industrious.

Even in the case of the widely demanded staples of long established indastry, where this element of chance is a mimimun, the fact remains that the value of the finished product is determined at a time far removed from the beginning of its manufacture and correlations between anticipated and actual value can never be exact.

3. The new goods- machinery and materials in processs of manufacture- naturally belong to those who furnish the raw materials and labored to transform it. This ownership is further complicated by the fact that the laborers, often sell their share in the Ultimate Product, for food and clothes and other present necessities.

This contract of sale, or the wage contract, was at first the sacrificing of the thrifty for the enjoyment of the thriftless; then it was entirely transformed and became the price paid by the rich who would wait to the poor who were hungry. Naturally, it tended to become the lowest amount necessary to keep workers from starving. Political power and Labor Unions have raised this price today in some cases to an equitable wage, but with most laborers the present low wage still is the cause of poverty and crime.

Contrast this with the condition of those who buy the laborers' share in current production; ~~then~~ their income is unregarded by public opinion because it is unknown, being hidden as a "return to capital" when in reality income must always be personal and a return for effort or a gift. The ownership of machinery and materials brings ownership of finished goods. Ownership of finished goods, made by the social time process, is always a monopoly and gives the owner, not simply present income, but the vaster power of controling the character and extent of future production. Moreover, long custom has allowed the owner of such goods to add to their selling price enough to pay for the replacement of his machinery and raw materials. Surely ~~there~~ these must be replaced, but the consumers who pay for the replacement should own them. As it is, invested effort dies with the doing; invested materials tends to become a perpetual receipt for future effort.

Such, then, is our great, modern, industrial problem, stated badly and simply and without many of the qualifications which complete treatment would entail. It involves the question as to the future attitude of society toward property ownership and particularly ownership of raw materials, tools, and machinery, goods in process of manufacture, and finished products.

Every civilized land has begun to restrict this ownership; by heavy income taxes, by restricting the freedom of the wage - contract, by fixing selling prices, by seizing property for public use, and by state industrial interprises.

However, to large and larger numbers of persons, called in general, Socialists, these seem half-way measures. They say that the state should own all materials and machinery and that thus society as a whole should exercise the power now wielded by capitalists. This, however, brings up a number of difficulties:

1st The just method of dispossessing present owners.

2nd The ability of the state

(a) to direct industry

(b) to apportion income

3rd The spiritual effect of the socializing of industry on the individual.

To some, these difficulties seem simple: they say that the Social Revolution through an inevitable Struggel of Classes will dispossess all capitalists by force; that there will be as much ability in the State after such a Revolution as before, and that the public can hire it just as private persons formerly did, and they assert that Justice and Co-operation in work will so increase income and reduce the hours of labor as to abolish poverty and yet leave a maximum of spiritual freedom.

only be brought into working order by much blood, suffering, and injustice and the more moderate Socialists - and do not most of us belong to that class? - seek a way to the same great ~~and~~ end through peace and development. Not that we minimize the costs of the present system in poverty, crime, and tears, but we know the more awful costs of revolution and war.

First, those who today own machines and materials are the thrifty savings ~~banks~~ depositors and small bond buyers ~~and~~ as well as the great Lords of Industry. Indeed, our most modern tyrants get their power and wealth through the control, rather than the ownership, of things. Dispossession, therefore, must be intricate social surgery, working through inheritance confiscation, excess profits taxes, mimimum wage limits, state insurance, and state regulation of industry. In some obvious lines the state is prepared today to actually direct industry and in others but little preparation would be necessary.

Nevertheless, there still remains the great question: Have we today a State that could direct industry as a whole, taking over all income and distributing the finished product? We may as well answer, proudly, We have not. First, we have not the Science of Human Action which must replace present guesswork and gambling by uniting and ~~systematory~~ systematizing statistics and economics and sociology. This we may easily have when we realize its practical necessity.

Secondly, we have not the intelligence necessary to the training and choosing of ability and the subordination and machine-like obedience which the industrial process must entail for a large part of every human beings' life, even though social reform left us a large, fine, free leisure. True, we have industry today, but it is the fear of starvation that oils its wheels and not the clearly conceived weal of the world.

We need, then, Science and Intelligence. But we need more, far more than this:

Thirdly we need the will to judge our fellows Justly. That is what ~~consumes~~ conscious distribution of income means. Today we determine income by power by chance, by personal likes and dislikes founded on little that is substantial or defensible. Distribution of Income should never be ~~mechanical~~ mechanical - it should be spiritual, ethical, a weighing of human desert. All this we lack and shall lack many generations.

But granted that we lack science, intelligence, and the will to Justice, are we like to acquire this under present conditions? We are not. Therefore, the present must be changed just as fast as change will help to install a new system. We can have a scientific census, and vital statistics and scientific surveys of our resources. We can have real schools to promote civilization and culture and not simply teach transient technique, and we can begin to teach that indsutrial reform begins in Justice toward our fellowmen.

It is as the Maxists rightly say, not impossible. But it is not as they wrongly assume, a matter of mere edict or change of system. It is a vast question of individual morals and training; a matter of introducing newer and higher and better and higher ideals for present selfishness and ignorance. It calls for years, not days, for centuries, rather than decades.

All this, however, is no excuse for reaction - for hesitating at beginnings. We mast begin. Society must begin today to take up the duties which it has so long wickedly left to selfish individuals. The result of such beginnings will not be the Millenium, but it will look toward it.

(1) Labor and Capital [No carbon]

More that in most social problems, the argument ~~summoning~~ surrounding labor and capital is a matter of words. If we change these indefinite and shifty terms and speak clearly of labor as effort and sacrifice; and of capital as tools and materials we have taken a great step toward understanding. First of all we include all work whether of laborer, manager or seer under effort and sacrifice, and we easily recognize that all income of every sort is due to this cause and this alone. On the other hand as income is and must be personal no income is due tools and machinery as such, but is only due the person who made or bought them by effort and sacrifice.

As long as men make that which can be immediately consumed or enjoyed the problem of income is simple: one's income is what he makes or what he buys with what he has made. Property under such a simple economic regime is a social institution for insuring the equitable distribution of income according to effort. Even in the case of land and natural resources the subtlety is so large that their enjoyment can be considered the result of the effort of discovery. Of course there suffer whose efforts find no corresponding wants; and the old and maimed may go uncared for.

But with Health and Justice, private property under such circumstances, and helped out by Charity, was a beneficient institution.

(2) *

Revolution came however when the manufacturing process began to produce daily and the things which men made to satisfy their wants required years and decades — even centuries, instead of ~~years~~ months and days and hours as formerly. A new sort of goods subject to annihilation appears, namely machinery and ~~materials~~ materials in various stages of manufacture. This kind of production called not only for extended time but also for wide individual cooperation among workers. In other words social as distinguished from individual production became the rule of our industrial life.

28-12-195

Social production brought new problems and emphasized old.

1. The monopoly of land and raw materials
2. The value of the finished product
3. The ownership of the materials and product.

1. Concentration of industry and new demand for raw materials gave a monopoly value to some land which was not the result of individual effort but rather of general social growth. Yet this "Unearned Increment" went to swell the private fortunes of those who held title to certain lands or who had access to raw materials.

The value of food to me today or tomorrow is fairly easy to determine; but what can we say of the value of cocoa to the inhabitants of New York city a year hence?

Puzzling questions arise of the number living & dying in the next year; the migrations & aid from New York; the habits of drinking; the cost of other food; the income of individuals the rent of houses, etc.

Yet if cocoa is & be traded next year one must begin now at the latest to provide it. Somebody must therefore guess at the future, using such knowledge as he can get & slowly his conclusions. It is this guessing at the future value of goods which manufacture must begin which has made gambling in "futures" so large and fatal a part of the modern industrial process. Unearned increments in the value of finished due & changes in human life and thought alone become vast prizes given to the daring & avid unscrupulous rather than & the industrious

Even in the case of the staples the widely demanded staples of long established industry the fact where this element of chance is a minimum the fact remains that the value of the finished product is determined at a time far removed from the beginning of the manufacture & consequently between anticipated and actual values can never be exact.

3. The new goods — machinery and materials in process of manufacture naturally belong to those who furnish the raw materials and labored to transform it This ownership is further complicated by the fact that the laborers, sometimes through lack of thrift, more often forced by their poverty, sell their share in the ultimate Product. & the owner for food and clothes and other present necessities

(4)* This contract of sale or the wage contract was at first the exception & the trusty for the enjoyment of the thrillers; then it was entirely transformed and became the price paid by the rich who owned most & the poor who were hungry. Naturally it tended

& become the lowest amount necessary & keep workers from starving. Political power & ~~social power~~ into ~~unclean~~ Labor Unions has raised this price today but much more laborers in some cases & ~~an equitable wage~~ an equitable high, ~~like in other~~

Low wage ~~,~~ all is the cause of undesired the present & ~~crimes~~, poverty, & crime

Contrast this with the condition of those who buy the laborers share in current production: their income is unexplained by public opinion because it is unknown, being hidden as a "returned capital" when in reality income must always be personal & a return for effort or a gift. The ~~control~~ ownership of machinery & materials being ownership of finished goods. Ownership of finished goods, made by the social time process is always a monopoly & gives the owner not simply present income but the power of controlling the character & extent of future production. Moreover every custom has allowed the owner of ~~goods~~ such goods & add & then selling price enough & pay for the replacement of his ~~goo~~ machinery & raw materials. Surely these must be replaced but the consumers who pay for the replacement should own ~~labour~~ effort. As it is invested ~~labour~~ ~~dyes~~ dies up all the decay; invested ~~materials, ores & foundations~~ materials, tools & income, a ~~fund~~ potential receipt for future ~~labour~~ effort.

Exploitation is our great modern industrial problem, stated baldly and simply and without many of the qualifications which complete treatment would entail. It involves the question as to the future ~~treatment~~ attitude of society toward property ownership — and particularly ownership of raw materials, tools and machinery, goods in process of manufacture and finished products

Every civilized land has begun to restrict this ownership: by ~~securing~~ ~~a~~ ~~for public use~~ ~~in the shape of death, taxation, for public use~~ ^ heavy income taxes ^ gift taxes; ~~but~~ by ~~interference with~~ restricting the freedom of the wage-contract, by restricting the owners power of re-investment, by ~~and~~ ^ by selling prices by severing ~~the~~ property for public use ^ and by stable industrial interference

The danger of such ownership lies in the tremendous social power which it lodges in private hands. The rich in goods are powerful for they can indulge themselves and buy services from others. But the owner of machinery and materials can determine, to a large extent, what there shall be in the market to be bought, what it shall be sold for and what the income of the mass of laborers shall be.

This, the modern world recognizes is too great a power and one easily abused. Every civilized land, therefore, has begun to restrict this power of ownership. Large wealth is more and more heavily taxed and charged with our taxes and effort is made more or less successfully to distinguish wealth in machinery and unfinished materials from other wealth. Efforts, too, are made to restrict the power of property in determining wages and conditions of work and even in determining what shall be manufactured and the price of sale.

However, to large and large numbers of persons, called in general socialists, these seem half-way measures. They say that the state should own all materials and machinery and that thus society as a whole should exercise the power now wielded by capitalists. This, however, brings up a number of difficulties:

1st The just method of dispossessing present owners.

2nd The ability of the state

(a) to direct industry

(b) to apportion income

3rd The spiritual effect of the socializing of industry on the individual.

To some these difficulties seem simple: they say that the Social Revolution through an inevitable Struggle of Classes will dispossess all capitalists by force; that there will be as much ability in the State after such a Revolution as before and that the public can hire it just as private persons formerly did, and they assert that Justice and Cooperation in work will so increase income and reduce the hours of labor as to abolish poverty and yet leave a maximum of spiritual freedom.

Without doubt, this program of the extreme ~~marxian~~ Marxian socialists could only be brought into working order by much blood, suffering and injustice and the ~~same~~ more moderate socialists - amd do not most of us belong to that class? - ~~seek~~ a way to ~~the~~ the same great end through peace and development. Not that we ~~summarize~~ minimize the costs of the present system in poverty, crime and tears, but we know the more awful costs of revolution and war.

First those who today own machines and materials are the thrifty savings-banks depositors and small bond buyers and well as the great Lords of Industry. Indeed our most modern tyrants get their power and wealth through the control rather than the ownership of things. Dispossession, therefore must be intricate social ~~energy~~ surgery working through inheritance, confiscation, excess profits, taxes, mimimum wage limits, state ~~insame~~ insurance and state regulation of industry. ~~Above all the State~~

In some obvious times the State is prepared to, & actually direct industry and in others and little preparation would be necessary.

Nevertheless there still remains the great question: have we today a State that could direct industry as a whole taking over all income ~~as allocated by the present time~~ and distributing the finished product? We may as well answer frankly, We have not. What we have not the Science of Human Action which must replace present guesswork and gambling by exacting and systematizing statistics and economics and sociology. This we may

We can have real schools & promote civilization
& culture & most simple & teach economic techniques

And we can begin to teach that individual reform begins in Jesus Name and for Christ's sake.

It is as the Marxists rightly say not impossible. But it is not as they wrongly assume a matter of mere edict or change of system. It is a vast question of individual morals and training; a matter of introducing newer and higher and better

ON THE NEW YORK STAGE.

I have watched with much interest the developing interest of the Negro on the stage in New York and, therefore, necessarily in the American drama throughout the nation.

I came to New York at the end of an era when Williams and Walker, Cole and Johnson and Ernest Hogan were a fading memory. To be sure, Bert Williams continued for many years but he was in the eyes of the stage a tradition, rather than a new force. Then came the determined effort to put the Negro on the stage and Mrs. Hapgood and her players made a brave, fine effort but New York looked on in askance. Dissolution efforts followed the Ethiopia Players, the attempt to have colored and white players in the same cast, and things of that sort. Just as matters were settling down and the pessimists saw the end of the Negro on the stage, came the triumph of the new musical plays "Shuffle Along" and "Runnin' Wild". These after a while seemed to have reached their limit, despite the latest "Africana" with its jungle flavor and the gorgeousness or "Rang Tang". Of course there was that other beginning: "All God's Chillun" down in the Village, followed on to "Deep River", "Abraham's Bosom", and the Little Theatre movement in Harlem. Then there came another angle. Colored and white players appeared in the same cast, and the African motif expanded. One sees this in "The Golden Dawn" and in "The International" down at the Playrights Theatre, with its Meyerhold flavor. Then there is the beauty of "Porgy" and the excellence of "Show Boat", both of which captured New York. There is Abby Mitchel as the maid in "Coquette" and other cases to many to list as a single genre or a particular line of development. It all simply means to me, as I sit and look upon the changing stage, that into the American drama slowly but with a sureness that is astonishing, the Negro is taking his legitimate part. He is arriving. For this we owe much to the pioneers, but we owe something too to the players of today: Bledsoe, Wilson, Robeson and Mrs. Rose McClendon.

KENYA

The situation in Kenya, East Africa is one of the most extraordinary combinations of physical and social problems that could be imagined. ~~First of all comes the physiographical peculiarities.~~ In east central Africa, near the Indian Ocean arises a plateau with mountains in the midst of a ~~vast~~ desert ~~which cuts the area off from~~ from the highlands of Ethiopia, ~~the plains of~~ North Africa ~~and the great~~ Congo valley. In the midst of this island plateau, and right on the ~~equator a moun~~ tain shoots ~~_____~~ feet into the air to the region of ~~eternal snows~~. This mountain and its foothills, sinking from high plateau to swamp, is Kenya, where two centuries ago lived four or millions of the finest specimens of African manhood

Kenya was never a center of slave trading. But it was a path to the interior, and a peculiar sort of geographical phenomena. Kenya is a high mountain set in a desert exactly on the equator, and covered with eternal snow. The desert stretches right to the headwaters of the Nile, cutting off the mountains of Abyssinia from the Kenya Highlands.

The Kenya Highlands are peculiar. There is a low range of hills overlooking the Indian Ocean. The soil is rocky, and the rainfall is scanty.

To the south, between Kenya and Tanganyika, formerly German East Africa, the desert comes up to the Highlands, and almost cuts Kenya from the central plateau.

It is this island that forms in our day the most intricate and costly of the British race problems, which has in our times cost millions of money, and hundreds of thousands of lives. The foothills of the mountains form the Kenya Highlands, lie in a small plain between the Highlands and Lake Victoria Nyansa.

Outside the narrow coastal strip, the only land of any value in Kenya lies on this mountain plateau, and in the small plain between the Highland s and Lake Victoria Nyansa.

The shores of the this high island are 4000 feet above the sea the highest peaks go up to 10,000-18,000 feet.

began in 1905 when control was transferred from the foreign office to the colonial office. Lord Elgin was then colonial secretary, and Winston Churchill under-secretary. Churchill ruled that the privileged position of the European settlers in the Highlands as against the Indians, could only be effected by administration, since there could not be actual legal restrictions. He recognized apparently no restrictions so far as the native Africans were concerned.

But the Indians were resistant and had historical reasonx to be. The Indian community was much larger than the white and historically the trade between Africa and India was large and had pre-dated any connection between India and Europe. It was still a considerable trade and there was the question as to how far more Indians would have the right to migrate to Kenya, which was, of course, within theBritish Empire. The Indians demanded free immigration, the right to buy land and a law of voting which would place all voters in each constituency on a common electoral role.

Because of this demand xxxxxxxx and the question of rights for Indians and natives the government had sent out from England a series of commissions to study the xxx situation and make recommendations.

There ensued a series of commissions sent out by parliament to examine the conditions in Kenya and toreport. During the 1st World War the demands of the Indians were dormant, but were revived in 1921 when a commission headed by the man who is now Lord Halifax made proposals to Mr. Churchill which were considered by a committee on which four leading Indian statesmenx sat. They came to no agreement, but in 1923 the Duke of Devonshire announced an epic making decision of the government, which grievances, and declared that"persons of every race, every religion, colored no less than white, have a right to equal treatment in accordance to their needs." It permitted the Africans to grow coffee, and own land on individual tenure, and ordered that taxation should be graded according to wealth. Unfortunately, this paper was never acted upon, and aroused objection in white Kenya, particularly because it repeated the Devonshire pronouncement... of 1923 of the "paramountcy of native interests."

A special commission under Lord Moyne went to Kenya in 1932. They concluded that the natives were not getting a fair deal, and were carrying too great a burden of taxation. They criticized lack of social services, and proposed that Europeans pay more in the ~~m~~ form of an income tax. The main part of this recommendation was not adopted.

In 1934 Sir Morris Carter spent a year studying the land problem and reported. His report felt bound to accept most of the proposals of the settlers, recognizing that the large claims of a small number of Europeanxx immigrants were of equal importance if not more than those of three million native inhabitants.

For a long time the problem of Kenya which aroused most outside interest was that of the people of the east Indies who formed a larger proportion of the popu lation than the whites ever did. These Indians were not intruders as most of the British assumed but next the natives have been longest in East Africa

An order in the Council in 1898 gave the government power to acquire land but not to alienate it. Alienation was legalized by an order in 1901. The Crown in Kenya granted rights in land which may be summarized thus: To the Europeans, 2000 miles in freehold and 5,500sq. miles in leasehold. To the Indians, 22 sq. Miles. To Africans: no land at all.

1P The natives became tenants-at-will of the Crown. Every vestige of legal right in land whether belonging to tribe, chief, or individual tribesman, was obliterated. Successive governors were allowed to dispose as they thought fit of the whole country and its inhabitants irrespective either of their rights or their wishes.

A few years ago laws were passed to control native squatters in the Highlands, in order to extinquish tenant's rights which they might have acquired in time, and to reduce them to the position of servants to be evicted at the convenience of the employers. These laws deeply affected the whole status of about 150,000 Africans who were squatting on European land.

The foothills of the mountains, and the large Kavirondo plain are the only areas of arable land occupied by the natives. The rest has been given to whites. And this is the story of Kenya.

as poor as any in the world, and suffering from disease, which they cannot remedy because of their poverty, paid at least 1/4 of his maximum earnings in direct taxation, while the richest European in the colony escaped tax.

The indirect taxation falls not only on luxuries like whisky and tobacco, but on necessities of life like flour and clothing, and is deliberately designed to add to the profits of the whites at the cost of the blacks.

In the spring of 1929 the income of the average peasant family was from $15 to $20 a year including the value of the food. $20 a year is the average income of a peasant Kenyan today. It was estimated in 1921 that the Africans of Kenya received in wages 7½ million dollars, of which from half to 2/3 was paid in cash. Thus the government exercises a nearly complete control over the industry of Africans and uses that control to increase by every possible means the profits of the European colony. That colony depends for its existence on the artificial support of the government. It was declared that until the late 20's the Africans in most districts received very little returns from the relatively high taxation which they were paying.

In 1936 the Director of Agriculture wrote that practically nothing had been done by his department for native agriculture up to 1929. The Africans were allowed to grow neither tea nor coffee and yet in the areas which about half of them inhabit coffee might be a reliable and profitable crop. Social services which have gradually been built up to protect workers do not exist in Kenya. There is no workingmen's compensation act. Every effort is made to make the worker leave home for alien and often absentee landlords. This is the great cause of the decline of the population .

The bill was drawn up by a select committee representative of settler's interests. It was a question of life and death to the squatters.

In 1924 it is forbidden the African in Kenya to rent land from its European owners. It is universally recognized that profound social changes cannot take place rapidly without disaster. In Kenya an ignorant peasantry has in large part been turned into an industrial proletariet in a single generation. ~~Nothing of the kind has ever happened in the same time in the world before.~~ The result has been a social disintegration of which declining population is an outward sign. In 1924 the policy pursued in Kenya was of taxing the poor instead of the rich, of alienating unoccupied land to the Europeans, and forcing Africans to work for Europeans.

A leaseholder, even if the lease be only annual, has a higher status than a wage-earner, and the authorities in Kenya agree with the settlers that the presence, in the "settled" areas, of Africans with a status higher than a wage-earner, and so more independent, is so offensive that it ought to be a penal offence. So in 1918 it was made one. The Resident Natives or Squatters Ordinance then enacted has it that" no occupier shall permit any family to reside on a farm save under the conditions hereafter prescribed." A magistrate's permission is needed for every squatter that the owner of a farm may want, and all of them must do a minimum of 180 days' paid work in each year for the owner.

In 1921 the Secretary of State for Colonies, being pushed by English opinion, sent instructions that administrative officers were not to take any part in recruiting labor, but they were ordered to encourage natives to go to work. But bishops of the Church urged compulsory labor.

The ordinary farm laborer in Kenya gets $2.50 a month and can earn $25 a year by working all the year. Out of this ~~cash~~ he must pay ~~12 shillings~~ $3 a year Hut Tax, ~~while the tax on a white man who earns $1000 a year is $15.~~ In addition ~~the African must pay~~ to the tax imposed by his native council. ~~In the case of dependents the tax on Europeans is lessened, while that on natives is increased.~~ ~~Africans in Kenya have to pay three direct taxes.~~ This by padding the rolls and charging several taxes to each hut, amounts to $5 a year, and in 1931 this tax brought in 3 million dollars. In 1942 half the males of Kenya were either employed at wages or on military service, and that proportion in some districts has reached 77%. ~~The amount paid in taxation by Africans~~ which was ~~at least~~ 2/3 of the whole tax revenue of the colony in 1924.

The last kind of direct tax paid by Africans in Kenya is in the shape of ~~un~~enforced labor. All adult males are required to do 6 days' unpaid work every three months. In order to force the Africans to hire out a registration office is kept open which costs nearly as much to maintain as the whole amount spent on the education of Africans.

In 1924 the largest and poorest section of the population of Kenya,

It used to be said that the boon bestowed on African natives was stopping inter-tribal war. But the first World War destroyed more life than a generation of inter-tribal wars. Over 350,000 unarmed porters were used in the campaign against the Germans in East Africa, of whom 150,000 came from Kenya. About 14,000 were in the armed services.

In the Chino war 46,000 men were killed or died of disease and of these 40,645 were untraced and unclaimed balances of paying wages amounting to ~~135,000~~ #775 000 pounds were still owed them. The widows of these dead porters received no pensions but have to pay hut tax like other widows. The number of deaths does not include many thousands who died after their return home, from diseases contracted during service.

The number of Kenya Africans officially known to have lost their lives in the ~~Great~~ 1st World War, ~~40,000~~, is actually a larger proportion of the population than it was in the case of ~~this country~~ G.B. Britain. (The records were admittedly incomplete and the true total was at least 60,000).

Forced labor for private employers was used during the war. And during the last war, as in the early 20's, administrative officers again became recruiters of forced labor.

During the 2nd World War in the Ethiopian campaign four or five of the tribes joined in freeing Ethiopia. South African whites, and East and West AFrican tnative troops were fighting. British and Indian forces were employed. The Sudanese were used, and AFricans from Belgian Congo further south. The immense value of African armies was proved, and the dependence of British Africa upon imperial protection.

In 1924 Miss Perham reminds us that Europe is dependent all the world over on the loyalty ~~of~~ and courage of colored troups, African, Indian, Chinese. The policy of racial discrimination is therefore against the growing demand of our time that the domination and racial privileges of white men should be diminished in order to allow greater racial equality.

Insert N

The first race problem in Kenya was that of the Indians. They had the larger part of the trade. In the early years of the colony the Indian rubee was the money for trade.

After ~~At the time of~~ the last World War, the Africans began to get improved social services, and an inter-colonial college was established at ~~Mak~~ Makerere..... In 1924 Kenya spent 110 pounds on education for the African community of 3 million as compared with 115 pounds for the education of less than 1000 European children. Most of the money for African education goes to missions, and is increasingly devoted to supplying commercial demand for Africans Once admitted into a society, the principle of inequality of status tends to spread. In Kenya for example, the first advantage gained by Europeans over the native Africans was that they alone got grants of Crown land. Then they got exclusive franchise rights. Then superior education for their children, the monopoly of coffee-growing, and so on until in every phase and function of life Europeans are in one position and Africans in another, always the lower position.

The ultimate fact is that Africans, being human, will not tolerate this inferiority of status much longer. If this series of fortifications built along the racial boundary is not removed deliberately, it will be overthrown.

Kenya was a crown colony in 1924 and it is a country governed by a governor under the direction of the Colonial Secretary and with the help of a legislative and an executive council. Of the former, half the members are officials, and the minority is composed of 11 Europeans, 5 Indians and 1 Arab.

The Indians have refused to elect the members allotted to them, since their agreements were repudiated.

The AFricans in Kenya are bitter, with ~~It is~~ one long list of ~~tears and~~ grievances. ~~A commissioner said~~ They believe ~~are under the impression~~ that the Europeans is determined to keep the native under, take his land, and use him as a laborer at the Colonial ~~smallest wage. There is deep feeling among the Africans,~~ especially, of course, ~~among the Kiyuyu~~ Kikuyu, with regard to land.

~~There is a development of~~ The political societies ~~which~~ are carefully watched by the police. And at the beginning of the last World War all the leaders of three Kikuyu and Kamba societies were arrested on charge of sedition and many of them stayed long terms in prison untried.

After the First World War a Kikuyu called Harry Thuku, started a political society which resulted in an attack upon the jail with sticks shouting and singing. This was called an uprising although none of the defenders of the jail were hurt. Thuku was shipped to the Somali border, but the tax which caused the uprising was reduced from 16 shillings to 12 shillings.

There were strikes and riots in Mombasa in 1937 , arising out of bad labor conditions.

Miss Perham says "it takes a great deal to drive Africans to overt resistance. It took the gross neglect and underpayment of labor to drive the dockers ~~in~~ to riot in Mombasa in 1938."

The second reason for these rules is the rise of a number of societies independent of European influence, with the purpose of ventilating grievances and advocating reforms. (The largest of these societies, the Kikuyu Central Association, sent two of its members to give evidence before the Select Committee. The Committee declined to hear them.

Since the first World War the agitation of the Indians has absorbed the attention of the public. The Indians demand three things: free immigration, the right to buy land, and a franchise law which would place all voters in each constituency on a common electoral role. The Wood-Winterdan (?) agreement admitted the Indian trains to the franchise and to free immigration, but supported the exclusive right of Europeans to ownership of land in the highlands. The Devonshire Despatch approved by the cabinet in 1923 gave a communal franchise to Indians and left the question of immigration open. The publication of the Wood-Wedgerton agreement was followed by a violent political storm in Kenya. The European colony determined on resistance. Armed rebellion was threatened, and was thoroughly organized. A deputation was sent to England, and the verdict of the country was reversed.

Today there are in Kenya 40,000 Europeans, I00,000 Indians and 5 million Negroes

In Uganda there are 4000 Europeans, 40ooo Indians and 5 million Negroes

In Tanganyika there are 20,000 Europeans 50,000 Indians and 7,500,000 Negroes

What now, has happend to the natives? Fifty years ago the central part of the Highlands was inhabited by various tribes, most of them ~~Nomads and not thickly settled. There were, for instance,~~ herdsmen, sparsely distributed. the Masai, ~~who had come~~ came down from the northern desert ~~and are now settling down to agriculture.~~ They, like their predecessors, the Gala, are among the handsomest of mankind. Tall, and comely, ~~and~~ they have for centuries ~~had~~ been cattle raisers and raiders. The Europeans came in contact with them in their search for a direct route to Uganda, and have progressively taken their land. When the Uganda Railroad was built, 1895-1901 it ~~crossed~~ cuts the grazing land land of the Masai in two

The Masai were given land amounting to about 1/10 of what they had previously owned, and spparated into two parts so as to ruin their cattle grazing. The government ~~finally~~ tried to satisfy them by promising a wide corridor between the parts, and declared that this land should belong to the Masai "as long as the Masai tribe should live". Five years later they had broken their word and ~~again the Masai lost land, and by~~ 1919 45,000 of them with 2 million cattle and sheep were in an area without water and practically useless. Land formerly belonging to them and had been now ~~worth~~ tens of millions of dollars were given to Englishmen. ~~In 1924 these landholders were not taxed and paid no direct taxation.~~ A great block of the Masai land was carved out of the very heart of their holdings and they were forbidden to use that land except as contract laborers at the will of the landlord.

So too, the Kikuyu, who are today making most of the trouble, lost the larger part of their land. Some of it was given to white settlers for coffee farms, and natives ~~in Kenya are~~ were not allowed to raise either tea or coffee.

Other tribes like the Temba, and the Milu, have had to surrender a large part of their area. As result of this procedure, perhaps 100,000 Africans in Kenya are ~~today~~ landless, ~~and there is no room for them in the reserves.~~ The native reserves are overcrowded and

They appeared first ostensibly to put down a new slave trade, which had begun in the Sudan under the Egyptian monarch, Mohammed Ali, and was carried on to furnish servants and workers for the Turkish Empire and later for the American slave trade.

Then in the 19th century a new slave trade arose in East Africa, which furnished ivory and slaves for various parts of the world, especially England and America. Medical advance began now to enable Europeans to live in the tropics, and the control of labor in Asia and Africa produced profits which were the cause of modern colonial imperialism.

When the Industrial Revolution took place in Europe and the slave trade to America waned, there was a demand for reinvesting the profits of capital. The raw materials were derived each year in greater degree from tropical countries, — Africa, Asia and elsewhere. Democracy in Europe limited the profits.

said, "Primarily Kenya is an African territory, and his majesty's government thinks it necessary to definitely to record their concerned opinion that the interests of the African natives must be paramount, and that if and when those interests and the interests of the immigrant settlers should conflict, the former should prevail."

This statement caused great excitement at the time, and finally was practically withdrawn. The Indians had demanded free immigration, the right to buy land, and a franchise law which would place all voters in each constituency on a common role. The Duke of Devonshire in 1923 granted the communal franchise but left the question of immigration open.

A violent political storm ensued in Kenya, and the European colony practically determined on armed rebellion. A deputation was sent to England and the verdict of the council reversed.

In 1924 a large royal commission was appointed, but without giving reason, this was dissolved the following year.

The Kikuyu lost most in the past and have the most pressing urgent needs. They lost valuable men and land to settlers for coffee farms. Some of this was compensated for but at a very small rate, and much of it of inferior quality to that which had been taken away before.

Moreover, some of the land taken away from these people was widely separated so that those in one part were unwilling to go so far to their friends, relatives and tribes, and too, there was considerable difference in climate.

The main object of the Maurice Carter report of 1924 set out to achieve, that is the removal of a deep sense of grievance among the Kikuyu, was not obtained.

The officials brought pressure on chiefs and people so as to induce practically the whole male population to offer for work. Some ran away. It cost 20,000 pounds a year to keep the registration office open while only 24,000 pounds a year was spent on the education of Africans.

The nature and spirit of the policy of government in Kenya in 1924 was illustrated by the fact that the largest and poorest section of the population, as poor as can be found in the world, suffering from disease which cannot be remedied on account of their poverty; this proletariat has paid at least a quarter of its maximum earnings in direct taxation while the richest European in the colony escapes tax. The deliberate policy of the government is to induce the whole able-bodied population of African natives to work for wages for private employers.

In 1938 in the district of South Kavirondo the Africans earned 53,000 pounds in wages and 99,500 by sales of produce or 150,775 in all. Of this they spent 47,900 on commodities, while government taxes, fees and fines took 75,000 pounds or almost half. Thus the government took back exactly half the income of people whose annual cash earnings are about 9s. a head.

The indirect taxation falls, not only on luxuries like whisky and tobacco, but on necessities of life like flour and clothing, and is deliberately designed to add to the profits of a favoured minority, at the cost of the rest of the community.

we are left with 4 ~~lbs~~ a year as the average income of a peasant family in Kenya today.

In 1921 the chiefs..... asserted that it was the practice to force women and girls to work on plantations. The total sum received in wages by Africans in Kenya in 1921 was estimated at 1,500,000 pounds, of which half to 2/3 was paid in cash. This means less than 11 shillings a month for the average wage of workers. Other than cash the wages consist of blankets, and food, In short, the government of Kenya in 1924 exercises a nearly complete control of the industry of Africans, and uses that control to increase by every possible means the profits of a European colony that depends for its existence on its artificial support by the government.

In June 1930 the Government published the now famous White Paper on Native Policy in East Africa, and instructed the Governors of the various East African Dependencies to carry out its directions. It was far less downright than the statements on the same subject made eighty years ago by former British Governments. But it did say that Africans were to be allowed to grow coffee; it did say they might have land on individual tenure; it did direct that taxation should be graded according to wealth; and above all it laid it down that "persons of every race and every religion, coloured no less than white, have a right to equal treatment in accordance with their several needs". If it had been acted upon, this White Paper, though halting and often vague, might have been perhaps as useful a check to the long period of drift in the wrong direction as a more direct and definite statement would have been.

The publication of the White Paper was followed by loud and emphatic protests. Objection centred on the phrase, copied from the Devonshire White Paper of 1923, "paramountcy of native interests". (In truth, no one knows what it means. No African or friend of Africans, asks that in any respect Africans should be in a position higher than Europeans. All that is asked for is equal justice. Professing to give more than equal justice, we give less.) Lord Delamere said that compliance with the directions of the White Paper would involve the amendments of more than twenty Ordinances, as laws are called in Kenya, and announced that until it was withdrawn he would refuse cooperation with the Government of Kenya. A few months later he was reappointed to the Executive Council. The settlers of Northern Rhodesia issued a statement repudiating the White Paper and asserting, with perfect truth, that its execution would completely reverse the policy of their Government.

were cattle raisers and raiders, whose wars like those of the Scottish clans were thundering exhibitions, and object was cattle.

Europeans came in contact with them when in search of a direct route to Uganda. In 1890 the herds of the Masai were swept away by the Rinda pest epidemic, so that many of the Masai died of starvation. The Kikuyu and the ..omba... took this opportunity for revenge. Just then the British agents came in , and stopped the raiding and between '97 and 1901 the Masai settled down near Nairobi. The Uganda railroad was begun in 1895, and finished in 1901. It cost the land of the Masai. The governor, Sir Charles Eliot determined to make the country a European colony, and applied to the British treasury for money. The British refused but an officer was sent to South Africa to find people who could be persuaded to accept grants of land and live in the country.

In Eliot's time the main body of the Masai lived within the center of their formerly extensive territories in the .Rift.. valley between ~~the~~ Nairobi and Naikuiu. The railway transversed their best grazing ground. The governor was hospitable to those whom he had invited to settle, giving them land in areas of 10,000, 25,000 and even 100,000 acres. The grants were not even surveyed beforehand. The government acted as if no native rights in land existed, and in law these rights were soon completely swept away. The Kikuyu suffered worse because among them land rights had begun to be personal. Tens of thousands of them were living in 1924 on land to which they had an indefeasible claim. The Masai lost most so far as area is concerned.

Europeans were laying claim to ownership in the Rift valley. Grants of land were made in London without informing the governor of Kwnya,

Until the appointment in 1931 of the Joint Select Committee of Parliament, the only one of these Commissions that was properly representative was the large Royal Commission of 1924, which was dissolved in the following year, for a reason that has never been publicly explained. While the reports of all except one of these Commissions contain long accounts of what their authors considered were the needs of the Africans, who in Kenya are 98 per cent of the population, and are an even larger proportion in the other East African countries, none of them explained at all adequately their wishes,

In 1924, ~~In 1923~~ the Labor government sent a parliamentary commission, under Mr. Ormsby-Gore to report on conditions. This report gave occasion for reiteration of the policy of the government as to the place of the native in the body politics by Mr. Amery

The deplorable decision of the Select Committee to refuse to hear the delegates chosen and sent, at the cost of great sacrifices, by Africans themselves, though it had listened to the delegates chosen by the Government, must have added many to the number of those in Kenya who suspect that our promises are not intended to be fulfilled.

in 1927, and a new special commission under Hilton-Young and with Dr. Oldham was sent. On receipt of their exhaustive report, which the Kenya settlers did not like, Amery dispatched Sir. Samuel Wilson to discuss the matter with the local government. His report was received by Lord Passfield, the former Sidney Webb, who issued several papers on the subject. The matter was then submitted to a joint committee of parliament which presented its report in October 1931. Delgatians of Africans, Indians and Europeans were brought from Africa.

They evacuated the Rift Valley unwillingly and found themselves short of both land and water. Despite this treaty, the Masai were moved in 1910, and the word of the government finally broken. Thousands of cattle died and old people perished by exposure and hunger. The Masai openly resisted. The dispute was taken to court but finally it was decided in favor of the Europeans. Appeal to the Privy Council was made, but the Masai did not have money enough to carry the case up.

During the 1st World War some of the Masai were employed as soldiers.

Thus in 1919 45,000 men, women and children of the Masai tribe and 2 million sheep and goats were put into an area largely without water and useless except for inferior meat and skins. Land worth tens of millions of dollars which once belonged to the Masai now belonged to Englishmen.

In 1984 this land was not taxed and its owners paid no direct taxation. Thus out of the Masai land was carved an immense block in the very heart of the country, and they were forbidden to use that land except as contract laborers at the will of the landlord.

The Kikuyu lost most of their land, and today have the most pressing needs. Valuable land was lost to settlers for coffee farms and the natives were not allowed to raise coffee.

The Carter Report of 1924 was trying to achieve the deep sense of grievance among the Kikuyu but this was not accomplished. Just what now had happened. ~~xxxx~~ (they assigned?) (Cough) .....farms among the Kikuyu where people were crowded from 283 to 1000 to a sq. mile. They are improving and making better use of their land but they need more and better land.

taken away their lands and hemmed them in. They have suffered from the Rindepest epidemic and many of them in 1890 died of starvation. Between 1897 and 1901 they settled down near ~~the Persian town of~~ Nairobi. But when the Uganda railroad was built between 1895 and 1901 it cut straight through the land of the Masai, which was in the Rift Valley, and given by the governor Sir Charles Eliot in unsurveyed tracts of 10,000, 26,000 and even 100,000 acres to the white immigrants whom he was planning to bring in.

The government acted as if there were no native rights in land. The Kikuyu suffered worse because among them land rights had begun to become personal while among the other tribes the land belonged to the tribe. There was no doubt of the rightful claim of the Kikuyu in 1924 to the land where tens of thousands of them were living and to which they had a clear claim. On the other hand, so far as area is concerned the Masai lost most. A British official said in 1904: "The Masai will never give us trouble so long as we treat them fairly." But at that very time 320,000 acres in Kenya was owned by a British syndicate. 100,000 acres had been given to Lord Delemere who afterward beaame the chief authority on Kenya, and 32,000 acres each by other men, and these grants embrace the best and most fertile grazing lands of the Masai, and both banks of the only 4 rivers in the vicinity.

In 1904 a half-hearted attempt was made to designate two areas which was to belong to the Masai, "so long as the Masai as a race shall exist". A road half-a mile wide was promised them. The two reserves made an area only about 1/10 as large as the tribe had occupied between '93 and '97.

The governor, Sir Charles Eliot ~~was the first who~~ proposed the policy of introducing an aristocracy of European landholders into Kenya. The next two governors did little but the 4th governor Girouard, between 1909 and 1910 advanced the idea and finally the plan was firmly established under Sir Edward Northey, just after the 1st World War.

Alienation of land proceeded rapidly, the idea being to place political and social supremacy of the white race on the permanent subordination of the natives. This raised so many difficulties, revolts and unrest, that the British government was bound to interfere. The intervention of the government land now occupied by the natives. 50 years ago the central part of the highlands was inhabited by the Masai. The eastern part of the highlands is still in great part occupied by the Kikuyu, the Temba, the Melu and other tribes, although the first two have had to surrender a large part of their area. The western part of the highlands contain several tribes who like the Masai came from the northern desert in the past and are settling down to agriculture. The great bulk of the land alienated in this area was not under native occupation when alienated. But all these tribes lost small areas of land granted by the government to Europeans. The Nandi have lost considerable area since 1914. The Kikuyu group number more than a million. Those on the .T.av..... plain andhills rather less than a million. The other tribes together, the coast people, the nomads and the agricultural tribes in the western highlands number less than half a million.

up to the Highlands, and almost cuts Kenya from the central plateau. It is this peculiar geographical island which has formed in our day an intricate and costly British problem entailing the expenditure of millions of money and hundreds of thousands of lives.

Kenya is a fertile island set in a desert, with deserts north, east and south. The Kenya mountain itself rises from the northeast corner of this territory, exactly on the equator, and covered with eternal snow, a curious geographical contradiction. The desert stretches without limit north and east and far off in the desert rises an island continent in a sea of broken hills covered with thorn scrub. This is Kenya colony. It contains 240,000 sq. miles of which the greater part is desert, and some of it almo t rainless. Outside the narrow coastal strip, the only land of any value in Kenya lies on this island of mountain plateau, and in the small plain between the Highlands and Lake Victoria Nyansa. The shores of this high island are ~~10~~,000 ft. above the sea, its highest peaks are 10-15,000 feet high. Down the middle of the island there runs from north to south the Rift Valley, with half a dozen lakes but with no river on its floor. It is a broad break in the earth's surface, with walls sometimes straight and precipitous, and sometimes lost in fantastic hills. This break, which is said to be the only thing on the earth's surface which a human being might see from the moon, can be traced from the Dead Sea in Palestine through the Red Sea to Lake Tanganyika and the Zambesi River. Kenya, therefore is a strip on the seacoast, too dry in the north for cultivation, with rain enough in the south, and a vast desert in which wild beasts, lions, giraffes and antelopes outnumber the of Africa had been parcelled out among European countries. Eastern Africa alone remained.

The first explorers of Kenya were missionaries. In 1888 the British government transferred the sovereignty of British East Africa to a chartered company. This company could not pay its way and in 1893 Great Britain took direct responsibility for British East Africa including Kenya and Uganda.

There was a new motive now in protecting missionaries and extending trade. The French were trying to extend their West African Empire to the Nile and French missionaries entered Uganda. Also, trade was and long had been in the hands of Indian traders and Arabian Mohammedans also came to Uganda, making a three-way fight.

During the first 3/4 of the 19th century Arabs attempted the conquest of this region between the coast and the Great Lakes. The slave trade encouraged by Mohammed Ali, was opened in the Sudan which at first furnished slaves to the Turkish Empire, then supplemented the American slave trade as it was partially suppressed, and at last evolved into a new trade in slaves and ivory, through which porters bringing ivory from various parts of East Africa were themselves seized and sold as slaves.

Great leaders of this traffic like Tippo Tib controlled large parts of East Africa and even conquered a part of the upper basin of the Congo. It was this slave trade that Stanley and Livingstone were opposing and it was one of the cruelest phases of the African slave trade. Kenya was not in the region of this slave trade. There a low range of hills overlooks the East African shores. The soil is rocky, and and in the northern part the rainfall is scanty. This bulk of largely uninhabitable country stretches right to the head waters of the Nile, cutting off the mountains of Abyssinia from the Kenya Highlands.

Along the frontier between Kenya and Tanganyika the desert comes

In the war between Christianity and Mohammedanism, between the 9th and the 18th centuries prisoners were sold as slaves on both sides. As early as the fifteenth century Moors were imported into the south of Portugal, and the first slaves to America were from Portugal and not from West Africa.

When the American slave trade began the whites established what were called factories on the coast, furnished the coast tribes guns and powder, and encouraged them to make war on their inland neighbors and sell them as slaves. In this way slavery became a purely commercial transaction. Cheap rum and gin added to the degradation.

Vasco Da Gama occupied forts on the East African coasts, which centuries before had been founded and occupied by Mohammedan Arabs. Each town had its own sovereign and the settlements were built mainly on islands close to the land, surrounded by a fringe of plantations. Gold was the object of discovery and conquest and its trade a monopoly. A great deal of gold was obtained from the southern part of the East African coast.

For 2 centuries the Portugese tried to monopolize the trade by sea between Europe and Asia, but English, French and Dutch adventurers made inroads.

In the 19th century East Africa became of importance to Europe and the Portugese held only a few scattered posts. The Zambesi, the largest river in Africa, had settlements on its banks, large quantities of gold were gotten in the neighborhood from the center of African civilization, Zimbabwe.

By the opening of the 20th century most of the tropical countries

The Arabs established depots where small parties of slaves were organized into large caravans. These slaves were trans-shipped to American vessels and even during the Civil War several cargoes of them were landed in the Confederate states.

Gibbon tells us that the Emperor Augustus foresaw ~~an Empire~~ a realm with universal citizenship, and that when the power of the Roman Empire was at its height and ~~during the time when~~ its subjects ~~were~~ happier and more prosperous than any earlier or later society, there was in the empire no race feeling, and the highest posts were open to the sons of men quite as barbarous as any ~~part~~ of Africa today.

In the British Empire the Crusades increased respect for Asiatics. In Shakespeare's time color did not prevent Othello from being painted as a hero and marrying a lady of high social status. Saladin ..... was painted as a man of highest gifts, who could aspire to the hand of an English princess. In fact, in the 18th century the British treated Asiatics and Africans as ordinary men and women. In that century a quarter of the seamen in the renowned British navy, were colored, ~~and~~ our It is of interest to remember that one of the causes of the war of 1812 was the impressment of colored American seamen by Great Britain. Curiously enough, race feeling in England seems to have arisen about the time that African slave trade was abolished, and that was because that on the ~~basis~~ collapse of the American slave trade, there was built a new colonial ~~slavery~~ imperialism with results which we are feeling today. Iron and copper were long used in ancient Africa, and indeed the use of iron probably began there and then ~~was distributed~~ spread to Asia and Europe. African art in stone and wood of great merit, and ~~the~~ no institution of slavery ~~was of the primitive sort that~~ up to the 16th century did not involve sale ~~up through the 16th century.~~ It was the American slave trade that ~~extended and~~ transformed slavery in Africa and ~~was~~ became itself an extension of the industrial slavery established in the Mediterranean countries.

The ordinary farm laborer gets ten shillings a month. He can possibly earn 5 lbs. a year by working all the year and his .ox..... will cost 2 lbs. 10s. a year. On that 4-5 lbs. cash he must pay 12 s. a year hut tax, while a non-native on 200 lbs. pays 3 lbs. In addition the African must pay his native council rate. In the case of dependents the tax on Europeans is lessened while that on natives is increased. The income tax on Europeans was raised by 40 to 50% in the first year of the last World War and has since been raise d again and an excess profits tax introduced. In-direct taxation has been increased.

Africans in Kenya have also to pay three direct taxes. One falls on all, the others only on the peasantry, i.e., those who live by cultivating their own land in the Reserves. By far the largest is the hut and poll tax. The amount of the tax is 12s. But that is not its real incidence, which, as will be shown, is 28s., or more than twice as much. In the Budget for 1931 this tax is estimated to bring in £607,000 lbs. If that sum is divided by the amount of the tax, 12s., we see that more than a million separate taxes will have to be paid. And there are not more than half a million adult African males in the country, including the old and otherwise unfit.

The African tax has stood still at 12 s. for many years. But in Britain, where taxes have gone up, wages have al so gone up, whereas in Kenya wages have not increased and compulsory labor resorted to in lieu of the attraction of high wages.

In 1942 half of the males in Kenya were either employed at wages or were on military service, and that proportion was soon raised to 55.5%. In the Kikuyu districts, 58.5%, and in one case 77% were thus employed. A half million of the Kavirondo had 56.6% of their men away, and the Nandi 85%, and 94% with those on military service.

The third and last kind of direct taxation paid by Kenya Africans consists of unpaid forced labour. Under the Native Authority Ordinance, all adult males may be and commonly are required to do six days unpaid work every three months. The penalty for refusal wasformerly a fine, up to 7r10s. But Sir Edward Grigg represented in 1928 that a fine was not punishment enough, and since then a magistrate may add a sentence of two months' rigorous imprisonment.

750,000 pounds paid in taxation by Africans is at least 2/3 of the whole tax revenue in 1924.

The Hut ~~Act~~ Tax was first levied in 1901 at the rate of two rupis for each hut. Since then the tax was raised by easy stages until at the end of the 1st world war it was 16 shillings, and was the ~~.....~~ rolls was padded in various ways.

Well into the late '20's the Africans in most districts received very little return for the relatively high taxation which they were paying.

In 1936 the Director of Agriculture, wrote that up to the period of 1929 practically nothing had been done by the Department for native agriculture.

Africans in Kenya are allowed to grow neither tea nor coffee. In areas that are inhabited by about half the African population, coffee might be both the most reliable and the mostprofitable crop.

in the last few years the penalties that are inflicted on Africans have been made heavier, and the evidence on which they are convicted made more flimsy.

Social services .....have gradually been built up to protect the workers do not and cannot exist in Kenya. There is no working-man's compensation act, for instance. In Kenya every effort is made to make the worker leave home to work for alien and often absentee landlords. A great cause of the decline of population is interference with normal family life, separating husbands from their wives, tends to diminish the birthrate and encourage sexual irregularities.

In 1944 Kenya Africans are getting improved social services. There is an inter-colonial college at Makerere.

In 1924 the government of Kenya spent 22,000 pounds a year on African education, as compared with 23,600 on the education of less than a thousand European children. Most of the money for African education goes to missions. Mission education is increasingly devoted to supplying commercial demands./

Since no enquiry has been made by the Government, the number of landless African families in Kenya is unknown. At a guess, there may be 40,000 of them, of whom half or 100,000 souls are the dispossessed. There is no room for these people in the Reserves. Here and there, it is true, families can be found with as much as fifty acres of good land, perhaps even more. But we have no right to ask such people to make room for others, when the average European holding is more than two thousand acres, or about four square miles. Nor is there room in the unalienated Crown land. There are some 2000 square miles of it or more. But it is all inferior land, most of it with no permanent water. The last of the good land, areas in various parts comprising nearly 200 square miles, were alienated in the spring of 1930.

The policy pursued for five years by the last Governor, Sir Edward Grigg, which was ~~really Lord Delamere's, which in turn, though this is denied, was~~ an adaptation of the South African policy, has dangerously ripened unrest in Kenya. He was not the first Governor to believe that the key to every door to prosperity was the encouragement of "white settlement", by building up, by means of privileges and subsidies of many kinds, a European colony large enough to be entrusted with the responsibility for governing the country.

The Carter report felt bound to accept largely under the influence of the settlers, that the large claims of the small number of European immigrants and of those who might come, were of equal importance and in some cases of more importance than those of three million native inhabitants who were already there and had nowhere else to go.

Lord Moyne undertook a special commission to Kenya in 1932, and Sir W. Maurice Carter spent a year studying the land problem and the results were recorded in a large volume in 1934.

In 1932 Lord Moyne was sent out to investigate. His conclusions were that the natives were not getting a fair deal. They were baring relatively the greater burden, and making the heavier contributions.

This was in regard to social services. And he reports the helplessness of the natives in regard to the imposition of taxation. He speaks of poor districts, highly taxed, of the rigid and ill-adjusted system of native taxation, and is satisfied that it is not fair to give such poor districts so small a proportion of the taxation which they raise. He proposes that the Europeans pay more in the form of an income tax. The main part of his recommendation was not adopted.

When the African slave trade to America was suppressed in the 19th century, the Arab settlements on the East coast belonged to the Sultans o f Muscat one of whom had built the tower of Zanzibar. They employed slaves of ability in positions of trust as merchants, ship captains, and shared in the profits of their enterprise. Some part of the produce of the coast plantations ~~.grain.~~(?) coconut oil and fibre, red pepper and dried fish were exported to Arabia, the Persian gulf and West India. The farmers were nearly all slaves, the town workers were half slaves, half free. There had always been a small slave trade here, but in the 19th century the trade to America enormously increased. This was because of cheap fire arms after the Napoleonic wars and the interruption of the cultivation of the cloves. (?)

The Indian community which outnumbers the white, has an inferior political status.

An Indian member of the Kenya legislative council said, "The trend of events as I see it in this country, is to create and perpetuate a landed aristocracy with a powerful influence with government, ~~which will not be allowed to go in a direction in which there is a tendency in the United Kingdom.~~"

40-7F-13

A report in 1911 shows that 3000 sq. miles were leased during the preceding five years at a total rental of ~~6,000 pounds~~ $32200. By 1914 the land leased to Europeans amounted to 5,000 sq. miles and the rentals came to a penny and a farthing an acre. The great bulk of the land was granted in blocks of ten to five hundred sq. miles.

industfy in Europe. Capitalists therefore turned to the exploitation of countries without free institutions and began to be taught that control over countries beyond their own increased their glory and strength.

Indirect government through chiefs was impossible in East Africa because of the demand of tribal authorities for labor, which the white landholders needed.

50 years ago the central part of the Highlands was inhabited by the Masai tribe. The eastern part is still occupied in part by the Kikuyu and other tribes, although they have had recently to surrender a large part of their area which is a chief reason of the present uprising.

The Masai tribe came down from the northern desert and are settling down to agriculture. These Masai have especially suffered. They, like their predecessors, the Gala, are among the handsomest of mankind. Tall, and comely, and for centuries cattle raisers and raiders, carrying on wars like those of the Scottish clans. The Europeans came in contact with them when in search of a direct route to Uganda, and have progessively

Since 1914 land has been alienated under the Soldier's Settlement scheme. Under this scheme officers and men, most of them officers, got free grants of 160 to 300 acres and were free to lease land up to as much as 5,000 acres. And these could be turned into freeholds by the payment at any time within ten years without interest, of 4-40 shillings an acrex. Everything possible was done for these men. Their machinery was imported free of duty their produce carried on the state railway at leas than cost. Yet most of the farms were abandoned and their European population in 1924 was less than it was in 1921. Some of the beneficiaries never went to Africa, some only went with the intention of selling their land to others, and others expected African laborers to do all the work.

The Masai represent a difficult moral question. They were nomads living on land in and around the Rift valley. This was land which would do for grazing cattle, but many European farmers have been unable to make it pay. Some of the finest agricultural land was in the Masai reserve, but most of it has been taken away, some of it during the last war.

[illegible] use that land except [illegible] as a contract laborer at the will of the landlord, seems to me an act that cannot be defended.

Liberal imperialism decided to build a railway to Uganda. Most of East Africa looked toward India rather than Europe. The currency was Indian and the Indian penal code was taken over.

European settlers in Africa want to have it both ways. They want to have a full supply of cheap labor, but in the interests of racial segregation they do not want that labor to have the status and claim to social services that workers elsewhere in the world are able to demand because they are organized as workers and as voters. White settlers maintain that since the government had encouraged them to come it had also undertaken the obligation to provide them with labor.

Lord Delamere once said: "If the policy was to be continued that

In order to force Africans to work for the whites, their reserves were cut to prevent them from having sufficient land to make them self-supporting. Taxation was used as a method of obliging the natives

During the first world war the Indians' demand for equality of political status was dormant, but was revived in 1921 when Mr. Wood, afterward Lord Halifax, submitted proposals to Mr. Churchill which were considered by a committee on which four leading Indian statesman sat. They did not come to an agreement, but in 1923, the Duke of Devonshire announced the decision of the government in a state paper, which included a considered statement regarding inter-racial relations in Africa.

The Duke of Devonshire said in his report for the government in 1923

All this except land ownership in the white highlands, the government conceded in I923. The result wa a furious uproar in white Kenya and open preparations for armed rebellion. ~~A deputation went to London and the Government retreated~~ from the Duke

This was the reason of the pronouncement of the Duke of Devonshire that Native rights were paramount against the demands of outsiders. Christmastide is coming, and we should not only celebrate it as the greatest of festivals, but should strive to make it a truly family festival. No family should be without its christmas-tree, and woe to the careless father or mother who lets the hearts of their little ones hunger after little remembrances of Infinite Love! Costly gifts to friends and children are not only unnecessary, but undesirable: no gifts of my life have given me the joy that the little fantastic "cruller" men, grandma used to fry me. They did not cost a tenth of a cent, and yet they were priceless. A little table-mat worked in love; a spread embroidered in thoughtfulness; a book selected and marked by sympathetic taste; these are gifts of God, far richer than gaudy toilet-sets, gilt foolishness, and velvet ostentation. Of the Coming of Little Children

You will read in the bible how it says of the Child Jesus — "And God so loved the world that he sent his only begotten son into the world that the world might not perish but have everlasting life" And so it is with all the fathers & mothers — they send their children out into the world that the children may grow & be good men & women & help the world. & the world never dies — the fathers & mothers die but the little children live & when they grow old their children live & so on forever & this is Eternal life

Now I come to wonder & the mystery of all this is & ever will be the Coming of these little children — the strange new way each day about us — How & why all this be? No man knows — it is the great Unfathomed secret of life & the great thing we know yet some things we know not yet some things we know not

You remember in Maeterlinck's Blue Bird how the souls of little children waited & be born & cried & the ship of life & how at last when the child started the great secret of the mother was heard in the world beyond. How we know that all life that is to be waiting to be born in an egg

Little chicken waits in here egg
Little birds in birds egg and so on
And stays & stays little human babies wait in human eggs — [illegible]

The Ocean

The attempt to monopolize the shores of the ocean for the benefit of the few is increasingly successful. A theory is being developed by which a beach is declared "private" and useable only by the property holders adjoining. It is thus becoming increasingly difficult for American citizens to bathe in the ocean without paying tribute to real estate dealers, hotel keepers and bathing house proprietors. This works unusual injustice upon colored people because they are discriminated against, not only by these monopolists but by the white bathers. Colored people are continually forced into advocating segregated beaches in order to escape this discrimination. But just as in lynching and lawlessness, the real victim is not the Negro, but the whole land and its inhabitants, so the growing monopoly of ocean-bathing is going to bear heavily in the future upon those who are blithely seeking color discrimination along the whole ocean front of the United States.

In a recent number of the CRISIS it was stated that the first wife of the late John W. Thompson of Rochester, New York was a white woman. We are informed by his daughter, Mrs. Joseph C. Moore, that this is a mistake. Both the first wife and second wife of John W. Thompson were of Negro descent.

Werner Drewes, North German by birth, has travelled widely around the world--Asia, South America, the West Indies and throughout the United States. He is an artist, especially interested in colored types. He has held an exhibition at the 135th Street Branch Library, and is still interested in painting colored folk. He is now living in New York.

The proposed bill to curb the power of the courts in the case of injunctions brings forward again the sort of dilemma which repeatedly faces the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. This Association has always been an organization of Liberals and even of Radicals on many matters of social advance. We believe in Democracy; we believe in the widest distribution of the right to vote; we believe in individual freedom of action and of speech to the utmost practical limits; and we believe in the Union Labor movement. In order to forward the realization of these beliefs for all men, we are organized to attack discrimination along the color line because it is primarily this kind of discrimination that hinders social advance in so many cases. It happens, therefore, that we often face curious dilemmas. Suppose that a wider right to vote would give the ballot to people who would vote for colored discrimination, and suppose that in this same proposed widening of the ballot there is either restriction or at least no further enfranchisement of Negroes? In such case, increased Democracy might easily work for increased colored discrimination. It would be, therefore, a puzzling question as to what action this organization ought to take. Should it support a widening of the right to vote because of Negro disfranchisement or should it stand for more voters, when Negroes were not included, therefore, bound at least temporarily to suffer? The same question comes with regard to school funds, particularly in the South. It is proposed to issue bonds for a large increase of school facilities, but no promise is made as to whether Negro schools are going to benefit or not. Shall the Negroes vote for the bonds on the general principle, that increase in education for anybody is better than ignorance? Or shall they say no bonds and no increased school funds for anybody unless the Negro schools are adequately provided for? The same question comes in the case of Labor injunctions. There can be no doubt in the minds of our fair-minded men that the increased use and repeatedly widened power of court injunctions threatens the overthrow of Union labor. The power must be curbed. But this power of injunction has been used, not simply to protect capitalists and employers, it has been used to protect minority groups of employees against whom Union Labor discriminates. This is especially true of Negroes. Despite all of the true and restricted promises, Union Labor in the United States today has a general movement and with only minor exception, descriminates absolutely and continuously against colored laborers. It either keeps them entirely out of the Union or admits them here and there with great difficulty, or if they are admitted in considerable numbers, discriminates against them systematically when they are inside the Union. For this reason, Negroes have been compelled to win their place in organized industry in the United States by widespread and systematic scabbing. There is scarcely a single semi-skilled or skilled industry where the Negro has not gained what little imagination he has to Union ranks by first acting as a scab and strikebreaker. When now comes a proposal that the power of injunction be curbed and limited to dangerous and tangible property, this Association again faces a dilemma. If this bill is passed the power to discriminate against black men or against any minority group on the part of Unions will be tremendously increased. If this bill or some other bill, with similar purpose is not passed, the labor movement will be permanently checked. What is our duty? We may hesitate as to what action we should take concerning this specific bill, but on one point there can be no hesitation. This matter of colored discrimination in Union ranks has got to be put up to Union Labor now and definitely and in no uncertain terms and with arguments based upon unanswerable fact. And then Union Labor in the

I firmly believe that the wide-spread attempt to restrict higher education in the case of persons belonging to certain classes, religions and races is spreading over the world because of the same chief causes. Just as in the early 19th century the common school training of the working classes and of women in general was opposed lest political and social power get into the hands of these people, just so today the domination of the world by certain European nations is being safeguarded and perpetuated by restricting the higher training of the working classes, of Jews, and of Negroes in Africa and America.

This numerus clausus is not the direct result of war conditions except as war always brings nasty and unfortunate things. Nations got a chance to do this with a certain amount of public approval because of the war.

The origin of the numerus clausus is chiefly economic and psychological although, of course, in the case of the Negro the fact that he was a slave helps.

It is not justified from the point of view of humanity or from the point of view of any nation or any race. It does not protect races, it weakens them.

A concerted attack by reason and science upon this policy should certainly be organized.

THE JIM-CROW CAR

A RHAPSODY

A group of persons of all colors are sitting in a Southern home, looking out on a beautiful spring landscape. One suggests a journey in the world, most of the others demur. The thought of the journey seems to depress them. The White One asks: "But don't you like to travel?" "Certainly," say the others, "but --", and one begins - there is the waiting-room, describing the part of the depot in the South set aside for Negroes on a particular journey which she took. Number two tells of the ticket window and of the difficulty of buying tickets. Number three tells of boarding the cars. Number four describes a car in which she journeyed, its dirt and accommodations. Number five tells of the white folks who were in there and who passed through. Number six describes the news butcher and the conductor. Then follow in order a series of stories of experiences covering smoking, changing cars, lunches, heat, prisoners, etc., until the arrival at the end of the journey. Finally, the White One says: "But all that will be changed now; railroads are national." "But the nation is Southern," answers the black man,"and as long as it is, there can be no change."

You are about to listen to the rhythm in word and song by which a group of human beings far removed from you have tried to express; their thoughts of life and death. These people, some twelve million in number, are the descendants of black slaves which Europe forcibly transported to America in the 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th and 19th Centuries. The blood of all nations flows in their veins, but the predominant strain is black African. They have known life with all its depths of sorrow and degradation and they have also experienced its finer and higher compensations in sunshine and love, sacrifice and toil. They have given America its only folk song and its dancing. They are beginning now to express themselves in prose and poetry, in painting and in sculpture. Their work is intensely human and calls for human encouragement and sympathy over all the world.

The re is in Cleveland , Ohio, a cultural exhibit which has received much less attention than it diserves. It is a succession of Cultural Gardens, broidering a public park. Here in small compass are plots of ground with statues of persons inscriptions and plaques commemorating nations and groups which have contributed to the civilization of the world and the city. Ther not only is Germany, Italy and Greece illustrated, but Lithuania, Poland, Hungary. England is remembered by a Shakespeare garden. But the Negro race is not there. This is curious for two reasons first, the Negro race has played a striking part in Cleveland history, from the day of Frederick Douglass , the Langstons and Senator Bruce to that of the late Charles W. Chestnut. And secondly, the whole area of fine homes bordering the park, once the abode of rich Cleveland society, is now owned almost entirely by Negroes and in most cases kept up quite as well as in the past. But while the Lithuanian can and does cherish his cultural past and is still American, the Negro is paying for his fight to become an American citizen by rapid surrender of his cultural heritage and experience. Any suggestion then of a "Cultural Garden" for him would meet bitter opposition from Negroes themselves

George W. Coleman is the father of the present Open Forum movement. I have spoken many times before Forums in all parts of the East, Middle and Far West. I regard the Forum movement as the straightest step toward practical, intelligent democracy that is being taken today. In a world of dangerous propaganda, deliberate misrepresentation and intellectual muddle, the Open Forum in America is one of the few bright and reassuring spots.

I believe that all men, black and brown and white, are brothers, varying through time and opportunity, in form and gift and feature, but differing in no essential particular, and alike in soul and the possibility of infinite development.

Especially do I believe in the Negro Race: in the beauty of its genius, the sweetness of its soul, and its strength in that meekness which shall yet inherit this turbulent earth.

A true Fairy Tale

Sherwood Healy

Once upon a time a white Southerner of Macon, Georgia, married (or at least consorted with for life) a colored woman, Eliza Clark also of Macon. Of this couple were born seven children, four sons and three daughters.

The father brought them north and tried to enter them into the public schools of New York. But this was before the Civil War and he could onlyget them into a Quaker school on Long Island.

They were or eventually became catholics. One son J.A.Healy became Catholic bishop of Portland, Maine. Another son became president of Georgetown University, D.C., where Negro are not now admitted. A sister became Mother Superior of the Congregation of Notre Dame. Another brother was ordained to the priesthood, but died.

Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven, but not of earth, since the ~~Cruch~~ Church did not ~~know~~ dream that these her children were of Negro descent.

THE CRISIS IN ENGLAND.

The Girl who is too busy to read newspapers, being interested in more important things, asked at dinner between courses:

"What's the matter with England, anyway?"

Others throughout the land are asking the same thing and want the answer in the same space and time.

Briefly, the trouble with England is Coal, Aristocracy and Imperialism.

Coal gave England during the 19th Century an immense industrial advantage. She trained her working classes and became a manufacturer of iron, steel, cotton and woolen goods and other commodities on a world scale. She sold these all over the world to pay for the food and raw material which she imported. But imports were cheap because they were raised largely by primitive, undeveloped countries, with low wages and slave labor; and goods were dear because England set the price according to her skill and wants and she wanted Wealth and Leisure.

Two things ensued: English capitalists England became rich from foreign commerce and England swung gradually from the slave trade into a new conception of industrial empire. Yes, England, rich philanthropy freed the slave but it was because English capital she saw that transporting material could be made to pay better than transporting black men. England She became imperial. On her vast dominions the sun never set. But this wasn't mere sentiment. It was hard, paying business. She seized colonies, lands and territories on any pretext and by any method. Murder, theft, cheating, force marked her imperial way. She developed the greatest navy in the world and for years her navy was so large that it could overcome the warships of any other two nations.

When she had conquered a territory or a colony, she organized it for business. With her surplus wealth, she loaned the colony money for its development. She established plantations, raised sugar, rubber, cocoa, all sorts of things; she built railroads; she built up, by means of highly paid English officials, a strong local government backed by army and navy. This meant that the investment soon began to pay. It paid in Canada, it paid in Australia, it paid all over Africa, it paid all over Asia. It was by the end of the 19th Century the most magnificent business institution in the world.

On this was built the second thing: English aristocracy. The nobility and gentry of England represent not so much hereditary class as triumphant commercialism. They receive huge incomes; they have vast privileges and the money that they make out of colored labor all over the world enables them to hold English labor in its place.

But eventually came disaster. First, local colonies where there were enough white people, asserted their independence of England and ~~refused to be simply money-making institutions.~~ their right to exploit them own "niggers" and white workers. Thus, England lost the United States and had to recognize the independence of Canada, Ireland, Australia and South Africa.

Then the laborers at home demanded more and more recognition there until they actually established a labor government but did not know what to do with it when they had it; and finally came War. War because of imperial colonies and profit-making War killed men, overthrew industry, destroyed credit, and England finds herself today with her industry disorganized and imperiled by industry in Germany and the United States; with her control of credit lost to France and the United States; and with her working classes idle and angry and her colonies on the edge of revolt. For the first time in her existence, she is on the verge of recognizing the independence of a colored country—India.

Out of this hole Ramsey McDonald tried to pull the nation. The aristocracy ~~yelled~~ yielded a little but not much. Organized industry and banking fought for privilege and threatened bankrupcy. Then the Socialists gave up and Ramsey Mac Donald, Stanley Baldwin and Lloyd George have united in a new temporary government to make at least the beginning of a new country.

It will be some job!

One wonders if Imperialism, Aristocracy and Coal after all really paid quite as well as the world once thought!

Suppose the British Empire instead had invested in human intelligence for the masses; comfort, not simply for the aristocracy; liberty for darker peoples as well as white; and the art of beauty for all mankind?

THE CRISIS IN ENGLAND.

The Girl who is too busy to read newspapers, being interested in more important things, asked at dinner between courses:

"What's the matter with England, anyway?"

Others throughout the land are asking the same thing and want the answer in the same space and time.

Coal gave England during the 19th Century an immense industrial advantage. She trained her working classes and became a manufacturer of iron, steel, cotton and woolen goods and other commodities on a world scale. She sold these all over the world to pay for the food and raw material which she imported. But imports were cheap because they were raised largely by primitive, undeveloped countries, with low wages and slave labor; and goods were dear because England set the price according to her skill and wants and she wanted Wealth and Leisure.

Two things ensued: ~~England~~ English capitalists became rich from foreign commerce and swung gradually from the slave trade into a new conception of industrial empire. Yes, England and philanthropy freed the slave but it was because English capital saw that transporting material could be made to pay better than transporting black men. ~~She~~ England became imperial. On her vast dominions the sun never set. But this wasn't mere sentiment. It was hard, paying business. She seized colonies, lands and territories on any pretext and by any method. Murder, theft, cheating, force marked her imperial way. She developed the greatest navy in the world and for years her navy was so large that it could overcome the warships of any other two nations.

When she had conquered a territory or a colony, she organized it for business. With her surplus wealth, she loaned the colony money for its development. She established plantations, raised sugar, rubber, cocoa, all sorts of things; she built railroads; she built up, by means of highly paid English officials, a strong local government backed by army and navy. This meant that the investment soon began to pay. It paid in Canada, it paid in Australia, it paid all over Africa, it paid all over Asia. It was by the end of the 19th Century the most magnificent business institution in the world.

On this was built the second thing: English aristocracy. The nobility and gentry of England represent not so much hereditary class as triumphant commercialism. They receive huge incomes; they have vast privileges and the money that they make out of colored labor all over the world enables them to hold English labor in its place.

But eventually came disaster. First, local colonies where there were enough white people, asserted their independence of England and ~~refused to be simply money-making institutions.~~ their right to exploit their own "niggers" and white workers. Thus, England lost the United States and had to recognize the independence of Canada, Ireland, Australia and South Africa.

Then the laborers at home demanded more and more recognition there until they actually established a labor government but did not know what to do with it when they had it; and finally came war. War because of imperial colonies and profit-making; war killed men, overthrew industry, destroyed credit, and England finds herself today with her industry disorganized and imperiled by industry in Germany and the United States; with her control of credit lost to France and the United States; and with her working classes idle and angry and her colonies on the edge of revolt. For the first time in her existence, she is on the verge of recognizing the independence of a colored country—India.

Out of this hole Ramsey MoDonald tried to pull the nation. The aristocracy yelled a little but not much. Organized industry and banking fought for privilege and threatened bankrupcy. Then the Socialists gave up and Ramsey Mac Donald, Stanley Baldwin and Lloyd George have united in a new temporary government to make at least the beginning of a new country.

It will be some job.

One wonders if Imperialism, Aristocracy and Coal after all really paid quite as well as the world once thought.

Suppose the British Empire instead had invested in human intelligence for the masses; comfort, not simply for the aristocracy; liberty for darker peoples as well as white; and the art of beauty for all mankind?

The Maine coast in the vicinity of Bar Harbor is one of the most beautiful places in the United States. It is a combination of mountains and sea, the highlands coming straight down to the water with islands and deep indentations into the land, rolling meadows, hills, rocks, trees and beautiful resorts. This coast has long been one of the great playgrounds of America for those people who want high altitudes, cool, fresh air and proximity to the ocean.

Recently, a plot of six hundred acres opposite Bar Harbor, at Sorrento, has been put upon the market for sale and Mr. Nail has secured an option. The land presents unusual aspects of beauty. There is a high, wooded ridge with old trees and magnificent views of the country round about, the mountain ranges and shining sea. There is an island, abundant space for golf links and a stretch of land near the sea available for home sites and cottages. There are already three hotels in excellent condition and several cottages and other buildings. There is a large swimming pool which enables bathers to avoid the extreme temperatures of the northern sea and yet have excellent bathing facilities. There are docks and bear landings, a post office, excellent roads, a fine water supply and a population of kindly people without race prejudice.

All these details together, however, do not convey any adequate picture of the crisp, clean air, the beautiful foliage, the deep blue of the sea and the extroardinary peace and attractiveness of this retreat.

The question now is: are there enough American Negroes who appreciate a quiet, Exclusive resort of this sort to finance it? If five hundred persons could be secured who would put $1000 each into the proposition, they could secure home sites of adequate size and be part of one of the finest summer settlements in the United States.

Sorrento can be reached by rail in eighteen hours from New York by direct express, or by boat from New York or Boston in twenty-four hours or less, or by motor car over perfect roads from any part of the United States.

Persons who are interested in this proposition can secure further information by writing Mr. John E. Nail, 145 West 135th Street, New York, New York.

Haiti

Haiti has had twenty-six presidents since the death of Christophe in 1820 when the North and South were reunited. Of these seventeen have been deposed by revolution and five died in office. Eleven of these twenty-six ruled between 1911 and 1916. Twelve of the twenty-six were Negroes, six were griffe—with a very small percentage of white blood—and eight mulattoes.

All these rulers were made to feel the ancient curse on Ham. Foreigners have never failed during any period of the century and a quarter of Haiti's independence to study how they might exploit that country. A small group in the capital and in the Cape were always gambling on the political situation, loaning money to this or that local chief who wanted to start a revolution and who, if successful, would promise large returns to the foreigners. Claims on Haiti by the United States began when Christophe seized United States vessels, after one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars sent through his agencies to buy goods in the United States had been fraudulently held there.

Relations between the two countries were also complicated by the fact that white refugees from the reign of terror in Haiti landed in the United States, causing slave owners here to fear that what had happened in Haiti would come to the ears of the slaves and induce revolt. A long series of unpleasant incidents took place in the United States as a result of the French refugees planning armed expeditions to bring Haiti back under the French flag. Fonchet prophesied in 1795 that Negro control in the island would mean that the United States would always feel a certain repulsion toward Haiti.

The United States early declared that it would not recognize Haiti as a country. At the same time, however, it was anxious to develop commercial relations. Little wonder that Haiti was slow to grant commercial favors to a power which showed itself opposed to political relations.

Trade continued, however, despite all drawbacks. In 1822 the United States was exporting as much to Haiti as to Russia, Prussia, Sweden, Denmark and Ireland combined, and more shipping entered the United States from Haitian ports than from any other country save England, the British American colonies, and Cuba.

In the eighteen thirties, with the growth of abolition agitation, the question of recognition entered upon a new phase. To the voice of the merchants who were interested in Haitian commerce was added that of the opponents of slavery. When the House of Representatives adopted the celebrated gag rule, which forbade all discussion of abolition, resolutions demanding the recognition of Haiti were substituted for those which came under that rule, in order that the question of slavery might be kept before the people.

The difficulties between the two countries is illustrated by the fact that the United States intervened in Haitian affairs a number of times before the present occupation, which began in 1915. As early as 1799 she prohibited United States ships from entering the island's southern ports, thus preventing delivery of war materials and defeating Rigaud, the opponent of Toussaint. During the reign of FaustinI the United States joined France and England to stop a Haitian war with Santo Domingo. In 1866 and 1867 United States naval vessels visited Haiti "because of revolutionary movements that threatened to place in Jeopardy the lives and property of American citizens." In 1870 the United States warned Haiti to keep out of the question of the annexation of Santo Domingo to the United States. In 1889-90 the United States warned Haiti to keep out of the question of the annexation of Santo Domingo to the United States. In 1889-90 the United States made such insistent efforts to secure Mole St. Nicholas that much unfriendliness to this country was created.

The very year before the final intervention in 1915 efforts were made to protect American citizens and secure a treaty giving the United States special privileges in Haiti. Thus on some fifteen occasions the United States, not to mention other countries, has put such diplomatic pressure as some authorities name as intervention in the Black Republic. In fact, Haiti has received practically nothing but discouragement from other nations.

A Mild Suggestion

From my little window I watch the world. I read from time to time many a proposal to settle finally the Negro problems. To me however they seem tame and dilly-dallying. They do not go directly to the root of the matter. The one proposes that we get rid of our prejudices against black folk — the idea! Another that Negroes rise to our level — what will that matter? It is not poverty we hate but Niggers — not ignorance but Niggers, not crime but Niggers. Some propose to make them emigrate — but think of the waste of time & money and patience, & the like. No my friends I am convinced you are not radical enough — that you unwisely hesitate to express what really hovers in the background. Honestly now, my white friend, South North East & West — in club and mine, on scaffold & lawn, what you really want is to be rid of these Negroes — thoroughly & finally rid of them, isn't it?

The Cleverness of G. B. S.

I am often in doubt when I hear criticisms of George Bernard Shaw as to whether I myself am exceedingly clever or an unusual fool. I remember reading Shaw's works first on an ocean voyage, a half dozen or more volumes. I was entranced. Afterwards, in an English railway carriage I said to two companions - an Irish Presbyterian and an English physician - "he is the greatest prophet now speaking." To my intense surprise, the roof actually rose from that carraige and when they were thru, I was silent. Since then I have had the same extraordinary experience again and again. "Fannie's First Play" which was to me a great tract for the moral freedom of women and the downfall of hypocrisy became in the hands of so many of my friends and acquaintances "simply, funny and queer" and here now comes Van Tassel Sutphen seeing in what I regard as the finest recent defense of christianity and religion of all kinds the "solid incontrovertible fact" that the author cannot possibly be a gentleman. Amazing! Spinthe seems to me a most suitable mmetic for a feast of sacrifice since he is the kind of hypocrite that the God of the New Testament spews out of his mouth. Ferrovius is funny only as all simple, sincere religionists, is pathetically laughable efen in his deep sincereity. But above all of these contradictory and half done exponents of religion stands the splendid religious woman and the fine humanity and love of animals in Androcles himself. How can anyone fail to see Shaw's great message in this play?

Disarmament in Asia

The fruits of war are war. No asiatic with an ounce of sense can have any faith in the peace movement in Europe when one remembers the past. Europe had raped India, and finally, it had every intention of raping Japan. The only thing that saved Japan was the army and navy. That army and navy secured for Japan, Manchuria. But Europe took it away from her on the plea that it belonged to China, and then annexed it herself. The World War and the Russian Revolution made it impossible for Europe to hold Manchuria. She now turned around and asked Japan to give it up in the interests of China. Japan replied that China is not _____ ___ play possible because of her exploitation by Europe. She declared that in effect, if not in so many words, that the only reason Europe is favoring China is because China is helpless with civil war. There is only one thing, therefore, that will convince Japan today or all Asia in the long run that Europe wants peace, and that is for Europe to give up the _____, second, therefore to war, and then his present exploitation of the darker nations. If Europe and America are determined to continue to extract from Africa, India and China the tribute which they have taken in the last one hundred years and more, then that determination spells war. War of defense, on the part of Asia, so far as it can organize itself; warof aggression on the part of different European countries to gain a large part of the lute. Such wars would be dangerous for civilization. They would mean organized murder, poverty, and the disfranchising of human beings. The first step, therefore, toward effective and real peace must be the abolitionof race prejudice, the abolition of the exploitation which is based upon this prejudice, and the willingness of Europe and America to exist by their own labor and by such trade with other races as will return to those races decent returns for their labor and material. Until this is accomplished, all appeals for peace and disarmament are in vain.

Franklin

I rode with a beautiful river — wide or wide & shimmering waters flanked by great mountains; grim chimneys belched, great lumbered hills rolled back the sky & towns ran by now stretched on river bank, now nestled in woods, now banked two storied on the mountains. The evening sun blazed golden & the dashed & smiled but ever the eternal hill sat beside the world - grey rocked bare with now a streak & great & some dim roofed cottage keys - above

Then came Franklin — two yarn mills for hostesses & where the crowd was friendship & laughter; a hasty clear cut & kindness like and an audience of 400 white black & grizzled. It was a different place for talking & I faltered and the audience sat very still & looked & any version of the word-war, & of

My Dinner

Of course it happens daily & certainly no colored man or woman in America lives who cannot tell the tale in a ~~thousand~~ hundred variations. And yet I am realizing more & more each day how few of my white friends realize even faintly the dreadfulness of this daily tragedy. It is not fair nor safe for such ignorance of the lives of one's fellows should exist and I am therefore tempted to tell just this episode

I am, it goes without saying, brown & smiley. I was asked urgently to come to Winnipeg from my home in New York city & lecture on the "Brotherhood of Man". The time seemed opportune ~~& atta~~ — when is not the time to speak of Brotherhood, that day when all its claims fail? — I went, although my folks most frantically protested

It was a long journey, from nightfall on Monday to Midnight Wednesday. Passing the gleam & shadows of the Dakotas we rode to the plains of Western Ohio & went into the grimness of Chicago where night fell again. Another morning found me at St Paul & then dallamed a day of gray wonder: a mighty world of darkness shrieked & shrieked away — opulent, silent almost unlemental and Oh so big and horrible. I came to Winnipeg at night and to the city & some of the city officials & a reporter met me. At the Hotel Royal Alexandra there seemed to have been some mistake & my room had not been reserved They were sorry. It made some inconvenience but little difference: I was by one o'clock installed in the Fort Garry Hotel, a beautiful tall new structure, quietly elegant. I raised to bed with a glad rage.

The next morning I gave myself the luxury of a breakfast in my room & then went out to view that quiet clean city & its marvelous resources.

I was to speak at 8, so I determined to have no lunch & dine at five. I met the beautiful girl

Henry Highland Garnett was born as a slave in Maryland, December 23, 1845. He ran away with his wife to Pennsylvania and in 1825 came to New York City. He was educated in the African Free School on Mulberry Street and studied with Charles L. Reason, Charles T. Downing, Ira Aldridge and others. He and Alexander Crummwell were afterward educated at Oneida Institute in New Hampshire, and he was graduated in 1839. He settled in Troy; studied for the ministry, and was licensed to preach in 1842. He became pastor of the Liberty Street Presbyterian Church, where he stayed ten years, and published a paper called "The Clarion". He was a cripple for many years, on account of the swelling on his leg; finally he had his leg amputated in 1841. He married Miss Julia Williams in 1842. In 1850, he visited England, France and Germany. Afterward, he went as a missionary to Jamaica, and during the Civil War became a chaplain of colored troops. He then served as President of Avery College; became a pastor of a Presbyterian Church in the District of Columbia, and then went to Shiloh Church in New York City, where he remained as pastor for twenty-six years. In 1881, accepted the position of Minister to Liberia. He lived but a short time and I have visited his grave at Monrovia.

JOHN E. MILHOLLAND AND THE UNIVERSAL RACES CONGRESS

In 1911 there was held in London, a Congress of representatives to all the chief racial groups of the world. It was an extraordinary meeting, and if it had not been over-shadowed by the immence and the final breaking of the world war, it might have easily become the beginning of a movement in human relations which would have transformed the face of humanity.

The Races Congress was started by the Ethical Culture Society and conceived and executed by Gustav Spiller. In the United States to men advocated it and helped it; Felix Adler and John Milholland. John Milholland furnished the enthusiasm and motive power, and particularly was the one who interested me, urged my attendance, and contributed to my expenses.

Mr. Milholland's business at the time necessitated his spending a large part of the year in London. He was particularly interested in making London think straight on the American Negro problem. He was incensed at the time of Booker T. Washington's visit. The idea was spread abroad in London in thinking circles that everything was going well in the United States and that everybody agreed with Mr. Washington's program. Milholland protested. He sent letters to the papers and he sent letters to America. As a result, a spirited protest, signed by many leading American Negroes, was sent to London to show that Mr. Washington's program was inadequate and his picture of racial conditions in America unfair.

Mr. Milholland wanted this followed up by a personal visit from me and attendance upon the Races Congress. He arranged to haveme invited to address one of the prominent women's clubs. Immediately, protest from American members and frequenters of the club arose. They threatened dire things if I should appear. The English people knew little about me or my point of view, and were disposed to be very hospitable to Mr. Washington, but at the same time, they did not propose to have America dictating as to what persons they should listen to.

They rose up and squelched the opposition and gave me a notable dinner. Her Highness Ranée of Sarawak presided and Maurice Hewlett, the Bishop of Honduras and many other persons were present to listen to me.

The Races Congress assembled in the great hall of the University of London. There were prominent Englishmen, like Sir Harry Johnston and Lord Weardale, distinguished French and German scientists, Italians and Austrians, East Indians, Japanese, Chinese, Egyptians and Africans. Practically all nations were represented, and there ensued an extraordinary and frank interchange of ideas and comparison of inter-racial problems. I shall never forget the morning when the gentleman from Ceylon paid his bitter tribute to Christians who were used to singing the hymn "From Greenland's Icy Mountains; from India's Coral Strand," ending with a lovely sentiment, "where every prospect pleases and only man is vile!"

The Congress was an immense and world-wide success. Its printed report, gotten out simultaneously with the meeting, still forms a reference book of great value. A permanent organization was formed, under the presidency of Lord Weardale, with the Prime Minister of England, Arthur James Balfour, J. Ramsey MacDonald and General Booth as Vice Presidents. The Executive Council was a Who's Who of race leaders throughout the world. But alas, at the very time the Races Congress was meeting, a German war vessel visited Agadir, and before another Congress could be assembled, the world was at war.

In all the proceedings of the Congress, Mr. Milholland was prominent and took a leading but unobtrusive part. I shall always thank his memory for the opportunity of attending this great and significent meeting.

HAITI

The persistence of the United States government in appointing to the head of the educational system of Haiti a man whom the best class of Haitians neither respect nor trust, augurs ill for the Haitian proclamation of President Hoover. It is especially unfortunate, coming as it does right after the visit of the Education Commission. The Crisis has said little about this Commission because there was little to say with any degree of comfort. We deplored its appointment because the necessity of sending any Commission to study the reasons and justifications for our interference with Haitian affairs was bad enough, but necessary after the mistake had been made. When, in addition to this, a Commission was appointed to meddle with the internal educational system of an independent sister state, without that state's wish or desire, this was merely adding insult to injury. And The Crisis wishes that President Moton had courteously but firmly declined to aid any such Commission. But Mr. Moton, with several Negro Americans of distinction, and with one white representative of the General Education Board, consented to visit Haiti. But there were several things connected with that visit which were most unfortunate. A Commission of one government to act is guided very strictly by rules of dignity and procedure. A United States Commission arriving on a war vessel, duly escorted and saluted by United States officials, proclaims to the world and to the country to which it is sent that its mission is important and its is left to its hosts a matter of thought and care. But when a Commission, like the Moton Commission, travels in discomfort and endures the careless neglect of the President of the United States and its subordinates, this is not simply an insult to the Presidents of the two greatest Negro institutions of the United States; it is an insult to the government of Haiti, and Haiti knows it. It is not a matter which can be hushed up by silence and endured as a merely personal affront. The Haitian Educational Commission, the moment they put foot on American ought to have given the Associated Press a statement of what they had been through that would have made the ears of the President tingle. In addition to this, they should have had the privilege of giving their findings and recommendations immediately to the press without waiting for President Hoover to vary or revise it. As it is, American Negroes still wait for explanations, and either a defense or an arraignment, and certainly, a report signed by the Moton Commission.

I know of no greater service that could be done for American democracy than to put real information in the hands of the mass of reading Americans at a trifling price. It is a tremendous service for human uplift.

The Prisoner is not a play for the tired business man. It is a grim, hard drama with a fundamental philosophy of peace and love which the world has always voted over-simple and unworkable. But the play is sincere and well acted and its lesson of the prison which jealousy and ambition may build about a soul, as well as the free spirit which a jail may confine, and well brought out in simple tense scenes.

The following states forbid marriage between white persons and persons of Negro descent:

Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, West Virginia.

This makes twenty nine states in all. In the other nineteen states such marriages are legal.

Life insurance is no longer a luxury nor an experiment. It is just as much the duty of a modern man to have his life insured as it is to wear clothes, to get married, and to eat nourishing food. The expense can be kept to a minimum by taking out the life insurance at an early age which effects a double saving: the paying of a smaller amount for the insurance and the habit of thrift when young at a time when thrift costs least in sacrifice. All this applies to any person, of any color, sex, or race. But young colored men and young colored women should be especially interested. The conditions under which their people live make death a more imminent risk. The breaking up of families by death, poverty and accident is greater in their case. And the habit of thrift is a thing which must be especially ~~remembered~~ learned by a race emerging from the thriftless customs of a slave regime. The first duty then of a young colored person is to earn a living. The second duty, is to take out life insurance.

Twenty-five students of the University of Michigan met in a restaurant in Ann Arbor last June. They were members of the Negro-Caucasian Club and their guests, including Christians, Jews, Mohammedans, Brahmas and Agnostics and five members of the University faculty. The Dean granted this club only temporary recognition. It has brought to Ann Arbor speaks as William Pickens, Norman Thomas, Paul Blanshard, A. Philip Randolph, Roger Baldwin and various professors of universities. The club sent representatives to listen to the Sweet trial. Literary men and teachers, like Kelly Miller, and Jean Toomer and Alain Locke came to speak. The aim of the club is to encourage a spirit of friendliness and fair-mindedness between the races and to study and discuss the problems of race relations. The club wants to see other such organizations throughout the country.

YOUTH

The fear of Youth is the most astonishing of fears, and yet, curiously enough, most widespread. After all, what can Youth do but fail, and what more than that have we done? On the other hand, if, perchance, here and yonder, Youth with its new dream succeeds, then the world works forward; a little step or even a great mile. This is progress, and the only technique of progress I have ever seen. Always, I hail Youth. Hail and farewell.

Few people read. Fewer colored people read. We gossip, we skim the headlines of the newspapers and we read the details of the last prize fight, but if in the large assembly of our people those persons raised their hands who had in the last year read through carefully a book worth reading, the number would be astonishingly small. This is only a habit and it is a bad habit. We ought to organize groups to buy books for ourselves. There are very few people who could not spend five dollars a year in buying good books and most of us ought to spend ten dollars. In addition to that we should provide libraries and books for those of us who are too young or too poor to buy them and for bringing together the more costly books which even the well to do could not afford. Unless we become a reading people we cannot become educated, and unless we are educated we cannot advance either as quickly or as far as we ought to.

Q. D. Johnston

In modern civilized life there are certain things which every man does. He is born; he is educated; he goes to work; he takes out life insurance; he is sick; he dies. Few of these things which can be avoided, certainly not the first and the last. The degree of a man's civilization is measured by the care which he takes of the other items. To be sure, uneducated men have succeeded; some men do not work, and perhaps a few serious men do not carry life insurance. But none of these omissions are to be recommended. All of them are essential to life. Sickness may be avoided to some extent; death never. Insurance is a method of making these the least possible burden upon the man himself, his friends, and his family.

Africa

The site of an iron foundry four thousand years old has been discovered in Northern Rhodesia. It shows that in Africa iron was smelted at that early day in the culture of the Stone Age. Of course, scientists are already trying to figure out what "superior race" brought this knowledge from outside Africa, instead of realizing that iron is the gift of Africa to the world.

Culture through Literature in terms of Sociological Founda..

If we note the literature written about Negroes in the United States we may pick out: Sewall's "Selling of Joseph", the poems of Whittier, Lowell, and Walt Whitman, "Uncle Tom's Cabin" by Harriet Beecher Stowe, the orations of Phillips and Sumner, the fiction of Cable, Page and Howells. If we place beside this the literature written by the Negroes themselves, we have: the poems of Phyllis Wheatley, the autobiography of Richard Allen, the almanacs of Benjamin Banneker, David Walker's Appeal, the life of Gustavus Vassa, the essays of William Wells Brown, the biographies of Loguen and Douglass, the poems of Whitfield and Harper, numerous slave biographies, Simmons' Biographical Dictionary, Williams' History of the Negro Race, Washington's "Up From Slavery", and the work of Chestnut and Dunbar.

These two sets of work may be best interpreted from an economic or sociological point of view. That is, they are the expressions of problems of work and human contact and organization, and those problems find their expression in this literature and in turn, this literature marks the progress of human culture both in the Negro group and in the surrounding groups.

Proclamation a more liberal tone was adopted toward black men. On Aug. 19, 1866, the National Labor Union said in its declaration:

"In this hour of the dark distress of labor, we call upon all laborers of what ever nationality, creed or color, skilled or unskilled, trades unionist and those now out of union to join hands with us and each other to the end that poverty and all its attendant evils shall be abolished forever."†

On Aug. 19, 1867, the National Labor Congress met at Chicago, Illinois. There were present 200 delegates from the states of North Carolina, Kentucky, Maryland and Missouri. The president, Z. C. Whatley, in his report said among other things:

"The emancipation of the slaves has placed us in a new position, and the question now arises, What labor position shall they now occupy? They will begin to learn and to think for themselves, and they will soon resort to mechanical pursuits and thus come in contact with white labor. It is necessary that they should not undermine it, therefore the best thing that they can do is to form trades unions, and thus work in harmony with the whites."‡

The attitude of the American Federation of Labor may be summed up as having passed through the following stages:

1. "The working people must unite and organize irrespective of creed, color, sex, nationality or politics."

This was an early declaration but was not embodied in the constitution. It was reaffirmed in 1897, after opposition. Bodies confining membership to whites were barred from affiliation.

2. "Separate charters may be issued to Central Labor Unions, Local Unions or Federal Labor Unions composed exclusively of colored members."

This was adopted by the convention of 1902 and recognizes the legality of excluding Negroes from local unions, city central labor bodies, &c.

3. A National Union which excludes Negroes expressly by constitutional provision may affiliate with the A. F. L.

No official announcement of this change of policy has been made, but the fact is well known in the case of the Railway Trackmen, Telegraphers, and others.

4. A National Union already affiliated with the A. F. L. may amend its laws so as to exclude Negroes.

This was done by the Stationary Engineers† at their Boston convention in 1902, and an (unsuccessful?) attempt in the same line was made by the Molders at their convention the same year. The A. F. L. has taken no public action in these cases.‡

The view of the philanthropist who for sentimental reason wants to see the uplift of manking, and the view of enlightened self interest. The philanthropist is allowed to insist upon certain efforts toward religious conversion and education. The advocates of enlightened self-interest, on the other hand, point out that less poverty, more intelligent knowledge of modern technique and a healthy manpower would be a better way of directing colonies and that greater profit and advantage to the countries which lead civilization would accompany such a policy. On the other hand, it is clear that if the economic well-being, intelligence and physical strength in the colonial countries, that is among a majority of mankind, were increased, it would certainly be but a short time before this majority of men would struggle and struggle successfully for their emancipation from the domination of present civilization. No sooner do we reach this impasse than there occurs to us the analogy of the relation between power and class in the past within those very nations which are today leading civilization.

It has not been so long ago since every great nation was built on the pattern, which we now see reflected in colonies. That is, in charge of the country, ruling its politics, absorbing the larger part of its wealth and monopolizing its knowledge and manners ruled a small aristocracy. The great mass of the people were contributing through labor and service to the support of this aristocracy and the situation was strongly defended on the ground that this organization of human kind was perfectly natural and the only way in which civilization could advance was by having the mass of the ignorant and stupid people of the nation support the civilized classes. To disturb this organization would mean the downfall and end of civilization. For the sake therefore of human culture, one must maintain the degradation of the majority of men. This was the attitude of civilization up to the time of and indeed after French Revolution.

It has been America which has most successfully challenged this dictum. America and its bath tubs; America and the fact that a majority of working people in this country live upon the plane of decency, that is not parallelled else where in the world. We have come to defend this voluably; we look forward not even in Great Britain and in the countries of Durope, to a rising of the labor class to a place where they share not only the political power but the economic power and the culture of the rulers of the nation. We are beginning to conceive in these countries, a real democracy. There are of course those who doubt that this democracy will be realizable in our day, but pratically none deny that its advent can be prophesied.

On the other hand, we have come to be just as dogmatic concerning the depressed masses of the world as we were formerly concerning the depressed classes within the nation. We envision the rise of great countries including their laboring classes, all perched upon the bodies of a majority of men. We think of modern culture as largely the monopoly of these leading nations. They are the ones that dominate the science and marvelous technique of our day, and by means of a monopoly of materials, machines and money, they keep in bondage the mass of men. Right here lies perhaps our most important mistake and that is in our comparison of European culture and the cultures of other lands. We see no goal for other lands even if they do advance except along the lines of European culture. We conceive European culture as consisting not simply of science and the application of science to the satisfactions of the wants of men, but also as consisting of the monopoly of materials, machines and money. This instead of being the picture of European superiority, illustrates rather precisely the reasons for its downfall. As compared with other cultures, the culture of Europe has grown in its scientific knowledge and in the technical way in which that knowledge has put the physical power of the world at the command of human wants. On the other hand the organization of industry by means of the capitalist system has not made European civilization superior, it has made it inferior and is causing and will cause its possible collapse. Because the capitalist system has not only ruined the ideals and the culture of Europe itself, surplanted its ethnics and commercialized its Arts, but in addition to that it has used its power to ruin those patterns of culture in other lands and among other peoples which if they had been allowed to survive and develop would have taught Europe and the world much of which the world is today ignorant. For instance there can be no doubt, but that the relation of the land to the community in accord with the African pattern was vastly superior to anything that we have developed in European culture, while land monopoly among us is a cause and a prime cause of poverty with the result and of ignorance and disease. The African pattern if had been allowed to continue and develop would have abolished poverty. The family as developed in Asia is a stronger and finer organization than anything that we can show in modern civilization; while our family is disintegrating, breaking up and we are showing no likelihood of a substitution that can do the social work that the family was designed to do. The Chinese family on the other hand has stood up against conquest and disaster, flood and famine; against ignorance and the despising of men. It has become so powerful and so efficient that it does not make any difference who rules China, the family still survives. The Chinese family has been by the pressure of Europe and America undoubtedly distorted and compelled to take up social duties for which it was not adapted, until today its very efficiency interfers with the efficiency of the state and the expression of Art. This shows again the way in which ignorance and selfish interference from abroad has spoiled a cultural pattern.

I need hardly refer to Aft. The beauty that was Greece, the intricate technique of Indian Art, the artistic life of China, the examples of art in Africa, rediscovered in our own day; all these things have been spoiled, cheapened, almost driven from the face of the earth by the greed and cruelty and ignorance of European civilization. I need say nothing of ethics, it is a colony today, India, that leads the world in ethically concept. There are no ethical standards in Great Britain or America; by which I mean that there is nothing that is so wrong and despicable and illogical, that the British empire and the American republic cannot pursue doggedly for generations and centuries in the face of liberal self-criticism, so long as this denial of ethics and religion makes for their power and self-esteem. No nation, no continent could have deve oped a man like Gandhi; he is a matter of jokes or puzzled astonishment to all modern civilization because of the things that he represents; sacrifice, atonement, the endeavor to establish a kingdom of love upon earth, is utterly inexplicable to London, Paris and New York.

In those cities we have the anesthesia of luxurious, wealth, the suicide of the machine and world war

I do not for a moment deny that in the leading cultural lands of the present there is not now and has not been in the past desperate effort to recover balance and a decent point of view. But the conception or real spiritual democracy comes with great difficulty. Democracy has been conceived in the West as primarily defense against oppression. But that is only the beginning of democracy and no mass of people can defend itself against power merely with a vote. Power is modern democracy resides in the monopoly of the machine; but even here the conception of improving monopoly simply by putting monopoly into the hands of labor is by no means the broad conception for which civilization calls. We must look upon the masses of men as not valuable and sacred simply because they are a mass, but because within them lies human possibility as great or greater than the world has ever realized in ancient aristocracy or modern plutocracy. The aristocracy, the oligarcly depends for its development very largely upon chance. The cultivation of the abilities of mankind on a broad and generous scale has never been attempted. Think what we might have by way of genius and ability if we did not depend upon that which comes to the surface by accident or only when accompanied by impudence and cunning? Suppose the whole field of human possibilities were explored; suppose we conceivedof a world community of intelligent men, of men who knew the past and understood the present; and from these could forcast the future; of men of character and ethical standards. It is the mass of people as holding possibility of that kind of humanity, which is the real idea of democracy.

Moreover, the freedom about which we talk so often when we discuss democracy, is a freedom which can only be developed and enjoyed in communities of intelligent and upright men. Then you can have real opportunity for individual development; for that anarchy of will which paints the beauty of a varied civilization, rather than a civilization standarized, cut-and-dried. All this of course cannot be developed quickly; the whole idea of increasing size and rapid growth which is the child of infantile capitalistic monopoly pattern and of of silly force, All that must go, we will then have a chance under this broader and greater democracy for the slow development and accomodation of human thought and emotion to the developing and expanding cultural patterns. We will develop patience; we will look upon the world as a slowly and beautifully unfolding throng rathern than as a mechanical, hurried mass.

From this point of view the colony in the future world, becomes the essential problem. Unless we go to work and go to work immediately to conceive of the colony not as the basis of luxury, wealth and power in a few imperial countries; unless we look upon the mass of people in the colonies as literaly the hope of the world and of decent living for all human beings, we miss the greatest problem of our day. Moreover most of the difficulties in the way of allowing the peoples of the world to develop to be rid of their poverty, their ignorance and their disease, exists in the imagination and suicidal greed of men. In the matter of work andincome, there is scarcely any part of the world today that does not furnish materials which the world needs; and there is no reason in logic nor decency why the materials in general demand which any colony raises should not pay the tings which that colony needs. The diamond and cooper, tin and oil of Africa ought to pay for decent food, shelter, clothing and education for the natives of that land. Take for instance the tin mines of Nigeria; they are paying dividends of from 50 to 80 percent and yet the miners who are bringing that tin where the world can use it are working for a shilling a day. Even more is reputable is the thing that has taken place in the gold and diamond mines of South Africa; there in return for which the world considers the greatest wealth, the mass of people has been reduced to semi-slavery.

There is no reason in the world why the valuable and indespensiable material which the colonial people furnish to the world should not balance the kind of materials or the processed goods and food which would make the native laborer a modern man.

To this it may be answered that while this is theoratically possible and just, the world is too selfish and self-centered to allow anything like this to happen. In reply to this we must remember that the greatest organizations in the world are religious; that the reason that the world in turn is not dominated by ethical and religious motives is because these organizations are not doing the work for which they were organized. In Africa it has happened that the missionary effort , great and fine as it has been has been only able to give elementary schools to the natives; and instead of emancipating the natives from the control of capital it has actual made wage slavery more and more possible. But today when we begin to see where emancipation really lies and what democracy really means there is no reason why the organized desire of normal human beings to be decent and good and self-sacrificing, which is so wide-spread in the world, should not be put at the head of a movement which could compell the world robbers and gamblers to carry out a new conception of the relation of colonies to the world. The so-called labor movement could easily be dominated by these ideals instead of being so largely as it is today the representatives of the petit bourgeois,— the small capitalist, who instead of looking at labor as a life career looks upon it as a stepping-stone to slave mastery. Men of good will after this war have got to stand for a mandate backed by the con-centered organized conscence of the world, which will say, poverty, ignorance, and disease are not the natural lot of the masses of men; the masses have to offer in cultural patterns quite as much as Europe has developed. They are ones through whom real democracy is to be developed and real humanity and thereform. At whatever cost this mandale of universal decency; universal control of the action of powerful men toward those who are temperally weak, must be established and must be made effective.

THE NEW NEGRO THEATRE

I do not suppose that any set of people ever tried seriously to make the world ugly, and yet from time to time many motives have urged people to fight beauty through prejudice or preconception or because certain ethical considerations seemed to urge them.

This has been the case with the Negro in America. The Negro race is peculiarly a race of artists, of people subtly susceptible to every call of beauty, in music, in color, in work. In the earliest times their art impulse has been felt. The remains of Negroid art in prehistoric Europe are well known. The influence of the Negro artist in industry and religion throughout the centuries of Egyptian history is undeniable, and no industrial workers have ever put more delightful sense of form into their product that the Negro iron workers of all ages. The catasthophe of world slavery has made ~~them~~ men not only forget this, but it has been so fashionable to deny all originality and sense of the beautiful to black folk that their message has come to the modern American world only after extraordinary effort.

Men like Henry Ward Beecher had to plead with the people of New York to listen to the songs of the slaves, and when the world heard their strange, new beauty, it discounted and criticized the discovery. They were pronounced "imitations" and slight in ~~value~~ form, curious, but of no value to the musical world. Yet today they are foundation and motif of a whole new ~~scale~~ school of music and if there is ~~in~~ any America music it is Negro American music.

The American world is not a white world in tint of flesh but white shading in to every beautiful color from cream and dark brown. Yet the painter has not dared, in most cases, to paint the scene before him save in white. One could see a New Orleans Mardi Gras transferred to paper without a colored face. Of the beauty and variety which Negro blood has given to millions of American faces almost nothing appears except startling caricatures. Gradually today the artist is breaking through this artificial beauty But his work is still regarded with surprise and even suspicion, as in the case of Manigault's "Negress."

At last, the Negro has forced a small foothold on the stage of serious drama. It has been a long, wearisome fight. Given his opening a generation ago as a minstrel he pushed on into comedy and adding his own wonderful music displayed under the genius of Williams and Walker and Cole and Johnson, a new musical comedy which caught the world's ear. When, however, effort was made to push on past this and portray along lines of serious dramatic effort the wonderful spiritual wealth of the Negro soul, there was no chance. One young black pioneer was forced even to suicide because of the doors wantonly closed in his face. Before these days a great black tragedian had knocked vainly at the entrance to the Green Room, but only found his chance abroad where every European country eventually vied to do him honor, and he was named as equal to the great Rachel.

Lately, two or three events have shadowed a new forward movement toward Negro drama. Slowly, tentatively, the Negro has appeared in fiction as something more than an ape and a clown. The spirit whirling in his soul, the tremendous wealth of dramatic material has begun to be sensed by American artists. Three times great pageants of Negro history and aspiration have been given in New York, Washington and Philadelphia, where audiences of perhaps 30,000 saw thousands of colored actors do folk-drama with surprising aptness and simplicity. Then there came in Harlem and spread to other cities companies of colored players in conventional Broadway plays who outside of certain obvious misfits of ~~blood~~ plot and circumstance rose to ~~heights~~ of real dramatic ability and drew large colored audiences. Finally Mrs. Emile Hapgood with ~~Mr.~~ Robert Jones as artist and Ridgeley Torrence as playwright has taken a decisive step and put on Broadway, New York, three little plays with Negro players.

The plays deal subtly with the deeper strivings of the Negro people. They have artistic setting and beautiful Negro music and they are the most striking departures in American drama seen for more than a decade. They are, of course, criticized. Whenever a submerged people seek self-expression there are always folk outside who know far better than they know just what they want and think. The artist who seeks to give them expression will always be accused of assuming for them thoughts they never had, of making a dreamer out of a ~~thief~~, a wild tragedy out of superstition and giving ~~a~~ possible awkward defender to Jesus Christ.

But time proves all things. If this step succeeds, and whether it succeeds or not, in the up-rushing force of oncoming years the present spiritual revolution in the souls of black folk is going to give to the American stage a drama that will lift it above silly songs and leg shows. There is not ~~an~~ in American life a more tremendous source for plot and feeling , and no onecan interpret it as can Negroes themselves.

Negro slaves arrived in America with a strong tendency to Nature worship and a belief in witchcraft common to all primitive peoples. Beside this some had more less vague ideas of a supreme being and higher religious ideas, while a few were Mohammedans, and fewer Christians. Some actual priests were transported and others assumed the functions of priests, and soon a form of African religion and witchcraft appeared in the West Indies, which was known as Obi, or sorcery. The French Creoles called it " Waldensian" (Vaudois), because of the witchcraft charged against the wretched followers of Peter Waldo, whence comes the dialect name of Voodoo or Hoodoo, used in the United States. At first the system was undoubtedly African and part of some more or less general riligious system. It often, however, degenerated into mere imposture. There would seem to have been some traces of blood sacrifice and worship of the Moon, but ~~fortunately~~ unfortunately those who have written on the subject have not been serious students of curious human phenomena, but rather persons apparently unable to understand why a transplanted slave should cling to heathen rites. The most obvious reason for the spread of witchcraft and persistence of heathen rites among Negro slaves was the fact that at first no effort was made by masters to offer them anything better. This was because of the widespread idea that it was contrary to law to hold Christians as slaves. One can realize the weight of this if we remember that the Diet of Worms and Sir John Hawkins' voyages were but a generation apart. From the time of the Crusades to the Lutheran revolt the feeling of Christian brotherhood had been growing, and it was pretty well established by the end of the sixteenth century that it was wrong for Christians to hold each other as slaves for life. This did not mean any widespread abhorrence of forced labor from serfs or apprentices and it was particularly linked with the idea that the enslavement of the heathen was meritorious, since it punished their blasphemy on theone hand and gave them a chance for conversion on the other.

When, therefore, the slave-trade from Africa began it met only feeble opposition here and there. That opposition was in nearly all cases stilled when it was continually stated that the slave-trade was simply a method of converting the heathen to Christianity. The corrollary that the conscience of Europe immediately drew was that after conversion the Negro slave was to become in all essential respects like other servants and laborers, that is bound to toil, perhaps, under general regulations, but personally free with recognized rights and duties.

Most colonists believed that this was not only actually right, but according to English law. And while they early began to combat the idea they continually doubted the legality of their action in English courts.

The colonies early began therefore cautiously to declare that certain distinctions lay between "Christian" inhabitants and slaves, whether they were Christians or not. Maryland, for instance, proposed a law, in 1638, which failed of passage. It was:

"For the liberties of the people" and declared "all Christian inhabitants (slaves only excepted) to have and enjoy all such rights, liberties, immunities, privileges and free customs, within this province, as any natural born subject of England hath ot ought to have or enjoy in the realm of England, saving in such cases as the same are or be altered or changed by the laws and ordinances of this province."

The question arose in different form in Massachusetts when it was enacted that only church members could vote. If Negroes joined the church, would they become free voters of the commonwealth? It seemed hardly possible. Nevertheless up to 1660 or thereabouts it seemed accepted in most colonies and in ~~England~~ the English West Indies that baptism into a Christian church would free a Negro slave. Massachusetts first apparently attacked this idea by enacting in 1641 that slavery should be confined to captives in just wars, "and such strangers as willingly sell themselves or are sold to us," meaning by"strangers" apparently heathen,but saying nothing as to the effect of conversion. Connecticut adopted similar legislation in I650 and Virginia declared in I66I that Negroes " are in-capable of making satisfaction" for time lost in running away by lengthening their time of service,thus implying that they were slaves for life,and Maryland declared flatly in I663 that Negro slaves should serve " durante vita." In Barbadoes the Council presented ,in I663,an act to the Assembly recommending the christening of Negro children and the instruction of all adult Negroes to the several ministers of the place.

At the same time in the ready-made Duke of York's laws sent over to the new colony of New York in I664 the old idea seems to prevail:

"No Christian shall be kept in bondslavery,villenage,or captivity,except such who shall be judged thereunto by authority,or such as willingly have sold or shall sell themselves,in which case a record of such servitude shall be entered in the Cpurt of Sessions held for that jurisdiction where such masters shall inhabit,provided that nothing in the law contained shall be to the prejudice of master or dame who have or shall by any indenture or covenant take apprentices for term of years,or other servants for term of years or life"

It was not until I667 that Virginia finally plucked up courage to attack the issue squarely and declared by law:

" Baptisme doth not alter the condition of the persons as to his bondage or freedom,in order that diverse masters freed from this doubt may more carefully endeavor the propagation of Christianity."

Following this Virginia took three further decisive steps in I670,I682, and I705. First she declared that only slaves imported from Christian lands should be free. Next she excepted Negroes and mulattoes from even this restriction unless they were born of Christians and were Christians when taken in slavery. Finally only personal Christianity in Africa or actual freedom in a Christian country excepted a Virginia Negro slave from life -

This changing attitude of Christians toward Negroes was reflected in Locke's Fundamental Constitutions for Carolina in I670, one article of which said:

" Since charity obliges us to wish well to the souls of all men, and religion ought to alter nothing in any man's civil estate or right, it shall be lawful for slaves as well as others to enter themselves and to be what church and profession any of them shall think best, and thereof be as fully members as any freeman. But yet no slave shall hereby be exempted from the civil dominion his master hath over him, but be in all things in the same state and condition he was in before."

So much did this please the Carolinas that it was one of the few articles re-enacted in the Constitution of I698. In I67I Maryland was moved to pass "An act for the Encouraging of the Importation of Negroes and Slaves." This act declared that conversion or the holy sacrament of baptism should not be taken to give manumission in any way to slaves or their issue who had become Christians or had been or should be baptized either before or after their importation to Maryland," any opinion to the contrary notwithstanding."

It was explained that this law was passed because "several of the good people of this province have been discouraged from the importing or purchasing therein any Negroes or other slaves; and such have imported or purchased any there have neglected- to the great displeasure of Almighty God and the prejudice of the souls of those poor people - to instruct them in the Christian faith, and to permit them to receive the holy sacrament of baptism for the remission of their sin, under the mistaken and undergrounded apprehension that their slaves by becoming Christians would thereby be freed." This law was re-enacted in I692 and I7I5.

It is clear from these citations that in the seventeenth century not only was there little missionary effort to convert Negro Slaves, but that there

Was on the contrary positive refusal to let slaves be converted, and th that this refusal was one incentive to explicit statements of the doctrine of perpetual slavery for Negroes. The French Code Noir of I685 made baptism and religious instruction of Negroes obligatory. We find no such legislation in English colonies. On the contrary, the principal Secretary of State is informed in I670 that in Jamaica the number of tippling houses has greatly increased, and many planters are ruined by drink. " So interests decrease, Negroes and slaves increase. There is much cruelty, oppression, rape, whoredoms, and adulteries."

In Massachusetts John Eliot and Cotton Mather both are much concerned that " so little care was taken of their [the Negroes] precious and immortal souls," which were left to "a destroying ignorance merely for fear of thereby losing the benefit of their vassalage."

So through out the colonies it is reported in I678 that masters," out of covetousness, "are refusing to allow their slaves to be baptized; and in I700 there is an earnest plea in Massachusetts for religious instruction of Negroes since it is " notorious" that masters discourage the "poor creatures" from baptism. In I709 a Carolina clergyman writes to the secretary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in England that only a few of 200 or more Negroes in his community were taught Christianity, but were not allowed to be baptized. Another minister writes, a little later, that he prevailed upon a master after much importuning to allow three Negroes to be baptized. In North Carolina in I709 a clergyman of the Established Church complains that masters will not allow their slaves to be baptized for fear that a Christian slave is by law free. A few were instructed in religion, but not baptized. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel combated this notion vigorously. Later, in I732, Bishop Berkeley reports that few Negroes have been received into the church.

This state of affairs led to further laws, and the instructions to some of the royal Governors contain a clause ordering them to "find out the best means to facilitate and encourage the conversion of Negroes and Indians to the Christian religion." New York hastened to join the States which sought to reassure masters, declaring in I706:

" Whereas, Divers of her Majesty's good subjects, inhabitants of this colony, now are, and have been willing that such Negroes, Indian and Mulatto slaves, who belong to them, and desire the same, should be baptized, but are deterred and hindered therefrom by reason of a groundless opinion that hath spread itself in this colony, that by the baptizing of such Negro, Indian or Mulatto slaves, they would become free, and ought to be set at liberty. In order, therefore, to put an end to all such doubts and scruples as have, or hereafter any time may arise about the same:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the baptizing of a Negro, Indian, or Mulatto slave shall not be any cause or reason for the setting them, or any of them, at liberty .

"And be it, etc.; That all and every Negro, Indian , or Mulatto and Mestee bastard child and children, who is, are, and shall be boen of any Negro, Indian or Mestee, shall follow the state and condition of the mother and be esteemed, reputed, taken and adjudged a slave and slaves to all intents and purposes whatsoever."

In I729 an appeal from several colonies was made to England on the subject in order to increase the conversion of blacks. The Crown Attorney and Solicitor General replied that baptism in no way changed the slave's status.

Occasional baptisms of Negroes into Christian churches began early. It is said that " In the year I624, a few years after the arrival of the first slave ship at Jamestown, Va., a Negro child was baptized and called William, and from that time on in almost all, if not all, the oldest churches in the South, the names of the Negroes baptized into the church of God can be found upon the rigisters."

It was easy to make such cases an argument for more slaves. James Habersham, the Georgia companion of the Methodist Whitefield, said about I730:

" I once thought it was unlawful to keep Negro slaves, but I am now induced to think God may have a higher end in permitting them to be brought to this Christian country, than merely to support their masters. Many of the poor slaves in America have already been made freemen of the heavenly Jerusalem and possibly a time may come when many thousands may embrace the gospel, and thereby be brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God. These, and other considerations, appear to plead strongly for a limited use of Negroes; for, while we can buy provisions in Carolina cheaper than we can here, no one will be induced to plant much."

In other cases there were curious attempts to blend religion and expediency, as for instance, in 1710, when a Massachusetts clergyman evolved a marriage ceremony for Negroes in which the bride solemnly promised to cleave to her husband " so long as God in his Providence" and the slave-trade let them live together?

The gradual increase of these Negro Christians, however, brought peculiar problems. Clergymen, despite the law, were reproached for taking Negroes into the church and still allowing them to be held as slaves. On the other hand it was not easy to know how to deal with the black church member after he was admitted. He must be either be made a subordinate member of a white church or a member of a Negro church under the general supervision of whites. As the efforts of missionaries, like Dr, Bray, slowly increased the number of converts, both these systems were adopted. But the black congregations here and there soon aroused the suppicion and fear of the masters, and as early as 1715 North Carolina passed an act which declared:

"That if any master or owner of Negroes or slaves, or any other person or persons whatsoever on the government, shall permit or suffer any Negro or Negroes to build on their , or either of their, lands, or any part thereof, and house under pretense of a meeting-house upon account of worship, or upon any pretense whatsoever, and shall not suppress and hinder them, he, she, or they so offending, shall, for every default. forfeit and pay fifty xxxxxxxx pounds, one-half toward defraying the contingent charges of government, the other to him or them that shall sue for the same."

This made Negro members of a white church a necessity in this colony, and there was the same tendency in other colonies. " Maryland passed a law in I723 to suppress tumultuous meetings of slaves on Sabbath and other holy days," a measure primarily for good order, but also tending to curb independent religious meetings among Negroes. In I800 complaints of Negro meetings were heard. Georgia in I770 forbade slaves "to assemble on pretense of feasting," etc., and "any constable", on directions of a justice, is commanded to disperse any assembly or meeting od slaves " which may disturb the peace and endanger the safety of his Majesty's subjects; and every slave which may be found at such meeting, as aforesaid, shall and may, by order of justice, immediately be corrected, without trial, by receiving on the rare back twenty-five stripes, with a whip, switch, or cowskin," etc. In I792 in a Georgia act " to protect religious societies in the exercise of their religious duties," punishment was provided for persons disturbing white congregations, but " no congregations or company of Negroes shall upon pretense of divine worship assemble themselves" contrary to the act of I770. Whether or not such acts tended -to curb the really religious meetings of the slaves or not it is not easy to know. Probably they did, although at the same time there was probably much disorder and turmoil among the slaves, which sought to cloak itself under the name of the church. This was natural, for such assemblies were the only surviving African organizations, and they epitomized all there was in slave life outside of forced toil.

It gradually became true, as Brackett says, that " any privileges of church -going which slaves might enjoy depended much, as with children, on the disposition of the masters." In some colonies, like North Carolina, masters continued indifferent throughout the larger part of the eighteenth century. In New Hanover county of that state out of a thousand whites and two house and slaves, 307 masters were baptized in I742, but only nine slaves. The English are told of continued indifference in Massachusetts, the Connecticut

General Assembly is asked in I738 if masters ought not to promise to train slaves as Christians, and instructions are repeatedly given to Governors on the matter, with but small results.

"The Society for Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," was incorporated under William III, on the I6th day of June, I70I, and the first meeting of the society under its charter was the 27th of June of the same year. Thomas Laud, Bishop of Canterbury, Primate and Metropolitan of all England, was appointed by his majesty the first president.

This society was formed with the view, primarily, of supplying the destitution of religious institutions and privileges among the inhabitants of the North American colonies, members of the established church of England; and, secondarily, of extending the gospel to Indians and Negroes. The society entered upon its duties with zeal, being patronized by the king and all the dignataries of the Church of England.

They instituted inquiries into the religious condition of all the colonies, responded to" by the governors and persons of the best note," (with special reference to Episcopacy), and they perceived that their work "consisted of three great branches: the care and instruction of our people settled in the colonies; the conversion of the Indian savages, and the conversion of the Negroes." Before appointing missionaries they sent out a travelling preacher, the Rev. George Keith(an itinerant missionary), who associated with himself the Rev. John Talbot. Mr. Keith preached between North Carolina and Piscataqua river in New England, a tract above eight hundred miles in length, and completed his mision in two years, and returned and reported his labors to the society.

The annual meetings of this society were regularly held from I702 to I8I and II8 sermons preached before it by bishops of the Church of England, a large number of them distinguished for piety, learning and zeal."

In I702 some work was done among the Negroes of Carolina and in I704 a Negro school was established in New York.

Mr. Elias Neau, a French protestant, was appointed Catechist and he baptized many Negro children. This school survived the bad feeling engendered by the Negro Plot of 1712 and is the lineal progenitor of the work of Trinity parish among Negroes.

The history of the society goes on to say: "It is a matter of commendation due to the clergy that they have done thus much in so great and difficult a work. But, alas! what is the instruction of a few hundreds in several years with respect to the many thousands uninstructed, unconverted, living, dying, utter pagans. It must be confessed what hath been done is as nothing with regard to what a true Christian would hope to see effected." After stating several difficulties in respect to the religious instruction of the Negroes, it is said: "But the greatest obstruction is the masters themselves do not consider enough obligation which lies upon them to have their slaves instructed." And in another place the society, "the society have always been sensible the most effectual way to convert the Negroes was by engaging their masters to countenance and promote their conversion."

From 1711 to 1785 thousands of sermons and leaflets advocating the conversion of slaves were distributed in America.

In the year 1783, and the following, soon after the separation of our colonies from the mother country, the society's operations ceased, leaving in all the colonies forty-three missionaries, two of whom were in the Southern States- one in the North and one in South Carolina. The affectionate valediction of the society to them was issued in 1785. "Thus terminated the connection of this noble society with our country, which, from the foregoing notices of its efforts, must have accomplished a great deal for the religious instruction of the Negro population."

The Moravians or United Brethren were the first who formally attempted the establishment of missions exclusively to the Negroes. Account of their several efforts, down to the year 1790, says:

In 1737 Count Zinsendorf paid a visit to London and formed an acquaintance with General Oglethrope and the Trustees of Georgia, with whom he conferred

LEO TOLSTOI

by W. E. B. Du Bois

It is a little difficult to assess the impact of Tolstoi's work on the United States. That it has been great there is no question, yet it is in some ways contradictory. We looked on it at first actually as a great protest and revolt against the tyranny of the Czars. Then in later years Tolstoi became to our minds a Russian writer and Russia meant Socialism and Communism. Nevertheless we clung to his WAR AND PEACE because for so long we tried to count ourselves as a peaceful country. Gradually we became the leading country of the world advocating war and it was difficult for our thinkers and writers to hold with the great Russian advocate of peace and at the same time spend fabulous sums of money for war, hate and destruction.

I am not sure just where today Tolstoi stands in our university classrooms. I would not be surprised to know that more attention is given to some of his Fascist relatives than to the great champion of the downtrodden Russian peasant. In selected lists of books recommended for our youth I doubt if Tolstoi today would hold a high place. Yet his popularity has never wholly faded and it will grow and increase as Socialism spreads, as war and preparation for war disappears and as we begin to get in America a true picture of the tremendous Revolution which began with the attempt to abolish serfdom and is still progressing with the effort to abolish war.

RENAISSANCE IN AFRICA

In these days when Africa is news, there is available no accuratee and compact history of this continent and its peoples. This is due in part to the variety of names under which this continent has played its role in history: Carthage, Ethiopia, Egypt, Sudan, Africa referring to the region where black people and their relatives and descendents have lived. To the Greeks t is Lnd of the Blacks compreh hended norteast Africa and Arabia; and there they said Civilization began among the finest people of the earth. To the Romans Afric a was Carthage and its hinterland from the Mediterranean to the desert and later the valley of the Nile. In years of the Fall of Rome and the rise of a new Europe, Africa loomed as a variety of nations and cultures, from Egypt and Ethiopia; Ghana, the Mellestine and the Songhai;the Haussa, Bornu-Kanem and Kitwara; the Fulani, Mossi and Benin; the Bushongo, Congo, Zeng and Monopotapa. In these centers flourished a varieties of cultures; with art and commerce, intricate developments of governments; vast family organizations; manufactures in cloth materials and foods; buildings and instruments. This variety of human invention reached all over the world until the Middle Ages said "Always something New out of Africa

When Rome had sunk into barbarism and was rescued by a new Church from annih liation, a rebirth of human thinking and effort rescued Greek civilation from the East. ARenaissance of civilization began; schools started; art flourished and science began to inquire. Arabian thought pushed west into Africa and Europe explored the world. By way of the West Coast, Europe came down around Africa and across the desert Africa came up to Europe. This intercourse encouraged that transfer of human labor which had long flourished from Germany to Rome , from Europe to Asia, Asia to Africa and Africa to Europe and Asia, increased in exent and variety because in I492 a new continent was added to the world. On that America new, cheap food and clot ing came, toge her with ornament and luxuries. Labor in unprecedented numbers was in demand and human ingenuity lear ed to process Sugar and cotton. Workers were taken f om feudal agriculture in Europe and settled in towns and from agriculture in Afr ca and herded into me the most lawless people in the modern world of civilization. From the mother who takes her seven or eight year old child into the street car and lies about his age to the corporation magnate who hires great lawyers to tell him how to defeat the law. We find the spirit of lawlessness everywhere, and I believe it is true, to a certain extent, at least, that in the crime of lynching we have one of the most acute and terrible forms of this lawlessness. But while that is true in a certain measure, it falls short of explaining the situation by which we are confronted.

We are told also that the crime of lynching is one way in which the American people show their contempt for the courts of the United States. There seems to have crept into the minds of the great mass of men and women at the present time the supposition that the courts of our land can no longer be trusted to see that justice is done surely and done at once. They have lost confidence in those who have to do with the dispensing of justice. That, I believe, is one reason which enters into this subject of lynching. Here is one cause, like the spirit of lawlessness of the American people, which has something to do with the case.

But these two causes taken together, important and significant as they really are, do not begin to explain the real situation. The trouble is, my friends, that today exactly as sixty or seventy years ago, the American people and mainly the people of the South, refuse to believe that the black man is to be regarded and treated as a man. The fact is that the spirit which made the institution of slavery possible still remains in the minds of thousands and thousands of white men and women of the North as well as of the South. We still believe that the black man is an inferior sort of man, but we refuse to dignify him with the name of man at all, and that being the case lynching is as inevitable as the shooting of a dog running along the street when the cry of "Mad dog" is lifted through the air.

Take the Oklahoma lynching. The only thing that I could think of as I glanced at this picture was a photograph I had seen of huntsmen returning with the animal which had been shot, proud of the achievement of their marksmenship. I believe that the same spirit which makes possible the photograph of the men gathered around the moose or the deer which has been shot makes possible the photograph of the Negro shot to death in Oklahoma. In both cases the huntsmen are proud that they have shot an animal, and therefore they stand before the camera in order that the evidence of the story may be sure. In other words, this is another expression of the lawlessness of the American people.

In this same period which is disgraced by this evil crime, we find that laws have been passed refusing the ballot to the black man. We find Jim Crow cars; We find laws prohibiting Negro men and women entering public libraries, museums, parks and theatres. We find the denial to the black man and woman of the right of education . We find in this same period the spirit of antagonism everywhere, and lynching is only one of the half-dozen or dozen symptoms of the old disease which well nigh destroyed our Republic in the days before the War.

Now, that being a diagnosis of the case - lynching, burning and Jim Crow cars being but an expression of the conviction of many of our so-called civilized fellow citizens that the Negro is not even a man - that being a diagnosis of the case, the remedy is perfectly simple. The remedy, to my mind, is not the remedy of teaching the American people to be a law-abiding peaople, although that may contribute to the result. It is not restoring in the minds of the American people a sense of justice. The only remedy which will really work the cure, the only thing which will really restore the black man to his place of equality and privilege with his white brethren is the renewal in the same spirit of the same battle that was fought successfully fifty years ago for the freedom of the black man from the chains of slavery. In other words, I believe that the time has come when that great battle must be begun again, that the hour has struck when the North must do its duty. The time has come when we must once again go up and down the length and breadth of this great Republic and preach to the four winds of heaven and to the souls of all who will listen and to those who will not listen, that the Negro is a man, a child of God, dowered with all the rights, powers, capacities and abilities of any man upon the earth; that he is entitled to everything that God has given the sons of earth, and tc all the privileges that are showered by this Republic upon the great body of its citizenship. The time has come once again in these northern states when the brave, silent and lonely man must work by day and sleep by night in his little printing office turning out day after day the pages of "The Liberator" to be scattered over the country. The time has come when up and down the land there must go, like Wendell Phillips, the silver-tongued orator who would speak in behalf of justice, liberty and truth, and pour out the vials of his perfect and divine wrath upon the heads of all who refuse to give justice to their fellows. The time has come when the American pulpit must be sanctified by the holy presence of such a man as Theodore Parker. Parker said that the pulpit of his church could be consecratedt to no higher thing than the liberation of the black man.

We must proclaim to our southern brothers that we propose some day or other that the advantages we lost shall be redeemed, that puhlic institutions shall be opened to all who are men; that we shall declare, upon the amendments that now stand in our Constitution, that the right of ballot shall be exercised by every man be he black or white,; that we shall declare that all men are free and equal, black or white, rich or poor, high or low , of whatever race or class or nation of men; tha we are all brothers and shall be treated alike.

This whole crime of lynching, to my mind , can never be solved by half-way measures. Men must have strength and courage. Poet: must sing. Prophets must speak. An Emancipation Proclamation must be written. Chains and fetters must be broken asunder. Again, as so many many times before, the battle for liberty must be fought over and over and over until the promised vision of the poet shall indeed be seen, and men of all colors, of all classes, of all conditions, shall come from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south, and they shall all sit down together arcund the one board as members and brothers of the one great kingdom of the living God.

Beginning with Massachusetts, in 1855, these separate schools have been abloished in nearly all Northern States.

The history of schools for Negroes in the South falls also in five main epochs

I. The Ante-Bellum Schools.

2. The Army Schools.

3. The schools of the Freedmen's Bureau.

4. The Missionary Schools.

5. The Public Schools.

Some few schools for Negroes existed here and there in the South before the war. In the District of Columbia, as already mentioned, no less than fifteen different schools were conducted here mainly at the expense of the colored people between 1800 and 1861. In Maryland, St. Frances Academy, for colored girls, was founded by the Roman Catholics in 1829. In North Carolina there were before 1835 several schools maintained by the free Negroes. They had usually white teachers. After 1835 the few clandestine schools were taught by Negroes. In Charleston, S.C., there was a school for Negroes opend in 1744, which lasted some ten years. It was taught by a Ngero and was for free Negroes only, although some slaves who hired their time managed to send their children there. Free Negroes in Georgia used to send children to Charleston for eduation. They returned and opened clandestine schools in Georgia. In Savannah a French Negro, Julian Froumontaine, from San Domingo, conducted a free Negro school openly from 1819 to 1829, and secretly for sometime after. Schools were stopped nearly everywhere after 1830 and as slavery became more and more a commercial venture all attempts at Negro education were given up.

During the war the first complication that confronted the armies was the continual arrival of fugitive slaves within the Union lines. At first the commands were rigid against receiving them. " Hereafter," wrote Halleck early in the war," "no slaves should be allowed to come within your lines at all." Other generals, however, thought differently. Some argued that confiscating slaves would weaken the South, others were imbued with abolition sentiment for right's sake. Twice attempts were made to free the slaves of certain localities by proclamation, but these orders were counter-manddd by the President. Still the fugitives poured into the lines and gradually were used as laborers and helpers. Immediately teaching began and schools sprang up. When at last the Emancipation Proclamation was issued and Negro soldiers called for, it was necessary to provide more systematically for Negroes. Various systems and experiments grew up here and there. The Freedmen were massed in large numbers at Fortress Monroe, Va., Washington, D. C., Beaufort and Port Royal, S.C., New Orleans, La., Vicksburg and Corinth, Miss., Columbus, Ky., Cairo, Ill., and elsewhere. In such places schools immediately sprang up under the army officers and chaplains. The most elaborate system, perhaps, was that under General Banks in Louisiana. It was established in 1863 and soon had a regular Board of Education, which laid and collected taxes and supported eventually nearly a hundred schools with ten thousand pupils, under 162 teachers. At Port Royal, S.C., were gathered Edward L. Pierce's "Ten thousand Clients." Mr. Pierce began the organization of relief societies in the North and established an economic system with schools. Eventually they passed under the oversight of General RufusSaxon, who sold forfeited estates, leased plantations, received the camp followers of Sherman's March to the Sea, and encouraged schools. In the West, General Grant appointed Colonel John Eaton, afterwards United States Commissioner of Education, to be superintendent of Freedmen in 1862. He sought to consolidate and regulate the schools already established, and succeeded in organizing a large system.

The Freedmen's Bureau was especially active in the establishment of schools for Negroes. In General Howard's first Freedmen's Bureau report, he says: "Schools were taken in charge by the Bureau, and in some states carried on wholly -in connection with local efforts -by use of a refugees' and freedmen's funds which had been collected from various sources. Teachers came under the general direction of the assistant commissioners, and protection through the department commanders was given to all engaged in the work."

The chief benevolent society was the American Missionary Association and next in importance came the various Freedmen's Union Commissions, the Freedmen's Aid Soicety of the M. E. Church, the Baptist Home Mission Society and Board of Missions of the Presbyterian Church. Beside these the Episcopals, Catholics and Friends did some work. The work of the American Missionary Association, representing the Congregational Church still maintains three high schools and colleges, one theological school, twenty-six high and Industrial schools, and seven graded schools; these schools have about four hundred and fifty instructors and I4,000 students.

The work of Northern Baptist among Negroes is carried on by the American Baptist Home Mission Society. This society in the last forty years has spent about $4,000,000 in educational work, and is spending now $140,000 a year in educational and mission work. It maintains and aids thirty-two schools in all of which thirteen are high schools and eight with additional college departments. In these schools there are 342 teachers, and 7,746 students (these are statistics of 1907); the value of school property $1,576,450, the students pay $42,000 a year in tutition and Negro churches and individuals $27,000 a year.

The workof the Presbyterian for Negro education is carried on through the Board of Missions for Freedmen, which represents work begun as early as 1864. The church property used and owned by the Board is worth $670,000 besides $122,000 invested in funds. There are the following schools: one college preparatory school, five girl schools, thirteen boarding schools, and ninety-five graded schools or in all 114 schools. 13,776 pupils attend these schools. The patrons of the schools paid in $72,000 in addition to $72,229 contributed by the Board.

The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church among Negroes is done through the Freedmen's Aid and Southern Educational Society, which was organized in August, 1866. This society had in 1904-05, twenty-four institutions; including one theological school, three medical schools, ten schools with college and preparatory departments, and eleven academies. These institutions had 409 teachers, 7,924 students and property valued at $1,352,258. Between August 1866 and June 30, 1905 the society had expended for educational work in the South chiefly among Negroes, but partially among whites $7,800,000. Students pay about $90,000 a year in tuition at present; 200,000 pupils have been instructed in all, of whom 3,000 entered the ministry, 12,000 have become teachers, 800 have become physicians, pharmacists and dentists.

Negro churches also support schools: the African Methodists spend $70,000 a year on twnety-five schools with 3,700 pupils. They have $500,000 in school property. The Colored Methodists have five schools, and the Zion Methodists nine schools. The latter collect $17,000 a year for their schools and have $134,950 in school property.

The Negro Baptist have one hundred and seven school, with property valued at $737,377, and expenditures in 1906 amounting to $148,883.50. They have 16, 664 students enrolled.

The most prominent Negro Schools are five colleges, with preparatory and other departments:

Howard University
Fisk University
Atlanta University
Wilberforce University
Virginia Union University.

Nine High and Industrial schools, with higher work:

Talladega, Alabama
Tuskegee, Alabama
Brick , North Carolina
Lincoln, Pennsylvania.
Straight, Louisiana
Biddle, North Carolina
Hampton, Virginia
Claflin, South Carolina

Three high and Industrial schools for girls:

Spellman, Georgia
Scotia, North Carolina
Hartshorn, Virginia

Four Professional schools:

Howard University (Medicine, Law and Pharmacy)
Gammon (Theology)
Meharry (Medicine and Pharmacy)

Gammon, Brick, Meharry, Tuskegee and Hampton are well endowed, Howard and Talladega have some endowment. The rest have small funds.

I. The Peabody fund of $2,000,000 given in I867 and I869. The income of this fund has gone principly to the education of the whites, but a small part has provided teachers, institutes and schools for Negroes.

2. The John F. Slater fund of $I,000,000 given in I882. The income of this fund has been given exclusively to Negro schools and more especially to Industrial schools.

3. The Danile Hand fund of $I,500,894.25, given to the American Missionary Association in I888 for educating needy Negro students.

4. The Jeanes Fund of I,000,000 was given by Miss Anna T. Jeanes and the income goes to Negro rural education.

There now remain the following one hundred and twenty-seven private institutions for Negroes, including certain State aided schools:

Besides the private schools there is in the South a separate Negro public scool system. The governments of the Southern States which survived the war made few attempts to establish publicschoolsystems, particularly so far as Negroes were concerned. The especially feared idleness and social revolution on the part of the blacks, and sought to keep them in serfdom. Alabama, for instance, declared " stubborn or refractory servants" or those "who "loiter away their time" to be vagrants, who could be hired out at compulsory service by law, while all Negro minors, far from being sent to school, were to be "apprenticed," preferably to their father's former " masters and mistresses."

The enfranchisement of the Negro changed this: The so-called "carpet-bag" governments, which under the sway of the army and the Freddmen's Bureau succeeded the State governments at war time, have undoubtedly many sins to answer for. Supported by ignorant and unlettered Negroes, and led in many cases by unscrupulous Northerners and Southerners, they were extravagant and funny. And yet we must give them credit for what they did well, and certainly, as Albion W. Tourgee says: " They instituted a public school system in a region where public schools had been unknown."

There have been enrolled in the Negro publicschools in the South the following children:

In I905-06, 55.77% of the Negroes five to eighteen years of age were enrolled in school, and of these 60.98% were in daily attendance. There were I29 public high schools(53 of thes being in Texas and Missouri)with 89I teachers and 45,037 students. To these may be added I27 private schools and State schools with 2,057 teachers and 42,500 students. Of these students less than 3,000 are in college courses,736 were studying theology, I25 law,870medicine,I06 denistry, 98 pharmacy, and I86 nurse training.

These public schools, save in the case of a few city systems, have not been paid for by the white tax payers. It has been estimated that in the years I870 to I899 the Negro school systems of the former slave states have not cost the white tax-payers a cent, except possibly in a few city systems.

Cost of Negro Schools, I870-I899	$69,968,67I.48
Estimated total direct taxes paid by Negroes, I870-I899,	$25,000,000.00
Indirect taxes and pro rata share of endowments	45,000,000.00
Approximate total, I870-I899	$70,000,000.00

Of the cost of their private schools also the Negroes bear a large share. The cost of seventy-four leading schools for the last nine years has been a little under $I2,000,000. Of this the Negroes paid 3½ millions in cash and over two millions more in work or about 45% of the total cost.

The result of this education on the illiteracy of the Negro has been as follows:

Negroes ten years of age and over
	% of Illiteracy.
I870	79.9%
I880	70.0 %
I900	44.5 %

At present probably two thirds of the Negro Americans can read and write. Further results can be seen in the occupations of Negroes, the spread of organized effort, the publication of books and newspapers, and the appearance of men and women of distinction.

The above information has been gathered chiefly from the reports of Missionary societies, the reports of the United States Bureau of Education, the reports of the Freedmen's Bureau, and Atlanta University publication No.6, and numbers8 and I2.

in fine, rich and poor. How did it all come about? Is it simply the reward of merit, the Good and Thrifty gwowing rich and the Wicked and Lazy growing poor? Not quite.

The measurable equality of wealth in 1815 existed side by side with other and important inequalities of which the greatest was that between House Servant and Field Hand. The colored House Servant had some education by contact, some ready money, some saleable skill, some powerful friends, and very often enough white blood to make him look like something different from the Negro problem even if he wasn't. He quickly began to transform himself.

By becoming a public instead of a private servant - a caterer, a hotel waiter, a dressmaker, the Negro began to receive regular wages as his field brother of the South had for some time; as an artisan he hired his own time instead of his master's, and as a city going laborer he got money instead of rations. The field hand remained a slave or ran away to the city or rose slightly as a share-cropper.

The first definite step was toward real property, the buying of a little city home - or reaching back to the country from the city to buy a forty acre farm from bankrupt whites. The Negro bought shanties in the city slums and outskirts and poor land in the country, but he bought both rapidly; but there appeared checks. The Negro farmer owning his land was a menace to the serf system and he met opposition in the shape of lawless aggression, intimidation, difficulty in getting markets. He kept on buying land but more from helpless habit than from far-seeing investment. He owns perhaps million acres today, but his great economic development is not in agriculture. There are large black farmers with tenants and hired hands, with farms of a thousand or more acres - but they are exceptional - they are not typical. The mass of rural Negroes rest on three levels - the countless serfs who note of sharp warning, it is in the face of the present situation in the rural South.

In the midst of a whirling rush of economic development for the last twenty (20) years, which is astonishing even according to American standards, any student of economics knows that the South of today is committing nearly every economic heresy which the whole history of modern industrial development warns nations to avoid and warns them forcibly, and even passionately.

What are the things that modern industry has learned to insist upon? They are, I take it, (1) The personal freedom of the laborer; (2) The education of the masses; (3) The equality of employer and employee before the law; (4) The impartiality of the courts, and (5) The right of the governed to share in their own government.

In the South, and particularly in the rural South every one of these fundamental postulates is being violated, and not only violated, but on those violations there is being built a philosophy of industry and life which is self contradictory and fatal to the development of the broad principles of industrial democracy. I have great sympathy with those amiable souls who, knowing this to be true, believe that present policy demands silence or even glossing over the plain facts. I say I have sympathy with such folk but I am compelled to remember that in the great past the inexorable decrees of truth have held as strongly against the flaterer and the so-called optimist as against the pessimist and the liar.

Everyone is, of course, aware that the reason that the South is building industry so largely on compulsory labor, ignorance, discrimination in the courts, lack of organized justice and disfranchisement is because these weapons are excused by the Negro problem. Permit me to remind the supporters of this argument of two things: First, if they are relying on these ancient and mediaeval weapons to keep all Negroes down, the figures presented here show how futile their efforts are. Second, if they think that the black man is the only sufferer under this policy, they are destined to add to the future an industrial error far greater than that of the past.

To illustrate this, let me point out that the practice of peonage in the rural South where not less than a quarter of a million black laborers are held to service on plantations by force in direct defiance of laws and wise industrial policy, has been buttressed by a system of statutes and administration which applies to all rural labor, black and white, and which makes a body of legislation positively astonishing in its reactionary and mediaeval aspect. The contract labor laws, the vagrancy laws, the permissible debt manipulation by book accounts, the discredited "company stores system", make a body of law which carries force and fraud on its very face, and yet which covers a large part of the rural South. Where else in a modern industrial land could a girl of fourteen (14) accused by the landlord's bookkeeping of receiving an advance wage of $7.00 and refusing to carry out farther her contract to pick cotton, be fined $75.00 or twelve months in the chain gang? Yet this is precisely the case that is today before the courts of Georgia, and this is the kind of victim that is being educated in crime all over the South. In every modern industrial system either the laborer has his unfinished product to dispose of, or if the capitalist retains it, the laborer is given a quit claim in wages, which money is absolutely his. Yet in the rural South such wages are characterized as money "advanced" to the laborer, ignorance, intimidation, and a legal contract worse than any allowed elsewhere in the civilized world - a contract which binds the laborer, his wife and his children, hand and foot; which makes them criminals if they stop work; which makes the landlord the judge of the value of the work, and puts the sale and handling of the crop into his hands; and which renders the landlord not only landlord, but practically judge, sheriff, executioner, owner, and storekeeper. Wages are not paid, food and clothes are doled out and charged for at advances of from 25 to 75 per cent over cost; no written accounts are kept and no accounts are rendered, and once a year the tenant is given a bald statement of his balance.

The result is migration to the small towns, widespread arrest for "vagrancy" and breaking of contracts, and great bitterness and discouragement. The region becomes a center of mob rule--- two-fifths of the Negroes lynched in the United States for thirty years, have been killed in or near this region. The Arkansas riot was only a recent variation of this lawlessness, following an attempt to bring the landlords into court. Those who go to the small towns drive out the better placed workers to the cities. From the cities, the colored men have poured and are still pouring into the North, where they tend to become a docile mass of strike-breakers.

Thus, the Black Belt and its peonage is a source of unrest which will never allow the labor problem in the United States to be settled on a basis of justice and fair wage. Moreover, the political power of the Black Belt makes and unmakes Presidents, and rules the United States Congress.

Today the Negro is a recognized part of the American government; he holds 9,000 offices in the executive service of the Nation, besides furnishing four regiments in the army and a large number of sailors. In the State and municipal civil service he holds at least 10,000 other offices, and he furnishes 100,000 of the 900,000 votes which rule the great States of the North and West .

In these nament ye ars the Negro has re-learned the lost art of organization. Slavery was the absolute denial of initiative and responsibility. Today Negroes have 35,000 chur ch edifices worth $56,000,000, and controlling nearly 4,000,000 members. They raise themselves $7,500,000 a year for these churches.

There are 200 private schools and colleges managed and almost entirely supported by Negroes, and other public and private Negro schools have received in forty years $45,000,000 of Negro money in taxes and donations. Five millions a year are raised by Negro secret and beneficial societies, which hold at least $6,000,000 in real estate. Negroes support wholly or in part over 60 old folks' homes and orphanages, 30 hospitals, and 500 cemeteries. Their organized commercial life is extending rapidly, and includes all branches of the smaller retail businesses and forty banks.

Above and beyond this material growth has gone the spiritual uplift of a great human race. From contempt and amusement they have passed to the pity and perplexity of their neighbors, while within their own souls they have arisen from apathy and timid complaint to open protest and more and more manly self-assertion. Where nine-tenthd of them could not read or write in 1859, today two-thirds can; they have 200 papers and periodicals, and their voice and expression are compelling attention.

II. What the Negro has got to demand today, is not so much recognition of exceptional talent, as recognition of the Negro masses as part of of the mass population of the land, with the right to demand protection from low wages, unemployment, sickness and old age insecurity, not simply as a boon to himself but as a help to the nation.

I2. How now does present Negro leadership see and recognize this new orientiation of aim? This brings us to the crux of the present Negro problem:

I4. There emerges a new search for leadership in the various Negro groups, which endangers the ~~el~~ leadership of property and education, and the aristocracy of ~~the~~ successful. ~~It~~ many seeks to install ~~a new~~ leadership, which would try to ignore the color bar, and cutting across race lines, unite the black and white, poor and disfranchised, in a common labor movement toward a new industrial democracy. This seems so natural and logical to ~~the new leadership, black and white,~~ them now that they have nothing but contempt and suspicion for those who cannot see the color bar thus easily ~~abolished~~ ignored. Every Negro of any prominence or profession who does not rush into the new alliance is accused of selling out to Capital or sacrificing his people to his own ease or ambition.

I5. The trained thoughtful, educated natural leaders of black folk, ~~are~~ are thus gradually being forced into ~~two~~ three groups: one group clings to the ideal of the past and still sees salvation for the Negro in America in accumulating wealth and saving, in business enterprise, and the training of talented men. They withdraw physically & mentally as far as possible from the poor & criminal and seek whenever opportunity offers, alliance & confidence with white middle class voters. They do not see believe in the threatened collapse of capitalism and the difficulty if not impossibility of black men being accorded a fair field in industry, and above all of the possibility of giving a fair chance to ability of any color under present industrial organization.

I6. ~~The other~~ A second group of Negro leaders is rushing into the labor movement ~~or the communist agitation~~, only to find themselves faced by the color bar in a new guise: white labor in America has been nurtured on the color line. One of the main objects of the A.F.of L. has always been and still is to monopolize skill, by excluding any group of workers who might compete. Negroes were almost universally liable to this discrimination. Even in the new I.C.U. the ~~laborers~~ union members also have been trained in color prejudice, and for the most part receive Negroes only in self-defense (and with ill-concealed dislike which is shown by discrimination in union ranks). This calls for inner organization and vigilance among Negroes to protect themselves after they are in the union-- i.e. a new black labor leadership (fairly when their blight becomes impossible). The ~~Communistic~~ Communists have met the labor attitude by boldly throwing down the color bar. They have suffered by this tactic, and part of the insane fury often displayed against Communism in the United States, is because it challenges not one but two deep-seated beliefs of America: Capitalism and the inferiority of the Negro. This makes clear-sighted ~~black~~ judgment of the program of communism by Negroes doubly difficult. Even ~~capitalist-~~ black conservatives with capitulatory leanings must often stand dumb, in the face of the communistic attack on the color bar. The result is that many exellent Negro organizations, like the Negro Congress, is hog-tied when it essays to consider any program for the Negro, by the communistic dogma, that there is but one program for all: the Revolution.

I7. ~~If~~ Nevertheless a third type of Negro leadership is painfully emerging: it declared that the older plan of Negro salvation was defective in its endeavor to follow the path of American capitalism in order to achieve the economic emancipation of the Negro race in America and the world. ~~They~~ He go further and asserts that education-- the training of a talented tenth for leadership, is not in itself sufficient, unless that training ~~is free to~~ inculcates a new economic orientation such as ~~which which~~ is today arising in the most advanced culture lands; and ~~is designed to~~ That this must furnish the Negro, a new plan of economic and cultural emancipation, adapted to his peculiar situation.

I8. This new leadership, while cordially recognitizing ~~all that~~ what Russia undoubtedly has done to fight race prejudice; and ~~all that~~ what Communism in America, has done to obliterate the color bar in group action; asserts that nevertheless, the plight of the Negro is too desperate for him to accept without ~~measurment or~~ most careful examinatio, any ready-made and mechanical social formula as a panacea for his ills. As a prime and continuous victim of force, war and revolution, the Negro ~~will not~~ refuse to assume without proof that further and deliberate upheaval will automatically cure the world's ills, or are always inevitably necessary for the beginnings of fundamental reform ~~and~~ this new Negro leadership siicks to this truth, dispite the patent fact that those who applaud ~~him for~~ it are mainly interested in using ~~his~~ black pacificism for reaction.

19. These thinkers cannot fail to recognize that much of the Negro's educational and other opportunities have come from capitalists and investors. Their motives may have been often profit through encouraging labor competition-- but for this the laborers have their submission to prejudice to thank. Onthe other hand these leaders refuse to let either their obligation to philanthropy ~~xxxxxxxxxxx~~ or their resentment at the past attitude of union labor cloud or prejudice their clear vision of the future aims of the Negro as a predominating labor group.

24. This group wishes to unite with forward thinking groups the world over in a new frank program of race relations. This program asserts the right of black folk to survive and progress, not in rivalry nor opposition to the balance of mankind, but in alliance and conjunction and cooperation with all men. It declares that the basic problem of mankind is not one of equality of all men or absolute likeness or uniformity of body or soul. So long as Negroes were regarded as sub-human and not entitled to human treatment. it was necessary vehemently and passionately to assert the essential equality of all men. Today science acknowledges one human family, with wide differences, between groups and between individuals in groups. What men must contend for today is the right to be different, and build on this difference, a wide human culture, ignoring minor questions comparative value of trait.

25. This group insists that their is no inconsistency in a ~~group~~ minority and ~~mankind~~ mankind both wishing the best and highest, and pursuing it together by common effort and mutual respect. Only the assumption thatthe highest good of most men depends on the degradion of others is absolutely inadmissable. The criminal, the sick, the sub-normal need special social treatment, but that for their uplft an developement, not their degradation or use by others for ~~my~~ private advantage or profit our jobs and our reputations, and looking over our shoulders for spies. It would be interesting to know how many of us here tonight are noted in the files of the FBI as persons who will bear watching. Above all we know that the world today is in sight of the most horrible of three horrible wars, even nine out of ten of the world's peoples are passionately against war.

A parellel situation may be seen in the Thirty Years War which ruined Europe for a generation and set back the clock of civilization for centuries. Then people fought over religion, over the ultimate interpretation of the universe, of which they necessarily knew nothing, and yet for that very reason they murdered and destroyed the more vindictively. As children they had imbibed dogma rather than science, so that as men they fought and did not know what they were fighting about. So with us: for three centuries we have given our thoughg, ingenuity and energy to technical conquest of the physical universe. Our sucess has been miraculous and driven us mad with pride of power. But since the beginning of our era; since the Industrial Revolution, based on American Negro slavery, has made white Europe arbiter of the destiny of the World wise men have warned that wealth woud choke civilization, unless we rationalized and controlled its production and distribution. This wisdom has been deliberately ignored. It has not been taught in our schools save by exception nor mentioned often in our pulpits. Those men today who are swearing before God that they never advocated changing our industrial system from its present contradictions and injustice to something better, should remember that in that case they are the only men of sense and insight inthe last 300 years who have not advocated revolution even reform in our industrial system. The passionate cry for reform did not begin with Karl Marx, nor will it end with Joseph Stalin. It cannot in the long run be murdered by war nor scared to death by witch hunts. It will endure as long as civilization endures because it is founded on science and justice

In that town where I was born, we did not mention in the schools the fundamental facts concerning wealth and property, income and wage. We left our children to grope for ways of earning a living and guess at economic justice. The best of the growing generation were forced to go away to find careers, so that the continuity of the towns life was broken. We thought of this beautiful and rich valley as provincial and offering no balance and believed that only in New York and Chicago did men really live. We surrendered farm and hill to city summer visitors and made money fleecing them in a valley where civilization, the simple life, with science and art might have flourished; and where above all men could have taught men that life was more than meat and the body more than raiment. But

But mention of such an ideal ~~xxxxx~~ on Main Street, today would set all the lo loafers, rich and poor, into gale~~s~~ of laughter. They are ~~s-t-r~~ with us to put Russia in its place; to refute Lenin and Karl Marx ~~xxx~~ of whom they know nothing, in their places. They ~~wa-n-t~~ with Genreal Eisenhower ~~to~~ "lick the world" and ~~and~~ with Barney Baruch, the great manipulator of Copper, to raise and army by forced draft, not only to re-conquer China, but to put down civil war in New York, started by advocates of Peace and fomented by the entire monopolized press of the nation.

For this town and for the nation and world, there is but one cure the Truth, taught in our schools, learned by the lost art of reading and spread by men who dare think and think again.

To root out Communism, whatever else may be

Black America is beginning to be a thing worth reckoning with.

But it is in knowledge and comprehension of the meaning of life and the technique of modern life that the most momentous change has come. For the first time in the modern world there stands a great group of black people who are thinking and acting in modern ways and demanding more and more articulately treatment of modern men. Despite every effort to ignore and oppress them, they are daily counting for more in the nation. It is impossible to-day for America to think or work or write, make music or dream dreams without taking into serious account 10,000,000 descendants of men freed by the Emancipation Proclamation.

Some folk assume that the very fact that this question of the place and treatment of black folk will not dawn is proof of the failure of the essential ideal back of emancipation. Not so. If the Negro, incapable of modern freedom, had sunk to the place where it was freely and confidently predicted he would fall, there would have been peace and quiet where there is now turmoil and friction. Friction means motion. It is the steady upward movement of millions that makes segregation ordinances, effort to force Negroes out of execlusive resdential sections, fear and fury ofer the power of the ballot, wrath over political planks and wild rantings on inter-marriage.

It is the fact that Negroes are rising and the absence of any general retrogression that forces the question to the fore: What place must be accorded colored men in the world of to-morrow? Yesterday colored men were given partial Emancipation. To-morrow they will take complete Freedom. Shall their second emancipation of the dark majority of men be in accordance with the enlightened ideals of Peace and Good Will or must men in the future as in the past claw and scratch and murder in order that the human spirit may be free.

West today, 2,000,000 ore more Negroes, while the Negro population of the Sout has increased but little, remaining at about 9,000,000.

The proportion of Negroes in the various states varies greatly. There is not a single state in which Negroes do not live, although there are very few in states like New Hampshire and North and South Dakota.

On the other hand, they formed in 1920 a majority of the population of South Carolina and Mississippi, and from 25 to 50 per cent of the population of the District of Columbia, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Arkansas, and Louisiana. Other states with from 10 to 25 per cent, were Delaware, Maryland, Tennessee and Texas. In the South Atlantic and South Central states the Negroes formed from between 20 and 30 per cent of the population and from 2 to 3 per cent in the Middle Atlantic and North Central states.

The recent migration has been chiefly to cities; and New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Indianapolis, Detroit, Cleveland, St. Louis and Kansas City have received a large influx.

NEGRO VOTERS IN PIVOTAL STATES URBAN DWELLERS

The Negro population in practically every one of the states listed above is concentrated in one or more cities of each state and, more, in specific areas of each city as a general rule. This circumstance will enable reaching these voters with a minimum expenditure of effort and money and with a much smaller number of workers and of meetings that would be the case with any other racial group.

For example, in New York State, the majority of the Negro vote is concentrated in New York City and most of that in Harlem. In Illinois there are 180,000 Negro voters and of that number 129,460 are resident in Chicago, most of them in three wards on the South Side of Chicago. In Missouri approximately seventy-five per cent of the 125,000 Negro voters of the state are located in St. Louis and Kansas City. Baltimore holds within its boundaries not only the vast bulk of the Negro voters of Maryland but is as well the center of Negro thought and influence in that state. In West Virginia 7,000 of the 45,000 Negro voters of the state live in Charleston; in that city are most of the colored men and women who set the pace in thought and action among Negroes of the state. In Ohio Cleveland and Columbus, cultivated insensively, will influence not only those cities but whatever is done there will radiate to Negroes throughout the state. In Virginia, Richmond Negroes will swing both in of the State of Maryland is to provide separate schools for the white and the colored. Johns Hopkins University is in receipt of a considerable appropriation from the State and it seems to us on this account we would not be authorized to depart from the general policy of the State."

Prof. Spingarn commenting on this, says that until the State contributes substantially to some colored university (does it?) Johns Hopkins ought to admit some colored men even assuming its obligation to abide by the educational policy of the State from which it gets its funds.

The fact is, the Southerner has given, given until it hurts, for education; given liberally, according to his lights. But his lights are rather dim. He thinks that he is generous for providing what education he does for the Negro, who pays no taxes, quite overlooking the fact that ten million Negroes do not live in a void nor exist on air alone. The landlord gets his tax money from the rent; the retailer does not pay taxes from his private income, but figures it in ih the cost of what he sells. The ultimate consumer pays - and the Negro is an ultimate consumer.

The Negro is also a worker - and not always an efficient one. I have often wondered whether the fact that the richer states have better school facilities is altogether a relation of - cause - riches, effect, schools; whether or not the mere fact that the people of the state are better educated does not to some extent make them more efficient at raising the per capita wealth. The Negro who, when asked if he wished to earn a quarter, replied "No suh, I has a quattuh," was unspoiled. His wants were few and simple. Therefore, he did not work much, nor did he buy much. The story neglects to state whether he had the advantage of an education.

In fact, the Southern farmer often neglects to fertilize his fields. The outlay is too much, a waste of money. The result is, that his crop is less. He neglects to fertilize the minds of the workers, white or black; the result is cheaper labor, but less efficient. When the South realizes that education is not a work of charity, but a necessity to the well being of the state, they will find that it is not a question of how much they can afford to pay for schools, but how much it will cost to be without them. Public schools, high schools, colleges, and public libraries are a necessity to a civilized state; these facilities for all are a necessity. When the country was in physical danger in war, no price was too great to pay for defense. But ignorance, and its train of allies, inefficiency, ill health, and lawlessness, are as great a menace as any foreign foe. The Negro question, the menace of the colored race, is in reality, the question of the education of the Negro, the menace of the ignorant Negro. And it is a question of color because the Negro is, as a rule, less educated than the white. The uneducated white man is also a menace to the peace and integrity of the nation.

In stating the necessity of schools of higher learning for the colored race, it must not be overlooked that the need is not for college INSTEAD of schools of other kinds, but for colleges AND other schools. The college is dependent upon the lower schools Without adequate primary schools, high schools and grammer schools, a college cannot exist. However, it must not be overlooked that if the colleges need the other schools, the other schools need the colleges no less. The training of teachers is one of the most necessary functions of the college. The high schools, without college trained teachers, are inefficient at the best.

Many writers have agreed that the Negro needs, not college but industrial and agricultural schools, similar in type to Tuskegee and Hampton. This is akin to arguing that a field, to produce a good crop, needs cultivation, instead of water and fertilizer. Tuskegee, without its college trained teachers, could not exist. It is doubtful if it would have been founded, had Booker T. Washington had no education above secondary grade. Among the schools it is strictly true that the good of one is the good of all. The lower schools, whose necessity is unquestioned, could not exist without colleges, and degenerate where the colleges are not up to standard.

This independence is not confined solely to schools. The South is sadly lacking in what is found in practically every Northern and Western hamlet, public libraries. The schools are not able to inculcate all the necessary habits which students must possess. Mere "book-learning" may be under a cloud, but it is not only true that an illiterate is not able to do college work; it is true that a student who cannot read with ease and facility is a poor student. This facility comes only with practice; the schools teach the method, but the practice is obtained only by a person who finds reading interesting and is able to obtain books. Without the habit of reading widely, the student lacks that intellectual background which is essential for the best results. For many students are severely handicapped in the race for education by that lack.

To be sure, people get along before there were public libraries some even rose to great intellectual heights. We can find an occasional plant thriving excellently in poorly tilled ground, but the farmer who substitutes for the plow the forked stick of his ancestors is due to be disappointed in his crop.

The public library is essential for the proper functioning of the college, as well as for all other schools. It is through the increase of education that the conscious demand for libraries will arise.

But even if a child has before him all the advantages of modern schools and libraries, he will still be handicapped if his home, the strongest influence of his life, has an atmosphere inimical to intellectual ideals. Most of our criminals come from homes where moral training is neglected, and most of our illiterates from homes where culture is lacking. Occasionally brilliant students have arisen from rude and lowly surroundings, but the great majority receive their primary stimulus to learn in a home where the parents also feel that desire. At present, alas, too many of our colored students are advancing in spite of that handicap; we may rest assured that the second generation will, on the whole, surpass the first.

But the cultured family does not evolve from a void. We find most of them, not where schools are lacking, but where they are best. So all the things on which the best functioning of the college and university depend, depend in their turn upon the vigourous development of the college and university. It is a circle, though far from a vicious circle. We may depend on it that anything which aids the lower schools, the public libraries, or the family, will have a good effect on the college. However, assisting the college is the surest way to promote the growth and welfare of these other institutions.

It may seem mockery to ask that the South promote schools, colleges, and public libraries at a cost of double or triple what it now contributes. But it is a necessity. "All that a man hath he will give for his life," and the LIFE of the South is at stake. No price is too dear to pay for justice.

It is true that nations have existed in the past, and perhaps exist at the present, without education. But those of the past are dead, as dead as the dinosaur and diploducus, which possessed size, but a negligible brain. If any such exist at present, they are uncivilized. Perhaps cheap labor promotes the national wealth, allowing the wherewithal for the erection of road houses, jazz resorts, the maintenance of bootleggers and first class burlesque shows. But something more is needed, if life be not mere savagery, however gilded. That something more is the higher life, is education.

The reasons for the building and maintenance of schools are not PRIMARILY material, but in the final analysis, the mere physical existence of the nation depends upon the institutions of learning. Not training for work, to enable the workers to produce more money for the nation, to allow it to obtain more trained workers; But the higher life, the knowledge of the world, the vision which is necessary for a real existence. "Where there is no vision, the people perish."

Wherever a person, be he black or white, is restrained from the free development of his abilities and powers, especially where that development contributes not alone to his own personal well-being but to the good of all, that place is, insofar, uncivilized.

The Negro is, for good or ill, a part of the nation. He may be a menace to the rest of the nation, but if so, the remedy is not in the denial of opportunities to him. His removal from the country, his assimilation by inter-breeding with whites, have been discarded as remedies, and would nowhere be seriously proposed. Even more absurd is the method of denying him any opportunity to advance. If the Negro be a menace, it is not because of his black skin, nor of any innate qualities, but because he HAS been denied, and is being denied, those opportunities. It is not the college trained Negro who is a menace. Education is not a menace, either to the Negro or to anyone else.

development among whites. Thus, Mr. Washington's program formed but a labor complement to the new and vast industrial organization of white capitalists. Foreseeing an increasingly industrial South, these carefully sought to provide there a closed reservoir of docile, satisfied common labor, with a skilled and semi-skilled group of black artisans, who wouldbe outside the labor unions, and able and willing to restrain union demands. This program met only partial success, chiefly because a politically disfranchised labor class, with meager education, could not compete with the rising political power, self-assertion and ambition of the poor-white South, as it developed after the Civil War.

When the Booker T. Washington experiment was at its height, there came among us who represented at the time the youth movement, a revolt which made demands for higher education and for the recognition and training of a Talented Tenth. Far from this being a mistake or a program of reaction, it was, as we foresaw, our only salvation. We did not oppose the preparation of the Negro for industry. But we asked who would lead Negro labor? Could we depend helplessly on white capital and capitalistic philanthropy? Where in our own group was the trained and educated leaders being prepared for the future? We opposed the placing of the leadership for our development in the hands of white capitalists and the refusal to train black men in modern culture, who, when the time came, could lead the Negro people out of the difficulties which we knew would come.

Today, our program has been partially fulfilled. We have the educated men; but its complete fulfillment will only come when this educated group sees that its duty is not simply to be cultured, but to supply the very leadership for economic and spiritual emancipation which the present crisis demands. The urge to do this, is today hindered by the absurd Negro philosophy of Scatter, Suppress, Wait, Escape. That is, our educated young leaders think that because the Negro problem is not in evidence where there are few or no Negroes present, this indicates a way out! They think that the problem of race can be settled by ignoring it and suppressing all refererence to it. They think that we have only silently to wait for the white people to settle the problem for us; and finally and predominantly, they think that the problem of twelve million Negro people, mostly poor, ignorant workers, isgoing to be settled by having their more educated and wealthy classes gradually and continually escape from their race into the mass of the American people, leaving the dregs to sink, suffer and die.

There were some efforts to distinguish between degrees of white blood but usually these were based crudely on mere skin color. In the new psychological tests, results are equally indeterminate. Strong, Philipps, Yerkes and Brigham, are sure that intelligent tests prove the inferiority of the Negro race, while Herskovits, Reuter, and Bagley disagree. Much depends on how the tests are given and by whom. Also, there has been some suppression of results. Louisville, Kentucky has never published the results of the intelligent tests for whites and colored children. The charge comes from responsible circles that the results did not "come out right." One may fairly conclude with M. S. Viteles of the University of Pennsylvania:

"From among these varied conclusions it is possible for anyone interested in the problem of Negro-white differences to choose one which best suits his particular bias. The varied character of the findings themselves and the difficulties of interpretation suggest extreme caution in generalizing on differences between the Negro and the white." (p. 175. The American Negro.)

With regard to the educational achievements of Negro and mulatto children, Charles H. Thompson of Howard University concludes:

"That the doctrine of an inherent mental inferiority of the Negro is a myth unfounded by the most logical interpretation of the scientific facts on the subject produced to date." (p. 208. The American Negro.)

in a rural community in West Virginia, Herskovits concludes that:

Class	Number of Individuals	Percent of Total
Unmixed Negro	342	22.0%
Negro and Indian	97	6.3%
Negro and White	798	50.8%
Negro, White and Indian	314	20.9%

"When, therefore, we speak of American Negroes, we speak of an amalgan and not of Negro in its biological sense. The American Negro is forming a definite physical type with a vary ability as low as that of the populations from which it has been derived, and perhaps lower. They are a homogeneous population despite the fact that they are greatly mixed." (M. J. Herskovits, "The American Negro".)

The census estimate of 85% pure Negro is not correct. There is a large infiltration of Indian blood in the Negro race, amounting, perhaps, to 29%. (M. J. Herskovits, Anthropometry of the American Negro, p. 279.)

No other careful studies of mulatto physique have been made, although Atlanta University (Publications No. 11.) brought together much interesting data. Most American students have the curious habit of studying Negroes in America indiscriminately without reference to their blood mixture and calling the result a study of the Negro race. This method invalidatesmuch of the anthropological and psychological data collected during the World War.

There were some efforts to distinguish between degrees of white blood but usually these were based crudely on mere skin color. Assuming, then, that most recent measurements and tests of American Negroes are for the most part studies mainly of mulattoes with a minority of full-bloods, we have these results: the measurements of physique have been summarized by W. M. Cobb in his "Physical Constitution of the American Negro". He declares that the American Negro "is forming a type intermediate between the parent Negro, white and Indian stocks in those superficial traits which are differential race characters....

"In fundamental bodily characters and developmental patterns, the American Negro is identical with other types of modern man." (W. M. Cobb, "The Physical Constitution of the American Negro".)

In the psychological tests, results are equally indeterminate. Strong, Philipps, Yerkes and Brigham, are sure that intelligence tests prove the inferiority of the Negro race, while Herskovits, Reuter, and Bagley disagree. Much depends on how the tests are given and by whom. Also, there has been some suppression of results. The varied character of the findings themselves and the difficulties of interpretation suggest extreme caution in generalizing on differences between the Negro and the white." (p. 175. There long persisted a legend born of slave propaganda that people of mixed blood were less fertile than the parent stocks. Davenport and others declare that there isno support for this notion. There is no lack of fecundity in Negro-white crosses nor deficit viability. It isnot generally true that hybrids between whites and blacks are relatively infertile. Some such hybrids show an especially high fecundity.

So much for our knowledge of the extent of race mixture in the United States, and of its physical results. Its social results are in violent dispute. As a matter in the body politic have expressed their wishes and sufferings. The result has been a smaller or greater balancing of their conflicting interests. The appearance off new interests and complaints means disarrangement and confusion to the older equilibrian. But this is not in itself evil. — it is the inevitable preliminary step to that larger equilibrium in which the interests of no human soul will be neglected. They will not, surely, be all fully realized but they will be recognized and given as full weight as the conflicting interests of others will allow. The problem of government thereafter will be to reduce this necessary conflict of human interests to the minimum.

From such a point of view one easily sees the strength of the demand for the ballot on the part of certain disfranchised classes. When women ask for the ballot they are asking not a privilege but a necessity. You may not see the necessity; you may easily argue that women do not need to vote. Indeed the women themselves in considerable number may feel the same. Nevertheless they do need the ballot. They need it to right the balance of a world sadly awry because of its brutal neglect of the rights of women and children. With the best will and knowledge no man can know womens' wants as well as women themselves. To disfranchise them is deliberately to turn from knowledge and grope in ignorance.

So too with American Negroes: The South continually insists that a benevolent guardianship of whites over blacks is the ideal thing. They assume that white people not only know better what Negroes need than Negroes themselves, but are anxious to supply those needs. As a result instead of knowledge they grope in ignorance and helplessness. They cannot "understand" the Negro, they cannot protect him from cheating and lynching and in general instead of loving guardianship, we see anarchy and exploitation. If the Negro could speak for himself in the South instead of being spoken for. If he could defend himself instead of having to depend on the chance sympathy of white citizens, how much healthier growth of democracy the South would have.

It is not for a moment to be assumed that enfranchising women would not cost something. It would for many years confine our politics. It would change the composition of parentage and sound life. It would admit to the ballot thousands of

To this definitely pessimistic interpretation of Negro thought there is one equally optimistic note to be added. The ~~con~~ in- clusion of the two aspects is illogical and inexplicable, and yet it is true that the Negro race in America is optimistic and ~~even~~ has not the slightest doubt that in the end it is going to triumph in each one of its demands. No writer, no speaker, no leader, ever suggests that the Negro is going to be submerged and ~~kept~~ held permanently in a caste position. The most pessimistic of Negro thinkers always concludes with his audience that in the end the cause of a universal democracy, which includes black men, must triumph. It is hard to say whence this optimism arises. Certainly, the current facts do not support it. It is only a vague generalization to say that such thinking is the racial characteristic of an exuberant group. This may be a true statement but it is no explanation. I presume that the real cause of Negro optimism is the tremendous strides by which in their own experience or the experience of fathers and grandfathers whom they have known, they have accomplished such extraordinary things. For this reason, probably no accomplishment seems too extraordinary in the reasonable future. At the same time, there creeps in continually today a new element. The faint foretaste of a willingness to hopeless sacrifice, ~~an o x plight~~ a wild call for the ordeal of blood in the very face of the impossible; all of the world-old dreams of imolation, hari-kari, and the "voice without reply." sight of Seers, the opinion of the majority and the traditions of the past.

Here then is a group of people in which every one of these great sources of inspiration is partially crippled: the family group is struggling to recover from the debaucheries of slavery; the number of the enlightened leaders must necessarily be small; the surrounding and more civilized white majority is cut off from its natural influence by the color line, and the traditions of the past are either lost or largely traditions of evil and wrong.

Anyone looking the problem squarely in the face might conclude that it was unjust to expect progress or the signs of progress until many generations had gone by. ~~And yet already there are among Southern Negroes signs of awaking which no honest man can ignore.~~ Indeed, we must not forget that those people who claimed to know the Negro best, freely and confidently predicted during the abolition controversy:

1. That free Negroes would not and could not work effectively.
2. That the freedman who did work, would not save.
3. That it was impossible to educate Negroes.
4. That no members of the race gave signs of ability and leadership.
5. That the race was morally degenerate. ~~And yet Today The Negro~~

Not only was this said - it was sincerely and passionately believed by honorable men who had lived with the Negro three hundred years. And yet today ~~stripped of wealth and reputation what has~~ the Negro [redacted] in one generation: [redacted] forms the chief laboring force of the most rapidly developing part of the land.

1. Among a people deprived of guiding traditions, they may be furnished trained guidance in matters of civilization and ideals of living.

2. A people whose family life is not strongly established must have put before them brought home to them the morals of sane and sanitary living.

3. The mass of Negro children must have the keys of knowledge put into their hands by good elementary schools.

4. The Negro youth must have the opportunity to learn the techinal skill of modern industry.

All these forms of help are important. No one of them can be neglected without danger of increasing complications as time flies and each one of them are lines of endeavor in which the Negro cannot be reasonably expected to help himself without aid from others. For instance, it cannot be seriously expected that a race of freedmen would have the skill necessary for modern industry. They cannot teach themselves what they themselves do not know and consequently a legitimate and crying need of the south is the establishment of industrial schools. The public school system is one of the dfoundation stones of free republican government. Negro children as well as other children have right to ask of the nation knowledge of reading, writing and the rules of number together with some conception of the world in time and space. Not one Negro child in three is today receiving any such training or has any chance to receive it and a decent public school system in the south aided by the National government is something that must come in the near future if you expect the race problem to be settled.

Here then are two great needs: public schools and industrial schools. How are schools of any sort established? By furnishing teachers. Given properly equipped teachers and your schools are a foregone success: without them I care not how much you spend on buildings and equipment, the schools are a failure. It is here that Negro colleges like Atlanta University show their fundamental usefulness ~~bases her appeal for aid in her work.~~ Nearly 2/3 of our graduates teach. They are manning the higher grades of the public schools of the south from Carolina to Texas and it is our contention that the teachers of an untaught people need especially rigorous training. That no public school system can be maintained that does not rest upon the Normal school and the college for the training of teachers and teachers of teachers. If this is true in the public schools it is just as true in the industrial schools. The graduates of Atlanta University are today teaching in over 20 industrial schools for such schools need something more than skilled workmen as teachers, they need trained intellects as well as hands and if the college-bred teachers were withdrawn from the Negro industrial schools today nearly every one of them would close their doors.

Atlanta University stands then for the training of teachers and if men expect to have schools in the south they must have taechers to teach them. It is worse than thoughtlessness for a nation to give all its countenance and support to common and industrial schools and neglect the institutions which make the-existence of t he lower schools. possible.

But in my list of ways in which the Negro may legitimately be helped to help himself, I named two other avenues of aid and I named them first because to my mind they are even of more importance than popular education. I mean the moral uplift of a people. Now moral uplift comes not primarily from schools but from strong home life and high social ideals. I have spoken of the Negroes' deficiency in these lines and the reason of that deficiency; Here then is a chance for help - but how? Not by direct teaching because that is often ineffective and it is precluded in the South by the color line. It can be done to my mind only by group leadership: by planting in every community of Negroes black men with ideals of life and thrift and civiliza-tion such as must in time filter through the masses and set examples of moral living and correct thinking to the great masses of Negroes who spend but little of their life in schools. After all the education of men comes but in small degree from sch ools - it comes mostly f rom the fireside, from companionships, from your social set, from the opinion of each indivi little world. This is even more true of the Negro. His world is small He is shut in to himself by prejudice, he has by reason of his poverty little time for school - if then he is to learn he must learn from his group leaders - his daily companions, his social surroundings, his own dark world of striving, longing and dreaming. Here then you must plant the seed of civilization. Here you must place men educated not merely in the technique

And this brings us to the crux of the matter. It is the shame of civilization that the value and respect which races and classes have for each other ~~may~~ should be measured by the amount of profit which one may derive from the other. To maintain ignorance in order to ~~suspect~~ keep the individual in subjection, to uproot without pity religion and custom and to build on suffering the prestige of the favored few, - such alas seems the order of the day.

One would say that Science, Religion and Philanthropy have become the slaves of World Trade and of World Industry. The bodies, the minds, the souls of the natives of the Fiji Islands or of the Congo, no longer are considered but by one gauge, ~~the~~ one estimate of value, that of the Bourse.

The time for such world organization is over. And no matter what precedent in its favor may be drawn from bygone days, the 20th century must consider men other than machines and beasts of burden.

This problem which civilized folk have treated up to this point as an exclusively domestic problem should, always supposing that a solution is actually to receive a favorable encouragement,

Could new railways, cotton mills and department stores by themselves vote? The answer is clear: no, it has not and the reason has been lack of interest in politics and the tyranny of the Majority. Politics has not touched the matters of daily life which are nearest the interests of the people — namely work and wages — or if they have, they have touched it obscurely & indirectly. When voting touches the vital every day interests of all, elections or nominations & elections will call for more intelligent activity.

There still remains however the problem of the Majority.

Consider too the vast unused and misused powers of public servants to obtain ability and genius for the service of the State. If millionaires can buy Science and Art, command the services of State and hold them not only for money but by merit the vast ideal of the Commonweal.

the French in 1908 made similar claims on the opposite side and both countries refused to settle matters until the other one had been satisfied. In 1907 a treaty was submitted by the French by which Liberia was deprived of some of her richest and most prosperous inland districts. She appealed to America but America turned a deaf ear and she had to sign on the dotted line. The English seized the district of Kanre-Lahun by armed force and in the case of both countries there still remain questions of final delimitation of boundary. All this action was, of course, simply the result as felt in Africa, of the partition of Africa as determined on by Europe.

France took the whole of the Liberian hinterland in the Sudan while Great Britain pushed down from the west as far as her shadowy claims could possibly let her and is in a position today to claim still more. And the whole of this drama was based in reality upon the claim that Liberia could not rule or affectively occupy the territory which she in reality owned and that on the other hand, the manifest destiny of Africa was to be ruled by white Europe and that this ruling was a matter of profit and power. To this, practically all the white world assented. But Liberia protested bitterly.

The great Congo Valley with its riotous fertility and slow moving oceans of water was long been a center of human culture of no low order. More than one thousand years ago, perhaps two thousand, the black invaders of the Congo settled in village and plain, absorbed such indigenous inhabitants as they found or drove them deeper into the forest, and immediately began to develop industry and political organization. They became skilled agriculturists, raising in some localities a profusion of cereals, fruit, and vegetables such as manioc, maize, yams, sweet potatoes, ground nuts, sorghum, gourds, beans, peas, bananas, and plantains. Everywhere they showed skill in mining and the welding of iron, copper, and other metals. They made weapons, wire and ingots, cloth, and pottery, and a widespread system of trade arose. Some tribes extracted rubber from the talamba root; others had remarkable breeds of fowl and cattle, and still others divided their people by crafts into farmers, smiths, boat builders, warriors, cabinet makers, armorers, and speakers. Women here and there took part in public assemblies and were rulers in some cases. Large towns were built, some of which required hours to traverse from end to end.

Many tribes developed intelligence of a high order. Wissmann called the Ba Luba "a nation of thinkers." Bateman found them "thoroughly and unimpeachably honest, brave to foolhardiness, and faithful to each other and to their superiors." One of their kings, Calemba, "a really princely prince," Bateman says would "amongst any people be a remarkable and indeed in many respects a magnificant man."

Here it was that in the fifteenth century Portugal came and introduced Christianity, ordained a Bishop and sent black men to Europe to be trained as priests, and hitheragain in the nineteenth century came Henry M. Stanley sent by Leopold of Belgium.

"I am charged, " said Stanley in 1878, "to open and keep open, if possible, all such districts and countries as I may explore, for the benefit of the commercial world. The mission is supported by a philanthropic society which numbers nobleminded men of several nations. It is not a religious society, but my instructions are entirely of that spirit. No violence must be used, and wherever rejected, the mission must withdraw to seek another field." (The Congo, I, Chapter III.)

What was the result? Harris declares that King Leopold's regime meant the death of twelve million natives. "Europe was staggered at the Leopoldian atrocities, and they were terrible indeed; but what we, who were behind the scenes felt most keenly was the fact that the real catastrophe in the Congo was desolation and murder in the larger sense. The invasion of family life, the ruthless destruction of every social barrier, the shattering of every tribal law, the introduction of criminal practices which struck the chiefs of the people dumb with horror--in a word, a veritable avalanche of filth and immorality overwhelmed the Congo tribes."

To this may be added similar stories from the Portuguese colonies, from French Guinea, from the Valley of the Amazon, from the West Indian sugar fields.

The second blow to the theory of colonial enterprise came from unexpected direction. Men thought that retribution might come from a great war between the oppressed and the oppressors of a black and white race struggle. But no; something nearer and more dangerous was the result. After all, colonial theory kept the natives unarmed, or encouraged such jealousies as armed them only against each other, just as today black men hired by Italians are fighting black Abyssinians. But the unexpected crisis came because the profit which arose from black labor was monopolized by certain great colonial powers, like France and England, while Germany and Italy had less or almost none. The jealousy, therefore, over the distribution of colonies and raw material and exploitable colored labor was one of the prime causes that led to the world war and almost overthrew European civilization. Moreover, Europe cannot today escape a second and more terrible threat of a recurrence of the same international greed and jealousy for the same causes. The Treaty of Versailles took colonies from Germany and denied Italy any increase of her barren colonial empire. These two countries, therefore, are determined at every risk to conquer or regain the privilege of exploiting black labor and monopolizing raw material.

Meantime, there is little thought and scarcely a word concerning the exploited laborers themselves. The great labor groups of the world are saying nothing on the matter except in the case of the Russian communists.

And even Russia's frank and open arraignment of colonial exploitation is nullified by the fact that she has no colonies and that in self-defense she must ally herself with colonial powers who propose to maintain colonial imperialism. The great statesmen see nothing but the vague possibility of one step such as was tentatively proposed by Sir Samuel Hoare, namely, [redacted], that possibly the national monopolies of labor and material might be broken down so far as to allow more hogs to get to the trough. But of the world swill that is in the trough, of the many millions of dark workers to whom almost nothing of modern protection for labor and uplift for the laboring classes has been applied, of the future of these folk, no modern statesman has said a single word. The church is dumb, both Catholic and Protestant, philanthropy is dumb, science, physical and social, is voiceless.

There is one path of hope for the colonial peoples. If the mandates of the League of Nations should become real and not a pious farce; that is, if the the League of Nations should take under its active and internal direction, not simply the colonies taken from Germany, but also all colonies and countries where the mass of people are ruled by aliens without voice in their own government and where education, health and social uplift is made distinctly and openly subordinate to private profit, if all such colonies were taken under the protection of a League of Nations, which included the United States and Germany, as well as other leading nations, then a program of peace and decency might be worked out for the glory of the thing now mis-called civilisation. The first step toward any such development should come from the colored people themselves. It should come from a Pan-African and Pan-Asiatic movement, from a great up-surging of the colored world crying, "It is [redacted]" We have followed the path of murder and theft and international jealousy as far as it can be followed without disaster that staggers the imagination. We must begin organised work to rescue the colored races from a situation where they are looked upon as a source of private profit and not human beings capable of contributing to human culture. This is the larger socialism. This is a program of communism that far out-strides anything that even Russia has attempted. This is a program of religion which will make or break the so-called followers of Christ.

We may perhaps more carefully approach this problem, if we consider certain colonies, or so-called colonies as they exist today. We may begin with India, characterized by a vast population, intrically differenciated by race and color, with over 90 percent of illiteracy; ignorance of modern science and technique is wide spread; divided among diverse religions and languages, and with varying degrees of cultural status. Disease is widespread, there is a vast death rate among children and unrest and dissatisfaction concerning the social condition and the political relation both to the British Empire and to the Indian Princes whom the Empire supports. There is no vaster nor more poignant problem which faced the First World War;which developed between the two world wars and which is going to be a major world problem after this war. Does the civilization of Great Britain depend upon the continuance with only slow and gradual change of present conditions in India.

We may turn to a second country: China, which from some points of view might be called an independent country, but which as a matter of fact because of the influence which the West have had for centuries upon the Chinese economy is practically in the colonial status. Here again we have poverty coupled with incessant toil. There are no harder workers in the world than Chinese coolies and yet the wages from their hard labor gives them scarcely enought to eat and to wear; their whole life is hard and unlimited toil. Despite an ancient and valuable culture, their ignorance of the advance of science in the last three centuries is so dismal that their industrial organizations is almost entirely dependent upon Western exploitation; their wide-spread victims of disease. What is said of China and India may be repeated of Indonesia. There to be sure, as in other parts of the Eastern World, Western exploitation is coupled with the exploitation of the Chinese merchant. Here is a vast change of islands with ancient culture, ignorance of modern science, illiterarcy and hard work. The toil of the people is chiefly concentered upon things which they themselves do not use but which are transported abroad, and the kind and aim of their industry is determined by the investments of the Dutch, the British and the Americans. There is some effort at education but among the 80,000,000 Indonesians there are not as many children in school as among the 13 million American Negroes. The revenue from these countries, just as the revenue to Great Britain from India is immense, but the wage paid are so low that poverty is the lot of the average native. Africa tells a similar tale within a difference only in the degree to which the native workers have been pitched into European machine. The African worker has been only partially absorbed into modern industry. He mines gold, diamonds, cooper and tin. He raises vegetable oil and fibers, but still to a degree he lives under his ancient tribal conditions and his broken culture is dominated by the interest of present and future industrial development in the West. The African laborer is consequently poor, illiterate and diseased. He is part of that mass of labor upon whose bent back the civilization of Europe largely rests. The Caribbean area approximates more or less the colonial status. The political domination varies; it is apparently absent in independent countries like the Domenican Republic and Haiti; it is modified in British colonies like Jamaica and Bermuda . Nevertheless the economic organization in Europe, the civilization of the Western World depend upon the work and personal service of West Indians, and the West Indians again are poor with low wage, with inadequate clothing and housing and with wide spread illiteracy. In Central and South America the pattern varies by the fact that home-born elements exploits and rule natives of the land and are the ones who carry on the government and who share in the spoils of exploitation based on European and American investment. The results however upon the Indian, Negro and Latin workers and the mixture of the three, is the same. There is the great mass of desperately poor illiterate and diseased workers whose conditions are the corner stone upon which prosperity and civilization both for South America and Western Europe is built. In the Middle East and the Balkans is something of the same situation. Which means that the majority of mankind are today in poverty,ignorance and disease because the domination of their work and their wage is in the hands of the Europeans or of those who are their own countryman, but share home with foreign spoilers. The interest of those dominated empires, nations and classes are regarded as necessarily involving the degradation of the colonial mass. There is no counteract to this two points of view.

To Europeans the attitude is baffling and easily misleading. China seems inert, ridden with graft and dishonesty, without national spirit and incapable of thoroughgoing reform. The eternal element in China is easily overlooked: the family. The Chinese ancestor-revering, closed and wavering but still unbroken group presents to the outsider an almost impenetrable resistence. Sale of Women, child-labor, inter-marriage, disease, misgovernment, and theft, may disturb but never overthrows this most immortal of human group organizations. It strength lies in the unbreakable grip between parent and child, which insures unity in physical home, in work and defense, communism in property, and in cooperation of every kind. It resists annihilation as grimly as it slows down innovation and reform. It is the long considered child and defense mechanism of a people who have fought tyranny and theft for a thousand years. No reform in China can ignore it and every permanent reform must envisage the family as the chief instrument and immediate object. Up from the family as its extension and instrument for broader efficiency, has grown the guild; the organization of united family and village cooperation for industry, defense and training on a broader scale than is possible for the single family. The two institutions are China. As long as they live she lives. Reform begins with them or it begins not at all.

Comes now the revolution, swinging now toward Communism, now toward a new capitalistic reform. The story of the attempt of Russian communism to spread into the East and to face Europe with a communistic Asia is one of the great sagas of modern times. My friends saw the Chinese University in Moscow in 1928, a marvel of determination and dream amid almost insuperable difficulties: difficulties of language and textbooks, of poverty and the securing of students; and yet a triumph of human education. It was a tremendous undertaking, and opened vistas beyond the far vision of Lenin himself. Not merely capitalistic Europe loomed as the future realm of the Worker, but the Ancient of Days, Asia and Africa, the Regarding British India, I shall quote here from "The White Sahibs in India" by Reginald Reynolds, published by Secker and Warburg in 1937. Reynolds gives documentary evidence for all he says, and this is what he says of British justice in India: "The Rowlatt Acts (India 1919) provided for arrests without warrant and indefinite detention without trial. Where trials took place they could be held in secret and their proceedings were not to be made public. The accused could be kept in ignorance of the names of his accusers and of witnesses against him, with whom he was not to be confronted. No counsel was allowed to the accused if tried under these Acts" . . . . "It would be difficult", Reynolds continues "to find any legislation in Nazi Germany or Fascist Italy to compare with this detailed denial of every accepted principle of justice. The provisions of the Rowlatt Acts show the closest similarity to the proceedings of the Court of the Star Chamber, regarded in seventeenth century England as the epitome of tyranny".

General Dyer admitted before the Hunter Commission that there was no question of his men being attacked. "I had made up my mind," he said, "that I would do all the men to death if they were going to continue the meeting." Asked whether he redirected his fire from time to time where the crowd was thickest, he admitted that he had done so. He had committed this "horrible act", he said, because he "thought it would be doing a jolly lot of good, and they would realize they were not to be wicked." The Hunter Commission estimated 379 persons were killed and 1,200 wounded, though these figures are universally considered in India to be an underestimate. The Hunter Commission was appointed largely because of the investigations already in process by a National Congress Committee, and the necessity of issuing an official statement to counteract the effect of this independent enquiry. Actually the Hunter Report, although its findings were sufficiently damning, has always been regarded in India as "whitewash" . . . The Congress report, issued after that of the Hunter Commission criticized its findings with devastating arguments based upon a mass of evidence which the Government Commissioners had conveniently neglected.

ideal, Haiti has not gone as far as Venezuela or Guatemala, but it is well started.

Of what other people have done, what China and India and Northern Viet Nam are doing to solve such problems, Haiti does not know. And if the Import- Export Bank has its way it will never learn. We have given Haiti some hurricane relief and induced her to match American investment in irrigation. For this we maintain in Haiti a growing group of Americans, civil and military, on good salaries.

Practically every cent the United States gives Haiti is either a loan to be repaid with good interest or a concealed American investment to return huge profit which will be shared with those Haitians who help manipulate the deal. Once we have helped build an economy like this belting the world and based on such principles, the whole structure is bound eventually to sag and fall. This will not be the result of "creeping socialism" or "Communist agression" but ~~from~~ of the failure of Capitalism as we try to practice it.

But Peace in Korea, in Malaya, in Indo-China and many other parts of Asia, Africa and America, does not mean that powerful nations can force their ideologies on weaker peoples. The United States has erected in Southern Korea a state ruled by great land-holders wo with American advice have openly threatened to over-run all Korea. The United Nations without investigating the facts has declared North Korea the aggressor when civil war broke out and delivered her to the military forces of the United States. We want peace in Korea, but we do not want the sort of peace which the United States seeks to impose on black and yellow peoples and we solemly protest to the world against this latest attempt to enslave the dark peoples of the world.

Ever since the first world war, the United States has been eager to rule Asia and Africa as Britain once ruled. It has replaced political rule in the Phillipines by economic and industrial slavery and called this freedom; it has invested billions of capital in the Middle East, Africa and South America, and by industrial and commercial control, [redacted] reduced millions of people to colonial status in all but name.

Whenever we and others have protested and inveighed against this policy, when we have asked full freedom for black Americans and have invoked the trusteeship clauses of the Charter of the United Nations, and called on implementation of promises of independence and autonomy for Discipline and a limited supply of consumers goods; but it leads to long range projects for public welfare and broad social legislation which in time will abolish poverty, ignorance and disease.

The truth of this theory and the validity of the present experimentation depends on peace & freedom

That is what makes our present repression of opinion and expression together with a vast program of world conquest and control, not only unwise but impossible of accomplishment

We cannot conquer and controll Russia and the Balkans, China and Asia

We can with Peace, conference, consultation and good-will work out the best economic programm for the world, which may include much more of American thinking than the Soviets believe possible and much more of Soviet thought than America admits

The Soviets fear war and prepare for war, because in the last generation they have been invaded and attacked by every European and North American nation

We want war because out of war we have gained wealth and power and think by further war we can rule the earth

Once we can assure the Soviets and the Balkans that they need fear no aggression so long as they wish peacefully to work out their theory of social reforms

Once we can assure Americans that they need fear no attempt to compell them to adopt any economic system which their intelligent experiment does not lead them to adopt, then we can have Peace

Then Civilization and economic reform can begin

ON THE NEGRO OR ETHIOPIAN ELEMENT IN EGYPTIAN HISTORY

During the Hyksos invasion and occupancy of Egypt, i.e. in the 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th Dynasties, many of the royal Egyptian families, according to the testimony of the veteran Egyptologist, Sir Flinders Petrie, migrated to Ethiopia and there allied themselves through inter-marriage with the noble and ruling houses of Ethiopia. Later the members of one of these Egypto-Ethiopian families, ruling as vassals of the Hyksos at Thebes, raised the standard of revolt against their Asiatic overlords, and through the aid of Ethiopian soldiers, as the recently discovered Kames Papyrus reveals, expelled the invaders and established the great Eighteenth Dynasty. The recently discovered mummies and the features presented in the statues of some of the principal leaders--Sequenenra, Kamos, Nefertari--in these activities and undertakings show them to have had marked traces of Negro blood. The same is true of subsequent sovereigns of the same line.

DuBois - Return

When this world council assembles I shall lay before it as primary agenda, the following basic principles

The principal of racial equality as proposed by Japan for the covenant of the League of Nations, supported by eleven out of Thirteen votes , but opposed by the United States and Great Britain, and declared defaated by President Woodrow Wilson

The principle of universal eduvation of all human beings, based on the best scientific principles and designed in the shortest possible time to eliminate illiteracy from the world, attain the maximum of human intelligence and eliminate the crime and error due to ignorance

The principle of the abolition of poverty by a immediate and revolutionaty use of known technique to produce goods and make services available so that all men may live decently and all shall labor to the extent of their ability to this end

Africa is always the unexpected. Thus Pedro da Cintra, sailing along the low West African coast in 1462, suddenly saw the Lion Mountain leap and roar to the silver sea. He called these fifty miles of singing headland Sierra Leone, and one sees today that couchant Lion from the ocean, the great twin-humped mountain that comes down close to the waters so contrary to one's preconceived notions of the African coast. All along here, and particularly at Sharbro Island, which lies low, yonder to the right, the slave trade flourished in the eighteenth century until the campaign of Clarkson and Wilberforce, and then in 1787 there began an experiment.

I sense unrest in Freetown. This city of forty thousand people has evidently had waves of prosperity and adversity. Curious chapters of economic history could be dug up here, I am sure; for first the colony was a philanthropy, then a trading company, then since 1808 a Crown colony. Today it falls into two parts, and thereby hangs a long and curved tale.

It all began with the Industrial Revolution of the nineteenth century, and England's far-sighted vision of coming changes in industrial organization.

For a century

it over-ran and held Egypt, then it withdrew into itself, warded off the power of Persia, Greece and Rome and maintained itself until conquered by blacks from the South east. some five hundred years after Christ.

AFRICA & CULTURE

It is the misfortune of black Africa that its modern contact with the world was with Nordics rather than with Asiatics, especially Chinese & Indiasns The cause of this was the African slave trade to America which eventually gave rise to modern private capitalism, based on exploitation of labor and monopoly of land. Modern "Pan-Africa" will revolutionize this with the Arabs. The age of the great Zymbabwe, Randall-Maciver thinks cannot possibly go back beyond the Eleventh Century. Here there centered what is known in history as the Empire of the Monomotapa, as the rulers were called, which came to European knowledge through the development of Sofala.

If the first World war was a war between investors, the second World War was a war between this concept of controlling labor and different ideals of its control. And no sooner had it come than it became a war insensibly between East and West and then a war between colored and white. And into this war which was a war of technique even then more than into the first World War came colored troops taking part.

Considering these facts we face a struggle of racial and cultural groups for equality or autonomy and we must either plan between these groups a future of peace and development or of war and struggle.

I am presenting a plan: autonomy for China, India, Japan and some other colored countries. Then benevolent and scientific guardianship for other colored groups; such guardianship being carefully limited against motives of private profit by equitable distribution of the land, by education, control of all investment by democratic methods. This will involve the restraint of Europe and white America. It will involve for all men freedom of art.

Some many impressions seem to exist present conditions and in Liberia. I take this opportunity of making the situation clear to our many American friends. Liberia has been an independent country since 1847 and naturally it has never considered the surrender of its sovereignty to any nation or organization. On the other hand Liberia has always regarded itself as the natural refuge and center for persons of Negro descent the world over. As a country whose greatest development is just beginning we are not of course, in condition to receive large and miscellaneous numbers of immigrants. Our present need is especially for strong young men trained as artisans engineers and merchants who can bring with them some capital for investment. To such immigrants and their families we offer a vast and rich country waiting for the application of hard work and brains and money. It goes without saying that in this development Liberia respects the integrity of the territory of her neighbors in the same way that they must respect hers. Under no circumstances will she allow her territory to be made a center of aggression or conspiracy against other sovereign states. She proposes to develop Liberia for the Liberians and to live at peace with the rest of the world.

Our alliance with reaction and tyranny through tht world is not deductive theory; by that we would uphold freedom, democratic control and even revolution to emancipate pauperized labor; rather is it our inductive logic that makes us seek first markets for our goods to be found in east Europe, the Middle East and Asisa; and necessary goods to buy cheap like the oil of Iran and the from the Belian Congo IT is then that the "we" who earn wage, bow without question to the ones who own our economy and in exchange for high wage and uninterrupted employment, a national programme which surrenders Greece to corrupt exploitation; finances Iran and tries to buy Chinese coolie labor by giving six billions to Chiang kai Chek.

Amerixxxx The United States is a rich and charitable country. But u its offers of help must be carefully scrutinized by its proposed benefic iaries for under the guise of help often masquerades the attempts of individuals to make money at the expense of poor and undeveloped peop ples. The Marshall plan to help Europe after the First World War was in reality to invest American capital in European entrrprise and keep European labor in control. Much missionary enterprize in Asia and Africa conceived eith the highest motives, has in the past been subverted to providing cheap labor for industry and trade and needlessly disrupting ancient customs adapted to native life.

Today in America a singularly large number of African agencies have arisen and the number of persons interested in Africa has suddenlly growmn in number

~~At the annual meeting of the Progressive Party,~~ Dr. Du Bois presented a proposed platform for the Party, which was in part as follows:

"The American people want Peace. They want neither to conquer the world nor police it. They have no desire to meddle in other peoples affairs, or censor their thought or control their industry. They want to spend the billions now wasting in war on human education and uplift for all men.

"We ask the United Nations to remember that their main object and reason for being is Peace and to this end, we need wider co-operation, greater faith in each other, mutual Disarmament and effort to achieve World Government with Freedom, autonomy and abundance for all peoples.

"We are threatened by no nation. There is no disagreement between us and the Soviet Union which Force can settle or which conference cannot resolve.

"Not by might nor by power; by far-flung armies, navies and aircraft; can we help the world; but by sacrifice and example. ~~As candidate for United States senator from the state of New York, Dr. Du Bois said:~~

"The most sinister evil of this day is the wide spread conviction that war is inevitable and that there is no time left for discussion. It is doubtful if the mass of Americans who accept this judgment realize just what its implications are. War is physical force exercised by men and machines on other men so as to compel submission to the will of the victors. Unquestionably in primitive times there were repeated occasions when such recourse to force was the only path to social progress. But as civilization has progressed and included larger and larger masses of men and portions of the earth, two things have become increasingly clear: one, that the costs of war have become too great for any nation to pay no matter what the alternative; and two: that in war as now carried on, there can be no victorious party. In modern world war all contestants lose and not only lose the immediate causes of strife, but cripple the fundamental bases of human culture.

used by the FBI, and witch-hunting by officials and the press. Communists, Catholics and Pacificists have the same right to think, vote and act, within the law, as other Americans; and injustice in the courts must not be used to punish freedom of belief and legal defense of accused persons.

"We have come out of war a scared, suspicious, money-mad people, without love, faith or hope and with our charity married to profit. We must cease to make science the prisoner of Big Business, government the slave of the army and education the plaything of propaganda. We need desperately a free press."

I began in Paris in 1919 a series of Pan-African Congresses designed to bring the peoles of African descent into consultation for mutual plans and assistance. Such Congresses met in 1919, 1921, 1923 and 1927, in London, Paris, Brusells, Lisbon and NewYork. I tried to a fifth congress in Tunis but was refused permission. I then gave up on account of the depression, the imperialist opposition and the lack of interest among American Negroes. The Africans kept the idea alive and formed National African Congresses in nearly every province. The African trade unionists, meeting in Paris in 1945 revived the idea of a Fifth Pan-African Congress.

material from Albert Kahn, "The Great Conspiracy," and from the records of the trials of the Torgprom in the Soviet Union, also from various Russian histories and from the Soviet Yearbook and from the USSR Encyclopedia.

The Torgprom was organized in [illegible] in the Soviet Union. It was made up of former Czarist bankers, industrialists, and financiers. The name means (in abbreviated form) Russian Trade, Financial, and Industrial Committee. (Torg is an abbreviation for the word for trade; Prom is an abbreviation for the word for industry.)
The Torgprom had British, American French, and German backing. It financed and directed the setting up of the Industrial Party in the Soviet Union (the so-called Ramzin group, of which Ramzin was the leader). Torgprom financed the setting up of the Industrial Party in the Soviet Union underground.

This grouping [illegible] met regularly and set the date of attack on the Soviet Union for 1929, which didn't come off. Poland, Finland, Rumania were to furnish most of the invading troops.

The date was then set forward to 1930. Besides the crisis, another reason given for putting the date forward was French unpreparedness.

The Soviet Union in 1930 began to ferret out the groups responsible inside the S U. It had a trial in 1930, where all this information came out. It had another trial in 1931 against the Menshevik group which was involved. It had still another in 1933 against the Vickers group. This showed the British and Dutch-Shell tie-up with Torgprom.

on war losses:

The only official Soviet estimate was in Stalin's speech of March 12, 1946, in answering Churchill's Fulton speech. He said 7 million Soviet citizens were killed, including both military and civilian losses. This did not include the Far East front, but since the S U was at war there only a few days, the losses must have been small.

Guillaume, the French writer, , writing in 1949, said there were 7 million military deaths, 10 million civilian deaths. Maurice Hindus said 16 to 25 million were killed, counting military and civilian deaths.

on wounded: Stalin gives no figures. Guillaume gives 11,500,000 wounded.

Everyone seems agreed that Stalin's figures on killed are too low.

On property damage: according to the statement of the extraordinary State Commission of 1945 on material damage during W W II, it amounted in rubles to 679.000.000 damage to state property and to individual property of residents.

The list is even more extensive and goes on for many pages. I can copy it out if this is not enough.

The unescapable conclusion derived is, that Dr. McKenzie is an autocrat, a man with no vision, a fossil, who treats grown men whom he has educated as though they are children in knickerbockers. He is domineering, overbearing, unsympathetic and would better be a driver of cattle than an educator of Negro youths of this generation. If he had heard the analysis of the situation of young Simmons, one of his students, he might, perhaps, get an idea into his cranium to the effect that he is no longer dealing with slaves, nor the descendents of slaves, but with freemen who are possessed of every instinct and ambition, conception and vision that any other set of young Americans possess. To educate men and women as Fisk University does, and then to attempt to make puppets of them, bespeaks a narrowness, folly, yea, ignorance of human nature that actually unfits the man who attempts it to teach in such a school much less to be its president. Every sensible man knows, that the president of a university is supposed to incarnate the intellectual ideals, and also to carry the tender and fatherly feelings of love which actuated the founders to establish such a school. The statement of the troubles in the press by the president are the silliest, most puerile efforts to becloud the clear issue of facts.

The daily papers seem to be his agents in the persistent way in which they state his side and hide the real facts. The dailies knew, or could have known, that the officers, last Wednesday night, beat up several of the students, cursing them with vile names without cause, yet not a word of this has been published. It is the same old custom of publishing one side of a contention and then asking for a verdict.

Even the student paper of white Vanderbilt University, Nashville commends this statement in its issue of February 26.

The National Baptist Voice says February 14:

And besides, there are other uglier facts yet unpublished which we do not wish to be called upon to publish nor wish to be compelled to publish, but we have them.

The calm and dispassionate way the large assembly of the most intelligent of Nashville's colored citizenry acted last night, reflects credit upon them in every way. Only one or two efforts were made to defeat the object of the meeting by a misguided dentist, Dr. Napier, and a doctor, Dr. Sumlin. They both deserve the pity and charity of their race for being so dull as not to have been able to perceive the seriousness of the situation and hence unable to function in any other way but as traitors to the loyalty of the Fisk young Negroes to the ideals of real manhood. The only comfort that we can give the Fisk young heroes in this case is that they must remember that Caeser had his Brutus and Jesus Christ his Judas, so they must expect to have their Napier and their Sumlin.

In Columbia, Tennessee, last year, a clerk in a store slapped a colored woman. Her son knocked him through a plate glass window. Mother and son were arrested and released on bail. The police raided the Negro section and four of them were wounded. A mob looted andpartly distroyed the section and 28 Negroes were arrested, charged with "conspiracy to murder". The NAACP moved in with $I5,000 furnished by Negroes all over the land. All of the Negroes have been aquitted but one; three cases are pending

The Crisis

1. To end the brutal exploitation of Negro workers in contract camps on the Federal-financed Mississippi Flood Control Project.

2. To get a proportionate share of jobs for Negro citizens on construction and relief projects financed by federal, state, county and municipal funds, for which Negroes are taxed at the same rate as other citizens.

3. To block the rising tide of legal lynchings and court injustice against Negroes during this period of crisis.

4. To counteract propaganda and activities of secret organizations trying to displace the Negro from employment.

5. To procure the full use of the ballot as a weapon of freedom.

6. To weld the Negro masses and white friends into a powerful phalanx for justice and opportunity.

Crisis

VII

In the field of the organization of Negro labor, we face special difficulties. Nevertheless, unless this mass of unskilled and semi-skilled labor is organized, the labor movement of America cannot achieve success. Efforts in the past, like that of the Pullman Porters, have been only partially successful. The reason for this is clear. First, white unions have not welcomed Negroes, and secondly, Negroes themselves are ignorant of the meaning of the labor movement.

The Negro does not see clearly a successful economic development of his group, except as he follows the advice and footsteps of the capitalists who have gained his friendship through charity. Effective organization of the Negro must be based on his own conviction and on a carefully prepared groundwork of economic knowledge and social ideal. He must be torn loose from ideals of philanthropy, charity and religious mysticism and fatalism, and be firmly rooted in a new belief in salvation by economic reform.

To accomplish this publicity, explanation and exhortation among Negroes is needed and on a widerscalethan ever before. This propaganda must with restraint but clearly and insistently preach the doctrines of organized labor, of socially owned and controlled capital, and of a rational distribution of wealth.

Such an organ we already have in The Crisis, the official organ of the N. A. A. C.P. For twenty years The Crisis has maintained itself and for three-fourths of that time it has been self-supporting. But it is handicapped by the very necessity of its hand to mouth existence from month to month. To enable it to push forward and carry the burden of a propaganda which is not understood and even unpopular among Negroes themselves,

The Crisis must have capital. If a substantial sum was put behind The Crisis at this time, we could easily triple its circulation and carry a vigorous new message of economic development to the American Negro. Such an organ could, at the same time, encourage and hearten the fighting spirit of black folk by showing, giving full and detailed publicity to what was being successfully done in the other lines of work already outlined.

He was trained at the Wesleyan High School, Cape Coast, then at Fourah Bay College, Sierra Leone, and finally at Cambridge. Univ. Engl. He was a member of the Inner Temple, London, and was called to the Bar in 1896. Soon after he returned to the Gold Coast to practise.

During his career as a Barrister he has proved of invaluable assistance to Judges in helping to elucidate problems relating to Gold Coast Customary Laws and Institutions. He was the Leader of the Gold Coast Western Province Bar, and was the author of the following well-known books, some of which are authorities upon the subjects of which they treat: "Gold Coast Native Institutions," ~~London, Messrs Sweet and Maxwell Ltd.~~ 1903; "Ethiopia Unbound," "Studies in Rac Emancipation, 1911 and "The Truth about the West Africa Land Question", ~~London, A.M. > " It is not only an honour to me to present this decoration to Mr. Casely Hayford, but it is a personal pleasure for me to do so as he is an old friend of mine and personally well-known to me. I know that besides being a fine Barrister and a brilliant Author, he is a man who takes the deepest interest in his own country, and is always willing to bring to the notice of the Government any matter for discontent that may arise and come to his notice. I don't say that the Government has not had in the past, and possibly in the future will not have, some passage of arms with Mr. Casely Hayford, but I think that he realises - and I think that all the Native Members of this Council realise - that the Government is making every effort really and truly to represent the people of this Country".

Mr. Hayford was instrumental, in conjunction with his friend Dr. Akinwade Savage, M.B., C.B., of Nigeria, in promoting the conference of Africans of British West Africa, which has now become the National Congress of British West Africa, ~~of which the Hon. Liberia

Those who have studied Liberia usually have taken no account of the economic background on which her tragedy was played. This is characteristic of our attitude toward racial problems. As soon as a problem of economics or of education or of health is assumed to be racial, immediately all facts that bear on work and wages, on human intelligence and on sickness and death are either ignored or given a peculiar and unreal valuation.

From 1848 until 1924 every effort has been made to deprive Liberia of her territory. The first difficulties arose on account of the slave trade. Between 1849 and 1856 by treaty with England and with the help of English anti-slavery philanthropists, Liberia had settled the boundary between herself and the British colony of Sierra Leone by buying land as far as the Sherbro Islands at a cost of about $100,000. Hardly had the transaction been finished however, than a change began to come over the British attitude. Not only did a trade in natural products of the west coast of Africa begin, especially in palm oil, but the illicit slave trade to America attracted English capital.

An English slave trader named Harris, established himself on this recently acquired Liberian property and defied Liberia's authority. Liberia seized two of his vessels which were clearly within Liberian territory. Nevertheless, the vessels were forcibly re-captured by a British gun boat.

Pressed by the commercial interests in the British colony, the government of Great Britain began to dispute the boundary line. Local chiefs continued to harrass traders and traders continued to engage in the slave trade and to violate Liberian laws. Harris organized inter-tribal wars which Liberia tried to put down. Thereupon claims for damage to English property arose. The matter was referred to an American admiral as arbitrator but still England refused to accept the settlement. Finally English gun boats appeared again before Liberia and demanded immediate payment of the so-called claims. Liberia's answer was perfect in logic:

"If the contested territory was British, why did the British Government claim from Liberia an indemnity for acts of violence amongst the natives which had taken place thereon? If, however, Liberia acknowledged her responsibility, as she had done, and agreed to pay an indemnity, why should she be in addition deprived of territories for the law and order of which she was held responsible and which were hers by acts of purchase admitted by the British Government?"

To all this there could, of course, be but one answer and in 1885, one hundred miles of Liberian coast was cut off; the Mano River was made the boundary line; and of the $100,000 which Liberia paid for the territory, a little less than $24,000 was returned.

No sooner had this happened than the French at the Southern end of Liberia made claims. There was no doubt but that Liberian territory extended to the San Pedro River, sixty miles east of its present boundary. The French, however, not only claimed this territory but claimed the whole Liberian coast on the basis of certain shadowy "treaties" with native chiefs, dating back to the 18th century. France refused to arbitrate and in 1892 compelled Liberia to give up territory as far as the Cavalla River and in these treaties both Great Britain and France drew the boundary line not in the middle of the rivers but on the bank nearest Liberia.

Crisis, Feb., 1920)

By Dr. John Haynes Holmes, Minister of the Community Church in New York City said:

"The Negro question in this day is problem of labor. I feel more and more that the Negro problem, like various phases of the white problem, is moving into that field. The Negro problem first came into prominence in this country in a day when we could say that the workers were to be divided into two classes. On the one hand, were the free workers of the North --- white workers, men who in that pioneer day were to be regarded as free workers. South of the Mason and Dixon Line, was a very different kind of working population --- a population bound to the land and doing its work for its master.

"We had, therefore, in the very clearest possible way, the distinction between the slave labor of the South, which was black, and the free labor of the North, which was white. All during the years we have discussed the problem --- and it is still true in our day --- and the burden of our discussion was to raise the black man to the level of the white man. That problem is not only with us today, but it is going to be with us tomorrow, and the long, long, battle for the rights of man, the black man as well as the white man, is going to be with us, to be settled only when men love one another upon a basis of justice and good will.

The thing that the black man has got to learn, is that the time has gone by for you black men to think that your problem is wholly your own. It is not your own problem any longer. More and more, it is getting to be the problem of the white man; and just as the oppressed white worker is reaching out his hand to the oppressed black worker, so the oppressed black worker, South or North, has got to reach out his hand to the oppressed white worker. And that means for you, my Negro brethren --- that means for you who live in New York City, who live in these Northern States and who have, therefore, the opportunity of grappling with this problem as it should be grappled with in this country --- namely, the political opportunity, which gives you the opportunity to stand shoulder to shoulder with the white worker in the political field --- to fight and struggle and battle for your own interests, and through those interests for the emancipation of America, white and black. That means, it is time to give up voting a Republican ticket; it is time to give up voting the Democratic ticket; it is time to recognize that new organizations and new forces are being fashioned in this country; and when the great Presidential election of 1920 is held, I venture to prophesy there will be a great universal party in the field, to bring all the workers, black and white, together..."

Nowhere is the work of Coleridge Taylor appreciated more than in the United States, and this is true both of white and black Americans. First came his music and it thrilled and captivated the nation. Then came Mr. Taylor himself. We, who are colored, watched the experiment with some interest and excitement because we wondered if there was enough of artistic feeling in the United States to receive a man of Negro descent as a great artist in a country where the color line is so decidedly drawn. We were gratified at Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's reception. His fine disposition and lovely character impressed itself on everybody. Again we were especially pleased to have him come to us and learn what American Negroes were doing with his music. He left in America, as elsewhere in the world, a beautiful memory.

Sec. 12. That the District of Columbia shall be entitled to the privileges of a Territory under the provisions of this act, but there shall be no commissioner of common schools appointed for said District, nor shall its existing laws and school authorities be interfered with. The Commissioner of Education shall be charged with the duty of superintending the distribution of its allotment, and shall make full report of his doings to the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this law through the Bureau of Education, and all moneys paid under its provisions shall be made by Treasury warrant to the individual performing the service to whom indebtedness shall be due, and who shall be personally entitled to receive the money, or to his agent, duly authorized by him, upon vouchers approved by the State authorities, when under the provisions of this act

This Bill appears to have slumbered in the committee until June 1882, when Senator Blair opened his remarkable campaign extending through ten years, five Congresses, of which it has been said: "no similar discussion is on record in history." The first speech delivered June first, 1882, may be said to have contained the most complete presentation of the actual condition of education in the country hitherto made to the Congress of the United States. The reprinting of these statistical tables is absolutely necessary to the correct understanding of this movement, which, from the first, has been studiously disparaged, not only by every division of the army still in the field in force, of opponents to the American common school, but further confused before the general public by the partisan political issues which finally defeated it in 1890 by carrying over several of its more influential supporters to the opposition. The tables were first suggested and in many cases actually constructed in detail by Senator Blair. But it may here be said that not the least of the value of this great debate in the Senate, to the South especially, was the presentation of this body of valuable statistics prepared at the suggestion of the Senator by the Bureau of Education and literally flung in the face of the country by the indefatigable industry of the leader of the movement. It can truly be said that the first reliable information spread before the educational public of the Union concerning the actual condition of the country in this respect was found in this mass of figures which did not "lie", and the explanation of which formed the substance of the major part of the elaborate speeches of the author of the Bill. Here was a benefit to the cause of American education in general that, in itself, amply compensated for all the time and public agitation devoted to the subject; often disparaged by public men and the press as it may have been.

Sec. 9. That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, which sum may be expended in maintaining institutes or temporary training schools, or in extending opportunities for normal or other instruction to competent and suitable persons of any color who are without necessary means to qualify themselves for teaching, and who shall agree in writing to devote themselves exclusively, for at least one year after leaving such training schools, to teach in the common schools, for such compensation as may be paid other teachers therein.

Sec. 10. That no part of the educational fund alloted to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same.

Sec. 11. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used in the school districts of the several States and Territories in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child an opportunity for common school and, so far as may be, of industrial education, and to this end existing public schools, not sectarian in character, may be aided, and new ones may be established, as may be deemed best, in the several localities.

Sec. 12. That any State in which the number of persons 10 years of age and upward who can not read and write is not over 5 per cent of the whole population thereof shall have the right to receive its allotment and to apply the same for the promotion of common school and industrial education, or the education of teachers therein, in such a way as the Legislature of such State shall provide.

Sec. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior shall receive from the governor of each State and Territory a report, to be made by or through such governor on or before the 30th day of June of each year, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory and received by the State or Territorial treasurer or officer under Section 4 of this act, and of the balance in the hands of such treasurer or officer withheld, unclaimed, or for any cause unpaid or unexpended, and also the amount expended in such State or Territory as required by section 8 of this act, and also of the number of public, common and industrial schools, the number of teachers employed, the total number of children taught during the year and in what branches instructed, the average daily attendance, and the relative number of white and colored children, and the number of months in each year schools have been maintained in each school district, and such other information in relation to the use of the school fund and the condition of common school education as the Secretary of the Interior may require. And if any State or Territory shall misapply or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made: Provided, That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein.

Sec. 14. That on or before the 1st day of September of each year the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the President of the United States whether any State or Territory or the District of Columbia has forfeited its right to receive its apportionment under this act, and how forfeited, and whether he has withheld such allotment on account of such forfeiture; and each State and Territory and the District of Columbia from which such apportionment shall be withheld shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress; and if the next Congress shall not direct such share to be paid, it shall be added to the general educational fund for distribution among the other States and the Territories and District of Columbia which shall be entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this act.

Section 15. That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories and the District of Columbia, through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report annually to Congress its practical operation, and briefly the condition of common and industrial education as affected thereby throughout the country, which report shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, accompanying the report of his Department.

The explanation of the republication of these tables of educational statistics followed by the Bill reintroduced in the following Congress--1884--is that the tables were all prepared expressly to set forth the condition of education in the South and only by a careful study and consideration of them can a correct opinion be formed concerning the persistent contention of the Senator from New Hampshire that these ten years, from 1880 to 1890, were the critical period of the public school system in the South and that the failure even by indirection, in passing the National Aid Bill was due partly to imperfect information among the southern people, in confounding the American Common School with the old time tuition school, free only to the poverty-stricken class that had existed in several of these states. But even from this point of view, the failure to pass the Bill would be even more disastrous in its reaction upon the North than upon the South and to the cause of the American Common School everywhere. It was evident that then was "the accepted time" for the inauguration of that gradual reconstruction of American public opinion through a frank acknowledgment from the North of its equal historical responsibility for the Civil War, through the toleration of the extension of the system of negro slavery through seventy-five years of the National existence followed by a hearty cooperation with the progressive educational public of the South in the effort to extirpate the illiteracy that was eating out the vitals of the higher American civilization. And in this connection, it may be added that, in his opening speeches of 1882 and 1884 and others germaine thereto, the Senator from New Hampshire placed before the Senate a report of great value on "Education and Labor" in which he outlines with almost prophetic foresight the inevitable result of this condition of illiteracy among the working classes especially of the Southern states, in placing in the hands of the capitalist of that region a labor-system crowded with ignorant workmen, by which through the aid of lower wages and child and woman-operative work the manufacturers of the North would be brought to face a competition far more ruinous to their interest than the foreign rivalship against which a high protective tariff has been built up as a defense. Universal education alone, he always contended, by increasing the intelligence and character of the laboring masses, will arrest this peril, develop a true independence and patriotism among them and make them competent to rise above the jealousy and sense of wrong inherited from their inherited recollections.

Another reason for pushing this measure was to further the progress of reconciliation between the sections and prevent the dreaded result, that the most dangerous foes to the effort for the educational uplift of the South would be found "to be of its own household." A Senator of New England, in his endeavor to take the subject from the floor, remarked: "I wish the Senator would wait and let me hear how much will remain of all this after the session has expired at twelve o'clock on the fourth of March." The Senator that added to this jeer a vote against the National Aid Bill in its final defeat before the expiration of his then official term had become aware that, up to date, the condition of industrial affairs predicted in those speeches had cost the Southern States and the Nation not only seventy millions of dollars in ten, but in one year. If there was a political party in the Union from 1880 to 1890 that regarded itself as the special representative of the American system of common schools so nobly set forth by President Ulysses S. Grant in his great address at St. Paul, Minn., and his first Presidential deliverance to Congress, it may now contemplate the results of its defeat of the Bill for National Aid to Education in the condition of political and industrial affairs in all the states then regarded as having the chief concern with its passage.

Happily for the Southern people and the cause of education through the vast and vacant spaces of this boundless domain, the cause of the children and youth of all classes and both races was never in this country more completely upheld in public debate than by the seventeen United States Senators from the ex-Confederate commonwealths who rose to the occasion in the first memorable discussion of the Bill of 1884, lasting through several weeks. Indeed, up to 1881 there had never been a debate in the Congress of the United States on the general subject of National Education that had attracted more than a passing notice. It had been assumed by the Confederation before there was a Nation and endorsed as soon as the Republic was on its feet that the United States of America had the power and was bound by the obligation to aid the people in that education of every new generation without which a democracy would only be a "glittering generality", ending in a collapse into anarchy, closed by the chronic remedy of public disorder, a permanent despotism more intolerable than that against which the fathers rose in rebellion in 1776.

It was to prevent this dire emergency that the whole question of the first establishment of the people's common school was in peril through sixteen states that every agency of opposition to the American system then came together, with that portion of the people who with good intentions, had an imperfect view of the condition and left the South to find itself indeed out of Egypt, but entering on another forty years of wandering in the wilderness towards the promised land. Against all these hostile agencies,- personal, social, political and religious, this brave column of seventeen stood up and discussed this mighty question with a weight of legal equipment, a grasp of national affairs and a far-reaching conception of the true interest of their own people, that placed them in the highest position of American statesmanship. It was evident that the chief honors in his high argument should be won by them. Senator Blair certainly in quantity and clearly in quality could be said to have borne the brunt of the discussion on the side of the North. It was very properly felt by its warmest friends that it was better that the Bill should be pressed by the representatives of the Southern States most in need of aid than upon them by the North and the Nation, against an indifference to the most vital interest of Southern society. It was indeed inspiring to see the Senators of Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana and South Carolina--the states from which came the first great revolt in 1860 in favor of state rights, now arguing in behalf of the children the constitutionality of the Blair Bill, gravely asserting the power and duty of the Nation to cooperate in the establishment and support of the common school in these sixteen states. The reader is referred to the Congressional Record of 1880-90 for this, by far the ablest, and the two subsequent discussions on this proposed law. Nothing indeed, today, would more distinctly advance the cause of popular education in the whole Union than the republication of this entire mass of congressional literature, with historical "note and comment", for its adaptation to popular reading. The noble utterances of Senator, afterward Secretary of the Interior and Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, Lamar of Mississippi, fairly represent the claim of this devoted body of advocates of the higher interest of the Southern States. The following extracts from the speeches of several of the foremost defenders of the Bill may be read today with profit.

These high and broad demonstrations are only brief extracts from the speeches of the group of Southern and Northern Senators, several from the North of southern birth, who in this great national movement displayed a power of solid and cogent reasoning, large information, appreciation of the fundamental principles of republican government, a lofty patriotic spirit and, above all, a growing sentiment and aspiration for nationality among the more eminent public men involved in the issues of the Civil War, unrivaled in the history of the American government. This action of a body of men justly held to be the greatest, willing to prove their superiority by becoming the most helpful servants of their people, revealed the on-coming tide of approval from the best representatives of almost every great organization of an educational character in the land. Elsewhere will be noted the unanimity of these appeals, that largely secured the passage of the Bill by the Senate in 1884.

The Bill as passed by the Senate, April 7, 1884, reads as follows:

Text of the bill (S. 308) as it passed the Senate, April 7, 1884, by a vote of yeas 33, nays 11.

An act to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for eight years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit: The first year, the sum of $7,000,000; the second year, the sum of $10,000,000; the third year, the sum of $15,000,000; the fourth year, the sum of $13,000,000; the fifth year, the sum of $11,000,000; the sixth year, the sum of $9,000,000; the seventh year, the sum of $7,000,000; the year the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the President of the United States whether any State or Territory or the District of Columbia has forfeited its right to receive its apportionment under this act, and how forfeited, and whether he has withheld such allotment on account of such forfeiture; and each State and Territory and the District of Columbia from which such apportionment shall be withheld, shall have the right to appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress; and if the next Congress shall not direct such share to be paid, it shall be added to the general educational fund for distribution among the other States and the Territories and District of Columbia eighth year, the sum of $5,000,000; which several sums shall be expended to secure the benefits of common school education to all the children of the school age mentioned hereafter living in the United States.

Sec. 2. That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of 10 years and over, cannot write, bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; such computation shall be made according to the census of 1880.

Sec. 3. That no State or Territory shall receive any of the benefits of this act until the governor thereof shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him, showing the character of the common school system in force in such State or Territory; the amount of money expended therein during the last preceding school year in the support of common schools, not including expenditures for the rent, repair, or erection of schoolhouses; whether any discrimination is made in the raising or distributing of the common school revenues or in the common school facilities afforded between the white and colored children therein, and so far as is practicable, the sources from which such revenues were derived; the manner in which the same were apportioned to the use of the common schools; the number of white and the number of colored common schools; the average attendance in each class and the length of the school term. No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that shall not have provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of race or color, either in the raising or distributing of school revenues or in the school facilities afforded: Provided, That separate schools for white and colored children shall not be considered a violation of this condition. The Secretary of the Interior shall thereupon certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the names of the States and Territories which he finds to be entitled to share in the benefits of this act, and also the amount due to each

Sec. 4. That the amount so apportioned to each State and Territory shall be drawn from the Treasury by warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the monthly estimates and requisitions of the Secretary of the Interior, as the same may be needed, and shall be paid over to such officers as shall be authorized by the laws of the respective States and Territories to receive the same

Sec. 5. That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws.

Sec. 6. The money appropriated and apportioned under the provisions of this act to the use of any Territory, shall be applied to the use of the common and industrial schools therein by the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 7. That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is hereby provided that no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues or out of moneys raised under its authority in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

Sec. 8. That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, which sum may be expended in maintaining institutes or temporary training schools or in extending opportunities for normal or other instruction to competent and suitable persons, of any color, who are without necessary means to qualify themselves for teaching and who shall agree in writing to devote themselves exclusively, for at least one year after leaving such training schools, to teach in the common schools for such compensation as may be paid other teachers therein.

Sec. 9. That no part of the educational fund allotted to any State or Territory shall be used for the erection of school-houses or school buildings of any description, nor for rent of the same.

Sec. 10. That the money distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools, not sectarian in character, in the school districts of the several States and Territories, in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child, without distinction of race or color, an equal opportunity for education. This term "school district" shall include all cities, towns, parishes, and other territorial subdivisions for school purposes, and all corporations clothed by law with the power of maintaining common schools.

Sec. 11. That no second or subsequent allotment shall be made under this act to any State or Territory unless the governor of such State or Territory shall first file with the Secretary of the Interior, a statement, certified by him, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory and received by the State and Terrirorial treasurer or officer under this act, and of the balance in the hands of such treasurer or officer withheld, unclaimed, or for any cause unpaid or unexpended, and also the amount expended in such State or Territory as required by section 8 of this act, and also of the number of teachers employed, the total number of children taught during the year, and in what branches instructed, the average daily attendance, and the relative number of white and colored children, and the number of months in each year schools have been maintained in each school district. And if any State or Territory shall misapply or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, and the other matters herein prescribed to be so reported, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made: Provided, That if the public schools in any State shall admit pupils not within the ages herein specified, it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein. If it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the funds received under this act for the preceding year by the State or Territory have been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by this act, and that the conditions thereof have been observed, then the Middle West today is politically helpless because in order to deprive black Americans of the right to vote, they allowed the South to cast two votes--the vote of the white man and of the disfranchised Negro. The double political power of these rotten boroughs of the South makes democratic government in the United States almost a farce.

We decry lawlessness. Where do we get the lawlessness of Chicago and of the United States? We began it when as a nation we disregarded the 13th, 14th and 15th Amendments and then are vastly surprised when we cannot enforce the 18th. We have organized our life so as not to carry out the laws which ourselves made and we have the heritage of lawlessness to pay for it.

We have created here in the United States, which today pretends to the moral leadership of the world, a situation where ~~on the last night of the old year~~ we can ~~slowly and~~ publicly, repeatedly, burn a human being alive for the amusement of Americans who represent some of the purest strains of Nordic blood, ~~in that great state, Mississippi, which has done so much for the civilization of the world!~~ have made it almost impossible for America to think logically.

I said, for instance, that I might ask what Negroes were. I come back to that question. I gladly as the representative of the Negro race, and yet I know and know that I can equally stand as a representative of the Nordic race. Whenever it seems necessary to deny me any privilege, then I am a Negro, and whenever I do anything that is worth doing, suddenly I become white. The United States measured soldiers in the great war and came to conclusions concerning the intelligence the Negro race; yet know perfectly well the men they were measuring were not Negroes, but that perhaps 70 per cent of them had white blood. It is impossible by any scientific measurement to divide men into races, and even to prove there are separate races, and yet we talk about races, and prescribe races and measure races; and because we are not talking logically when we talk about races, so we talk logically about --the tariff, farm relief, unemployment, credit, wages or capital.

The matter of our logic is not nearly so important as that of our ethics and religion. Here you are, a great white nation with a magnificent Plan of Salvation. have an ethical code far beyond anything the world ever knew--if you do not believe it, listen to what you preach to the darker peoples. You are followers of the Golden Rule and of the meek and lowly Jesus. Yet you do not try to follow out your own religion because you know when your religion comes up against the race problem that religion has nothing absolutely to do with your attitude toward Negroes. The attacks that white people themselves have made upon their social structure are worse for civilization than anything that anybody could ever do.

In this present crisis, American Negroes are hesitant and divided. For many years our policy has been to agree with and support the most powerful classes and movements in the United States, if by that method they could be assured of reciprocal support for Negro equality of civil, political rights. For this reason we were long congenital Republicans voting unquestioningly for high tarifs, containing of the labor movement and in general government in the interests of the rich. This attitude in New England was strengthened by the gifts of the well-to-do to Negro education and other social enterprises. The depression shook us out of this attitude and drove us to support the social program of the New Deal, which proved our economic salvation. We therefor voted for Roosevelt as long as he lived. Today we are thrown back where we must make new political and social choices. Our plan of emancipation as followed by the NAACP for 40 years has had great success. Negro rights have been widely established before the courts and race discrimination has been driven to a new low. But this does not mean that the battle is won: the cases of Rosa Ingram, the Martinsville Seven , Willie Mc Gee and the Trenton Six prove that Negroes cannot be sure of basic justice before the courts;more Negroes vote in the South than ever before, but it is still true the most eligible Southern Negroes do not vote nor hold office. Taxation without representation is still the rule of thr black South. Over the whole nation, and not least in New Engand, discrimination against Negroes in jobs and wage is still the rule and the Negro today is faced by the question as to whether simply to continue a program which in the past has brought notable success or whether the momentous change which is overtaking the world, may not call for change of tactics and broaden of aim on our part.

Decision is all the more imperative since custom and inertia, example and present safety. impell our upper classes toward reaction and conservative action. We have evolved a growing class of well-to-do Negroes, with education, beautiful homes and expensive cars Instinctively this class seek alliance of interests with property and respectability. But the danger here lies in the fact that throughout the world, the rule of organized wealth is being challenged as never beforeorganized industry and monopoly have been behind Colonial Imperialism and the serfdom of the darker peoples of the world in Africa, Asia and the

What is being attempted in Germany and also foreshadowed in Japan is colonialism under another name and with excuses ~~fit~~ different from the race theories on whcih we built the colonialism of the I9th century . Then nations must obey Europe because they were not able to stand alone. Now nations must obey the United States for fear of absorption by Russia In both cases the outcome is that the interssts of the ~~Un~~ imperial master dictates policy and not the interests of the nation itself. In both cases democratic methods a re limited by military force and dictatorship more or less concealed makes the nation the colonial appendage of concentrated power. It is nothing less than crazy for us to dream that Japan will ever ally herself will ingly with the United States against Asia. The race hate which we for more than a century inspired among the Japanese against the white world will not be dissipated by the tactics of General Mc Arthur. We may restore the former industrial masters of Japan to temporary power, but that power will never last after its crass failure in the Second World War

Back of all this -- Colonial Imperialism, Investment Imperialism, the war against Socialism --- back of all this lies the persistent belief that mankind has to be controlled and that those who control have a right to seek their own interests before the interests of the mass of mankind. This belief is deep-seated in the United States despite all talk about freedom and democracy. Never was dictatorship stronger than in America of today poor Negroes of the United States; they need social medicine; free legal advice; cheap municipal housing; wage floors in industry ; social security and insurance. These great social ramparts are the goal of all laboring people and have been the salvation of all Scandinavian lands. They are spreading in every civilized country today and are being forwarded by national control of all industry which is liable to abuse in private hands. Today railroads, telephones and telegraph, street cars and subways express freight, roads, rivers and river control, power and transmission all these things are under public control and ownership in all civilized lands. Only the United States is fighting this socialization of industry bitterly, although even here the fight was not altogether sucessful as the TVA and social security laws prove. But to carry on this fight against the social control of wealth , Big Business has tried to control cjeap labor and cheap rwa materials the world over and to make this nation enter a third world war ostensibly against Communism, but really against the rise of the working class in this nation.

Allied with Big Business in the United States is the race discrimination of th e South. It is the South which blocks not only anti-lynching laws but anti-poll tax legislation and stimies every effort for a fair employment law. Hand in glove with the South is Northern wealth. And the whole nation black and white is misled as to current trends in the world by a press and periodical control under the ownership of monopoly. Our news is screened, our education is propaganda, our platform of debate is limited and any Negro who wants the praise of white folk today, would better start by damning Paul Robeson and end like Hazel Scott by despising Commnists.

This is the day for Negroes of integrity to stand up and do their own thinking. To realize that there is but one party which deserves their votes and that is the Progressive Party. That the Repu blican and Democratic are but the same principles under two names. As freedom came by a Third Party in I860, so it can only come in the same way in I952

Of course, the C.C.C. camps have included a very large proportion

Thus taxation falling mainly on the poor furnishes funds which make American investment safe; and then the business man without risk , with cheap native labor, reaps 50 or 100% profit and calls it his. He uses it in elections ~~like this~~ to buy public officials, push legislation which favors him and kill laws which he does not like. Moreover much of the capital used today is taken from public funds through taxation while the returns go to private profiteers. For instance huge profits of the automobile industry are largely due to the vast expenditure for roads paid for by the public. Labor contends that it is therefore but fair to take part of this profit for public use. On the other hand industry in the United States consistently refuses this demand and is reluctant to bear its own share of public taxation. Today for instance, the owners of our commerical shipping, built and sustained in part by public taxation pay less proportionately in taxes than the sailors on their ships pay out of their wage.

Today despite every effort in the United States to conceal and deny the facts, all civilized nations ~~except this~~ have been progressing toward socialism especially since 1900. They own and run the railways, the telephone and telegraph, street cars, buses and subways; they largely conduct housing sanitation, insurance and relief, they guarantee employment; they engage in industry, in manufacturing, foreign trade, mining, forestry and river control in power conversion and control and wide ownership of land. Some nations like Britain go further than this; others like the Scandinavian lands plan less in theory but do evernmore in practice; while the Iron Curtain lands attempt complete social and industrial planning and ownership of all capital.

Here then is a world movement which the United States almost alone is attempting to stem. We are attempting to champion private enterprise when no great industrial effort can possibly be private or carried on primarily for private ends; we stress individual initiative which is laudable when it is for social ends and inadmissable when it leads to anarchy.

Assuming that one fourth of the college graduates from 1920 through 1927 were women, the total number of college women graduates since 1920 has probably been 2750. According to the Census figures of 1920, there were, among Negro women, ten years of age and over, 4 lawyers, 35 dentists and 65 physicians. Of course these numbers have greatly increased in the last seven years. I should imagine that there are 10 lawyers, 60 dentists, and 100 physicians.

is on the Hampton grounds, and even in after life made an he students to an extraordinary degree. To be a personal a Hampton teacher is the especial reward of an excellent udent.

. too, the graduates of Hampton in large numbers find excellent nd do excellent work the men of exceptional ability find themselves pushed into an educational blind alley with responsibilities thrown upon them for which their education has not prepared them.

Take, for instance, Major Moton. He is an excellent man and a fri of mine. He has done and will do good work, but he is going to be for ever handicapped by the fact that Hampton deliberately kept him from b a broadly educated man. He is handicapped by his training and he feels He may, of course, by argument, and Hampton does argue that broader n and higher training might have "spoiled" him. My feeling is that it is better to take the risk of spoiling exceptional men rather than to ta the other risk of giving talent half a chance.

A case in point is that of W. T. B. Williams, field agent of the Slater Fund. Williams is a graduate of Hampton. He was discouraged by the Hampton authorities in every way and even ridiculed. Nevertheless, he pushed on. When he tried to enter a Northern college he found that his Hampton preparatory training was not recognized there. At a great, and to him, serious loss of time he had to take practically a whole preparatory course, and then enter, and was graduated from Harvard College.

What was the result? When Hampton wanted a first-class educated man to take charge of certain field work in which she was interested she was compelled to turn to Mr. Williams, and he is now one of their most valued and lauded graduates. Yet Hampton did all it could to make Williams impossible.

Hampton get easily the best raw material for education that the Negro race is producing. Some of it she uses to advantage, but a large and important part of it she not only does not use to advantage but she so spoils it that it cannot be used by other institutions and these men go out as half educated men.

Again, great advertisement has been given to certain aspects o the Hampton method of learning by doing. Undoubtedly the Hampton metho taught us something in the line of recasting the high school corr but it has not taught us everything and it has made itself seriou forgivable mistakes.

I remember when I went for the first time to the Hampton trade and asked the wagon maker how his students were getting on. He tol They have n't got enough mathematics to make wheels. At the time Ha was sneering at higher mathematics, but she had to put some into her riculum in order to do her "practical" work.

In a similar way Hampton authorities fought the introduction of tain historical and social studies into her corriculum. For a long t she would allow no instrumental music to be taught, and their present musical instructor, Mr. Dett, one of the geniuses of the colored rac has had a hard time trying to get permission to develop the musical ability of Hampton students.

It is all very well to stress retically the advantage of

Negro

The same problem faces the Negro in another form in his schools. Since the great crusade of Reconstruction, when Northern white men and women of the finest type went South to teach the eager freedmen, there has been a tradition of white and Negro teachers working together in the higher Negro schools. The South has again and again attacked the system by law and by social wrath, but still this contact of white and black America long remained the finest cultural contact between diverse races that the world afforded. America may never know, in the pother of race hate, how much she owes to the fact that up to the present no liberally trained Negro has walked into the world who had not in his youth held the hand of a white teacher and friend.

But change came. The romance of the crusader faded and the courage of the martyr. The white South, by steady and unyielding pressure, kept demanding of all white folk down there conformity to Southern ideas about the Negro. To this demand was joined the financial pressure of the philanthropic North and especially of such agencies as the General Education Board, on which the white repairing for each other. The white plumber charges a Negro five dollars for minor repairs and pays his wife a dollar for five hours hard housework. No Negro can enter the plumber's union and the cuty inspector backs the plumber's lightest demand. Here the Negro must use his vote. There must be house in dustry which Negroes can contrive. They must be ways of escaping the cheating of the white retail stores; there must be kinds of decent well-paid work for Negroes instead of leaving them to the extrems of exploitation backed by city and county authorities. The Negro Problem cannot be settled by continued migration to the North. Rights in the south based on intelligent voting on economic lines with knowledge of what socialism the world over is doing for the worker

There are certain matters about the kinds of business which you are organizing to which you must give attention. Insurance, for instance, must not be allowed to fall into private hands. It it does it will become gambling or exploitation or both. Insurance should be dominated and conducted by the state. Building should be largely in the hands of the state which should control the amount and place and kind of building. The making of cloth and cl thing should be built upon your own ancient method of home manufacture and guided and assisted by the state. Especially in the matter of food you should guard against the import of large amounts of costly foreign food and drink. Try to raise your own foods as far as possible and to manufacture your own light beverages. If you do so it will save you a world of trouble and expense.

THE SIMPLE TRUTH

American culture is almost completely submerged in business enterprise; So much so that to the average citizen of the United States any attempt to change our concept of business is an attempt to ch nge the American Way of Life, since business is normal life. At the center of this concept of business is the widest possible freedom to carry on manufacture and trade as will bring to the business man the most personal profit. Such business men comprise a wide variety of persons and functions from bootblacks and greengrocers to vast corporations like the United States Corporation. Their area of common interest is small and virtually consists in the right to receive less than they expend. The wider this gap, the more sucessful the business.

One can see then how deep and fundamental is resistence of business to any propos l which would curtail its field of operation or change its methods so as to limit or distroy it rate of profit. This would seem to the average business man as an attack so fundamental as to justify resistance to t the last step of war.

Yet each business man must recognize that the field of profit-making business has limits. Manufacture and trade must be honest: increasing the u usefulness of goods and trading without deceit. That certain things must not be matters of trade, like human life.

The Hamilton Study

A teacher writes us:

Moreover most of our work today is done neither by governments nor individuals. It is done by artificial individuals called corporations. These corporations having neither bodies to be kicked nor souls to be damnes, for the most part do as they please, and noone can be held responsible for their actions or failure to act. Noone except th government which created them and which some people think should own and direct them. But Business men , most of whose work is done by corporation s and most of whose wealth is owned by corporations put up strong opposition to this program, stoutly maintaining that corporation action is individual action with which govern ent must rarely interfere. "hen now our business administra gets to work, we must expect that busine s will not interfere with corporations, except to allow them to buy and sell, make profit to the limit of the often non-existent law and thus simplify starvation. If however industry comes up with loss instead of profit then the govern ment co es to the rescue of business as it did in the great Depression. Remember? It was really the funniest thing in a very unfunny era, to see the banks on their knees begging for a hand-out. They got billions of our money, yours and mine.

All this makes the plan of a business administration less convincing than some think. For instance among these busibess tycoons who knows what about the theatre: or literature or painting or sculpture? To be sure Mr. Eisenhower believes modern art is "nuts" and social insurance to be equated with jail. I have never heard him mention a book nor are his cabinet expert on bridges, architexture, parks nor trees; none of them have of the history of the past or of what men think or how or why experience in educati n, or travel, or scientific laws. What they are expert in is making money; selling for more than you pay. In that they are tops. So in a time of crisis, when w war threatens the world and civilization totters, these will be our rulers, headed by four-star generals who are expert in arming, marching and murder. Somehow I am uneasy.

The officers of the Peace Information Center are shocked by the latest effort of the Department of Justice to stop the mouths of those Americans who desire peace and not a Third World War. Last April a number of those who were alarmed at the trends toward war, formed a "Peace Information Center" to desseminate news concerning peace sentiment in this country and abroad. We issued "Peace-Grams", reprinted and circulated the Stockholm Appeal and the Red Cross protest against atom bombs.

In August the Department of justice asked us to register under the act requiring registration by "an agent of a foreign Power". The Chairman replied:

Meantime we asked the Attorney-General for an interview in which our objects and methods could be explained. This was not granted. Meantime the work of the Center has been finished and the office closed states. We are today dominated openly by selfish private interests, in no small measure because the disfranchisement of 3,750,000 black voters in the

We rejoice at the continued growth and development of economic Negro culture, art and literature. Dispite efforts within and without the race to prostitute beauty to filth and defeatism.

We are still objects of petty public insult, coupled with economic theft. In time of public calamity, like the Mississippi flood, we are treated in many instances like slaves and criminals. We still lack the right to enter many places of public accommodation, and especially we continue to pay railroads in the South for accommodations which we do not receive. These public carriers, even in interstate traffic, inforce a species of discrimination so outrageous and so obviously illegal as to call for immediate redress before the courts.

Our great weapon of offense against all this is the ballot. We must give it up. We must register and vote whenever and wherever we can. We must not mortgage our vote to faithless and corrupt political organizations. We must demand.

We hail and greet our friends, North and South, black and white, whose liberal thought in word and deed, in platform, newspaper, classroom, book and press, is forwarding the day of our emancipation.

The white man

~~will~~ feel that the prestige of the [illegible]race is in danger and that unless the offending Negro is put imm[illegible]ately "in his place", the present race relations in the South are in danger. I was therefore ~~more than half prepared~~ not surprised to see the white man grow livid with anger. The occasion in other parts of the country or in other lands or at other times would have seemed trivial, but there was absolutely no doubt but that here was a man furious with anger.

He arose from his seat. He was tall and dressed in black, and started up the aisle toward me. There were, of course, many possibilities which I have since considered. In the first place he probably thought I was armed. My experience is that three out of four at least of the men in the South carry pistols. I was not armed. I had at that time never owned a pistol or any other sort of fire-arm in my life. I had always been afraid that if I did have one, that in some moment of unreasoning anger I ~~should~~ might kill a human being. I ~~do~~ did not want any such contingency to occur. Probably the man as he advanced up the aisle thought I was armed and expected me to rise so that if necessary I could shoot. If I had risen and he had been armed one of us undoubtedly would have been killed. The second contingency that he probably had in his mind was that I would run away; but that did not occur to me, not from bravado but simply because on a moving train with a white train crew in front and two or three coaches of white passengers behind there was no place to run. If I had started to retreat or run I should probably have gotten off with having my ears boxed or being kicked or receiving a severe tongue lashing. I did not run, I sat quietly and watched the man approach. Probably this disconcerted him somewhat. He did not know just what I proposed doing and he did not know what the car full of Negroes would do. There was a death-like stillness in the car, not a movement, not a whisper, hardly a breath. If these people, or any part of them were my friends (and they were not) he ~~might expect~~ was afraid of trouble from their side, which I seriously doubt. Then

Mr. Wallace in his attack on socialism merely quibbles; how a welfare state with planned economy differs from socialism is something which a champion of the New Deal finds difficulty in explaining. He forgets that once his only criticism of socialism was that this country was "not ready" for it; and he chided labor fir having " little interest in government ownership of key industries." Wuth that irritating theological twist which Wallace always lugs into his talks, he admits that but charges that

"Marxism denies the spiritual side of man and the existence of God"

~~Wallace adds with confused logic; "but~~

Marx seeking scientific unity declares that matter thinks and not an undiscoverab le " spirit", but that did not hinder him from exalting the spiritual side of man as no economic philosophy ever has; and it comes in poor grace from a supporter of Roosevelt Four Freedoms to deny freedom of religoous belief

The final tour de force of this speech is: "We in the US inspite of the McCarran Act still have a free world. Russia in spite of all she has done to teach her people to read and write, still has a slave world."

This begs the whole question. Many Americans, some of whom sit today in jail for no crime, would doubt the freedom of this nation; and if the Soviet Union is based on slavery, then a host of witnesses from Sidney and Beatrice Webb and Bernard Shaw to ~~a dozen of other students and writers~~ the Dean of Canterbury are either liars or fools.

This apologia from a man who once led the progressive forces of America, fills me with profound disappointment. It reads like abject surrender to current hysteria and class the class interests surrounding M. Wallace. He was profoundly ~~disappointed~~ upset by the election of I948. ~~He could stand defeat when~~ He could stand defeat when still defended by an applauding minority; but not defeat which entailed bitter criticism and the discountenance of respectable people. We saw him changing in I949 and the change came bef struction" of race relations which was really "worth the riot". Let us see now what Atlanta is doing for her Negro children. According to the Census of 1900, Negro children formed 40% of the school population. A school census of 1908 make them but 33½% - a suspiciously low figure. Accepting, however, the latter figure we find the following facts:

in 1903, 214 white and 49 colored,

1908, 300 white and 60 colored.

The figures for the pay of these teachers (not including superintendence) are difficult to ascertain, but we learn this much:

Pay of teachers -

1906, $176,775.28 for white teachers,

1908, 209,069.50 " " "

1906, $24,732.99 for colored teachers

To know the future we have but to remember the past. Everyone can easily learn that not only did Negroes fight for the New World in the days of discovery and Colonial Wars but that 3000 of them fought in the Revolution and there, too, without segregation. "No regiment is to be seen," writes a Hessian officer in 1777, "in which there are not Negroes in abundance and among them able-bodied, strong, brave fellows." Even the regiments of the South had their black men. New York State raised two Negro regiments in 1812 and Perry, ~~and~~ Chauncey and Paul Jones used colored sailors. Jackson at the Battle of New Orleans said to his colored troops: "I knew that you could endure hunger and thirst and all the hardships of war. I knew that you loved the land of your nativity and that like ourselves you had to defend all that is most dear to man, but you have surpassed all my hopes." Four hundred Negroes took part in the Battle of New Orleans and one of them gave Jackson the suggestion for his famous cotton breast works. There were 178,975 Negro soldiers who took part in the Civil War beside 150,000 Negro laborers. The soldiers took part in 449 battles and had 36,874 killed and wounded. In the Spanish American War it was the Negro Tenth Cavalry that saved Roosevelt's Rough Riders at El Caney and a southern writer said that they were physically "the best men in the army," and seemed to be "absolutely without fear." In the present war it is well known that Negro troops are already with Pershing in France.

True it is that the burdened nation is not at this time (more's the pity!) engaged in settling the "Negro problem," but is raising an army for war. Nevertheless, it is certain that the best way to raise an army in America today is to settle at least so much of the Negro problem as interferes with the effective training and use of Negro officers and troops.

F. We believe that Negro workers should join the labor movement and affiliate with such trade unions as welcome them and treat them fairly. We believe that workers' councils organized by Negroes for interracial understanding should strive to fight race prejudice in the working class.

And in other cases we should form and federate our own Negro unions

I. We conceive this matter of work and equality of adequate Income is not the end of our effort, but the beginning of the rise of the Negro race, in this land and the world over, in power, learning and accomplishment. Colored

J. We believe in the use of our vote for equalising wealth through taxation, for vesting the ultimate power of the state in the hands of the workers; and as an integral part of the working class, we demand our proportionate share in administration and public expenditure.

K. This is and is designed to be a program of racial effort; and this narrowed goal is forced upon us today by the unyielding determination of certain elements in the white race to enslave, exploit and insult Negroes; but to this vision of work, organization and service, we welcome all men of all races and colors so long as their subscription to this basic creed is sincere and is proven by their deeds.

But we know that control of Capital by the masses is the fundamental & all political + social power

2. We demand enforcement of the laws which give the right to vote to American citizens of Negro descent and in order that they and others may cast an intelligent ballot we ask for national aid to common school education, to be distributed among the several states in accordance with their illiteracy.

SECOND CHOICE

1. Universal Suffrage: There can be no equality of opportunity in political affairs, and consequently no complete democracy, so long as one-half of the adult inhabitants are denied a voice in forming the laws under which they are to live, or so long as any race or group is disfranchised. The right of suffrage should not be denied or abridged on account of sex, or race. We, therefore, demand the nation-wide enfranchisement of women upon equal terms with men, and favor the immediate adoption of the Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Federal Constitution. And we demand the enforcement of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments which gives the right of suffrage to citizens of Negro descent.

THIRD CHOICE

2. We believe that one of the greatest difficulties in democratic government today as yesterday is the ignorance of the masses of men. We demand national aid to common school education distributed among the several states in accordance with their illiteracy, and administered without discrimination against any race or class to the end that all laws and customs which directly or indirectly disfranchise any race or class may be repealed and changed without danger to the common weal.

cept. They, therefore, withdrew into the African Methodist and Zion Methodist Churches. The Baptists, even among the slaves had their separate churches, and these churches in the North began to federate about 1836. In 1871 the Methodist Church, South, set aside their colored members into the colored Methodist Episcoapl Church, and the other Southern churches drove their members into the other colored churches. The remaining Northern denominations retained their Negro members, but organized them for the most part into separate congregations.

Practically, then, the seven-eighths of the whole Negro population is included in its own self-sustaining, self-governing church bodies. Nearly all of the other eighth is economically autonomous to a very large degree. It is natural that to-day the bulk of organized efforts of Negroes in any direction should center in the church. The Negro church is the only social institution of the Negroes which started in the forest and survived slavery; under the leadership of the priest and medicine man, afterward of the christian pastor, the church preserved in itself the remnants of African tribal life and became after emancipation the center of Negro social life. So that to-day the Negro population of the United States is virtually divided into Church congregations, which are the real units of the race life. It is natural, therefore, that charitable and rescue work among Negroes should first be found in the churches and reach there its greatest development.

The statistics for Negro churches in 1906 according to the United States Census was as follows: "The total number of communicants or members, as reported by 36,563 organizations, is 3,685,097; of these, as shown by the returns for 36,648 organizations, 37.5% are males and 62.5% females.

According to the statistics, these organizations have 35,160 churches with a seating capacity of 10,481,738, as reported by 33,091

2. To put forward a series of labor laws which should make the exploitation of Negro labor secure.

Both these things they were able to do under the cry of race prejudice. No method of inflaming the darkest passions of men were unused. The lynch mob was given its glut of blood, and egged on by purposely exaggerated and often wholly invented tales of crime on the part of perhaps the most peaceful and sweet-tempered race the world has ever known. Under the flame of this outward noise went the more subtle and dangerous work. Laws were passed, in the States where three-fourths of the Negroes live, so ingeniously framed that a black university graduate could be prevented from voting and the most ignorant white hoodlum could be admitted to the polls. Labor laws were so arranged that imprisonment for debt was possible, and leaving an employer could be made a penitentiary offence. Negro schools were cut off with small appropriations, or wholly neglected, and a determined effort was made, with wide success, to see that no Negro had any voice in either the making or administration of local, state or national law.

30. 27d-28

In order to accomplish this, it was,of course, necessary to secure the white labor vote of the South and the neutrality of the North. The former was accomplished by throwing white and black laborers so far as possible into rival competing groups and making each feel that the one was the cause of the other's troubles. To-day the white laborer regards the Negro artisan as a "scab" working for low wages, and the Negro regards the white workman as a tyrant who keeps him out of the Union and forces him to work for low wages. Meantime, the neutrality of the North has been secured through their fear for the safety of large investments in the South, and through the fatalistic attitude common both in America and Europe toward the possibility of real advance on the part of the darker nations.

To understand this development better let us return to the economic condition of the Negro.

The chief occupations of Negroes in 1890 and 1900 : exact figures were as follows: taking the Negro population at least ten years of age, engaged in specified occupations.

Silence under these conditions means tacit approval. The indifference of the North is already responsible for more than one assault upon democracy, and every such attack reacts as unfavorably upon whites as upon blacks. Discrimination once permitted cannot be bridled; recent history in the South shows that in forging chains for the negroes, the white voters are forging chains for themselves. ~~"A house divided against itself cannot stand";~~ this government cannot exist half slave and half free any better to-day than it could in 1861. Hence we call upon all the believers in democracy to join in a national conference for the discussion of present evils, the voicing of protests, and the renewal of the struggle for civil and political liberty.

sooner than it will, instead of surrendered to war led by private capitalism.

As time passes the possibility of any such laboratory experiment in studying the American Negro as an integrated group will become progressively impossible. The walls of segregation and caste are falling, which is the objective of all those who are working to solve the Negro problems. But if the efforts of statesmen and social workers could be guided by science the solutions would be quicker and better. As it is they are guided in the United States by the thought and method which is currently dominant. This, happens at present to be the anarchy of private capitalism guided by individual profit making and what we call the American "way of life." American Negroes are therefore dividing themselves into classes with the rich exploiting or helping to exploit the poor and with all the fantastic consequences which Franklin Frazier has shown so clearly in his BLACK BOURGEOSIE. Not only then American Negroes, but other groups the world over will have lost at least for a time the guidance of that social science which the Atlanta University Studies tried to start.

labor was thoughtlessly born to hate the slave and in new free labor states like Kansas and California in the early days the laws against Negroes were severe as the laws against slavery.

This inborn tendency found further justification in the fact that the freed Negro having worked formerly for nothing was delighted on emanciaption to work for almost nothing. This lowered the general level of wages in sections and communities and everywhere in certain lines of work. The wrath of the laborers was forthwith directed not simply against the low wages and the men who paid them, but alos and even more virulently against the men who received them.

These poor black workers mertied no such anger. They accepted low wages because the low wages were higher than any they had ever received before. They knew nothing of the struggle of wage slaves for higher wage; they did not know the A B.C. of agitation. To meet this situation two paths were open to the working class. To educate this new free working class up to the plain of demanding a living wage, or to ignore them and to try and organize the working class along the color line.

First the labor movement in the United States tried more or less sincerely the broader and worthier method.

The Evans brothers who came from England as labor agitators about 1825, put among their twelve demands: "10th. Abolition of chattel slavery and of wages slavery."From 1840 to 1850 labor reformers were, in many cases, earnest abolitionists; as one of them said in 1847:

"In my opinion the great question of labor, when it shall come up, will be found paramount to all others, and the operatives of New England, peasant of Ireland and laborers of South America will not be lost sight of in sympathy for the Southern slave."

"Indeed the anti-slavery agitation and the organization of the mechanics of the United States kept pace with each other; both were revolutionary in their character and although the agitators differed in their methods, the ends in view were the same, viz. the freedom of the man who worked."

Along with this movement went many labor disturbances which had economic causes especially the series of riots in Philadelphia from 1829 until after the war, when the Negroes suffered greatly at the hands of white workingmen." The civil war with its attendant evils bore heavily on the laboring classes, and led to wide-spread agitation and various attempts at organization.

"In New York City, especially, the draft was felt to be unjust by laborers because the wealthy could buy exemption for $300. A feeling of disloyalty to union and bitterness toward the Negro arose. A meeting was called in Tammany Hall and Greeley addressed them. Longshoremen and railroad employees struck at times and assaulted non-unionists. In New York Negroes took the places of longshoremen and were assaulted."

After the war attempts to unite all workingmen and to federate the trade unions were renewed and following the influence of the Emancipation Proclamation a more liberal tone was adopted toward black men. On August 19, 1896, the National Labor Union said in its declaration:

"In this hour of the dark distress of labor, we call upon all laborers of whatever nationality, creed or color, skilled or unskilled, trades unionists and those now out of union to join hands with us and each other to the end that poverty and all its attendant evils shall be abolished forever."

On August 19, 1867, the National Labor Congress met at Chicago, Ill., There were present 200 delegates from the states of North Carolina, Kentucky, Maryland and Missouri. The president, Z.C. Whatley, in his report said among other things:

"The emancipation of the slaves has placed us in a new position, and the question now arises, What labor position shall they now occupy? They will begin to learn and to think for themselves, and they will soon resort to mechanical pursuits and thus come in contact with white labor. It is necessary that they should not undermine it, therefore the best thing that they can do is to form trades unions, and thus work in harmony with the whites."

It was not, however, until the organization of the Knights of Labor that workingmen began effective co-operation. The Knights of Labor was founded in Philadelphia in 1869 and held its first national convention in 1876. It was for a long time a secret organization, but it is said that from the first it recognized no distinctions of "race, creed or color."

Nevertheless admission must in all cases be subject to a vote of the local assembly where the candidate applied, and at first it required but three black balls to reject an applicant. This must have kept Northern Negroes out pretty effectively in most cases. On the other hand the shadow of black competition began to loom in the horizon. Most people expected it very moon and the Negro exodus of 1879 gave widespread alarm to labor leaders in the North. Evidence of labor movements in the South too gradually appeared and in 1880 the Negroes of New Orleans struck for a dollar a day but were suppressed by the militia.

Such considerations led many trade unions, notably the iron and steel workers and the cigar makers, early in the eighties, to remove "white" from their membership restrictions and leave admittance open to Negroes at least in theory. The Knights of Labor also began proselyting in the South and by 1885 were able to report from Virginia:

"The Negroes are with us heart and soul, and have organized seven assemblies in this city (Richmond) and one in Manchester with a large membership."

So,too, the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners said about 1886 that they had Negro unions as far South as New Orleans and Galveston:

"In the Southern States the colored men working at the trades have taken hold of the organization with avidity, and the result is the Brotherhood embraces 14uunions of colored carpenters in the South."

The Knights of Labor, after a brilliant career, having probably at one time over half a million members, began to decline owing to internal dissentions and today having perhaps 50,000 -100,000 members. Coincident with the decline of the Knights of Labor came a larger and more successful movement - The American Federation of Labor which has now nearly a million members.

The attitude of the American Federation of Labor may be summed up as having passed through the following stages:

1. "The working people must united and organize irrespective of creed, color, sex, nationality or politics."

This was an early declaration but was not embodied in the constitution. It was reaffirmed in 1897, after opposition. Bodies confining membership to whites were barred from affiliation.

2. "Separate charters may be issued to Central Labor Union, Local Unions or Federal Labor Unions composed exclusively of colored members."

This adopted by the convention of 1902 and recognizes the legality of excluding Negroes from local unions, city central labor bodies, etc.

3. A National Union which excludes Negroes expressly by constitutionaly provision may affiliate with the A.F.L.

No official announcement of this change of policy has been made, but the fact is well known in the case of the Railway Trackmen, Telegraphers, and others.

4. A National Union already affiliated with the A. F. L. may amend its laws so as to exclude Negroes.

This was done by the Stationary Engineers at their Boston convention in 1902, and an (unseccessful?) attempt in the same line was made by the Molders at their convention the same year. Thr A. F. L. has takem no public action in these cases.

The net result of all this movement has been to convince the American Negro that his greatest enemy is not the employer who robs him, but his white fellow workingmen. For thirty years, he has been taught this lesson by the working man himself: between 1881 and 1900, fifty strikes occurred in the United States against the employment of Negroes and probably twice that number really against Negroes, but ostensibly against non-union men, when in reality the Negro was not permitted to join the union.

The socialist party must know and heed this history. The Negro workingman is daily increasing in efficiency. Small Negro capitalists are arising. The whole trend of thought among Negroes is for reasons given and other reasons distinctly capitalistic. The employign classhas given hugh sums of money wrung from underpaid white laborers to furnish Negro schools and other institutions which the States controlled largely by the white laborers vote refused to furnish. Small wonder that the average Negro can be counted on as the solid unwavering ally of capitalistic government and looks on strike breaking as a more than justifiable blow to his enemies.

Facing such a situation what has socialism to say to these black men? Is it going to ignore them, or segregate them or complain because they do not forthwith adopt a programme of some revolution of which they know nothing or a movement which they are not invited to join.

My name is John Brown. I have been well known as Old Brown of Kansas 2 of my sons were killed here today & I am dying too. I came here to liberate slaves & was to receive no reward I have acted from a sense of duty & am content to await my fate. I am an old man. Yesterday I could have killed whom I chose but I had no desire to kill any person. If I had succeeded in running off slaves this time I could have raised 20 times as my men as I have now for a similar expedition. But I have failed

I should be 60 yrs old should I live to May 9, 1860. I have enjoyed much of life as it is & have been remarkably prosperous having early learned to regard the welfare & prosperity of others as my own ++ I might go on to recount unnumbered blessings, among which would be some very severe afflictions & those the most needed blessings of all; & now when I think how easily I might be led & shall all I have done or suffered in the cause of Freedom, I hardly dare wish another voyage ~~of~~ even if I had the opportunity

My love & all that love their neighbors
I have asked & be spared from hearing any weak or hypocritical prayers made over me when I am publicly murdered & that my only religious attendants be poor little dirty ragged bareheaded & barefooted slave boys & girls, led by some old gray haired slave mother.

The Rampin

Let them hang me I forgive them for they know not what they do. I have no regret for the transaction for which I am condemned. I went against the laws of men it is true, but whether it be right to obey God or men, Judge ye!

I feel astonished that one so exceedingly vile as I am should even be suffered & have a place anyhow or anywhere among the very least of all whom when they come to die (as all must) were permitted to pay the debt of nature in defence of the Right & of God's eternal & immutable truth

I, John Brown, am now quite certain that the crimes of this guilty land will never be purged away but with blood

The lesson

Who' Love repine & reason Chafe

There came a voice ——

Much after intelligent and sympathetic examination he seems best fitted + which seems also best fitted to encourage his own individual ability, and self respect.

By encouraging the Talented Teach the Shaker seek to select such quiet one every ~~one~~ one of exceptional ability and encourage such ability by the very best and most exhaustive training in order to supply Negro leaders thinkers, technologists and artist to the world. Every method of public awards, Medals, honorable mention scholarships &c should be used

& we should set the Negro before the world as a creative artist and as a strong sympathetic subject for artistic treatment

By Political action we should organize the voters of the Negro & train them in modern political methods for the enfranchisement of their disfranchised men & women, for enlightened labor legislation & for general social reform. Particularly must we divorce them from the bribery of Patronage & office

By education we must seek to train ~~the~~ colored children & become intelligent citizens & efficient workers. ~~and~~ We must see that every American child has a chance to learn to read ~~and~~ write & cipher; that beyond this he has a chance to gain some comprehension of the world in which he lives. We must then train him as an intelligent doer of that part of the world's work for causes that cry for the same good democratic ideal for which each stands.

This has been peculiarly true of the fight of enfranchisement across the lines of race and sex. In the ~~good~~ democratic upheaval in India one continually hears on the lips of enlightened men the greatest contempt for the English suffragettes and for Votes for Women anywhere. Here in the United States large numbers of colored men & of their advisers regard militant feminism with ~~hostility~~ as an unnatural fact, and the ~~Suffragettes~~ leaders of the Women's Social and Political Union have never been welcomed in this country.

On the other hand I dare say a woman suffrage rally has been held in the last 10 years where fool or bad some one did not base the desirability of votes for women on the undesirability of votes for black folk. At times the argument has even taken a further step and we have been asked to contemplate the abnormality of allowing the coach-driver to vote when the mistress was denied. The subtle ~~implication~~ known in all such arguments is ~~that~~ the covert appeal to class, ~~prejudice~~ & to aristocracy as against democracy: the subtle assumption that the husband & wife lies not in any ~~disfranchisement~~ so much as in the disfranchisement of some one else whom I do not regard ~~as my equal or whom~~ who should not be regarded by others as my equal. ~~as fair of any said disfranchisement~~

Manifestly such arguments & attitude is dangerous and unworthy of so great a cause as this, & yet, unfortunately, many (not permanent arguments for democracy can be based on undemocratic foundations. The bigotry & tyranny of class exclusion cannot be made the high way to universal suffrage.

I am not here to ask therefore that the Woman's Suffrage movement ~~shall~~ be ~~especially~~ & ~~exclusively~~ a movement of Negro or the greater freedom of the laboring man to vote but I am here to insist that every argument for the abolition of sex discrimination in the use of the franchise is an argument against the political slavery of races; and that no objection has ever been raised against the right of black men to vote but what the same argument true and supposed difference has been hurled against voting women: One has only to name the arguments of inherent inferiority, constitutional incapability, economic dependency and dependency of brutal force to realize the striking parallelism.

Why now has there been this peculiar tendency of the Disfranchised to make common cause against each other in these modern days? It is without doubt by reason of the [illegible] movement which [illegible] the early 20th century as contrasted with the philosophy of the early 19th Many earnest but ~~fe~~ shallow ~~or~~ ~~ex~~ ~~cen~~ ~~con~~ ~~fe~~ thinkers have concluded that the democracy & ~~and~~ universal suffrage for which the fathers fought was a mistaken ideal and that we demand today efficiency rather than or indeed in spite of democracy. In no other way can we obtain the rise of the strong executive, the concentrated cabinets & commissions, the ~~de~~ subservience of militarism & a certain contempt for popular election.

Any new movement for enfranchisement must face the new & strong ~~allie~~ allies and small wonder that the new movement is ~~tempted~~ tempted to say: we too would deny ~~my~~ all ~~too~~ and unite ~~with~~ the ~~the~~ elected look upon us not as advocates of further democratization of the world but rather as allies & your own kith & kin who will help you make the world less democratic & more African.

Right here then it seems to me is the place for a warning word. Our the connection between democracy & Negro suffrage, and the future development & generalment in these respects. In saying this word I assume to speak not so much to those who seek a place in democracy as to those who have won it. The road to be traveled for woman suffrage has been a long one agencies more years ago when the suffrage movement was not a commonplace but when women who labored to demand the vote took their reputations, & their freedom & future

& [in] [illegible] safely in their hands
& when the helm of the ship was in the hands of the greatest advocate
Frederick Douglas was not deposed Today the fight is over. The guerilla warfare will continue & the struggle
[illegible] will may defend them
[illegible] [illegible] for yet many years. It is [illegible] merely a question of time when woman will vote in every civilized land & in every land that writes D. after [illegible]
In defence of democracy therefore I asked with this new cause. I asked & [illegible] [illegible] you not ask those who ask and as more who have & will have the ballot and who have thus forced forward the frontiers of human ~~democracy~~ democracy. Do other words

What is going to be your attitude when other hands without fear open the gates of opportunity? Will you join the cursed armadillos and dollar-chasers in efficiency & what they have profit in efficiency & therefore greater & greater reduction of the ballot & the lopping off of the failures?

To answer the questions raised here there are certain fundamental truths which we must consider & certainties as an human democracy & capabilities. There is not the slightest scientific reason for assuming that a normal human being of any race or sex cannot reach normal human development if he is given a reasonable chance. This is of course denied. It is denied by unduly & so frequently ~~that~~ and such such spontaneous conviction that most unbiassed people seem to assume that most human beings are not human, and have no right to human treatment or human opportunity. This fact is not as strange as it seems ~~How are so blind as those nearest the object~~ ! More have more persistently and dogmatically mistaken on the inherent inferiority of women than the men with whom they come in closest contact. It is the husbands brothers sons of women whom it has been most difficult to induce to consider women seriously or to acknowledge that women have rights which men are bound to respect. So too it is those who live in closest contact with black folk who

Human beings are and must be mutually dependent on each other. It always should not be [illegible] each other's weakness

People do not associate with each other we associate with our ideas of each other & their people have either the [illegible] ability or courage to question their own ideas have most unhesitatingly asserted the utter unfitness of living human negroes who were not either industrial or political slaves and social pariahs. All this shows that none are so blind as those who will not see. The thing seen, and on the other hand the history of the world is the history of the discovery of the common humanity of human beings and steadily increasing circles of them.

What reasonable doubt is there then that the flood of democracy that has successfully overflowed the barriers of family locality class station & race, will not just as surely surmount the rampants of race. It would be a. Political democracy is a contradiction terms.

The fact is that what has been regarded as a limitation of democracy is simply a limitation of the democratic method of the past — a method which I may call the method of the Majority. I remember that ~~was~~ excellent little high school text book Woodhoff's Politics where I first read of government had this sentence at the beginning of its most important chapter: "The first duty of a minority is to become a majority" ~~This is a statement that has been denounced~~ This is a statement which has its underlying truth but it also has its dangerous falsehood for any minority which cannot become a majority is not worthy of any consideration. No greater misdemeanor of office, could be committed than this. We have assembled in democratic government which only entrusts the Majority to make it rule by divine right and to make the rule hereditary in the same Majority. We have come to look on minorities as obstacles & usurpers & to give them no serious attention unless we feared a revolution at the ballot box when we suddenly discover Aristocrats or Laboremen or Communists and treat them a bit more considerate because they may become rulers at some time.

All this we assume to be inherently hard and based of democratic government & because the revolt against the supply of ability and kind of new ideas. But like all impulsive results do stands backgrounds. If the absolute monarchy of Napoleon is found inefficient are they any more inefficient than the absolute monarchy of individuals or ~~are~~ classes or races? Surely not & just as the correction of absolutism was to call the people to counsel so the future democratic Napoleons will call aristocrats to counsel. People & governments will not in future assume that because they have the brute power to impose momentarily dominant ideas that it is best to do so wise and thoughtful conference with the ideas of smaller groups & individuals.

That this method is already coming in vogue we can see in the numerous groups of modern legislatures. Marked by the unanimity attained & divide all sensible ideas and plans between the great parties, modern legislatures in advanced nations tend to develop minority groups & government is carried on by tendency coalitions. It is only the fear of war that drowns ideas in dogma and war is the child of national & racial prejudice.

The ~~people~~ persons then who Bore formed in the dawn of the 20th century to hold in the minds of men must come with the firm conviction that no nation race or sex has a monopoly of ability or ideas; that no group is so small as to deserve to be ignored as part of an integral and indebted part of the mass of men.
That no group of 10 million black folk even tho they are at the mercy of a 90 million white majority can be silenced of voice in government or the right to self development until at a blow at the very foundations of all democracy & all human uplift? You cannot dispose of the rights of white men in this land & ignore the rights of black men. You cannot seek to uplift 45 millions inside women on the backs & degradation of 5 millions of your brothers sisters. The battle of Murdens democratic government to vindicate carried forward by the enfranchisement of woman suffrage must not be forestalled by the continued disfranchisement of 8 millions negroes.

The doctrine of the same rights of majorities leads to almost monstrous inconsistency on a dead level of mediocre likeness. It insists that all people be alike or be ostracized. At the same time the greatest accusation is decent to be like: the Puritan is accused of vanity to be a man; the realist is accused of envy of the rich & the black man is accused of wanting to be white. Any one of these should

There are times, when the heart swells up
In every human breast,
With its feelings undefined,
Beyond a vague unrest.

There are times when the past comes back
Like a plodding caravan train,
And emotions, dead, revive,
With mingled joy and pain.

To-night I have sat and watched,
In the burning fire-light glow,
Pass many a scene and face
Before me to and fro.

On the face of some, there was
A smile of youth and glee,
And childhood's shadowy dream,
Came flitting back to me.

The old home and its hearth
On a pleasant wintry night,
Gave again to a babbling six,
Its warmth, its glow and light.

Two girls, four frolicsome boys,
The flickering fire light showed Around a noisy hearth,
Where a silent mother sewed.

A quarrel, then a making up,
Some sweet old song is led,
A scary tale, or blindman's buff,
A tucking off to bed.

Then a shadowy dreamy face
Was alone in the firelight glow,
Hands plying the needle and thread,
With many a rent to sew.

The silence and the night,
Wear on as wear they must,
While six young sleepers sleep
The sleeping of the just.

But the glimpse of childhood home
With all its smiles and tears,
Like the moving caravan
Passed on with other years.

Then youth, gay youth and hope
Which only fair scenes know,
Blazed up in a red-hot blaze,
To fade in the flickering glow.

So many a scene of life,
Passed in my firelight glow,
Like a showman's canvas views,
Before me to and fro.

Thus gladness and regret,
I know not which the most,
Come with these shadowy scenes
As silent as a ghost.

So I have sat and thought
Of many a scene and face,
Which I have loved, and yet,
Have in my heart a place.

But late, so late it is,
The fire has burned so low,
Till ashes cover up
The dying embers' glow.

And I must hie away,
And get me off to bed,
And count my childhood sleep
When my first prayer was said.

I'll say that prayer to night,
For old time's sake to keep,
God bless my friends while "Now
I lay me down to sleep."

God bless them, and, "If I Should die before I wake"
In this last sleep, "I pray
The lord my soul to take."

GLIMPSES OF CHINA.

———o———

THE following is an extract from a private letter written to a member of the faculty by Miss Minor, whom we pleasantly remember as a teacher here in '86–'87, and who is now a missionary in China:

Tientsin, China, Nov. 8, '87.

I'll tell you a little about this place, as I shall probably see it about once a year while I remain in China. The "Foreign Concession" was waste land subject to overflow a few years ago. Now it is a very pleasant city, but quite unlike anything in America. The "mission compounds" here are all quite near together. These compounds are enclosed by high brick walls. The gate is usually an archway, and just within on one side is the room of the gate keeper whose duty is to exclude all improper persons and to lock the gates at night. Inside are the comfortable cottages in which the missionaries live, usually not more than three families in a compound, often a chapel, and sometimes a little building. As you go along the street all that you can see are these high compound walls, with an occasional glimpse thro' an open gate.

It is the foreign, not the native city which I have described. I have made one pilgrimage, in a jinricksha to the Chinese city, and do not care to repeat it. We rode two miles and a half to a dispensary one day–I'll stop right here to tell you a little about Dr. Gloss, whose dispensary we visited.

She is a very enthusiastic young lady who came out about two years ago under the Methodist Board.

Her home is in the Foreign Concession, and in the adjoining compound is her hospital. Here she has "in-patients" and a clinic every day for "out-patients." She spends two afternoons a week in her little dispensary in the native city, where she often treats fifty persons in an afternoon, performing surgical operations and doing all sorts of things. But to return to our jinrickshas. The narrow streets were thronged and packed with people and heavily laden wheel–barrows and donkey carts among which we literaly "wound" our way, often having to stand still for five minutes or more. The Chinamen would get close to us and stand still to stare as only a Chinaman knows how to stare, taking in the most minute details, and showing especial interest in our enormous feet with their queer skin shoes. And you can't imagine the sights and smells and tumult of sounds which greeted us. One is made to realize the phrase "even to the uttermost". The lines occured to me:

"Still thy love, O Christ arisen
Yearns to reach these souls in prison;
Thro' all depths of sin and loss,
Drops the plummet of thy cross;
Never yet abyss was found,
Deeper than that cross could sound!"

The Viceroy of this province, Li Chang, "the Bismark of Asia," has had great improvements made in the city both in cleanliness and in smoothness of the streets, but to put it mildly, there is still room for improvement. The native city, by the way, has outgrown its walls, and there is as much outside as within. This dispensary is without the walls, and after leaving it we climbed the Drum Tower in the center of the wall city, at the intersection of the two main sides which connect four gates. From the second story of this tower or pagoda we looked down upon the floor of roofs below us, when an occasional break gave a glimpse into a tiny court. The Drum Tower is a temple to sacred animals, the fox, snake and others equally noble.

It contans no idols, but tablets to the animals. The temples of China are numerous, but most of them are miserable affairs. I wish that I had time to describe a visit to a Chinese bride, but my letter bids fair to grow to undue proportions.

One institution in Tienisin in which I have been very much interested, is the "Viceroy's Hospital," in charge of a Dr. Mackenzie from Gt. Britain, with whom medical and religeous work go hand in hand. There were fifty conversions last year among his in-patients. He has a class of thirteen young men, supported by government, who are taking a three years course to fit them for navy surgeons. A class of four were graduated last year. Of these thirteen, nine are earnest Christains. Think what an influence they will exert in the future! I attended Dr. Mackenzie's Sunday School class of young men, where English was spoken. I doubt whether any where you could find a class of young men who would show deeper intellectual and spiritual insight into the passages studied than they did.

I am ready now for the second installment, for the courier will be starting for Tientsin in two or three days. I want to write next a description of our mission premises here, and some phases of our life, and then I may hold forth, not philosophically, on the Chinese language. These won't be missionary letters, for I shall know practically nothing of mission work for some time to come, and want to avoid giving any false impressions.

It was the fifteenth of November when we reached home and took breakfast with Dr. and Mrs. Merrith, the only missionaries at the station except those who came up with me. They have been here only two years, tho' both of them are about half way thro'the thirties. My home has been with them thus far, and I hope that it will continue to be for they are like a brother and sister to me already. They are very delightful people, brimful of fun and life, but Dr. Merrith has as much missionary spirit to the cubic inch as one often finds. The other people here are just as nice only in a rather more formal and proper way, and I am sure that we shall all be very happy together. The old workers here were so glad to welcome the new recruits, for they had been calling for reinforcements for so long, and the native Christians greeted us so warmly that we felt at once that we had got to the right place. We had a genuine Thanksgiving this week. I am sure that I had more reasons for thankfulness than I have ever had before. I don't think that there is any earthly happiness to surpass that of finding a place in which to work. The hard part of it is that I can't get at the real work until I have worked at the langnage for about a year. It is quite a trial to see these people around and not be able to do anything for them.

I commenced work in the language, with a Chinese teacher, the day after I reached here, and am pegging away at it with all my might. I erjoy the study very much. My teacher and I carry on the most astonishing conversations. He knows about ten English words. I struggle laboriously thro' a sentence three or four times, then perhaps he grasps my idea and expresses it in language which usually bears a remote relationship to that which I used. In English we inflect a sentence; in Chinese the meaning of each individual word depends upon the inflection or tone given it, and you have to slide up the words and down them and over them in all sorts of shapes. One word without changing its spelling, has thirty different meanings depending entirely on the way in which it is pronounced.

I havn't time to describe at length our mission premises. They are Chinese dwellings with foreign floors, doors and windows. The three courts are paved with brick and poles are arranged overhead so that matting can be spread on them in summer to keep out the sun. Each inn is a little house by itself except the three in the rear of the Merrith court, and the two corresponding ones back of the Piersne court. The halls etc., are really covered passages with independent walls. The houses are of native brick, which is grey, and the bricks are laid with the broad side showing. The houses are only one story with quaint tall roofs such as you have probably seen in pictures, and with red woodwork under the roof and about he doors and windows. The walls of the main court come just up to the edge of the roof, and have open-work tile ornamentations at the top. There are five gateways, only the inner and outer gates in the main courts being gates proper. The other's have simply the tile roof supported by pillars. The whole affair is quite picturesque, and the houses are very comfortable.

This property is only rented. The mission has recently bought ground outside the walls, and is beginning to put up some foreign houses. One house may be ready so that a family can get out of the city next sali. At present the mission has to be deserted by foreigners during the summer because it is'nt safe to stay in a closely packed Chinese city of one or two hundred thou sand inhabitants during the intense heat.

The nearest cities to us are Tien tsin and Pekin, each a hundred miles away. We were six days in coming here on the river, but we did not travel on Sunday.

We shall have almost unbroken sunshine all thro' the winter. The trouble with our surrouudings here is that we have so little opportunity for exercise.

We have made one expedition out side the walls. We have to go out in springless Peking carts, which are simply indescribably dreadful on these rough roads.

My disappointments have all been happy ones, and I look forward only with pleasant anticipations to my life in China, hoping that I can spend my whole life here. I think often of you all, and of my pleasant year at Fisk, and hope that our first home mail will bring a letter from some of the friends there.

TOM BROWN AT FISK.

In three chapters.

CHAPTER. III

IT was the close of the Christmas Rhetoricals. The bustling of departing visitors and students mingled with the congratulations poured upon the successful orators. One group stood near the door. You could easily recognize the affable voice of Thompson, for Thompson was a senior now, and of course—well he was a senior and every body knew it. "Who was that tall dark young man that spoke so splendidly ?" asked one of the group, an octaroon with black waving hair and twinkling eyes, pretty, and cognizant of the fact. "Oh' that was Brown. He's a freshman ; this is his first time on. Smart fellow that ; lost one year to take care of his mother 'till she died and then came back and not only kept up with his class, but made another. You ought to have seen him when he first came! green, whew !" "Yes, he's my chum," said another, a pretty little fellow dressed in the latest style, so that he almost looked like a laundried collar with a head on it. "Wouldn't you like to meet him?" "O yes! Do bring him here." answered Miss Floyed (the beauty), "I should like to see him ever so much." In a few moments our Tom was bowing and scraping before the group of young ladies and probably would have been blushing had not that been a physical impossibility. "Really you must come and see us" said Miss Stanley, "we live on South High." "Thank you, I will" said Tom, as visions of beauty and cake passed before his already excited brain. "Tell you, boy, you've struck a big thing. We'll have a racket in the city during the holidays," said Carter, Tom's chum, as he returned from escorting his charges to the city. "I believe Bess Floyed's stuck on you, fellow." "O pshaw! stop your nonsense" said Tom as he tucked up in the bed-clothes and industriously tried to go to sleep, which he succeeded in doing at last and dreamed that he and Miss Floyed were married and that he was the greatest orator—I don't know what else he might have dreamed had not the warning bell for breakfast started him from his slumbers. On their way from breakfast Carter imparted some very important information to Tom. "Boy, I've got an invitaion for you to night at Miss Stanley's. Going to have a big time. Then next week we've something on docket for every night. I tell you, we'll just paint Nashville red ; show 'em what Fiskites can do. Of course you'll need a new suit and some laundry, etc, but—" "But I have'nt any money,—not a cent," said Tom dubiously. "Borrow," replied Carter sententiously, as if that was a very common method with himself. "I dont like to do that ". "Bah! don't get squeamish now! why, fellow, you ought to have heard Miss Floyed talking about you. Why, I tell you we'll have all these fellows opening their eyes when they see us having such a big time in the city." Tom kept thinking the matter over as he was cleaning up the room, and it must be confessed that under the ceaseless running of Carter's tongue his scruples were fast melting away. "But Miss Parmelee won't excuse us so often." "Go without an excuse then. I don't propose to be shut up here all the Christmas just because those teachesr want me to be. I'm a man and propose to do as I please." "The teachers don't want you shut up here. They don't think it right however to be running out too much and staying up nights, and I don't—" "Well, you can stay here and read the Bible if you want to. Hello! there's a letter—no, a card for you. Whew! registered letter down in the office for you. Tell you, Brown, you're luckey. We can have a racket now, hey?" "Ye-es, but that money was for my school warrants and I ought to give it to Stickel." "Well I declare! You're the biggest gump-head I ever saw!" Suffice it to say that Tom took ten dollars to the Treasurer and put the remaining thirty in his pocket, and then wanted to be provoked because the Treasurer was a little gruff. Soon Tom had a new suit with a long-tailed coat, a package of laundried collars and cuffs, and countless neckties and handkerchiefs. The first two nights of eating and dancing quite turned his head, and made him deeply in love with Miss Floyed's curls. The third night the Matron flatly refused to excuse them, and they followed Carter's plan and went anyhow, for as Carter argued "they could easily get back by ten." However Carter wasn't ready to depart at that time, being engaged in a very confidential conversation with Miss Stanley, and although Tom hated to leave Miss Floyed's black eyes, he departed alone. As he crossed the railroad he saw the lights in Livingstone beginning to go out and he started out in full gallop. As he neared the bridge his foot struck a stone and he fell spranling into one of the spacious mud-puddles which can always be found in that vicinity. Picking himself up he started out again and reached the door just in time—to find it locked. Here was a pretty fix! If he aroused the watchman he was sure to be reported, and if he didn't,—ah! here was a window left open; he crawled in, sneaked up stairs and dreamed all night that officers were arresting him for burglary. Carter turned up bright and early, in time for breakfast, and started to whisper in Tom's ear:

> Of the midnight run off—"

but was promptly checked by a pitcher of water. Tom did not go out much the rest of the week. New Year's day however, he could not resist the temptation, especialy when it was backed by a dainty missive, saying "Miss F. would be disappointed, if" &c.&c,&c. "I'm not going to buy any more cards" said Carter. "We won't need 'em." Tom readily consented for he had only fifteen cents left. They were ashamed to ask for excuses again so away they went without them. Arriving at the house they boldly rang the bell and when the door was opened by a small boy, stepped in and began to take off their over coats, when the boy held up a little server, and said, "Thirteen cards, pleth thir." Tom stood and looked at the boy for a moment and then turned just in time to see Carter's coat-tails disappearing down the street. Soon only the boy and server were left in the hall. Cards however were purchaced and written in short order and often waiting long enough for the affair to be forgotten, they returned and spent the evening in most agreeable company. This time even Tom could not tear away by ten, and, to make a long story short, staid out all night. "We're in for it now," said Carter as he came up stairs after breakfast, "The President wants us down in his office. He knows it all." The final result was that Carter, being an old offender, packed his trunk, while Tom received a severe reprimand, which was very affective

It wouldn't have been so hard but when he reached his room he found a note wnich stated that Mr. and Mrs. John Floyd would be pleased with his company at the marriage of their daughter Bessie, to Mr. J. R. Bruce, at Louisville, Ky., Feb. 9, 188–. Tom didn't shed any tears, merely walked to the mirror and said, "Tom Brown, you're a fool!" and the young man in the mirror seemed to assent, without any mental reservations.

Ella Boyd had been compelled to loose two years for financial reasons, and was consequently a Senior Normal at the same time Tom a Senior College. They did not meet very often, for Tom's Freshman escapade had settled the girl question with him, as he thought, and he was tending strictly to his studies, while she was pursuing her quiet way as usual, not even bothered now by Thomson. The scholarship and deportment of both were very high, and once in a while they mutually sought one anothers advice as to certain pet schemes. Ella had a taste for literary work and Tom's practical common-sense was often of use in toning down too brilliant passages: Tom was doing some extra work in the sciences and sometimes made her his confidant as to his future plans. Commencement soon drew near, and one day as Tom was passing the little grove in the north-west corner of Victoria square, "getting off" his oration he happened to overhear a conversation to which, being personal, he could not be blamed for listening. "That Tom Brown is jnst making a fool of Ella Boyd. Like to see myself running aronnd after a boy as she does. And then he's homely as a hedge-fence—" just then Tom happened to spy Ella seated on a bench not far away, also, probably, getting the benefit of the conversation. Tom said nothing. Commencement passed off nicely. After dinner Tom spoke to Ella and asked her to take a little walk. O no, really she conldn't now she must go up stairs and pack. "I had something very important to say to you " "Well can't you say it here, Mr. Brown?" "You used to call me Tom." "I used to do a graet many other foolish thing" with a defiant look that said "but I don't intend to again." After considerable argument Miss Boyd was prevailed upon to take a very short walk. I don't know what Tom said but at any rate when Ella came back she did'nt look half as mad as she might have, and her chum had to remind her twice not to pack the lamp in her trunk. At any rate Tom Brown is now a large farmer and stock-raiser in Kansas, worth probably ten thousand, whose christian life and example are worth many times that amount to the community, and Ella Boyd is—his wife.

EDITORIAL.

WE congratulate our sister institution, the Meharry Medical College, on the completion of twelve years of excellent work. This institution is certainly an honor to the race.

THE life of the late Secretary Powell of the A. M. A., as related in the Chapel a few days ago by Secretary Ryder, was certainly a noble one. In him the Negro people especially, have lost a staunch friend. We can best show our appreciation for him by imitating his upright and self-sacrificing character.

THE increase in the number of glasses worn in the University lately, is a sure sign that many of our students are abusing their eyes. The eye is the most faithful and useful of our servants and it behooves us to see that it is used aright. There are some who will loiter away a whole hour when the sun is at the meridian, but in the last rays of twilight or just before breakfast they begin to have a wonderful appreciation of the fact that moments are golden. There are few here who could if they wished prepare their recitations by broad day light or at least with little hard study at night and thus save themselves and teachers much trouble and annoyance.

EDITORIAL TOOHPICK.

THOMAS Carlisle once sharply reproved a student because he had no plans laid for his future life.

If said terse old gentleman were in Fisk to-day he could find several weeks of profitable employment at the same business, to say nothing of a month or so among the Alumni, in which time he would have ample chance to exhaust his vocabulary of expletives. It's a fearful thing to be aimless, yet how many of us are blown about by every wind of desire.

Many of us will be teachers. Why? Because we choose this profession, and fit ourselves carefully for it; no; but because we will drift into it? by accident of situation, and will never drift out. Such a noble calling as teaching should not be taken hold of as an experiment. It is a profession.

It should be treated as such, and not as a mere stepping-stone. No matter what we do, whether we teach, preach, die, or get married let's have an end in view.———Prof Smith's lecture on student life in Germany was very interesting.

Why isn't there a Fisk student at Leipsic, or a Fisk metaphysician at Berlin? Aren't we smart enough? Mures! well, then, have'nt we grit enough? "Mebbe, Mebbe!"—So! now the time draweth nigh when the soph. layeth his Horace carefully away in his table-drawer, and the Senior forgeteth his Moral Philosophy, mournfully they look forth upon the landscape. They revolve multitudinous and divers plans. The sun riseth on their meditations, and noonday findeth them yet deep in thought. Verily what mighty plans absorb them, what ubiquitous design disturbs their homogeneity? A Keely motor? a Ph. D., at Heidelburg? Nay, nay! a greater than these; they are planning for a Spring Suit. O Lord, how long this thusness? Till we're uniformed,— a suit of jeans, and one of wool, for a year's ward-robe.

We are the recipients of a very beautiful valentine from the Pope Manufacturing Co., giving twenty-three reasons for purchasing a Columbia Bicycle. The Editor while very thankful would beg leave to $ay that exce$$ive mode$ty make$ the purcha$e of $aid vehicle @ pre$ent an impo$$ibility. —As the Editor was strolling down 5th Avenue, (3rd floor, Livingstone,) about 9:30 P. M. last Saturday night, meditatively sucking a beef-bone, which he had borowed or stolen, (his memory fails him just here) he was startled by flaming posters at No. 12, inscribed, NOTICE! NOTICE!! starch found!!! Dumbfounded at so strange a discovery, he he joined the immense throng at the entrance and by almost superhum an exertion gained admission. In the middle of the floor with a large field glass was the prospector surrounded by a throng. In close proximity was a chair upon which lay a cuff just from the Fisk Laundry in which the aliedged starch was found. The Editor took a look through the field glass and must confess there were a few signs of the article. However, without doubt it got there by mistake.

HENRY WARD BEECHER AND THE FISK JUBILEE SINGERS.

ONE of the earliest and strongest friends the "Jubilee Singers" ever had was Henry Ward Beecher. That he did not up to the last days of his eventful life forget this early friendship is shown by his address before the Freedmen's Aid Society in London, England, on the 16th of October last. We quote from the address;

"I think there never was such a phenomenon as the building of Fisk University. We talk about castles in the air. That is the only castle that ever I knew built by singing from foundation to top. That is a castle in the air worth having. They sang through our country, and it is one of the things that I cherish with pride that they took their start from Plymouth Church Lecture Room. Oh! those days after the war! My brother Thomas wrote to me that this Jubilee Band were trying to sing their way to the East and see if they could not raise a little money, and urged me to look after them. They called on me. I said, "I do not know whether the folks will bear it or not, but come around on Friday night, at the prayer meeting, and I will give you a chance." On Friday night they sat there, and after the service concluded I said to the people: 'There's a band of singers here, every one of whom has been baptized in slavery, and they are coming to the East to see if they can raise some little funds for their education and their elevation, and now I wish that you would hear them sing a few pieces. I called them up on the platform. There were about eleven hundred people there. The Jubilee Band began to sing. It was still as death. They sang two pieces—tears were trickling from a great many eyes. They sang again, and the audience burst out into a perfect enthusiasm of applause; and when they sung four or five pieces my people rose up in a mass and said: 'These folks must sing in the church.' On Sunday morning I gave out word that on Wednesday the church would be open on payment, not of a shilling–that is the English price. Fifty cents is what we call a respectable fee at the door for anything. Anything that is not worth fifty cents is not worth trying. I had them sing on Sunday morning, and on Wednesday night the church was crowded and crammed, and from that they went on conquering and to conquer. They sang up and down our own country; they sang here; they sang in the presence of the Royal Family; they sang in Paris; they sang in Berlin; they sang before the Emperor William; and when they came back they had earned one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the building of Fisk University." Selected.

OUR NEXT PRESTIDENT.

DELIVERED IN THE SENIOR PREP. RHETORICAL CLASS.

I am not an orator, and as I am a woman, I shall, most likely be considered entirely out of my sphere when I touch on any measure in politics: but even if I am not one of the great, grand and all-aspiring men, I am to quite an extent interested in the next presidential election. Although I do not profess to be posted at all in politcs, you will please allow me to speak in behalf of the man who in my judgment would most honorably and successfully fill the president's chair for the next four years. We know nothing of his political career, none of us know any thing of him as a statesman, but to come nearer home, we all know him. It does not seem to me that the president's chair should always wait for some great general, for some man who has led armies on to victory, nor even to those who boast their ability and intellect: but until the responsible position of presidency is filled by such a man (strange his name may sound to you,) as I have in mind, the United States of America will lack that which might make her one of the grandest nations on the face of the earth.

And when we women are allowed to select the man who is to lord it over us, we will choose just such a man. Until then we must be content with whom you choose to put in office. Excuse me if I deviate a little, but our country needs the female vote. Let us vote, and we will not only give you a president worthy of honor, but we will also drive intoxicating liquor as far from you as the "east is from

Now again to our subject: the man who now occupies the president's chair no doubt does the best he can, but there is always room for improvement; and my candidate will not only be a great improvement; but even a blessing to the country. And when we women go to the polls we will even "stuff" the box for our honored and most beloved friend and instructor: Erastus Milo Cravath; and if the women are for him, who need be against him?

Lizzie Dee Jones.

PEOPLE AND EVENTS.

The annual boat race between Oxford and Cambridge takes place March 24th.

A son of the late Pres. Finny of Oberlin has given $50,000 to the College to be kept till it reaches the sum of $80,000 and then to be expended in the erection of a memorial building to his father.

WEDDING IN TEXAS.

FEBRUARY 8th 1888.

AT the residence of Mr. Wm Watts, one of Longview's highly respected and aristocratic families, occurred the marriage of Miss Celia Phelps and Mr. Wm Scott M. D., both graduates of Fisk University. Long ere seven o,clock, the appointed hour, arrived, the little cottage was filled with loving friends and acqaintances, ex-Fiskites, some coming on the train and others on horseback

The bride was becomingly attired in a dark gray travelling suit, trimmed with plaid velvet.

The bridegroom with his usual comely dignity and reserve, wore a handsome suit of broadcloth and black kid gloves.

As they stood there among schoolmates, friends and acquaintances, and pledged themselves to ever remain true and faithful to each other we could but say as the poet:

"So stately his form and so lovely her face;
That never a hall such a galliard did grace."

After ceremony supper was served, then amid inumerable congratulations and good wishes the happy couple boarded the south bound train to Richmond, Texas, there future home, where the Dr has a large and paying practice.

We wish them God-speed and a long life.

EXCHANGES.

The Moderator a monthly journal published at Lansing, Mich., is for keeping teachers and students up with the latest methods of instruction, a sparkling gem.

If many of our exchanges would devote more to general topics than to pursonals and locals so many readers of college journals would not feel like stopping after reading about a page and half, and the interest would be increased. Now most are filled with advertisments, personal and locals.

Butchell College has just completed a gymnasium that cost $15,000; Oberlin is in hopes of one to cost $50,000; and the University of Michigan is rapidly raising the required amount for their new gymnasium.

There is a girl in Michigan. six feet nine inches tall, and when her lover stands on his tip toes and pleads for a kiss, she stoops to conquer.

The Feb. issue of the High School Record has an amusing article on blind boys playing ball.

The Penn Chronicler is certainly a paper that has the right name, as it always contains interesting articles.

Base Ball seems to be at fever heat with most colleges, as we see in most college papers something about "the nine" either under the head of personals, locals or even in the editorial department.

Most of our exchanges have something to say of Washington's Birthday.

MUSIC AT FISK.

AS we came in at the northwest door of Jubilee Hall, last Friday afternoon, we were struck with the unusual noise in the hall and in the Assembly room. We approached and inquired as to the cause of all this clamor and we were informed that the long hoped for piano had just been putinto the room. Certainly we excused the noise and with the other girls mingled our voices in the rejoicings. The piano comes from Gordon Bros. and a pretty little instrument. One by one have the young ladies welcomed it but March 7th we we welcomed it en masse at the Rehearsal of which the following is the programme:

"Danish Air, King," Ida Mallery
"Under the Pines," Emery, Carrie Carney.
"Rendo Mignon," Baumfelder, Arvilla Bryant.
"Shepherd Boy," Wilson, Nettie Crump.
Sonata, Op. 47, No. 2, Reineke,
Mrs. E. Crawford.
Cradle Song, Barili, Bellina Bryan.
"Shepherd Boy's Song," Karl Merz,
Hermine Smith
Brook Song' Op. 107, Reinecke, Lulu Erving.
"Consolation', S. W. W., Mendelssohn, Miss Cheatham.
"At the Fountain" Op. 311, Spindler,
Flora Wright.
Nocturne No. 15, Chopin, Mary Bennett.
Etude from Op. 46, Heller, Willa Hadley.
"Sweet Violet," Spindler, Mary Coffin.

The Faculty has voted to have the Mozart Concert in April. We need not say that we are all delighted both because we like to hear the Society sing and because the concert is one step nearer the Pipe Organ although perhaps a very short step.

LOCALS.

The appoinments have been made for the oratorical contest.

4. Educational qualification for voters, with an "understanding clause" for poor whites. (Voters must read and write, or understand a clause in the Constitution read to them. The local election officers are the judges of the understanding. This is the Mississippi law.)

5. Educational qualification, with the "grandfather clause" (i. e., admitting ignorant voters if they or their ancestors could have voted January 1st, 1867. This is the Louisiana law and is proposed in North Carolina.)

6. Educational qualification with compulsory "understanding" clause, and also a "grandfather clause." (This requires that a voter must not only read and write, but must also understand the clause read in the constitution. The local election officers are judges of this "understanding." Those who could vote in 1867, or whose ancestors could are excepted. This is the proposed Georgia law.)

The first two steps belong to reconstruction times, and altho they have not wholly disappeared they have fallen into distinct disfavor. The third step must, of course, fail where the whites are divided into parties. The last three are the latest attempts to combine in one bill provision for negro disfranchisement and honest elections among whites.

The negroes of Georgia have become aroused over the Hardwick bill, and have just presented to the Legislature a straightforward and logical memorial, couched in calm and respectful terms. In this document they readily acknowledge that the demand for a government based on the consent of the governed must, in civilized countries, be modified by the proviso that those taking part in government be intelligent. They say: "We join heartily with the best conscience of the State, of the nation and of the civilized world in demanding a pure, intelligent ballot, free from bribery, ignorance, fraud and intimidation. And to secure this, we concur in the movement toward imposing fair and impartial qualifications upon voters, whether based on education, or property, or both.

"Nor is this, gentlemen of the Legislature, a light sacrifice on our part. We negroes are to-day, in large degree, poor and ignorant through the crime of the nation. Through no fault of our own we are here brought into contact with a civilization higher than that of the average of our race. And we have not been sparing in our efforts to improve.

"Notwithstanding all this, so far as the Hardwick bill proposes to restrict the right of suffrage to all who, irrespective of race or color, are intelligent enough to vote properly, we heartily indorse it." They then proceed to point out the two clauses against which they "desire hereby to enter solemn and emphatic protest." They declare that the "grandfather clause" is wrong in theory, unfair in application and "in flat contradiction to those very principles of reform on which the whole proposal is based;" and they assert that the "understanding" clause "is a direct invitation to injustice and fraud." The petition proceeds then to say:

"When race discrimination in political affairs is grounded on real difference in civilization and intelligence, then it is defensible; for in such case it is not really discrimination against color, but against ignorance, poverty and vice. It is for this reason that the nation, the civilized world and the negro himself have acquiesced silently in much of the discrimination against this race. But when race proscription has no such excuse back of it, it stands confessed to the world as a plain wrong.

"If ignorance is dangerous to democratic institutions, then proscribe ignorance and not color.

"If bribery and vote-selling have too often made popular elections in Georgia a farce, then proscribe bribery and vote-selling, and not color.

"It is ignorance and crime that menace decent government in Georgia, and not the color of its citizens. Away, then, with ignorance and crime, but let the rule that regulates the restrictions apply to white and black alike."

It is further pointed out that 22 per cent. of the 518,706 illiterates in Georgia are white, and that negro illiteracy has decreased enormously in a generation, for which they gracefully thank the school system of Georgia. Finally they say:

"For these reasons, gentlemen of the Legislature, we plead for the defeat of the above mentioned features of the Hardwick bill, which would tend to increase that race antagonism between citizens of our State which all good men deeply deplore. We know that there are among our white fellow citizens broad-minded men who

IT is not generally known that there has passed to a second reading in the lower house of the Georgia Legislature a bill radically amending the qualifications for voting in that State. This Hardwick bill goes a step beyond anything yet proposed in the South. Briefly summarized, the steps toward disfranchising the negro have been as follows:

1. Intimidation at the polls.

2. "Counting out" and other false returns of votes.

3. "White primary" system (i. e., preliminary "party" voting under strict State law; to the Democratic primary all white men, even Republicans, are admitted; and no negroes, not even Democratic negroes. The regular election then merely registers formally the decision of the Democratic primary. This system is in vogue in Georgia.

conditions are not peculiar to this little island, and also that they are not of our making, except as our best-intentioned charity may have aggravated the effect of the climate.

The question as to our part in working out the problem,—which is, after all, not of our making,—I put at every mile of the way; the question which the whole temperate zone is putting to the tropics. I asked it of every stolid face; of every idle man; of the boy who walked at my side begging for a centavo; of the father carrying his dead child upon his shoulder, in the glaring sun, to consecrated ground miles away; of the boy who, in primitive fashion, balanced the produce on one side of his panniers with rocks on the other, and of the Indian who guided me through the pathless woods and brought me sugar-cane to suck when I could get no food,—of all these I asked it. I did not need to ask the fallow fields and the bare hillsides; I knew their answer, and it was put into the mouth of the people. It is the answer of all the tropics, that the temperate zone has an obligation there. We certainly have an obligation in Porto Rico.

But there is a hopeful side to the situation in Porto Rico even now, if our theories will let us enjoy it. The schools are being opened all over the island, under competent supervision. Roads and bridges are being built. Franchises are being sought for redeeming swamp-lands, for water privileges, for building street railways and steam railroads across the island. Neglected plantations are being brought into cultivation again, and prosperity seems on the eve of entering the island. The taxes are being honestly collected, and progress is being made toward securing justice to all. These are rather abstract statements, but there are concrete facts back of them. There is no occasion to be jubilant or boastful or sanguine; but if our civilization means anything, it means that the agencies that we have established there will some day bring good to the island and its people.

The orange grows wild in Porto Rico, but it lacks that particular flavor which the cultivated palate demands. Since the American occupation, new-comers have set out orchards with the purpose of grafting slips from California or Florida trees upon native stock, that they may produce, not Porto Rican, but California and Florida oranges. The simile is easily carried into the field of politics.

It will be at least five years before the orange-trees will bear, and then perhaps not abundantly. And the simile will allow the further suggestion that one ought to be as patient with the processes of political growth as the orange-growers are with their slow-fruiting trees. Barring hurricanes, they are as likely to get their California and Florida oranges in time, and the island of Porto Rico will get its civilized fruitage, if only the political storms are not too violent. One may not reason from orange-trees to human beings; but the processes of Nature in the transformation of a wild tree do certainly give most hopeful analogy.

THE AMERICAN NEGRO AT PARIS.

BY W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS

ON the banks of the Seine, opposite the Rue des Nations, stands a large, plain white building, where the promoters of the Paris Exposition have housed the world's ideas of sociology. As a matter of fact, any one who takes his sociology from theoretical treatises would be rather disappointed at the exhibit; for there is little here of the "science of society." On the other hand, those who have followed historically the development, out of the old Political Economy, of a miscellaneous body of knowing chiefly connected with the larger aspects of human benevolence, will here find much of interest: the building and mutual-aid societies of France; the working-man's circles of Belgium; the city governments of Sweden; the Red Cross Society; the state insurance of Germany,—are all here strikingly exhibited by charts, statistics, models, and photographs.

DR. W. E. B. DU BOIS.

The United States section of this building is small, and not, at first glance, particularly striking. There are, in the center, well-made tenement-house models; in one corner a small exhibit of the American Library Association, and elsewhere sets of interesting maps and photographs showing the work of factory inspectors and typical industrial plants. All these exhibits, are, unfortunately, rather fragmentary, and do scant justice to the wonderful social and economic development of America.

In the right-hand corner, however, as one enters, is an exhibit which, more than most others in the building, is sociological in the larger sense of the term—that is, is an attempt to give, in as systematic and compact a form as possible, the history and present condition of a large group of human beings. This is the exhibit of American Negroes, planned and executed by Negroes, and collected and installed under the direction of a Negro special agent, Mr. Thomas J. Calloway.

In this exhibit there are, of course, the usual paraphernalia for catching the eye—photographs, models, industrial work, and pictures. But it does not stop here; beneath all this is a carefully thought-out plan, according to which the exhibitors have tried to show:

(a) The history of the American Negro.
(b) His present condition.
(c) His education.
(d) His literature.

EXHIBIT OF AMERICAN NEGROES AT THE PARIS EXPOSITION.

The history of the Negro is illustrated by charts and photographs; there is, for instance, a series of striking models of the progress of the colored people, beginning with the homeless freedman and ending with the modern brick schoolhouse and its teachers. There are charts of the increase of Negro population, the routes of the African slave-trade, the progress of emancipation, and the decreasing illiteracy. There are pictures of the old cabins, and, in three great manuscript volumes, the complete black code of Georgia, from colonial times to the end of the nineteenth century. Not the least interesting contribution to history is the case given to Negro medal-of-honor men in the army and navy—from the man who "seized the colors after two color-bearers had been shot down and bore them nobly through the fight" to the black men in the Spanish War who "voluntarily went ashore in the face of the enemy and aided in the rescue of their wounded comrades." It was a Massachusetts lawyer who replied to the Patent-Office inquiry, "I never knew a negro to invent anything but lies;" and yet here is a record of 350 patents granted to black men since 1834.

The bulk of the exhibit, is naturally, an attempt to picture present conditions. Thirty-two charts, 500 photographs, and numerous maps and plans form the basis of this exhibit. The charts are in two sets, one illustrating conditions in the entire United States and the other conditions in the typical State of Georgia. At a glance one can see the successive steps by which the 220,000 negroes of 1750 had increased to 7,500,000 in 1890; their distribution throughout the different States; a comparison of the size of the Negro population with European countries bringing out the striking fact that there are nearly half as many Negroes in the United States as Spaniards in Spain. The striking movement by which the 4⅕ per cent. of Negroes living in the cities in 1860 has increased to 12 per cent. in 1890 is shown, as is also the fact that recognized mulattoes have increased 50 per cent. in 30 years, even in the defective census returns. Twenty per cent. of the Negroes are shown to be home-owners, 60 per cent. of their children are in school, and their illiteracy is less than that of Russia, and only equal to that of Hungary.

It was a good idea to supplement these very general figures with a minute social study in a typical Southern State. It would hardly be suggested, in the light of recent history, that conditions in the State of Georgia are such as to give a rose-colored picture of the Negro; and yet Georgia, having the largest Negro population, is an excellent field of study. Here again we have statistics: the increase of the black population in a century from 30,000 to 860,000, the huddling in the Black Belt for self-protection since the war, and a comparison of the age distribution with France showing the wonderful reproductive powers of the blacks. The school enrollment has increased from 10,000 in 1870 to 180,000 in 1897, and the Negroes are distributed among the occupations as follows:

In agriculture, 62 per cent.; in domestic and personal service, 28 per cent.; in manufacturing and mechanical industries, 5 per cent.; in trade and transportation, 4½ per cent.; in the professions, ½ per cent.

They own 1,000,000 acres of land and pay taxes on $12,000,000 worth of property—not large, but telling figures; and the charts indicate, from year to year, the struggle they have had to accumulate and hold this property. There are several volumes of photographs of typical Negro faces, which hardly square with conventional American ideas. Several maps show the peculiar distribution of the white and black inhabitants in various towns and counties.

The education of the Negro is illustrated in the work of five great institutions—Fisk, Atlanta, and Howard Universities, and Tuskegee and Hampton Institutes. The exhibit from Fisk illustrates, by photographs and examination papers, the work of secondary and higher education. Atlanta University shows her work in social study and the work of her college and normal graduates; Howard University shows the work of her professional schools, especially in medicine, theology, and law. From Hampton there is an especially excellent series of photographs illustrating the Hampton idea of "teaching by doing," and from Tuskegee there are numerous specimens of work from the manual-training and technical departments.

Perhaps the most unique and striking exhibit is that of American Negro literature. The development of Negro thought—the view of themselves which these millions of freedmen have taken—is of intense psychological and practical interest. There are many who have scarcely heard of a Negro book, much less read one; still here is a bibliography made by the Library of Congress containing 1,400 titles of works written by Negroes; 200 of these books are exhibited on the shelves. The Negroes have 150 periodicals, mostly weekly papers, many of which are exhibited here.

We have thus, it may be seen, an honest, straightforward exhibit of a small nation of people, picturing their life and development without apology or gloss, and above all made by themselves. In a way this marks an era in the history of the Negroes of America. It is no new thing for a group of people to accomplish much under the help and guidance of a stronger group; indeed, the whole Palace of Social Economy at the Paris Exposition shows how vast a system of help and guidance of this order is being carried on to-day throughout the world. When, however, the inevitable question arises, What are these guided groups doing for themselves? there is in the whole building no more encouraging answer than that given by the American negroes, who are here shown to be studying, examining, and thinking of their own progress and prospects.*

*Mr. Thomas J. Calloway, the special agent of the Negro exhibit, gives the following list of awards to the exhibit, together with a note of explanation, which we print below:

Grand Prix—American Negro Exhibit (on the collection as a whole): Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute, Hampton, Va. Gold Medals—Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, Tuskegee, Ala.; Howard University, Washington, D. C.; T. J. Calloway, Special Agent Negro Exhibit (as compiler); W. E. B. Du Bois, Collaborator as Compiler of Georgia Negro Exhibit. Silver Medals—Fisk University, Nashville, Tenn.; Agricultural and Mechanical College, Greensboro', N. C.; Berea College, Berea, Ky.; Atlanta University, Atlanta, Ga.; Booker T. Washington, Monograph on Education of Negro. Bronze Medals—Roger Williams University, Nashville, Tenn.; Central Tennessee College, Nashville, Tenn.; Atlanta University, Atlanta, Ga.; Pine Bluff Normal and Industrial School, Pine Bluff, Ark. Honorable Mention—Haines Normal and Industrial Institute, Augusta, Ga.; Claflin University, Orangeburg, S. C.

While these awards represent the appreciation of the several juries, taken together there is not the even balancing that might be wished. Some of the principal features were not installed till after the juries were disbanded. For example, the books, the models, patents, etc., fall under this lists. The awards, therefore, except in certain cases like Hampton, Tuskegee, Atlanta, etc., do not necessarily represent the strongest features of the exhibit.

presented for popular vote. The returns showed an overwhelming majority in favor not only of direct nomination, but also of the municipal ownership of lighting plants and street railways. It demonstrated the strength of the referendum as a political weapon, "both in the profound impression created upon the community, and especially on the political leaders." But if folly and bad counsel form a factor in the town meeting, are they not equally to be feared in the use of the referendum, where they are not displayed in the open nor so often seen side by side? The hope and success of town meeting, of referendum, of every form our self-government takes, then, depends, first of all, not upon making the public servants sensitive to the public will—it depends upon the people themselves.

The Training of Negroes for Social Power

Professor of Economics and History in Atlanta University.

THE responsibility for their own social regeneration ought to be placed largely upon the shoulders of the negro people. But such responsibility must carry with it a grant of power; responsibility without power is a mockery and a farce. If, therefore, the American people are sincerely anxious that the negro shall put forth his best efforts to help himself, they must see to it that he is not deprived of the freedom and power to strive. The responsibility for dispelling their own ignorance implies that the power to overcome ignorance is to be placed in black men's hands; the lessening of poverty calls for the power of effective work; and the responsibility for lessening crime calls for control over social forces which produce crime.

Such social power means, assuredly, the growth of initiative among negroes, the spread of independent thought, the expanding consciousness of manhood; and these things to-day are looked upon by many with apprehension and distrust, and there is systematic and determined effort to avoid this inevitable corollary of the fixing of social responsibility. Men openly declare their design to train these millions as a subject caste, as men to be thought for, but not to think; to be led, but not to lead themselves.

Those who advocate these things forget that such a solution flings them squarely on the other horn of the dilemma: such a subject child-race could never be held accountable for its own misdeeds and shortcomings; its ignorance would be part of the Nation's design, its poverty would arise partly from the direct oppression of the strong and partly from thriftlessness which such oppression breeds; and, above all, its crime would be the legitimate child of that lack of self-respect which caste systems engender. Such a solution of the negro problem is not one which the saner sense of the Nation for a moment contemplates; it is utterly foreign to American institutions, and is unthinkable as a future for any self-respecting race of men. The sound afterthought of the American people must come to realize that the responsibility for dispelling ignorance and poverty and uprooting crime among negroes cannot be put upon their own shoulders unless they are given such independent leadership in intelligence, skill, and morality as will inevitably lead to an independent manhood which cannot and will not rest in bonds.

Let me illustrate my meaning particularly in the matter of educating negro youth.

The negro problem, it has often been said, is largely a problem of ignorance—not simply of illiteracy, but a deeper ignorance of the world and its ways, of the thought and experience of men; an ignorance of self and the possibilities of human souls. This can be gotten rid of only by training; and primarily such training must take the form of that sort of social leadership which we call education. To apply such leadership to themselves, and to profit by it, means that negroes would have among themselves men of careful training and broad culture, as teachers and teachers of teachers. There are always periods of educational evolution when it is deemed quite proper for pupils in the fourth reader to teach those in the third. But such a method, wasteful and ineffective at all times, is peculiarly dangerous when ignorance is widespread and when there are few homes and public institutions to supplement the work of the school. It is, therefore, of crying necessity among negroes that the heads of their educational system—the teachers in the normal schools, the heads of high schools, the principals of public systems, should be unusually well trained men; men trained not simply in common-school branches, not simply in the technique of school management and normal methods, but trained beyond this, broadly and carefully, into the meaning of the age whose civilization it is their peculiar duty to interpret to the youth of a new race, to the minds of untrained people. Such educational leaders should be prepared by long and rigorous courses of study similar to those which the world over have been designed to strengthen the intellectual powers, fortify character, and facilitate the transmission from age to age of the stores of the world's knowledge.

Not all men—indeed, not the majority of men, only the exceptional few among American negroes or among any other people—are adapted to this higher training, as, indeed, only the exceptional few are adapted to higher training in any line; but the significance of such men is not to be measured by their numbers, but rather by the numbers of their pupils and followers who are destined to see the world through their eyes, hear it through their trained ears, and speak to it through the music of their words.

Such men, teachers of teachers and leaders of the untaught, Atlanta University and similar colleges seek to train. We seek to do our work thoroughly and carefully. We have no predilections or prejudices as to particular studies or methods, but we do cling to those time-honored sorts of discipline which the experience of the world has long since proven to be of especial value. We sift as carefully as possible the student material which offers itself, and we try by every conscientious method to give to students who have character and ability such years of discipline as shall make them stronger, keener, and better for their peculiar mission. The history of civilization seems to prove that no group or nation which seeks advancement and true development can despise or neglect the power of well-trained minds; and this power of intellectual leadership must be given to the talented tenth among American negroes before this race can seriously be asked to assume the responsibility of dispelling its own ignorance. Upon the foundation-stone of a few well equipped negro colleges of high and honest standards can be built a proper system of free common schools in the South for the masses of the negro people; any attempt to found a system of public schools on anything less than this—on narrow ideals, limited or merely technical training—is to call blind leaders for the blind.

The very first step toward the settlement of the negro problem is the spread of intelligence. The first step toward wider intelligence is a free public-school system; and the first and most important step toward a public-school system is the equipment and adequate support of a sufficient number of negro colleges. These are first steps, and they involve great movements: first, the best of the existent colleges must not be abandoned to slow atrophy and death, as the tendency is to-day; secondly, systematic attempt must be made to organize secondary education. Below the colleges and connected with them must come the normal and high schools, judiciously distributed and carefully manned. In no essential particular should this system of common and secondary schools differ from educational systems the world over. Their chief function is the quickening and training of human intelligence; they can do much in the teaching of morals and manners incidentally, but they cannot and ought not to replace the home as the chief moral teacher; they can teach valuable lessons as to the meaning of work in the world, but they cannot replace technical schools and apprenticeship in actual life, which are the real schools of work. Manual training can and ought to be used in these schools, but as a means and not as an end—to quicken intelligence and self-knowledge and not to teach carpentry; just as arithmetic is used to train minds and not skilled accountants.

Whence, now, is the money coming for this educational system? For the common schools the support should come from local communities, the State governments, and the United States Government; for secondary education, support should come from local and State governments and private philanthropy; for the colleges, from private philanthropy and the United States Government. I make no apology for bringing the United States Government in thus conspicuously. The General Government must give aid to Southern education if illiteracy and ignorance are to cease threatening the very foundations of civilization within any reasonable time. Aid to common-school education could be appropriated to the different States on the basis of illiteracy. The fund could be administered by State officials, and the results and needs reported upon by United States educational inspectors under the Bureau of Education. The States could easily distribute the funds so as to encourage local taxation and enterprise and not result in pauperizing the communities. As to higher training, it must be remembered that the cost of a single battle-ship like the Massachusetts would endow all the distinctively college work necessary for negroes during the next half-century; and it is without doubt true that the unpaid balance from bounties withheld from negroes in the Civil War would, with interest, easily supply this sum.

But spread of intelligence alone will not solve the negro problem. If this problem is largely a question of ignorance, it is also scarcely less a problem of poverty. If negroes are to assume the responsibility of raising the standards of living among themselves, the power of intelligent work and leadership toward proper industrial ideals must be placed in their hands. Economic efficiency depends on intelligence, skill, and thrift. The public-school system is designed to furnish the necessary intelligence for the ordinary worker, the secondary school for the more gifted workers, and the college for the exceptional few. Technical knowledge and manual dexterity in learning branches of the world's work are taught by industrial and trade schools, and such schools are of prime importance in the training of colored children. Trade-teaching cannot be effectively combined with the work of the common schools because the primary curriculum is already too crowded, and thorough common-school training should precede trade-teaching. It is, however, quite possible to combine some of the work of the secondary schools with purely technical training, the necessary limitations being matters of time and cost: the question whether the boy can afford to stay in school long enough to add parts of a high-school course to the trade course, and particularly the question whether the school can afford or ought to afford to give trade-training to high-school students who do not intend to become artisans. A system of trade-schools, therefore, supported by State and private aid, should be added to the secondary school system.

An industrial school, however, does not merely teach technique. It is also a school—a center of moral influence and of mental discipline. As such it has peculiar problems in securing the proper teaching force. It demands broadly trained men: the teacher of carpentry must be more than a carpenter, and the teacher of the domestic arts more than a cook; for such teachers must instruct, not simply in manual dexterity, but in mental quickness and moral habits. In other words, they must be teachers as well as artisans. It thus happens that college-bred men and men from other higher schools have always been in demand in technical schools, and it has been the high privilege of Atlanta University to furnish during the thirty-six years of its existence a part of the teaching force of nearly every negro industrial school in the United States, and to-day our graduates are teaching in more than twenty such institutions. The same might be said of Fisk University and other higher schools. If the college graduates were to-day withdrawn from the teaching force of the chief negro industrial schools, nearly every one of them would have to close its doors. These facts are forgotten by such advocates of industrial training as oppose the higher schools. Strong as the argument for industrial schools is—and its strength is undeniable—its cogency simply increases the urgency of the plea for higher training-schools and colleges to furnish broadly educated teachers.

But intelligence and skill alone will not solve the Southern problem of poverty. With these must go that combination of homely habits and virtues which we may loosely call thrift. Something of thrift may be taught in school, more must be taught at home; but both these agencies are helpless when organized economic society denies to workers the just rewards of thrift and efficiency. And this has been true of black laborers in the South from the time of slavery down through the scandal of the Freedmen's Bank to the peonage and crop-lien system of to-day. If the Southern negro is shiftless, it is primarily because over large areas a shiftless negro can get on in the world about as well as an industrious black man. This is not universally true in the South, but it is true to so large an extent as to discourage striving in precisely that class of negroes who most need encouragement. What is the remedy? Intelligence—not simply the ability to read and write or to sew—but the intelligence of a society permeated by that larger vision of life and broader tolerance which are fostered by the college and university. Not that all men must be college-bred, but that some men, black and white, must be, to leaven the ideals of the lump. Can any serious student of the economic South doubt that this to-day is her crying need?

Ignorance and poverty are the vastest of the negro problems. But to these later years have added a third—the problem of negro crime. That a great problem of social morality must have become eventually the central problem of emancipation is as clear as day to any student of history. In its grosser form as a problem of serious crime it is already upon us. Of course it is false and silly to represent that white women in the South are in daily danger of black assaulters. On the contrary, white womanhood in the South is absolutely safe in the hands of ninety-five per cent. of the black men—ten times safer than black womanhood is in the hands of white men. Nevertheless, there is a large and dangerous class of negro criminals, paupers, and outcasts. The existence and growth of such a class, far from causing surprise, should be recognized as the natural result of that social disease called the negro problem; nearly every untoward circumstance known to human experience has united to increase negro crime: the slavery of the past, the sudden emancipation, the narrowing of economic opportunity, the lawless environment of wide regions, the stifling of natural ambition, the curtailment of political privilege, the disregard of the sanctity of black men's homes, and, above all, a system of treatment for criminals calculated to breed crime far faster than all other available agencies could repress it. Such a combination of circumstances is as sure to increase the numbers of the vicious and outcast as the rain is to wet the earth. The phenomenon calls for no delicately drawn theories of race differences; it is a plain case of cause and effect.

But, plain as the causes may be, the results are just as deplorable, and repeatedly to-day the criticism is made that negroes do not recognize sufficiently their responsibility in this matter. Such critics forget how little power to-day negroes have over their own lower classes. Before the black murderer who strikes his victim to-day, the average black man stands far more helpless than the average white, and, too, suffers ten times more from the effects of the deed. The white man has political power, accumulated wealth, and knowledge of social forces; the black man is practically disfranchised, poor, and unable to discriminate between the criminal and the martyr. The negro needs the defense of the ballot, the conserving power of property, and, above all, the ability to cope intelligently with such vast questions of social regeneration and moral reform as confront him. If social reform among negroes be without organization or trained leadership from within, if the administration of law is always for the avenging of the white victim and seldom for the reformation of the black criminal, if ignorant black men misunderstand the functions of government because they have had no decent instruction, and intelligent black men are denied a voice in government because they are black—under such circumstances to hold negroes responsible for the suppression of crime among themselves is the cruelest of mockeries.

On the other hand, a sincere desire among the American people to help the negroes undertake their own social regeneration means, first, that the negro be given the ballot on the same terms as other men, to protect him against injustice and to safeguard his interests in the administration of law; secondly, that through education and social organization he be trained to work, and save, and earn a decent living. But these are not all: wealth is not the only thing worth accumulating; experience and knowledge can be accumulated and handed down, and no people can be truly rich without them. Can the negro do without these? Can this training in work and thrift be truly effective without the guidance of trained intelligence and deep knowledge—without that same efficiency which has enabled modern peoples to grapple so successfully with the problems of the Submerged Tenth? There must surely be among negro leaders the philanthropic impulse, the uprightness of character and strength of purpose, but there must be more than these; philanthropy and purpose among blacks as well as among whites must be guided and curbed by knowledge and mental discipline—knowledge of the forces of civilization that make for survival, ability to organize and guide those forces, and realization of the true meaning of those broader ideals of human betterment which may in time bring heaven and earth a little nearer. This is social power—it is gotten in many ways by experience, by social contact, by what we loosely call the chances of life. But the systematic method of acquiring and imparting it is by the training of youth to thought, power, and knowledge in the school and college. And that group of people whose mental grasp is by heredity weakest, and whose knowledge of the past is for historic reasons most imperfect, that group is the very one which needs above all, for the talented of its youth, this severe and careful course of training; especially if they are expected to take immediate part in modern competitive life, if they are to hasten the slower courses of human development, and if the responsibility for this is to be in their own hands.

Three things American slavery gave the negro—the habit of work, the English language, and the Christian religion; but one priceless thing it debauched, destroyed, and took from him, and that was the organized home. For the sake of intelligence and thrift, for the sake of work and morality, this home-life must be restored and regenerated with newer ideals. How? The normal method would be by actual contact with a higher home-life among his neighbors, but this method the social separation of white and black precludes. A proposed method is by schools of domestic arts, but, valuable as these are, they are but subsidiary aids to the establishment of homes; for real homes are primarily centers of ideals and teaching and only incidentally centers of cooking. The restoration and raising of home ideals must, then, come from social life among negroes themselves; and does that social life need no leadership? It needs the best possible leadership of pure hearts and trained heads, the highest leadership of carefully trained men.

Such are the arguments for the negro college, and such is the work that Atlanta University and a few similar institutions seek to do. We believe that a rationally arranged college course of study for men and women able to pursue it is the best and only method of putting into the world negroes with ability to use the social forces of their race so as to stamp out crime, strengthen the home, eliminate degenerates, and inspire and encourage the higher tendencies of the race not only in thought and aspiration but in every-day toil. And we believe this, not simply because we have argued that such training ought to have these effects, or merely because we hope for such results in some dim future, but because already for years we have seen in the work of our graduates precisely such results as I have mentioned: successful teachers of teachers, intelligent and upright ministers, skilled physicians, principals of industrial schools, business men, and, above all, makers of model homes and leaders of social groups, out from which radiate subtle but tangible forces of uplift and inspiration. The proof of this lies scattered in every State of the South, and, above all, in the half-unwilling testimony of men disposed to decry our work.

Between the negro college and industrial school there are the strongest grounds for co-operation and unity. It is not a matter of mere emphasis, for we would be glad to see ten industrial schools to every college. It is not a fact that there are to-day too few negro colleges, but rather that there are too many institutions attempting to do college work. But the danger lies in the fact that the best of the negro colleges are poorly equipped and are to-day losing support and countenance, and that, unless the Nation awakens to its duty, ten years will see the annihilation of higher negro training in the South. We need a few strong, well-equipped negro colleges, and we need them now, not to-morrow; unless we can have them and have them decently supported, negro education in the South, both common-school and industrial, is doomed to failure, and the forces of social regeneration will be fatally weakened, for the college to-day among negroes is, just as truly as it was yesterday among whites, the beginning and not the end of human training, the foundation and not the capstone of popular education.

Strange, is it not, my brothers, how often in America those great watchwords of human energy—"Be strong!" "Know thyself!" "Hitch your wagon to a star!"—how often these die away into dim whispers when we face these seething millions of black men? And yet do they not belong to them? Are they not their heritage as well as yours? Can they bear burdens without strength, know without learning, and aspire without ideals? Are you afraid to let them try? Fear rather, in this our common fatherland, lest we live to lose those great watchwords of Liberty and Opportunity which yonder in the eternal hills their fathers fought with your fathers to preserve.

Fresh Air Neighbors

By Helen Lockwood Coffin

MIKE MALONEY was the only boy in the party that Abraham Godolski really cared anything about. The other two dozen or so were from Abraham's own neighborhood, and he knew them well, while Mike was an undiscovered country; the others had never been in a Fresh Air Camp before, and they were foolishly enthusiastic over the grass and the cows and the new freedom, while Abraham and Mike, although this was their first taste of the country too, knew enough of the world to pretend that they always spent their summers in this manner. In the last analysis, that was Abraham's chief reason for liking Mike—because he knew how to pretend things.

So the first morning after they struck the camp the two boys gravitated toward each other.

"You come along with me," suggested Mike. "All this here's too slow trottin' fer us—we're outer our class."

"It's fierce how slow it is," agreed Abraham, and so the two went out the gates of the farm and started down the road on a tour of investigation. It was a wide country road, with banks of sweet clover along the sides, and tall

TRAINING OF THE NEGRO FOR SOCIAL POWER.

BY W. E. B. DU BOIS.

THE responsibility for their own social regeneration ought to be placed largely upon the shoulders of the Negro people. But such responsibility must carry with it a grant of power; responsibility without power is a mockery and a farce. If, therefore, the American people are sincerely anxious that the Negro shall put forth his best efforts to help himself, they must see to it that he is not deprived of the freedom and power to strive. The responsibility for dispelling their own ignorance implies that the power to overcome ignorance is to be placed in black men's hands; the lessening of poverty calls for the power of effective work; and the responsibility for lessening crime calls for control over social forces which produce crime.

Such social power means, assuredly, the growth of initiative among Negroes, the spread of independent thought, the expanding consciousness of manhood; and these things today are looked upon by many with apprehension and distrust, and there is systematic and determined effort to avoid this inevitable corollary of the fixing of social responsibility. Men openly declare their design to train these millions as a subject caste, as men to be thought for, but not to think; to be led, but not to lead themselves.

Those who advocate these things forget that such solutions flings them squarely on the other horn of the dilemma: such a subject child-race could never be held accountable for its own misdeeds and shortcomings; its ignorance would be part of the Nation's design, its poverty would arise partly from the direct oppression of the strong and partly from thriftlessness which oppression breeds; and, above all, its crime would be the ligitimate child of that lack of self-respect which caste systems engender. Such a solution of the Negro problem is not one which the saner sense of the Nation for a moment contemplates; it is utterly foreign to American Institutions, and is unthinkable as a future for any self-repecting race of men. The sound afterthought of the American must come to realize that the responsibility for dispelling ignorance and poverty and uprooting crime among Negroes can not be put upon their own shoulders unless they are given such independent leadership in intelligence, skill, and morality as will inevitably lead to an independent manhood which can not and will not rest in bonds.

Let me illustrate my meaning particularly in the matter of educating Negro youth.

The Negro problem, it has often been said, is largely a problem of ignorance — not simply of illiteracy, but a deeper ignorance of the world and its ways, of the thought and experience of men; an ignorance of self and the possibilities of human souls. This can be gotten rid of only by training; and primarily such training must take the form of a sort of social leadership which we call education. To apply such leadership to themselves, and to profit by it, means that Negroes would have among themselves men of careful training and broad culture, as teachers and as teachers of teachers.

There are always periods of educational evolution when it is deemed quite proper for pupils in the fourth reader to teach those in the third. But such a method, wasteful and ineffective always, is peculiarly dangerous when ignorance is widespread and when there are few homes and public institutions to supplement the work of the school. It is therefore of crying necessity among Negroes that the heads of their educational system—the teachers in the normal schools, the heads of high schools, the principals of public systems, should be unusually well trained men; men trained not simply in common-school branches, not simply in the technique of school management and normal methods, but trained beyond this, broadly and carefully, into the meaning of the age whose civilization it is their peculiar duty to interpret to the youth of a new race, to the minds of untrained people. Such educational leaders should be prepared by long and rigorous courses of study similar to those which the world over have been designed to strengthen the intellectual powers, fortify character, and facilitate the transmission from age to age of the stores of the world's knowledge.

Not all men—indeed, not the majority of men, only the exceptional few among American Negroes or among any other people—are adapted to this higher training, as, indeed, only the exceptional few are adapted to higher training in any line; but the significance of such men is not to be measured by their numbers, but rather by the numbers of their pupils and followers who are destined to see the world through their eyes, hear it through their trained ears, and speak to it through the music of their words.

Such men, teachers of teachers and leaders of the untaught, Atlanta University and similar colleges seek to train. We seek to do our work thoroughly and carefully. We have no predilections or prejudices as to particular studies or methods, but we do cling to those time-honored sorts of discipline which the experience of the world has long since proven to be of especial value. We sift as carefully as possible the student material which offers itself, and we try by every conscientious method to give to students who have character and ability such years of discipline as shall make them stronger, keener, and better for their peculiar mission. The history of civilization seems to prove that no group or nation which seeks advancement and true development can despise or neglect the power of well-trained minds; and this power of intellectual leadership must be given to the talented tenth among American Negroes before this race can seriously be asked to assume the responsibility of dispelling its own ignorance. Upon the foundation-stone of a few well equipped Negro colleges of high and honest standards can be built a proper system of free common schools in the South for the masses of the Negro people; any attempt to found a system of public schools on anything less than this, on narrow ideals limited or merely technical training, is to call blind leaders for the blind.

The very first step toward the settlement of the Negro problem is the spread of intelligence. Manual training can and ought to be used in these schools, but as a means and not as an end—to quicken intelligence and self-knowledge and not to teach carpentry; just as arithmetic is used to train minds and not skilled accountants.

Whence, now, is the money coming for this educational system? For the common schools the support should come from local communities, the State Governments, and the United States Government; for secondary education, support should come from local and State Governments and private philanthropy; for the colleges, from private philanthropy and the United States Government.

I make no apology for bringing the United States Government in thus conspicuously. The General Government must give aid to Southern education if illiteracy and ignorance are to cease threatening the very foundation of civilization within any reasonable time. Aid to common school education could be appropriated to the different States on the basis of illiteracy. WHAT INTELLECTUAL TRAINING IS DOING FOR THE AMERICAN NEGRO*

* This article is based largely on Atlanta University Publications, No. 6 ("The Negro Common School"), to which publication those wishing further information are referred.

BY W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS, PH.D., ATLANTA UNIVERSITY

How easily one generation forgets the problems of its fathers! We call it still the negro problem, and yet it has changed its form in every decade. Our fathers asked, Can the negro be educated? We are asking, How shall the negro be educated? The very asking of this latter question shows that the former has been answered. We still differ as to the objects and extent of the training that ought to be given to the negroes, but no sane man to-day questions of their ability to be educated. Indeed, how can it be questioned? Compare the statistics of illiteracy. They are crude measurements of knowledge, and yet they have their value. In 1870, just after emancipation, four-fifths of the negroes ten years old and over could not read and write. Ten years later this was reduced to seven-tenths, in 1890 to 57 per cent., and in 1900 to 44.5 per cent. If we had not been so busy discussing Mr. Roosevelt's dinner list in recent years, we would have hailed the educational returns of the twelfth census with a chorus of generous approval for colored people, for to-day, for the first time in history, the majority of American negroes can read and write. The exact figures particularly for the South are of great interest:

Dunbar Memorial Number

Paul Laurence Dunbar won unusual distinction for his writings, particularly for his poems. He wrote his first poem when seven years old, and while one would not be expected to produce much of a literary effort at such a tender age, it attracted some attention and it was predicted that a bright future awaited this Negro boy, who was then earning his living by selling newspapers.—Springfield (Mass.) Morning Union.

The passing of Dunbar is sure to be heard with sincere regret wherever the English language is spoken. Beginning at the age of 7, this remarkable individual turned out poems and prose works of exquisite beauty. For years, however, he met with no recognition. Always modest and retiring, he encountered so many discouragements that when success did come he greeted it with well-nigh prayerful gratitude. Mr. Dunbar died in the flower of his manhood. He gained renown second only to James Whitcomb Riley and Eugene Field, and many critics favored him above both. He had countless admirers in Chicago, and, in fact, called this city his second home.—Chicago Record-Herald.

In the death of Paul Laurence Dunbar there is ended a career of the second person of his race to achieve distinction in imaginative literature. Other Negroes have from time to time risen to positions of influence and power in various walks of life. In public service, in mercantile pursuits, in educational activities, at the bar and elsewhere we have numerous illiustrations of the possibilities of the colored man, but not since Phyllis Wheatley, the African born slave girl, whose verses received the compliments of Gen. Washington, had the race produced a poet of quality until this Ohio boy captured an audience and found a place in a field where competition is as keen as in any of the pursuits that men follow.—Detroit (Mich) News.

Mr. Paul Laurence Dunbar's death was but the close of a pathetic struggle against destiny. He suffered, as have so many of more talented of his race, from consumption. His earliest book of verse, "Oak and Ivy," was published in 1893, when he was only 21, and since that time he had contributed pretty regularly to the magazines and had written enough to fill seventeen volumes of verse and fiction. * * * His was a slender muse, wavering between humor and pathos, more or less conventional in both; but he will have some claim to memory both for the suffering of his later years and for the reason that he is the first of his people among us, we believe, to gain pretty wide recognition as a poet.—New York Evening Post.

Paul Laurence Dunbar died of "the white plague" at his modest but cultured home in Dayton, O., last Friday. It was but a few weeks ago that a visitor found him apparently holding his own and thoroughly optimistic. He had put out his last of a considerable series of books, a little before Christmas. This was characteristic. For nearly ten years he had been under the death-sentence of consumption, but he held steadily to his passion for work and it can be said that he almost died with his pen in his hand.—Central Christian Advocate.

With the death of Paul Laurence Dunbar the negro race loses its one poet who could interpret the soul of the black man—his various moods and passions, his sorrows and his hopes—better, perhaps, than any other poet of his time. William Dean Howells, the novelist, himself an enthusiastic admirer of Dunbar's verse, has said: "As far as I could remember, Paul Dunbar was the only man of pure African blood and of American civilization to feel the Negro life aesthetically and express it lyrically." He has also been spoken of as "a man who counted heart throbs."

He acquired that habit early, for the boybood days of the poet were full of trials and tribulations. His father was a slave in old Kentucky, who fled from there to Canada, and his mother, freed by the war, went to Dayton, O., where Paul was born and where he died yesterday of consumption. These first years were years of constant struggle on the part of mother and son against poverty and hunger. Life was as Dunbar himself has said in one of his poems:

A crust of bread and a corner to sleep in,
A minute to smile and an hour to weep in,
A pint of joy to a peck of trouble,
And never a laugh but the moans come double;
And that is life!

Finally Dunbar got a job as elevator boy in one of the public buildings of Dayton, and it was while he was at that work that he began to write the lyrics which were to make him famous. Even after his name became well known he clung to his old job, for his books brought him in but little and he had his mother to support.

Dunbar was the author of seventeen books of prose and poetry. Perhaps his best known work is "Lyrics of Lowly Life." Every one who has read it will remember the poem, "When Malindy Sings," a tribute to his mother.

For a long time Dunbar had been ill of consumption. While in the clutch of the dread disease he was working on a play which he was anxious to see staged, and his one consuming fear was that death would overtake him before he had finished it. So bit by bit he dictated daily to a stenographer. Propped up by pillows a visitor found him in his Dayton home not long since. While they talked a rainstorm came up, with a strong wind, which carried the drops against the window pane. The tall oaks swayed in front of the house. Dunbar raised his head and gazed silently at the storm. Then in prose he expressed the poesy within him.

"I like to see it rain," he said. "I just love to sit at this window and watch the rain for hours. There is something in the patter of the drops as the wind rushes them to the window, the moaning of the trees and the dreariness of the scene that appeals to me. I could sit here all day watching a storm."

Then he spoke of an old and well-to-do friend whose sole ambition was to become a writer and who was willing to sacrifice his wealth to attain a name in the literary world.

"I only wish I could trade him all the literary honors, if I may call them so, that I ever received," said Dunbar. "for his health and money. Then I could easily finish my——"

The sentence was never completed. Neither was the work he had in hand. But he learned at last the answer that lies beyond the years.

Lots For Sale to Good Colored People Only

We have just opened a most beautiful Subdivision in the Northeast part of the city for COLORED PEOPLE ONLY. Most good property, you know, is given to White Subdivisions, but we consider this equal to anything ever opened in Memphis for white people, and FAR ABOVE ANYTHING ever put on the market for colored. Lots all have good depth, ranging from 110 to 150 feet, and have a frontage of 25 feet. To show our interest in the place we make this proposition: When all lots are sold we give to the buyers of lots a 50 foot lot on which they are to build a NICE CHURCH, and besides when they have gotten up $500.00 we will give them $200.00 in cash to add to their amount, making the church cost $700.00. We make this requirement in order that the place will have a respectable place of worship. We can sell these lots at from $200.00 to $325.00 per lot, with from $8.00 to $13.00 cash, and balance monthly at from $7.00 to $12.00, which is the cheapest property ever sold for a SELECT SUBDIVISION.

Come in to see us before they are all gone.

SOUTH AFRICA.

A disturbance occurred at a farm fourteen miles from Pietermaritzburg, where a body of Natal police fourteen strong was sent to arrest some natives who had made an armed demonstration the previous day on the occasion of the collection of the poll tax. Two natives were arrested, but an armed body of Zulus attacked the police, killing an officer and a trooper and wounding another officer. The wounded officer escaped with the rest of the party and returned to Pietermaritzburg.

There is every reason to believe that the disturbance will prove to be merely local, but, in view of the restlessness which has been noticeable for some time past among the Zulus, the government cannot afford to adopt half-measures. The right wing of the Carbineers and C Battery of the artillery have been mobilized, the Volunteers have been called out, and all the available police have been requisitioned.—London (England) Mail.

Within the last few days the native disturbance in Natal has reminded us of what is, after all, the biggest and most abiding question of South Africa. More vital even than the relation of one section of the white community to the other is the joint relation of both to the vast native community which surrounds them. It is just because of this big problem in the background, often lost sight of, but always there, that it is so necessary to secure government on sound and settled lines for the two elements of the white population. Our Pietermaritzburg correspondent does not think, we are glad to see, that immediate concerted action on the part of the natives is probable. At the same time the mere mention of such a possibility is significant, and so is the fact that the outrage of last Thursday is held to have been occasioned almost as much by the ordinary hut tax as by the poll tax which has lately been imposed. It seems evident that a good deal of organization will be needed before Natal can be thoroughly quieted, and there is, of course, always a chance of the unrest affecting those idle husbandmen, but superb warriors, the Zulus. Those who recall the interaction of the Transvaal question and the native question in the years 1877-1881 will be far from desiring that the native agitation should be complicated, and perhaps stimulated, now by the existence of political discontent in the Transvaal. The Natal incident lends fresh force to Mr. Lyttleton's earnest warning against vacillation of purpose on the part of the British government toward South Africa. Our experience in the past ought to show us how essential is continuity, and how deplorable would be any departure from it while the native population happens to be unsettled.—Editorial London Times.

LIBERIA.

Rev. Joseph C. Hartzell, missionary bishop of Africa for the M. E. Church, has returned to the United States to secure a number of missionaries for his field and funds to promote the work. He is anxious to establish industrial mission schools throughout Africa, which he declares are much needed for the white as well as for the black people.

He is very hopeful for the black republic of Liberia, in which the repatriated Negroes from America and their descendants, now 18,000 in number, and a few thousand civilized natives, form the governing class.

"Liberia, which has led hitherto a rather precarious existence," said the bishop, "is now entering upon a new epoch. An English company has been granted large mining and rubber concessions, in return for which the government has secured a loan of $500,000. With this sum it is intended to pay the debts of the republic, to establish a national bank and to open up the interior for new settlers."

Bishop Hartzell said he would not advocate the wholesale emigration of Negroes from the Southern States. There are not openings in Liberia, he said, for many settlers, and trade and other conditions are unfavorable for the absorption of many immigrants at a time.

BARBADOES.

To the Editor of the Herald—As a white native of Barbadoes I must protest against the wholesale characterizations of my Negro compatriots as lazy and useless, so frequently made during the last few months by speakers and writers discussing the canal labor problem.

The Barbadian Negro is, to my perhaps prejudiced view the highest type the race has yet produced. His industry, intelligence and ambition are undeniable, as must be plain on the face of it when one recollects that in an island 166 square miles in area 180,000 of his race make a living, however meager, and compete closely in every line of industrial and professional endeavor with 20,000 whites, backed by three hundred years of Caucasian supremacy and by social restrictions of the closest.—New York Herald.

WASHINGTON.

Representative Heflin, of Alabama, introduced a bill in the House requiring the sleeping car companies to provide separate compartments for white and colored passengers.

St. Valentine shared honors with Frederick Douglas, the leader and educational champion, whose birthday was February 14. At all of the colored schools of the city exercises commemorating Douglas Day were observed from 1 to 3 p.m. At the M Street High School, Oswald Garrison Villard, grandson of William Lloyd Garrison, the notable New York editor, and Judge Robert H. Terrell delivered addresses paying tribute to the memory of Douglas and calling attention to the advancement of education since his death in 1895.

BOSTON, MASS.

During the recent encampment of the Massachusetts G. A. R., the department commander, J. H. Wolff, who is a prominent Negro lawyer of this city, was presented on the eve of his retirement from office with a beautiful gold watch, the gift of the Massachusetts G. A. R. Commander Wolff accepted the token of esteem in well-chosen words of appreciation.

A Litany of Atlanta

Silent God, Thou whose voice afar in mist and mystery hath left our ears an-hungered in these fearful days—

Hear us, good Lord!

Listen to us, Thy children: our faces dark with doubt are made a mockery in Thy sanctuary. With uplifted hands we front Thy heaven, O God, crying:

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord!

We are not better than our fellows, Lord, we are but weak and human men. When our devils do deviltry, curse Thou the doer and the deed: curse them as we curse them, do to them all and more than ever they have done to innocence and weakness, to womanhood and home.

Have mercy upon us, miserable sinners!

And yet whose is the deeper guilt? Who made these devils? Who nursed them in crime and fed them on injustice? Who ravished and debauched their mothers and their grandmothers? Who bought and sold their crime, and waxed fat and rich on public iniquity?

Thou knowest, good God!

Is this Thy justice, O Father, that guile be easier than innocence, and the innocent crucified for the guilt of the untouched guilty?

Justice, O Judge of men!

Wherefore do we pray? Is not the God of the fathers dead? Have not seers seen in Heaven's halls Thine hearsed and lifeless form stark amidst the black and rolling smoke of sin, where all along bow bitter forms of endless dead?

Awake, Thou that sleepest!

Thou art not dead, but flown afar, up hills of endless light, thru blazing corridors of suns, where worlds do swing of good and gentle men, of women strong and free—far from the cozenage, black hypocrisy and chaste prostitution of this shameful speck of dust!

Turn again, O Lord, leave us not to perish in our sin!

From lust of body and lust of blood

Great God deliver us!

FROM lust of power and lust of gold,
Great God deliver us!

From the leagued lying of despot and of brute,
Great God deliver us!

A city lay in travail, God our Lord, and from her loins sprang twin Murder and Black Hate. Red was the midnight; clang, crack and cry of death and fury filled the air and trembled underneath the stars when church spires pointed silently to Thee. And all this was to sate the greed of greedy men who hide behind the veil of vengeance!
Bend us Thine ear, O Lord!

In the pale, still morning we looked upon the deed. We stopped our ears and held our leaping hands, but they—did they not wag their heads and leer and cry with bloody jaws: Cease from Crime! The word was mockery, for thus they train a hundred crimes while we do cure one.
Turn again our captivity, O Lord!

Behold this maimed and broken thing; dear God it was an humble black man who toiled and sweat to save a bit from the pittance paid him. They told him: Work and Rise. He worked. Did this man sin? Nay, but some one told how some one said another did—one whom he had never seen nor known. Yet for that man's crime this man lieth maimed and murdered, his wife naked to shame, his children, to poverty and evil.
Hear us, O heavenly Father!

Doth not this justice of hell stink in Thy nostrils, O God? How long shall the mounting flood of innocent blood roar in Thine ears and pound in our hearts for vengeance? Pile the pale frenzy of blood-crazed brutes who do such deeds high on Thine altar, Jehovah Jireh, and burn it in hell forever and forever!
Forgive us, good Lord; we know not what we say!

Bewildered we are, and passion-tost, mad with the madness of a mobbed and mocked and murdered people; straining at the armposts of Thy Throne, we raise our shackled hands and charge Thee, God, by the bones of our stolen fathers, by the tears of our dead mothers, by the very blood of Thy crucified Christ: What meaneth this? Tell us the Plan; give us the Sign!
Keep not thou silence, O God!

SIT no longer blind, Lord God, deaf to our prayer and dumb to our dumb suffering. Surely Thou too art not white, O Lord, a pale, bloodless, heartless thing?

Ah! Christ of all the Pities!

Forgive the thought! Forgive these wild, blasphemous words. Thou art still the God of our black fathers, and in Thy soul's soul sit some soft darkenings of the evening, some shadowings of the velvet night.

But whisper—speak—call, great God, for Thy silence is white terror to our hearts! The way, O God, show us the way and point us the path.

Whither? North is greed and South is blood; within, the coward, and without, the liar. Whither? To death?

Amen! Welcome dark sleep!

Whither? To life? But not this life, dear God, not this. Let the cup pass from us, tempt us not beyond our strength, for there is that clamoring and clawing within, to whose voice we would not listen, yet shudder lest we must, and it is red, Ah! God! It is a red and awful shape.

Selah!

In yonder East trembles a star.

Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord!

Thy will, O Lord, be done!

Kyrie Eleison!

Lord, we have done these pleading, wavering words.

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord!

We bow our heads and hearken soft to the sobbing of women and little children.

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord!

Our voices sink in silence and in night.

Hear us, good Lord!

In night, O God of a godless land!

Amen!

In silence, O Silent God.

Selah!

GIVE a Meat Zest to the home cooking without the inconvenience of making perishable stock.

Armour's EXTRACT of BEEF

is always ready, rich and savory—and keeps indefinitely. A jar of it upon the pantry shelf enables the housewife to give, in an instant, to the home foods, that delicious relish which has won world-wide fame for Italian cooking. A meat zest—that is the secret. It has usually been done with meat stocks—tedious to prepare.

No need of complex preparations. Rich sauces require time and patience, and often make food indigestible.

Armour's Extract of Beef gives to the simplest, most inexpensive foods, aromas and flavors which cannot be equalled by the most elaborate sauces. Variety is endless by combining with other simple seasonings. This is wholesome diet.

Here is an example of how a meat flavor improves a simple food:

Tomato Soup Italienne

Two teaspoonfuls Armour's Extract of Beef
1 can tomatoes
1 quart water bit of bay leaf
2 cloves
1 teaspoonful paprika
1 tablespoonful sugar
1 teaspoonful salt
⅛ teaspoonful soda
2 tablespoonfuls butter
2 tablespoonfuls flour
1 teaspoonful finely chopped onion

Directions for Preparing

Strain the tomatoes, add the water, and cook 20 minutes; add soda, salt, sugar, and Extract of beef; bring to boil on quick fire; bind with butter and flour; add seasonings. Serve with croutons.

Include Armour's Extract of Beef among the regular pantry supplies.

ARMOUR AND COMPANY

in April. Many of them have gone there with camera, and note book, and laboratory appliances, and have spent anywhere from one to a dozen weeks trying to find out the causes, both of success and failure, of concrete construction. They have come back with a fund of information which will add largely to the useful knowledge on the subject and greatly assist in the determination of the true principles along which the concrete builder should work. While there is much yet to learn upon this subject, it should be remembered, however, that the buildings in San Francisco which totally succumbed to fire and shock were not built in accordance with all the then known laws for concrete construction. And one beneficial result of this disaster, aside from the knowledge gained by architects and engineers, will be an impetus on the part of owners of buildings toward giving the architect and engineer carte blanche to design buildings which will embody all the known principles of safety and endurance.

THE TRAGEDY AT ATLANTA

I—FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF THE WHITES

BY

JOHN TEMPLE GRAVES

EDITOR OF "THE ATLANTA GEORGIAN"

IT is exceedingly difficult in times of excitement and of public protest to consider dispassionately or to induce others in that environment to consider dispassionately the causes, conditions and provocations which led to lawlessness and personal vengeance.

It is equally difficult to persuade the majority of those people who live on the northern side of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers to receive any utterances that come from the South with patience and consideration unless it happens that these expressions coincide with their own views.

By the thoughtless newspapers in many cities of the northern and central states, I am written down as a radical extremist upon this Negro question, and without anything more than casual reflection, men who measure other utterances by the line of their own convictions, have done me the injustice to credit me with many things which I have never said, and to misconstrue entirely many things which I have said.

I am legitimately and earnestly a student of the race question. I have studied more diligently than any other the question that relates to the life of the people of the South, with an intensity of interest due to my conceptions of its serious meaning to the welfare of my children and to the future of the section of our common country in which I live.

I am not an extremist. I am not a negrophilist. On the contrary, I am absolutely devoid of passion, temper or prejudice in the consideration of the Negro question. Personally the Negroes regard me as their friend and helper. I receive more requests for personal favors from them than almost any other white man in my section, and, within the limits of my strength and capacity, I give more to their personal welfare and development than most men who live in the South. During the recent troubles in Atlanta my home was the rendezvous of Negroes who sought protection at my hands. And during the high tension of the riot period I sheltered under my own roof and upon my own premises perhaps a larger number of Negroes than any private individual in the South.

I have reached first of all the impression derived from history that the African and the Caucasian races are not only opposite but antagonistic races. They are inherently so. They would have been antagonistic if the institution of slavery had never existed. They are equally as antagonistic in the northern and middle states where slavery has never existed as they are in the South to-day. Who will deny the fierce and frequent outbreaks of this prejudice in the northern sections — in New York, in Wilmington, Delaware, in Danville, Illinois, in Evansville, Indiana, in Columbus, Ohio, in Chicago, in Indianapolis, in Leavenworth, in Topeka and in Cana and Cartersville in Virginia. The different skins of the races make an antagonism which seems to be but natural and providential, and I have only been able to explain it upon the theory that the antagonism of the races represents in part the purpose of the Creator in preventing a congregation of many peoples in one especially favored region of the universe, and in separating the races into different countries by the implanting of this natural prejudice in the bosoms of each.

It is doubtless true and may as well be acknowledged that this prejudice is greater in the South than in the North, because of the institution of slavery, which produces in the mind of the white man a rebellious protest against any effort to place his former slave upon an equality with himself, and on the part of the black man a spirit of revenge for the century of slavery in which he served the South. At any rate no thoughtful man looking fairly at the question can fail to realize that this race antagonism, which exists everywhere, exists peculiarly and emphatically in the South, and that the years that have passed and are now passing do not in any degree modify or ameliorate this racial antipathy and dislike. The younger Negroes imbibe in their mothers' milk the sentiment of hostility and hatred toward the youth and adults of the white race, and this is manifested in their personal relations from the time they start to school to the time they separate in the work and in the vocations of life. It is not because I would be unwilling to see this antagonism speedily destroyed, and it is not because I am not myself a reverent believer in the creed that Christianity is a solvent for human problems, that I am skeptical of a religious solution, but because I do not find in history or in precedent one line of light or one ray of hope upon which to base expectation that this feeling will die away, either in the lapse of time or through the labors of the Church.

I do not know that the crime of rape is primarily due to the existence of this racial antipathy. I am quite confident that in many cases, perhaps in the large majority of cases, it is evolved from other and more tangible causes. The increasing use of whiskey, the consumption of morphine and cocaine, the observation of obscene pictures in low dives, and the ever increasing recklessness and irresponsibility of the criminal Negroes, all joined with the long continuance of hot weather, produce at certain seasons of the year a wave of criminality along this appalling line.

In the application of these considerations to Atlanta's recent riot, I would simply ask fair-minded and broad-minded Americans to adopt that policy which has its sanction in Holy Writ and in the philosophy of justice, and to put themselves so far as possible in the places of the people whom they sometimes so unjustly judge. I am not seeking here to defend or to justify the violence of the mob, but I insist upon it that no brave and fair-minded people in any consideration of the mob can fail to remember and to weigh the provocation which moves the mob.

Those who have kept up with this lamentable tragedy in Atlanta, and those who have done me the honor to read the statement which the Washington Post was kind enough to distribute through the Associated Press, will bear in mind that for nine consecutive weeks the people in and around this city of Atlanta, the capital of Georgia, and in many respects the metropolis of the South, were horrified, at first week after week, and then, day after day, by the continued assaults upon the persons and the virtue of blameless and helpless white women in this vicinity. Never in the history of this atrocious crime in the South have the assaults been so brutal, so audacious in attempt, so fiendish in purpose, in the mutilation of women, and more insolent in the reception with which they have been met by the mass of the race from which these criminals came.

As I have said before, there were within three weeks eleven assaults made and attempted upon pure and virtuous women of good repute and standing in the immediate suburbs of Atlanta.

After the first two or three of these assaults, the press and the people began to discuss them and to devise ways and means to put a stop to them. No general violence was ever suggested or inculcated in any public meeting of the citizens of Atlanta, or in any newspaper of this section, with one exception. The consideration was calm and clear, while it was firm and resolute. It was a fact established that the noble women of Georgia — whose fathers had bought their liberty with their blood, and whose civilization had been worked out through heroic toil and industry — that the noble women of the South were actually living under a reign of terror which destroyed tranquillity in the daytime and a peaceful rest at night. Conditions rapidly grew worse until, at last, there was scarcely a thoughtful man in this section of the state who would dare to leave his home after sunset, even in the city and suburbs, and least of all in the country districts, without leaving a male escort and protector with his family at home. Public meetings, social enjoyments and an attendance upon the night services of the churches were all neglected in order that the man of the house might stay at home to protect the women of his family from a danger that hung like a pall upon the spirit and life of the Georgia home.

The assaults that were made were in the immediate suburbs of Atlanta, under circumstances of peculiar daring. Four of them were attempted right in the very heart of the city, and one of them in the lighted parlors of a home at 9 o'clock in the evening with the members of the family all in the house.

The strain of apprehension and of indignation daily grew in intensity. Public meetings were held under the most prudent yet determined auspices, and the most temperate discussions were held in order to discover the cause and the remedy for this appalling crime. The county police of Atlanta were quadrupled in number. Two hundred and fifty deputies were sworn in by the high sheriff of the county. The Negro leaders, stirred and quickened by the appeals which I had the honor to lead, gave us their full coöperation in preaching hell and damnation from their pulpits to the assailants of our white women.

On the Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday preceding the day of the Atlanta riot there were three separate attempts of extraordinary aggravation attempted within the limits of the city. Friday was an intervening day. The people breathed easier. On Saturday the first editions of the evening newspapers came out without the record of a rape.

Then suddenly there flashed upon the streets an extra announcing that four women had been assaulted within the hour and the indications were that the crimes were preconcerted and coördinately arranged. Another extra of another paper confirmed the rumor, and by 6 o'clock the streets were swarming with an outraged and angry populace who, having exhausted every expedient of remedy and protection that genius, money and law could devise, felt themselves absolutely helpless before the fast multiplying criminals of a race who were seeking to destroy the women of the South.

You know the rest as the story has been told. Without premeditation, without deliberation, without any possible organization, and simply upon the wild impulse of human nature driven to frenzy by the failure of the law and the failure of public sentiment, the impulsive, thoughtless and hot-headed members of our civic population lost the rudder of control in the storm of apprehension and danger that threatened their dearest possession, and the mob was on.

Now we do not need to go further. Atlanta through its representative voice has spoken its protest against the mob. Its newspapers have condemned lawlessness. The world has known that the sober, representative sentiment of this city does not approve the wholesale assault upon a whole people because of the monstrous and unspeakable crime of the few.

I do not plead a justification of the mob, and I do not argue for its continuation, but I invoke the human nature that runs in the red blood of every white man in America to understand at least, even if we can not justify, the fearful and transcendent provocation which stirred the Atlanta mob to its swift and terrible revenge.

If I speak warmly here, it is because no light and tranquil words can possibly describe the sentiment of all classes of our people at this point in a thoroughly law-abiding community of the South. It was the instinct that moves the animal to the protection of its young. It was the instinct that moves the gentlest of doves to fight for the birdlings in her nest; and it was the instinct which fired a people beyond their self control to strike one blow whose single mission was to terrify and to remedy a colossal crime when all else failed.

The deed is done, the riot is over. Preachers have thundered North and South. Public meetings North and South have condemned and deplored the slaughter of the innocent. The passion of the mob has been spent and it is not likely that it will ever rise again in Atlanta. The repetition of the awful scenes of that Saturday night is out of the question.

But let us see fairly and honestly what the mob has done. Since that Saturday night the police and the military report that Atlanta has never enjoyed such peace and order among all elements of its population for the last twenty years. It is the common testimony of observant men that our streets are safer for pedestrians and that our suburban lines are freer and safer than they have been for a decade or more. The shadow of the terror has been lifted in large part from the hearts and minds of our women, and they not only feel safer than they have been at any time within these twenty years, but they are actually safer.

It is the common testimony of thoughtful men that not in two decades have the Negroes of this region been so accommodating, so reasonable, so polite, and so thoroughly kind and considerate in their attitude toward white persons as they are to-day.

It is held by the most conservative of our citizens to be true that the fearful lesson of the white man's vengeance, wrought on Saturday night, will have the effect of saving within the next three years twenty times the number of lives that were lost in the tragedy of the mob.

And above all else this great fact stands out, that since 7 o'clock P.M. on the evening of Saturday, September 22, not the suggestion or rumor of an assault upon a white woman has startled the air of this capital city of Georgia.

Now then, to sum up, I think that the status of affairs is fuller of hope and of promise than it has been before. The Negro has seen the awful and lawless fury of the white man's vengeance when he is aroused beyond control. The Negro has seen the superiority of the white man in numbers, in equipment, in military, in arms, in police force, in fire companies, and in coherent discipline. Best of all we have now, as we have never had before, the full and hearty coöperation of the Negro leaders.

I think that the coöperation of the best class of Negroes with the element of law and order among the whites along this line has done more than anything else has ever done to better the feeling and permanent relationship between the races. I believe that this consistent preaching of the leaders will permeate in time the whole rank even to that of the criminal Negroes of the race, and will cause that class to realize at last that they do not have the sympathy, but the utter condemnation, of their own people for this fiendish crime. I believe that the result of the riot and the reflections which come from it has established the fact that raping is not to be regarded hereafter as a crime of race but a crime of individuals, and will be so punished by the law.

I believe that the minds of thoughtful men of the South are coming more and more to study this instinct of the Negro criminal from a scientific standpoint as the experts study cholera and yellow fever. We are looking for the germ, in heredity, in environment, in habit and in education, and in the diseased conditions of the criminal Negro's body.

I believe that the results of these diligent and intense investigations will within the next year enable us to come nearer to understanding this phase of criminology than we have ever done before, and that with a clearer understanding we will reach in time a better and lawful remedy to control it.

I thank THE WORLD TO-DAY and all thoughtful periodicals that give to the people of the South a fair hearing upon this question. No people on earth know and understand and appreciate the Negro as we do, who were raised with him, and who live in the civilization of which he is so interesting a part. If you will join with us in studying this great question and give to your reflections and expressions less of bitterness, less of the prejudice of sections, and less of abstract philanthropy that measures considerations at the distance of a thousand miles, we will promise to meet you in the same way, frankly and earnestly, and between us we should at least avail to solve this mighty question and if possible to save and elevate and dignify the race that is dependent on our own.

II—FROM THE POINT OF VIEW OF THE NEGROES

W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS

AUTHOR OF "THE SOULS OF BLACK FOLK"

ON Saturday, September 22, a mob of boys and young men from twelve to twenty-two, together with a few older persons, took possession of the streets of the city of Atlanta, Georgia, and killed, beat, maimed and otherwise maltreated such Negroes as they could get at. Afterward Negroes began to retaliate and for a time things looked like an armed vendetta. On Tuesday one hardware firm alone sold $16,000 worth of arms to white people, while every effort was made to disarm Negroes. The net result of the riot was the killing and wounding of at least one hundred persons, most of whom were Negroes, although a very large proportion of both the dead and maimed were white, the exact number on either side being unknown; the looting of three or four white stores and a few Negro; the smashing of plate glass, the partial wrecking of twenty street cars and spoiling of Pullman cars, the suspension of church services for a part of Sunday and a stagnation in business shown by a falling off of more than a quarter of a million of dollars in clearing-house receipts. To quote the results as summed up by the Atlanta Constitution:

"Thousands of Negroes, the best class of the race, the law-abiding class, collecting their property and their savings and leaving Atlanta! Business in almost total stagnation for three days, but now, fortunately, fully resumed with the return of confidence. Factories shut down. Long trains of freight cars standing unloaded for lack of labor to switch them. The loss running into a sum that can not be computed for many weeks."

The Alleged Cause

The alleged cause of this riot was the raping of white women by Negroes culminating in four cases on the day of the riot. The afternoon papers announced "four rapes attempted in swift succession within the hour, two of which had been successful." What were the facts? John Temple Graves' own paper announced September 24 that of these alleged crimes of Saturday, "None was a real case of criminal assault."* The real story of these assaults acknowledged by Graves' paper was as follows:

1. At 2 P.M. a Negro loafing in a back yard was ordered away and shot at.
2. At 7 o'clock a woman was knocked down by a man as she stepped out of her back door. He immediately ran away.
3. At 7:30 o'clock a similar occurrence in another part of the city.
4. An old lady living alone saw a black face looking through the window and was greatly frightened.

Two cases of fright and two cases of intentional or accidental violence is all that occurred Saturday. Before that there had been one case of brutal violence and one case of probably attempted rape and another alleged, but as there was nothing but newspaper report on these cases it is difficult to be sure.

* The Georgian, September 24, 1906.

The Real Cause

The real cause of the riot was two years of vituperation and traduction of the Negro race by the most prominent candidates for the governorship, together with a bad police system and a system of punishing crime which is a disgrace to any civilized state. Mr. Hoke Smith in his campaign for office has deliberately stirred up in every part of the state the deepest hatred of the Negro, fear of his aspirations, and determination to keep him down. Mr. Clark Howell has been but a shade better. Only one candidate, Colonel Estill, treated the Negro with ordinary courtesy.

The colored people, even many of the best and most law-abiding, regard the Atlanta police as their oppressors. In the riot, when the civilization of a city went to pieces, blood ran and drunkenness and fury prevailed. It was, as the Atlanta Constitution naively remarks, "a remarkable fact" that out of 160 men "only two policemen were injured in the slightest degree." Atlanta, a city of less than one hundred thousand has seventeen thousand arrests a year by her 160 policemen, as many as New Orleans with her 270 policemen and twice the Negro population, three times as many as Savannah, where a majority of the inhabitants are Negroes, and three times as many as in a northern industrial center like Lowell, Massachusetts, a city of the same size. Most of the Atlanta arrests are of colored people and are largely for trivial charges.

Then, too, the whole criminal policy of Georgia is to make money out of crime. The system has been improved lately, but as a recent report says:

"It still makes the income from crime rather than the reformation of the criminal of paramount importance. Special stress is laid in each report of the prison commission on this income; the system is extolled as self-sustaining and nets the state large sums of money annually." At present the income is $225,000, which the last prison commission report refers to as a "magnificent increase."*

* Seventh Report, Georgian Prison Commission.

Retaliation by Negroes

In the last resort democratic governments have to depend on the self-defense of law-abiding citizens against the lawless. This is true of the southern whites to almost too great a degree. But it is the unwritten law of the South that the Negro must not defend himself against white aggression. That the mob was composed of the lawless element of whites is certain. The Constitution said: "Are we working for the protection of the womanhood of our race when immature boys — many of them in knee-trousers, many of them led by indiscreet and unthinking leaders; many of them viewing the thing simply as a picnic — drag innocent, pleading human beings from street cars, from alleys where they had taken refuge, from the sides of their employers, and hack and stab and shoot and stamp them?"

As soon as the dazed Negroes realized the situation they naturally began to arm and fight. Again and again the whites started toward "Darktown," one of the slums, but hesitated. The Negroes gained in courage. They shot out all the electric lights and, it is reported, telephoned the governor: "Don't send the police to us, send the mob!"

The situation began to look very grave; twenty or thirty white rioters were arrested, but the great mass were still free, and then the authorities made the strange mistake of attempting to disarm all Negroes, peaceful and vicious alike, while the whites were buying arms by the thousands. In a Negro suburb the county police, having sworn in a large number of white deputies, started to disarm the blacks and were ambushed, had their leader killed and a slaughter ensued. The state militia now was called, the work of arming the whites and disarming the Negroes proceeded, and peace at last settled on the distracted city after three days of orgy.

The Lesson

The lessons of this riot are clear.

1. It is a criminal procedure to stir up race hatred for political preferment.

2. There is crime among Negroes — serious crime, and there is crime among whites. The way to stop it is by just courts, a decent, honest police force, and a system of punishment the object of which is to stop crime and reform criminals, and not to make money.

3. No community can hope to be peaceful if it makes a third or a half of its population helpless, defenseless and ignorant,* and leaves it naked to the worst elements of the city who form its industrial rivals.

4. The Negro must have the ballot. Only in this way can he peacefully defend his life and property, help the best class of whites defend theirs and put down the criminals of both races.

* Atlanta schools can not seat half the Negro children.

5. There is considerable evidence to show that the Atlanta riot was deliberately planned weeks before, and it has been openly charged that many of the attempted assaults were not made by blacks at all. However this may be, it is certain that action and radical action is necessary to prevent future outbreaks. These should take the form of forcing real republican governments in the South by reducing the representation of disfranchising states, and by government aid to the southern public school system to reduce illiteracy and barbarism.

AGRICULTURAL CUBA

BY

F. S. EARLE

DIRECTOR, CUBAN AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION, HAVANA

THE prosperity of Cuba depends almost exclusively on its agriculture. No country of its size in the world excels it in the quantity and quality of its arable lands. No tropical country excels it in the comfort and salubrity of its climate; and in geographical position and the ease and cheapness with which its products can be marketed, it is also unexcelled. It is no wonder therefore that it is more and more attracting the attention of investors and of people who are seeking a milder climate in which to make a home.

Only a small fraction of its fertile acres is as yet under cultivation and its immense possibilities for future development are realized by but few of its scanty population of a million and a half people. It is small wonder, then, that the thrifty land speculator has seen his opportunity here. In the years immediately following the war, advantage was taken of the unsettled business conditions and of the immense losses and consequent financial difficulties of the old land owners to buy up large quantities of Cuban lands at very low prices.

It must be remembered that there is some very poor land as well as much very good land in Cuba. In only too many cases the buyers either did not know or did not care about the quality of their purchases if only the price was low enough. Flowery prospectuses with pictures of beautiful tropical scenes and luscious fruits, and most extravagant statements as to the profits to be derived from the products of a few acres, were scattered broadcast, especially in the United States; large commissions were given to canvassers, and the work was merrily begun of unloading worthless acres that cost only two or three dollars on unsophisticated teachers, clerks and railroad men at prices ranging all the way from $15 or $20 to $50 or more per acre.

During the early days of my residence in Cuba I had the good fortune to travel some distance by rail with a typical representative of that most charming class, the well-to-do Cuban planter. My friend was educated in France, had traveled much in Europe and had resided for many years in the States. He was thoroughly posted on Cuban agriculture and was keenly alive to any suggestions as to means by which existing conditions could be improved. He

The First Universal Races Congress

BY W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS, Ph.D.

[Professor Du Bois was the Honorary Secretary for the United States of the First Universal Races Congress just concluded in London. We have heard from others that his was the best address given at any session. We also publish, on the opposite page, his poem, read at the opening session.—EDITOR].

OF the two thousand international meetings that have taken place in the last seventy-five years there have been few that have so touched the imagination as the Universal Races Congress of this summer.

Such a meeting may be viewed in many lights: as a meeting of widely separated men, as a reunion of East and West, as a glance across the color line or as a sort of World Grievance Committee. Perhaps it was in part something of each of these. There was, however, one thing that this congress could do of inestimable importance. Outside the discussion of racial problems, it could make clear the present state of scientific knowledge concerning the meaning of the term "race."

This the congress did and this was its most important work. There were practically no reports of new anthropological knowledge. There were, however, several reviews and restatements in popular terms of the present dicta of the science in the matter of human races, exprest with a clearness, force and authority that deserve especial mention.

The scientific men who contributed papers to the congress, and who were with few exceptions there in person to take part in the discussions, were, many of them, of the first rank: Von Luschan and Von Ranke, of Germany; Sergi, of Italy; Myers, Lyde and Hadden, of England, and Boas, of America, are all well known; among the other speakers were the Indian scholar, Seal; Lacerda, of Brazil; Finot, of France, and Reinsch, of America. All those mentioned, save Boas, were present in person.

To realize the full meaning of the statements made by these men one must not forget the racial philosophy upon which America has long been nursed. The central idea of that philosophy has been that there are vast and, for all practical purposes, unbridgeable differences between the races of men, the whites representing the higher nobler stock, the blacks the lower meaner race. Between the lowest races (who are certainly undeveloped and probably incapable of any considerable development) and the highest, range the brown and yellow peoples with various intermediate capacities.

The proofs of these assumptions have been repeatedly pointed out; the high civilization of the whites, the lack of culture among the blacks, the apparent incapacity for self-rule in many non-Europeans, and the stagnation of Asia. The reasons for this condition were variously stated: some assumed separate development for each race, while others spoke as tho the various races represented different stages in the same general development, with thousands of years between, the negro remaining nearest the ape, the whites furthest from the common ancestor.

Had these assumptions remained merely academic opinions it would not be necessary to recall them, but they have become the scientific sanction for widespread and decisive political action—like the disfranchisement of American negroes, the subjection of India and the partition of Africa. Under the aegis of this philosophy strong arguments have justified human slavery and peonage, conquest, enforced ignorance, the dishonoring of women and the exploitation of children. It was divine to enslave negroes; Mexican peonage is the only remedy for laziness; powerful nations must rule the mass of men who are not fit and cannot be fitted to rule themselves; colored women must not expect to be treated like white, and if commerce is arranged so as to make the dark world toil for the luxury and ease of the white, this is but the law of nature.

As I sat in the great hall of the University of London, I wondered how many in those audiences of five, six and seven hundred who daily braved the sweltering heat of a midsummer meeting realized how epoch-making many of the words quietly spoken there were, and how far they went toward undermining long and comfortably cherished beliefs.

The anthropologists were not rash in statement. They spoke with full realization of the prevalent attitude of Europeans toward other races. Some, like Von Luschan, took pains to emphasize separate racial development for the sake of the "hassenkamf," but he began with the sweeping assertion that "mankind is one":

> "Fair and dark races, long and short-headed, intelligent and primitive, all come from one stock. Favorable circumstances and surroundings, especially a good environment . . caused one group to advance more quickly than another."

Moreover both he and Von Lanke, Sergi and others ridiculed the possibility of a "science" of race, or, indeed, of the possibility or desirability of drawing complete racial lines: "The question of the number of human races," said Von Luschan, "has quite lost its raison d'être, and has become a subject of philosophical speculation, rather than of scientific research. It is of no more importance to know how many races there are than to know how many angels dance on the point of a needle!"

Especial insistence was made against regarding races as unchangeable accomplished facts; they were, in the words of Boas and Seal, "growing developing entities" and "the old idea of the absolute stability of racial types must evidently be given up; and with it the belief in the hereditary superiority of certain types over others."

This brought the discussion to the crucial point, for granted that human beings form a family thru which it is difficult to draw absolute lines, yet does not the present advancement of the various groups of men correspond on the whole with their physical characteristics? No proposition was more emphatically denied than this. In physique, said Seal, quoting Weisbach, "each race has its share of the characteristics of inferiority," and it is impossible to arrange the main groups of men in an ascending scale of physical development. Lyde, of Oxford, added that even color, which is today made the greatest of racial barriers, is with little doubt "entirely a matter of climatic control."

Nevertheless there are tremendous differences in the present condition of the various groups of men—whence do they arise and how permanent are they? Practically every anthropologist present laid the chief stress on environment in explaining these differences; not simply physical environment but the even more

The Negro's Fatherland

By W. E. B. Du Bois

DIRECTOR OF PUBLICATIONS AND RESEARCH, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE

THE future of Africa is one of the most important questions to be answered after this war. The very silence today concerning that future, on both sides of the forces at war, emphasizes its importance. We must remember that in Africa we have today not only the greatest world mine of undeveloped human labor but, also, that much of the raw material which the modern world particularly wants is to be found in Africa more abundantly than anywhere else. Let us note the list: Palm-oil, cocoa, mahogany, ebony, cork, cotton, rubber, ivory, ostrich feathers, gold, copper, iron, zinc, tin, lead and diamonds,—these are the present gifts of Africa to the world. Others in abundance hide in her bosom. The fight for the ownership of these materials and the domination of this labor was a prime cause of the present war. If this question is to be left unsettled after this war it is going to be a prime cause of future wars.

Why, then, are we so silent concerning the fate of something between 150,000,000 and 200,000,000 human beings? I presume that the cause of our indifference is largely psychological. It is the penalty of human degradation which always exacts payment from oppressor and oppressed. Today it is possible to ignore the Negro because of a history of degradation the parallel of which the modern world does not furnish. In ancient Mediterranean civilization Negro blood was predominant in many great nations and present in nearly all. Negro genius and Negro civilization gave here their great gifts to the world. In the European middle age when Africa became more or less separated from direct contact with Europe, nevertheless, African culture filtered into Europe, and legend and story and song came out of the dark continent. There was then no question of racial inferiority based upon color. But then, beginning late in the fifteenth century, the world for four hundred years raped this continent on a scale never before equalled. The result was not only the degradation of Africa, it was a moral degradation of those who were guilty; and we are still living in the shadow of the debauch of the African slave trade. It comes natural for us to have great masses of unthought-of men; to conceive of society as built upon an unsocial mudsill. It is possible for great labor organizations like the American Federation of Labor to organize themselves upon distinctly aristocratic lines, leaving out of account and out of thought certain so-called lower elements of labor. It is even possible for an organization like the League of Small and Subject Nationalities to bring in Africa only as an accident and after-thought. This mental attitude toward Africa and its problems builds itself upon unclear thinking based on the tyranny of conventional words.

When we speak of modern African slavery we think of modern slavery as a survival of ancient slavery. But it was not. The cleft between the two was absolute. Modern African slavery was the beginning of the modern labor problem, and must be looked at and interpreted from that point of view unless we would lose ourselves in an altogether false analogy. Modern world commerce, modern imperialism, the modern factory system and the modern labor problem began with the African slave trade. The first modern method of securing labor on a wide commercial scale and primarily for profit was inaugurated in the middle of the fifteenth century and in the commerce between Africa and America. Through the slave trade Africa lost at least 100,000,000 human beings, with all the attendant misery and economic and social disorganization. The survivors of this wholesale rape became a great international laboring force in America on which the modern capitalistic movement has been built and out of which modern labor problems have arisen. We have tried ever since to keep these black men and their descendants at the bottom of the scale on the theory that they were not thoroughly men, that they cannot be self-respecting members of and contributors to modern culture—an assumption purely modern and undreamed of in ancient or medieval days.

If, now, this same psychology and this same determination to exploit and enslave these people passes over into the new world after the war, what can we expect but, on the one hand, persistence of the idea that there must be an exploited class at the bottom of civilization and, on the other, an endeavor by endless war and rapine, futile at first but in the end bound to be triumphant, by which these millions of people will gain their right to think and act. No modern world can dream of holding 200,000,000 of people in permanent slavery even though they be black. If it tries, the cost will be terrible. If we would avoid this cost then we must begin the freeing of Africa through this war.

There is an unusual opportunity to do this. Africa is today held by Negro troops trained under European white officers. These Negro troops have saved France. They have conquered German Africa. They and their American Negro brothers are helping to save Belgium. It would be the least that Europe could do in return and some faint reparation for the terrible world history between 1441 and 1861 to see that a great free central African state is erected out of German East Africa and the Belgian Congo. Surely after Belgium has suffered almost as much from Germany as Africa has suffered from her, she ought to be willing to give up the Congo to this end; and it would be right that England should refrain from taking German East Africa as well as refrain from handing it back. Out of this state we could make a great modern effort to restore the ancient efficiency of the land that gave the iron age to all the world, and that for ages led in agriculture, weaving, metal working, and the traffic of the market place. Here is a chance such as the world has not seen since the fifteenth century. Liberia and Haiti were never given a sincere chance and were from first to last harassed, as only modern capitalism can harass little and hated nations.

The effort of such a new and sincere start in Africa would be tremendous. Its first effect would be upon the millions of Africa and then upon their descendants throughout the world. In the West Indies and in South America are some 30,000,000 of men of Negro descent. They have given literature and freedom to Brazil; they have given industry and romance to the West Indies, and they have given to North America art and music and human sensibility. In South America they may lose themselves in the blood of other people, but in the West Indies and North America they are striving for self-expression and need only such encouragement as just treatment of their fatherland and its spiritual effect on the whole world would give. I trust, therefore, that among the new nations that are to start forth after this war will be a new Africa and a new beginning of culture for the Negro race.

Now there are six Negroes in the French House. There were 280,000 black African troops in the war before whom France stands with uncovered head. The net result was that Clemenceau gave us permission to hold the Pan-African Congress in Paris. What could a Pan-African Congress do? It could not agitate the Negro problem in any particular country, except in so far as that problem could be plausibly shown to be part of the problem of the future of Africa. The problem of the future of Africa was a difficult and delicate question before the Peace Conference—so difficult and so delicate that the conference was disposed to welcome advice and cooperation.

If the Negroes of the world could have maintained in Paris during the entire sitting of the Peace Conference a central headquarters with experts, clerks, and helpers, they could have settled the future of Africa at a cost of less than $10,000. As it was, the congress cost $750. Yet with this meager sum a congress of 58 delegates, representing 16 different Negro groups, was assembled. This congress passed resolutions which the entire press of the world has approved, despite the fact that these resolutions had two paragraphs of tremendous significance to us.

Two Great Points Made

Wherever persons of African descent are civilized and able to meet the tests of surrounding culture, they shall be accorded the same rights as their fellow citizens; they shall not be denied on account of race or color a voice in their own government, justice before the courts, and economic and social equality according to ability and desert.

Whenever it is proven that African natives are not receiving just treatment at the hands of any state or that any state deliberately excludes its civilized citizens or subjects of Negro descent from its body politic and cultural, it shall be the duty of the League of Nations to bring the matter to the attention of the civilized world. Colonel House of the American Peace Commission received me and assured me that he wished these resolutions presented to the Peace Conference. Lloyd George wrote me that he would give our demands "his careful consideration." The French Premier offered to arrange an audience for the president and secretary of the conference. Portugal and Belgium, great colonial powers, offered complete cooperation.

As it was, we have organized the Pan-African Congress as a permanent body, with Mr. Diagne as president and myself as secretary, and we plan an international quarterly, Black Review, to be issued in English, French, and possibly in Spanish and Portuguese.

The world-fight for black rights is on!

went to the Amer[illegible]
sion and said frankly and openly: "I want to call a Pan-African Congress in Paris." The captain to whom I spoke smiled and shook his head: "Impossible," he said, and added: "The French Government would not permit it." "Then," said I innocently, it's up to me to get French consent!"

THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE NEGRO TO AMERICAN LIFE AND CULTURE

32-39-116

It takes but little reflection to realize how far the Negro element in American Life is part of the very essence of its being. History, art, literature, industry,—on no one of these can we write for America without dwelling in some degree on the Negro. While most people would admit this, they at the same time assume that the place of the Negro in American culture is not that of a contributor, but rather of a passive victim or brute fact. This is not true. If we take his simplest contribution, manual toil, his significance to America has been tremendous. In a day when to Europe foreign trade was principally a trade in luxuries, designed for the whimsical rich and consequently more or less of a gambling operation, there came four great crops which, because of their wide demand among the mass of people, furnished for the first time in modern days a stabilized basis for foreign commerce. These were sugar from the West Indies, rice, tobacco and cotton from the mainland of America. Modern foreign trade was built upon these crops, and to them was added a trade in labor itself—the slave trade. The Negro then, both as an article of commerce and as a laborer upon basic articles of commerce, laid the foundations of the new world.

From these beginnings in the 15th and 16th centuries his importance as a laborer increased. The economic development of America would have been impossible without him. and its cultural and political growth far different. Through Negro labor, America bridged long centuries over which other continents had toiled. His toil was not only positively efficient and valuable, but negatively his wide employment as common laborer and servant has for centuries released for other employment millions of persons, and upon this fact, more than any other, is based the phenomenal speed of American growth.

As time went on the Negro became the back bone of the farming industry in the South and today in a vast country where he forms only one tenth of the population he furnishes one third of the farmers and farm laborers and one fifth of the actual farm operators in the land.

Nor has the Negro confined himself entirely to the grosser forms of brute toil. He has done much as a skilled and semi-skilled laborer and even in the higher regions of invention he is not unknown. Granville Woods made some of the basic inventions on the telephone, Elija McCoy invented the foundations of the present system of locomotive lubrication and Matzeliger contrived the machine for making shoes which is today the basis of wholesale shoe manufacture.

The Negro woman, particularly, has played a curious and interesting part in the economic and spiritual life of America: slavery compelled her to be at least as large a contributor to the support of the Negro family as the man and very often she contributed more in care and labor to the training of the children. After emancipation she tended to become to a greater degree than white women economically independent, so that today nearly 39% of the colored women are in gainful employment as compared with 18½% of the white women.

The contribution of the Negro has not been confined, however, to his labor. Perhaps even greater than his contribution of toil has been his gift to art in America. With the single exception of the rather small contribution of the American Indian, the only real American music is Negro music and that which, past and present, has been based upon it. The Negro folk song was based upon African themes and rhythm, but was not simply African; it was developed by the African in America into new and poignantly beautiful forms and is today known and sung throughout civilization. From it Steven Foster in earlier days and composers like Powell in our day have developed notable musical contributions. Moreover Negro composers themselves like Harry Burleigh, Rosamond Johnson, Nathaniel Dett, Will Marion Cook and others in America, and Coleridge Taylor in England, have raised a splendid superstruction. The peculiarly African gift of syncopation and rhythm has swept the modern world not only in song but in dance.

Negro America has produced a series of notable singers but they naturally are but slightly known outside of the Negro world itself. The so-called "Black Swan" in 1851 had a voice with a range greater than that of Jennie Lind but of course its possibilities were only partially trained. The Fisk singers and other bands who rendered the Negro folk songs were widely heard in Europe and America just after the Civil War and our tenor, Roland Hayes, has just sung before the King in England.

On the stage, in spite of equally great drawbacks, we have had Ira Aldrich who was regarded in Europe as one of the greatest tragedians of the day, equal in his line to the great Rachel. He was decorated by the Emperors of Russia and Austria and made a member of several academies of science and art. In our own land we have had Bert Williams and Charles Gilpin and on the minstrel stage have given the world a peculiar and characteristic kind of stage humor and comedy.

The American Negro has his painters like Tanner, known throughout the world, and sculptors like Edmonia Lewis once widely known, but now forgotten. In literature the gift of the Negro divides itself naturally into two parts. First his peculiar situation and tragic history has been the inspiration of perhaps a larger mass of American literature than any other single series of facts in American life. We have only to think of the writings of Emerson, Whittier, Holmes, Lowell, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Julia Ward Howe, Thomas Nelson Page and George W. Cable. One could not on any basis of selection pick out ten great American masterpieces without including two or three like Uncle Tom's Cabin, based primarily on the Negro. On the other hand there has arisen an important American literature written by Negroes including Phillis Wheatley of Revolutionary days and Paul Lawrence Dunbar and Charles W. Chesnutt of our own day. There are a number of biographies which have been widely read, especially those of Frederick Douglass and Booker T. Washington. Between these two main branches of literature by the Negro we may note a growth of work like that of Joel Chandler Harris, where folk lore of purely Negro origin has been put into literary form by a white writer.

If we turn now to the indefinite but important matter of general social uplift we must first remember that emancipation was not simply the gift of white America to the passive Negro. As persistent fugitives from slavery, agitators, contributors to anti-slavery funds, organizers and helpers in the Underground Railroad, the actions of Negroes were decisive in making the abolition of slavery possible. The anti-slavery campaign without Harriet Tubman, Sojourner Truth and Frederick Douglass would have been impossible.

The Negro also has done much for the religious life of America. He has been a vivid exponent of religious emotion, an organizer of churches on a wide scale and a pioneer in missionary effort as in the case of George Lisle, the first American missionary to the West Indies and Lott Cary, an early missionary to Africa. Negro preachers have ministered to white congregations and had great success as in the case of Lemuel Haynes in New England, John Chavis and Lunsford

Lane in the South. As legislators Negroes in Reconstruction times were first in establishing the public school in the South, in admitting to the ballot classes of white men who had never been allowed to vote before and beginning a new system of social legislation. They even tried in South Carolina to deal with the distribution of land along lines which we now see were far-sighted and important.

From the beginning of American history down to the present time the Negro has in a peculiar way and by his own action and expression been a sort of test and measure of democracy in America. If democracy finally triumphs in the world as a feasible method of human government it will be because in America the Negro was found capable of participating in democratic government and was, after much travail and oppression, accepted as a fellow citizen.

In general ways there have been several American Negroes like Benjamin Banneker, Booker T. Washington and William Stanley Braithwaite who in many lines, quite outside their racial identity, have contributed much to American culture.

Finally a word might be said as to the special fields of exploration and defense in which the American Negro has been notable. One must not forget that the only living human being who has stood at the North Pole is an American Negro and that nearly 400 years before that event Estevanico was the first person of the eastern hemisphere to discover Arizona, New Mexico and the Southwest. There were Negro helpers and laborers with Balboa, Cortez and Pizarro. If it had not been for Toussaint L'Ouverture and the Haitian revolt there is every reason to believe that the Mississippi valley could never have been acquired by America and certainly not for the nominal sum which Jefferson paid for it. It was the Haitian revolt that drove France out of the Mississippi valley. On the other hand the Negro not only helped to find the land but to defend it and colored soldiers have been decided factors in the Revolutionary War, when Crispus Attucks was the first to fall; the War of 1812, on Lake Erie and at New Orleans; the Civil War, where 200,000 Negro soldiers were, according to Lincoln, indispensable to victory; the Spanish American War, where they saved Roosevelt at El Caney, and the World War. In the World War there were a thousand Negro American officers, 200,000 soldiers and stevedores who saw service in Europe, and 200,000 others in the camps of the United States.

THE COMPLEXITY OF THE AMERICANIZATION PROBLEM

By Herbert Adolphus Miller

If we compare a language map of Europe with a nationality map of any industrial city of America, it is immediately obvious that within one city's limits there is found the task of working out a way of harmoniously living together which the same people have not worked out when they have had all of Europe in which to do it. In all of these cities there is also a substantial minority who call themselves Americans and who assume to run the city according to their own standards. In 1915 more than half of the children in the schools of Cleveland did not speak English at home, and the same was true of Boston, New York, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Toledo, Chicago, and a multitude of other cities large and small, and yet the average American citizen never questions for a moment that they were English speaking cities.

It is not generally understood that in addition to variety of nationality, every political party in Europe is represented by these people in our American cities. It is no exaggeration to say that one can learn more about Europe in one summer in Chicago than in a year in Europe. I know for I have done it . We have, then, in addition to the adjustment of for-on terms of social equality and the offspring should reap the benefit of such equalization.

The results of race mixture in the United States are not merely a subject of academic curiosity. This country cannot afford to remain longer in complaisant ignorance of the nature and consequences of phenomena which will affect largely its future welfare.

This is the last Brownies' Book. For twenty-four months we have brought Joy and Knowledge to four thousand Brownies stretched from Oregon to Florida. But there are two million Brownies in the United States, and unless we got at least one in every hundred to read our pages and help pay printing, we knew we must at last cease to be. And now the month has come to say goodbye. We are sorry---much sorrier than any of you, for it has all been such fun. After all---who knows---perhaps we shall meet again.

THE LAND BEHIND THE SUN

YOLANDE DU BOIS

YOU didn't know that there was such a place did you? No, neither did Madalen, until she went there. Madalen looked like a little Japanese girl, with a dimpled face, golden-brown in color, and soft jet-black hair. Her pretty almond-shaped eyes usually sparkled and danced with mischief. In fact, one afternoon these black eyes held too much mischief for her own good, and after she had succeeded in breaking two saucers, teased the white kitten, eaten the sugar on the sideboard and tangled her grandmother's knitting, her mother decided to put her to bed. I forgot to tell you that Madalen was a very little girl.

"But, Mamma," she protested, "I'm not sleepy, not a bit," and she opened her eyes very widely indeed.

"You've been a very naughty little girl, and if you don't behave, the Brownies will come and carry you away."

"Are the Brownies bad fairies?"

"Well," replied her mother, "they are little brown elves who catch naughty little boys and girls and carry them away until they promise to be good."

"Oh-oh," gasped Madalen, "and where do they take them?"

"Oh, somewhere down behind the sun," laughed the mother. "Now, Madalen, you really must close your eyes and go to sleep."

"Yes, Mamma," said the little girl, "but I wanna know—is it dark behind the sun?"

"Um-m, perhaps. I've never been there," and her mother closed the nursery door hastily. For quite a while Madalen lay perfectly still, with one chubby brown finger in her mouth.

"I wish"—she said aloud after a few moments, "I wish I could peek behind the sun, just to see what it is like."

"Do you really want to see behind the sun?" piped a small sweet voice.

"Oh," squealed Madalen, "who was that?"

"Look behind you," continued the voice. The words were no more than spoken when Madalen whirled around and there, on her very own bed-post, sat the prettiest little figure you ever saw. It looked like a doll, about eight inches high, but Madalen had never seen a doll who could laugh and swing her feet as this one did. Moreover, this minute figure was entirely gold. Her little hands and face were a dull golden-brown, her eyes were like a topaz, her filmy draperies seemed to shimmer with sunlight, and her hair shone like pure gold spun into threads. As for her wings, have you ever seen a bubble in the sunlight? Well, that's what her wings were like. When Madalen could recover from her astonishment she asked:

"Who are you, and where did you come from?"

"From behind the sun," gaily replied the little figure. "I'm one of the ladies-in-waiting, and my name is Topaz."

"Oh," said Madalen, "do you really live behind the sun—what is it like back there?"

"It's a very beautiful land," said the little creature soberly. "Would you like to visit it for a little while?"

"Yes," hesitated the child, "but how shall I get there? Besides, Mamma would spank me for running away."

"Just hold on to my hand tight and shut your eyes—when I say, 'Open', then you'll be there; and as for your mother, she'll never miss you from your crib."

Madalen obediently shut her eyes and clasped the hand of the tiny fairy. For a second she heard a rushing noise, and some voice, only much louder, bade her open her eyes. Looking around, she was astonished to see that Topaz was now the same size as herself.

"Oh," she cried, "you've grown up."

"No," laughed the fairy, "you've grown down."

"Do you mean," demanded the little girl, "that I'm as small as you were?"

"Yes indeed—you had to be to get behind the sun. Now take my hand and come along if you want to see the court of the Queen."

Madalen placed her hand in the fairy's and to her consternation, they rose in the air.

However, as she seemed to float along quite easily and without any effort, she soon gathered up courage to look about her. First of all, she noticed that although the sky above her was a deep blue in color, there was no sun. She couldn't tell where the light came from, but everything seemed enveloped in a silvery glare as though a full moon were shining over them. The next strange thing that she noticed was that the ground was blue; they were floating swiftly over hills and valleys, and the smooth velvety grass, the swaying trees and dainty cottages—all were delightful shades of blue.

"Why is everything blue?" she inquired of her guide, "and where's the sun?"

"Silly!" exclaimed Topaz with a smile, "you're behind it, so naturally you can't see it, and the back of the sun always gives a silver light. Everything is blue because it's our Queen's favorite color. Her name is Sapphire, and all her ladies-in-waiting are called after precious stones."

Madalen replied to this explanation with a nod because she was so busy looking she just couldn't speak. They were approaching what looked like a crystal city. As they drew near, Madalen could see that each little house was a single sapphire, carved into delicate tunnels and pergolas. The little city spread out, and in the very center stood the palace. It was an immense structure, entirely of blue stones set in silver. At the gate of the city they dropped back to earth, and Topaz touched a tiny bell on the lacy silver gate before them. Almost immediately the gate flew open and they beheld a little brown man dressed in a soldier's suit of blue velvet trimmed with silver.

"Greetings—Lady of the Topaz," he said, bowing low before the golden fairy.

"Gatekeeper, this is Lady Madalen from the Land in Front of the Sun."

At this the quaint little man bowed so low that he nearly tumbled on his nose, and the two girls were obliged to hurry on to keep from laughing and hurting his feelings. That never would have done, you know—it's awfully unkind to hurt people's feelings.

As they passed through the winding streets of the little city, Madalen noticed the cheerful faces of the inhabitants, which were all different shades of brown.

"Why!" she exclaimed, "everybody's brown."

"Yes," smiled Topaz, "didn't you know we are the Brownies—we are all brown, even our Queen."

"Why are the ladies-in-waiting named after stones?" inquired the little visitor.

"Because each one looks after the children born in the month her stone represents. What month were you born in?"

"October," replied Madalen.

"Oh," cried the fairy, "that's Opal's month. She is the most beautiful of us, except the Queen—her wings and her dresses are all changeable just like the Opal. Well, here we are. Now, Madalen, follow me and do exactly as I do."

Madalen obediently followed Topaz, gazing meanwhile with awestruck eyes at the structure which they were entering. Her eyes were dazzled by the light from the innumerable blue stones. Crossing the moat over a high arched bridge, Topaz paused and raised her arms. Madalen did likewise and the gate swung open. They ascended a wide, blue carpeted stairway, with a vast reception room also carpeted and hung with blue. At the far ends Madalen could see two blue thrones cut out of single sapphires.

"This," explained the fairy, "is the throne room. It is nearly time for the Queen to receive, so we'll wait."

She had hardly spoken when the vast doors on each side swung open and the ladies-in-waiting appeared. It would be impossible to describe them all, but they were very beautiful. There was the Amethyst in her robe of royal purple, the Ruby in rich red, the Turquoise in delicate blue, and the Opal, resplendent with her rainbow wings and draperies and flaming hair. Looking at the others, Madalen noticed them eagerly watching the throne, so she gazed also. Suddenly it became enveloped in a puff of smoke and as this cleared away she saw the Queen on the throne. When all the ladies had courtesied, Madalen stood before her.

"Lady Madalen," said a voice like a silver bell, "greetings and welcome, my dear."

The Queen's cordiality and beauty soon quieted the child's fears. She looked like a mere girl, about Madalen's color, wrapped in sheer blue chiffon. Around her plump brown neck was a necklace of blue. Even her sandals were blue and the blackness of her hair seemed to reflect blue lights.

Madalen watched the court proceedings with interest and afterward the Queen turned to her and inquired how she liked their land.

"Oh," cried the visitor, "I think it's just wonderful—but I thought you punished naughty children here."

"No," replied the Queen, "but sometimes we bring them here to show them how nice it is to be good."

"Oh, I see," replied Madalen, "and what does become of the bad ones?

"Well, if they insist on being naughty, the Wicked Witch of Bogland gets them."

At this juncture the Queen looked very sad.

"Sometimes," she continued, "we can buy them back as the Witch is very fond of gold and silver, and we have plenty of that because whenever anyone in your world does a kind act a piece of gold drops into our treasury."

The Queen went on to tell how the Wicked Witch of Bogland had captured the young King. He was so handsome that she refused money for him but determined to marry him herself. Her eyes filled with tears as she murmured,

"We've tried lots of earth-children but they've all failed and you're too small."

"Well," offered the little girl, "if you tell me what to do I'll try to help you."

Then the Queen sent for Opal and charged her to direct Madalen on her way. As they went out of the Palace, Opal said:

"I know you don't know me but I've often sung you to sleep."

Soon they came to a hedge of thorns and Opal placed a little blue cap on Madalen's head and bade her good-bye, saying:

"Good luck, little one, I would come also but the fairies of this country may not enter Bogland."

Then she clapped her hands and Madalen found herself in a dark wood. Seeing a dim light in the distance, she followed it and soon found a tiny cabin. By this time she was awfully scared but she managed to knock on the door. A hump-backed dwarf opened it and motioned her to enter and turning to the other figure in the room, he squeaked:

"A tasty morsel, eh, mother?"

Looking past the dwarf, the girl saw the Witch, a bent figure in black with a white distorted face and hard gray eyes.

"Hee-hee," she cackled, "a very fine supper, my son; here, fetch me some water to boil her in."

Madalen looked around her in terror. There was no way of escape, she would be cooked alive!

The elf returned and setting down the pail, motioned her to get in it. As she hesitated, the Witch started toward her in a rage and in a panic of fear the child grasped the pail and flung the water over her.

"Oh, oh, oh," screamed the Witch, "Just look what you've done. I'm melting! Didn't you know any better than to wet me?"

Sure enough she was melting before their eyes. The dwarf fled into the darkness as she sank into a shapeless mass. Almost immediately bells began to ring everywhere and people of all shapes and sizes appeared to thank Madalen for their rescue. After a moment of astonishment she recovered herself enough to ask for the unfortunate "King of the Brownies". After a long search they found him hidden away in a dark garret, weak with hunger. Curtsying, Madalen exclaimed joyously:

"The Witch is dead, your Majesty."

Of course his surprise and joy knew no bounds. He was a handsome little king in spite of his rags, with a clear, kind eye. Bidding the others follow, they hurried through the wood to the thorny hedge where the King clapped three times and they were on the other side. When they reached the court, everyone went positively wild with joy and gratitude and determined to give a magnificent ball in honor of Madalen; but when they went to look for her she wasn't there at all!

And far away, in the land of the sun, Madalen was just waking up.

That night at supper her father looked at her strangely, saying:

"I never noticed that little star-shaped mark on your forehead before, daughter."

"No, replied Madalen, "that's where the Queen of the Brownies kissed me."

"What!" cried her astonished parents, "you've been dreaming again."

"Perhaps," said the child.

But she knew quite well it wasn't a dream and we knew it too, but we aren't telling all we know.

UP TO THE CRATER OF AN OLD VOLCANO

LANGSTON HUGHES

NEAR Toluca, Mexico, is an old volcano, Xinantecatl. The fires which once burned within its bosom have long ago gone out and now, in the deep crater that in past centuries held boiling lava and red hot ashes, two calm blue lakes sparkle like dainty jewels in a rough setting. No one knows when the last eruption of this volcano took place but some say that it was long before the time of Christ, and when the Aztec Indians came down from the North to found their powerful empire, Xinantecatl, for so they called it, had long been sleeping. Now, like a dead giant at rest, it is still great and majestic. Rising above the puny cities and little low hills that cluster about its base, it is as some nature king rising above a subject people. The ancient Indians thought it a god and climbed its steep sides carrying gold and jewels and precious gifts on their backs as an offering to the mountain deity. Even today the rural Indians say that when shots are fired in the crater or stones thrown into the blue lakes, the mountain becomes angry and calls the clouds to hide its peaks and send rain down upon its disturbers. We in Toluca, however, are not afraid of Xinantecatl. It is like a well known friend to us and one whom we see every day. On clear mornings its peaks are sharp and distinct in the blue sky; at evening the whole mountain makes a great black silhouette against the twilight colors.

When the boys of the Instituto, Toluca's high school, began to plan a two-day walking trip to the crater, and invited me to go with them, I accepted eagerly. They, with the customary Mexican politeness, put my name first on the list of those who were to go and several of the students went with me to aid in choosing the proper kind of "trumpeate", a sort of bag for carrying food. It is woven from marsh grass and is light of weight. They also saw that I bought a wide Mexican hat, as protection from the sun, and told me all the things that I would need to carry. First, plenty of lunch; then, two warm blankets because we were to sleep in the open mountains; my camera for pictures; a bottle for water; a small amount of cognac or some other liquor in case of mountain sickness in the high altitude; and a pistol. "But above all," they said, "take onions!" Those who had been up to the volcano before claimed that they were the very best things to smell if one began to feel ill in the thin air near the summit. I thought to myself that if I should get sick, the scent of onions would only make me worse. Nevertheless I took them and when the time arrived for their use I found my mind completely changed about their smell.

It was a beautiful sunny morning when we left Toluca. From the platform of the small station, where we were to board the seven o'clock train for Calimaya, we could see the white, sparkling snow peaks of the volcano and they seemed very high and far away. There were forty of us going on the trip and, before leaving time, the first coach of the tiny train was completely filled with Instituto boys. The aisle of the car was one jumble of blanket rolls and fat "trumpeates" of food, and the windows were crowded with faces—mostly brown faces of laughing young fellows, all talking at once and watching the late comers hurrying down the platform. These dark faced, friendly school boys were about like other dark skinned boys of my own race whom I had known in the United States. They made me remember a hike that the colored Y. M. C. A. fellows, in Chicago, took out to the sand dunes one summer. There the car windows were crowded with dark faces, too, and everybody talked at once. The only difference was that in Chicago they were speaking English and when a late member of the party reached the platform, every one cried out, "Hurry up!" while here, when Rudolfo, the tardy, came running through the gates, every one in the window shouted, "Apurese!" which means the same in Spanish.

The little train went click, click, click, down the pretty valley. We passed several small villages: Metepec, with its great church large enough to hold its whole population; San Francisco, a collection of small huts, and a white temple; Mexicaltzingo, where the country bullfights are held; and then Calimaya, where the road to the volcano begins.

We found Calimaya a small, clean town with cobblestone streets and a stream of water running down the center of each one, where the cows and long horned oxen stopped to drink.

We piled our blankets and bags in one corner of its arched "Portales" to wait while two of the boys went for the guide and the burros—patient little beasts of burden—who were to carry our things. After a long while the burros came. There had been some disagreement in regard to the money to be paid, so we learned, the guide having set a price and then suddenly changing his mind, saying that he could not risk his animals in the cold mountain air for such a small sum. But finally an agreement was reached and we had three burros, a boy and two men to drive them, and a guide—all for a price that would amount to but five American dollars, and this for a two-day trip!

When the word "Vamanos" was given, the three small animals were almost hidden under their loads of blankets and lunch-bags, but being strong, sturdy little beasts, they did not seem to mind. They started off down the road with a trot, the two drivers and the boy running behind shouting, "Burro! Burro!" to make them go faster. The members of the hiking party, freed of their luggage, had nothing to pack now except the canteens or water bottles and their guns. Very few having pistols, there was an unusual variety of fire-arms in sight, from a modern rifle to ancient carbines. The reason for so many shooting machines was that we might meet bandits on the road, and, though it was only a might, every one should be prepared. During the revolutions and until a year or so ago the hills were full of robbers, who, not content with taking travelers' money, would ofttimes take their clothes, even to their shoes, leaving the robbed ones to get home as best they could. Now, though such robberies are infrequent, no one goes far into the country unarmed. The boys of the Instituto, going through the quaint streets of Calimaya, looked like a small militia.

The road leading to the foothills was quite bare of trees. High in a cloudless sky, the sun beat down upon our heads without pity, while the dust rose in clouds from under our feet.

On either side the road was lined with maguey and cactus plants which served as a sort of fence around the fields, where lazy, slow moving oxen were pulling wooden plows yoked to their horns, and wide-hatted peons pricked them languidly with sharp-pointed sticks. After about an hour's walking we passed Zaragoza, a small village which, like all Mexican villages, had its tall old church towering sad and beautiful above the miserable little huts. By this time all our water bottles were empty and our throats were dry. The guide promised us that we should come to a river soon and when we finally reached its friendly banks, after what seemed like an eternity of tramping in dust and sun, we lay on our stomachs like dogs and drank the cool clear water that came rippling down from the hills.

Soon the road began to ascend and we found ourselves climbing a slope covered with little pine trees. Before us, when we reached the summit, we saw only pine clad hills and then more hills, hiding the volcano from us. Looking back, we saw the wide valley of Toluca below, dotted with red roofed villages and the white towers and domes of old, old churches. At its opposite side we saw the mountains rising like a wall about the valley, shutting it in from the rest of the world and protecting it with their grey and purple strength.

The road now led upward, and it was not easy climbing through the forest of stunted trees with the sun like a hot ball overhead. About one o'clock, when everybody was aching and tired, the guide showed us a little cañon at one side of the road and said that here was the last water to be found before reaching the crater, the next morning; so he advised us to stop for lunch and to fill our water bottles. The burros were unloaded and everyone searched in the pile of "trumpeates" for his lunch-bag. As each woven sack looked just about like another, there was much opening and exchanging and inspecting before each one had his own. Then we scattered about the slope and prepared to eat. One of the boys from each group went down to the spring for water, and it was deliciously sweet and cool. After lunch we decided to rest a while. The guide said we had made good time and in three hours we could reach the timber line, where we were to make camp on the edge of the woods.

At three o'clock we climbed up to the road, loaded the burros and were off again—up, up, up. We had left the foot-hills behind us now and were on the very slope of the volcano itself. Here the trees, taller and thicker, made what we call a real forest. Perhaps we had eaten too much lunch, or perhaps we were tired, but anyway the trail seemed difficult. Then, too, we had begun to notice the lightness of the air and at every hundred yards or so we had to stop for breath. Some of the boys began to feel ill and at this juncture the onions put in their appearance. I felt none too well, so I began to search in my pockets for my onions, too,—and when, with a dull ache in my head and a breathless feeling in the lungs, I pressed them to my nose, all the former aversion to their scent disappeared. I kept them under my nose all the way to camp. And whether due to the onions or not, I didn't feel any worse while some of the fellows had to walk so slowly that they were left behind the rest of the party.

In the late afternoon we passed through a part of the forest where it seemed as if more than half the trees had been torn up by the roots. Great tree trunks, so large that we could hardly climb over them, lay across the path. Looking down, I could see whole hillsides strewn with these fallen members of the forest. Some of the boys explained to me how, two years before, a hurricane had swept across the mountains and tried to carry the whole forest off with it. The fallen trees were a bad impediment to our progress because, in an atmosphere where one cannot walk without getting out of breath, to climb over a gigantic trunk is an exercise that is not taken with pleasure.

It was almost six o'clock when we arrived at the spot chosen for camp, just below the timber line, where the trees of the mountain end. We were close to the peaks now and one of them, that looked very near, loomed between us and the sinking sun so that all the mountain-side was in shadow. Down below we saw the valley—far, far beneath—bathed in a twilight mist of rose and purple; the little river, that had been a winding, silver thread all day, had now turned golden in the sunset.

We began to make camp. Some unloaded the burros and tied them fast to trees. Others searched for the dry limbs and branches of the pine in order to make the fires. And still others, too tired and out of breath to do anything, sank down upon the ground to rest, for the last hour of the ascent had been the hardest of all.

The shadows on the mountain-side deepened and the sunset colors faded from the sky. For me, the evening passed quickly. There was supper around the blazing camp-fires, of which each group of fellows had its own; then songs and stories and more songs, to which the two burro drivers contributed a love ballad which they said they had learned down in the "hot country." At nine, the first guards were posted and the camp became still. The only noise to be heard was the occasional sob-like "hee-hooing" of the burros and the strong "Alerta" of the watchers, crying to each other from the four corners of the camp.

At two o'clock, when my turn came to stand guard, the moon had gone down behind the mountain and the forest was in inky blackness. The low burning camp-fires gave a little light. A long way off and deep down in the night-covered valley, we saw the white lights of Toluca, shining like a cluster of sunken stars in the darkness.

The next morning, at sunrise, we were off for the crater. A half hour's walk took us past the timber line, out of the forest, and to the open mountain-side. In a little while we found ourselves at the foot of one of the volcanic peaks, which, if we chose to climb it, would give us a view down into the crater. About half the party chose to go up; the others took the burro path which led around the side of the peak, entering the crater at the lowest opening. The peak, which near the top was covered with large patches of snow, did not appear to be very high. But we soon found that the steepness of its slope and the lightness of the air made the ascent more laborious than we thought it would be, and at every eight or ten steps we had to stop for breath. It seemed as if we would never reach the summit. The rocks and sand and gravel, of which the mountain was made, slipped beneath our feet and made us slide half-way back at every forward movement. We had to cross the snow covered spaces on our hands and knees—they were so slippery. When we finally gained the summit, it seemed as if our last breath had gone. We were very high and, between us and the hills below, the white clouds drifted by.

As we turned to look down into the crater, we saw it as a sort of double one, divided into two parts by a long hump-backed hill. On each side of the hill there was a blue lake with a rocky shore. The sides of the crater were steep and many colored, and the three highest of the tall, jagged peaks that formed its ragged edge had snow upon them. We, on top of our laboriously climbed summit, had an excellent view down into that part of the volcano where La Laguna Chica (The Little Lake) sparkled in the morning sun. Those who had taken the burro path were already resting on its shore and the height from which we saw them made them appear very tiny. Feeling the pangs of hunger, as we had not yet eaten breakfast, and knowing that the burros carrying the lunch-bags were waiting for us below, we began to descend. Half running, half sliding in the loose sand and gravel of the inner slope, we reached the bottom much more quickly than we had ascended. On the sandy shore, scattered with big boulders taller than a man, we ate our breakfast and drank the cold, refreshing water of the clear blue lake.

After breakfast we decided to see La Laguna Grande (The Big Lake), and so, circling around the side of The Little Lake, we began to climb one of the low ends of the hump-backed hill. In a short while, from the top of its rocky ridge, we saw below us the deep blue waters of La Laguna Grande, so beautiful and lovely and calm that it gave one a thrill of surprise at finding it buried in this old volcano's burnt, scarred walls. Some people say that this pretty lake has no bottom and that swimmers who venture far into its cold waters may be drawn down into unknown depths. Its smooth, innocent surface, however, gives no indications of such treachery, and the charm of its beauty makes one think it is a good fairy lake and not the wicked old witch with the pretty face, which reputation has given it.

We walked all around the rocky shore, stopping now and then to pick up small queer-colored stones or the sulphur coated rocks found on the beach. To reach the other end of the lake's long oval required more time than we had expected, for distances are deceiving in the high clear air. We stopped often to rest, sitting down on the large boulders and admiring the beautiful colors in the sides of the crater whose walls were sometimes deep crimson capped with jagged peaks, sometimes bright red or soft orange streaked with purple, and sometimes just gray rock covered with snow patches near the rim. And the blue lake was always like a jewel in a rough setting. At the other end of the oval we found erected on the sandy shore, a large wooden cross which a band of religious people had carried up the steep trail some years before. They held a mass in the crater. Behind the cross rose "El Pice de Fraile," the highest of the Xinantecatl peaks, glittering snow white in morning sun. From its tooth-like summit on a clear day, one who has a pair of strong binoculars can see, off the coast of Guerrero, more than a hundred miles away, the silver waters of the Pacific.

When we climbed back over the hump-backed hill and down to the wider shore of the Little Lake, the burros were already packed with our blankets and much diminished lunch bags. Before we reached the spot where we had eaten, the first ones started off. We filled our water bottles and canteens from the lake and started after them. When we came to the highest point in the narrow road we turned for a last look at the little blue lake below, the hump-backed hill and the opposite red and purple walls of the volcano. Then we turned and followed the path which curved, at a dizzying height, onto the steeply sloping outer sides of the crater, where a false step too near the edge would have sent one tumbling down a mile or so into a green tree-covered valley. We took care not to make the false step.

When, at sunset, we unloaded the burros in the clean little "Portales" of Calimaya, although stiff and footsore and weary, everybody was happy and agreed that it had been a fine trip. A few minutes later, sitting on the platform of the country station, awaiting the last train for Toluca, we could see, high and far away, the sharp, jagged peaks of the old volcano faintly outlined against the sunset sky. They seemed so very high and so very far from us we could scarcely believe that just ten hours before we had visited them and drunk the cool snow water of their clear blue lakes.

I HAVE a dog named Bingo,
That dearly loves to play;
He runs about a-barking,
And has such fun all day!

One day he chased a kittie,
Who turned and said, "Scat-scat!"
He ran off crying, "Ki-yi!"
What do you think of that?

Good-Bye!

THE JUDGE

OYEZ ! O yez ! oyez ! All Brownies are herewith ordered on pain of not knowing to read page number 354, and to think about it five whole minutes before saying a single word.

"IT seems to me," says Billie, "mighty funny"——

"By which he means 'extremely curious'," explained Wilhelmina, complacently.

"Aw—I don't neither—I mean——"

"Well, what is it that is so extremely funny?" asked the Judge.

"Well, it's this way: here I've saved my money to pay for the BROWNIES' BOOK and now because somebody else didn't I can't have it any more."

"I don't call that a bit funny," said William. "It's pretty serious business and needs looking into. Here are 4000 Brownies who want the BROWNIES' BOOK awfully. Now, why on earth should it be any of our business if 16,000 other kids don't like it or don't see it or can't buy it?"

"It's life," sighed the Judge.

"It seems to be," snapped Wilhelmina, "that there are a lot of grown-ups who are extremely fond of laying the blame of everything disagreeable on life instead of on themselves."

"True," said the Judge. "Too true. From which fact, however, it does not necessarily follow that life isn't a considerably more complicated and mixed-up affair than even the wisest young ladies of 16 like to admit.

"For instance, Tommie Titmouse steps out of his door in Willipuswalipus City, and waits on the street corner. In five minutes a great giant of a wagon with driver and footman whirls by and for five cents carries him ten miles and puts him down at Smith's Toy Store, just where he wanted to go.

"Now, Sallie Dormouse steps out of her door at Skeesix Corners and she might stand on the corner two years and no street car or carriage would come by and carry her anywhere, even for five dollars if she had it, and she hasn't.

"All of which goes to show that life is not a matter of you and me and him, but rather of all of us together. Ten thousand people working together and living together can arrange to have cheap street cars and cheap newspapers while one person or a hundred persons could afford neither.

"If the Brownies of the United States want a BROWNIES' BOOK enough of them must want it and want it badly enough to pay for printing it."

"But," says Billie, "it doesn't cost any more, does it, for each Brownie to have 4000 Brownies' Books printed than it would to have four million?"

"Ah, there you're mistaken," says the Judge. "To print one BROWNIES' BOOK would cost $500. To print 1,000 BROWNIES' BOOK would cost $750. To print 5,000 BROWNIES' BOOK would cost $1000. To print 20,000, would cost $2500. In other words if only 1000 persons want the BROWNIES' BOOK it would cost them 75 cents a copy or nine dollars a year, while if 20,000 will buy it, it could sell for 15 cents a copy, or a dollar and a half a year."

"So the more you print, the cheaper it is?"

"Precisely."

"Then we ought to get busy and make everybody buy the BROWNIES' BOOK," said Billie.

"Oh, it isn't the Kid's fault—it's the Grown-ups—they're so busy with their own silly conferences and wars and autos they haven't time for real things," said William.

"Besides it's too late now," said Wilhelmina.

"It's never too late," said the Judge.

OLIVE PLAATJE

SARAH TALBERT KEELAN

IT is a far throw from New York to South Africa. A sad bereavement suffered by a well known native family in that far off country has reduced the circulation of THE BROWNIES' BOOK by one interested little subscriber, from Kimberley, South Africa—the diamond city of the world.

Olive Schreiner Plaatje, more intimately known as "Ngoetsi," died on the fourteenth of July, in Bloemfontein, South Africa, at the age of sixteen.

Ngoetsi did her life work at the age of thirteen, during the Fall of 1918—which, by the way, is the South African Spring—when the influenza epidemic swept over Kimberley, and killed in one month, 6,000 people, out of a population of about 30,000. October, 1918, has since been known as the "Black October." All the shops, churches, schools, theatres and market places were closed up and deserted. Drug stores alone were packed with customers, day and night. Nearly all the doctors were ill in bed, and pharmacists had to depend upon one general prescription for all sufferers. Throughout October, when the epidemic raged, the city looked like a huge hospital, for, according to official reports, all but five percent of the entire population of the city of Kimberley had the disease.

Only two Kimberley streets, I learn, were alive with traffic—the road from the City Hall to the hospital, and from the hospital to the cemetery.

The Plaatje household was among those stricken with the "flu" with the exception of Ngoetsi and her father, Mr. Solomon Plaatje, the Brotherhood lecturer, who is well known to many of us Americans. He himself at the time was looking after many of the other sufferers, often leaving his sick family alone with Olive, who, single-handed, was kept busy nursing a household of helpless patients, from her mother and cousins down—to be accurate, eight in all.

Nearly every house in the neighborhood had its funerals, but little Olive, like Mrs. Van Rooyen, over the road, saved every one of her patients.

Three months after the epidemic had passed away, when shops, schools, diamond mines and everything had reopened, and the people were glad it was all over, Olive was seized with an attack of rheumatic fever, which the doctors said was the after-effect of her nursing. She had to give up school and her piano lessons, and on the doctor's advice, her parents sent her to the Hot Springs of Aliwal, North Cape. Upon her arrival there, Olive was not allowed to use the waters, because her skin was not white. However, she eventually got better and resumed her studies at the Wesleyan Methodist High School for colored girls in Natal.

It was there that the rheumatic affection went through little Olive's heart and leakage developed. The teachers sent her home, but she got no further than Bloemfontein, where she died, about one hundred miles from home. Her mother hastened to her side; but her father, being in far off America, did not hear of the end until six weeks afterwards.

It is painful to learn that Ngoetsi most probably would have reached her mother's house but for the shocking "Jim Crow" system, which in British South Africa is even more rigorous than in the United States. It is charged that the sickness was aggravated by the harsh treatment accorded her by the white train men of the South African railways. At a railroad junction, where she waited hours for the Kimberley connection, her escort was not allowed to rest the sick girl in the waiting room or on the platform seats, which are at the disposal of white passengers only. The patient had to wait outside of the depot, without shelter or comfort of any kind.

It will thus be seen that while Brownies are a "problem" everywhere, in their own homeland—Africa—their troubles start rather early in life.

While we are enjoying the benefits of instruction in high schools, conservatories and colleges in New York, Massachusetts, etc., we should remember that in South Africa there are no public schools for colored children. The natives can only get elementary training in the rural and village mission schools. Native children who take advantage of these have to pay their "tickeys" and "tanners" (English nickels and dimes), every week in the primary section, while the fourth and fifth grade pupils pay a quarter or more every Monday morning. In addition to these weekly school fees, the African Brownies have to buy their own books, pencils and slates, which in the South African public schools are supplied to white children free of cost. Therefore, we should appreciate the sacrifices made by Mrs. Plaatje and other African mothers to supply their children with training and strive to make the best use of our superior privileges.

Yet with all these difficulties, our late little Brownie friend had advantages which few of us on this side of the Atlantic will ever be privileged to have. Coming probably from the most polyglot family, of a polyglot country, Olive could write and converse in Sechuana, her father's language, as well as Sixosa, her mother tongue. Her parents, being of two different tribes, have separate languages. Besides these, Ngoetso could read and write English and Dutch.

Olive Schreiner Plaatje

Her uncle is chief translater in native languages for the Union Government. One of her cousins is interpreter to the South African Native Affairs Commission; another was until lately examiner for the Cape Education (Graduating) Department. To hold any of these posts, one has to be proficient in at least six different languages, and have a working knowledge of a few more dialects. One girl cousin is in training as a nurse at the Scottish Missionary Hospital, of Lovedale—the Hampton of South Africa.

The late Brownie was named after Olive Schreiner, a great South African authoress; "Ngoetsi" is after a native chieftainess in Africa.

I first met Olive's father at London, England, during October of last year. This summer I went to spend my vacation with my friend, Mr. and Mrs. Burton, of Ridgefield Park, N. J. Knowing that Mr. Plaatje was in New York, we invited him to spend a day with us, and on calling him over the telephone, to make the engagement, I learned of his sad bereavement, and of how Mrs. Plaatje faced the sorrow of laying to rest away from home, the dear little girl who, three years before, had saved her own mother from the "flu."

I feel certain that readers of THE BROWNIES' BOOK will sympathise with Mr. and Mrs. Plaatje, and especially with Violet "Teto" Plaatje, the surviving subscriber to THE BROWNIES' BOOK, for by the death of Olive, a promising yuong career has been brought to an end; family hopes have been dashed to pieces, and the Kimberley Women's Sisterhood has been deprived of one of their most useful junior members. Peace be to her ashes!

What Would the Dog Say If He Could Talk?

ONCE there lived a little baby who had no father. His father was killed in the war. One day the baby's mother went out and left the dog to stay with the baby. If the dog could talk he would say "I wish the baby's mother would come home so I could go out, but I must be faithful and stay with the baby." I know the dog will get some good meat. Soon after that the baby's mother came in and the dog got his meat and the baby got his milk. Then the dog went out doors.

WILLIAM VALENTINE (age 7).

"SAINT" GANDHI

The Greatest Man in the World

BLANCHE WATSON

ABOUT two thousand years ago there lived a man who said, "He that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword,"—that is, He tried to make people see that war was wrong—that all killing was wrong—because all human life was sacred. The world, since that time, has listened to that message, but it has not understood it, or even tried to understand it—all of which means that this man came before the world was ready for Him, and (not being ready) it crucified Him!

When I say the world, I do not mean everybody in it. There were some few people who did understand what Jesus, the Christ, taught, and who tried to live by those teachings.

Now, today, on the other side of the world, in far away India, a man is preaching as did Jesus of Nazareth, "Love your enemies"; "Do good to them that hate you"; "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you". Like Jesus, he goes out under the blue sky and gathers the people around him. Like Jesus, he says "Follow me!" And the people follow him —not by the hundreds—but by the millions—for India is a nation numbering more than 300 million souls!

The people of India want the right to govern themselves as we govern ourselves in this country—as they governed themselves a great many years ago! Usually when a people decide that they want to be independent (as we call it) they "go to war"—that is, they gather together armies and go out and kill one another—forgetting what Jesus said—forgetting that we are all brothers and that God is our Father.

Now this man, who is leading the Indian people—"Saint" Gandhi as he is called—is giving to his people, after all these years, the message of the Man that we Christians call our leader. He, too, says: "He that taketh the sword shall perish by the sword," and—if you will believe it—the British Empire, that has held India against its will for a hundred and sixty years, is more afraid of this man than any "general", that is, any fighting man—that has ever arisen during that time.

You ask me, "Why?"

Let me tell you. Gandhi, this saint, says, "Don't have anything to do with this government and the people it sends here to rule us; but do not hurt them—do not lift a hand against them: just love them!" That is why the British government is so afraid of this great leader. When a man persists in loving you—in spite of all you do to him—you can't keep on hating and mis-using that man forever! More than that—any group of people that is held together by hate and bitterness must fall to pieces sooner or later. Hate is destructive—it kills! But a group of people held together by good-will, by love, is mighty—for love is constructive—that is, it builds.

Gandhi says to his people, "If you follow my way, you will be a free people; and when he speaks thus—this little brown man who has to sit in a chair on a table when he speaks—no one can disagree with him. No one can look in his wonderful eyes and even think that he is wrong. Do you know why this is? Because of the strength of his spirit. It is the spirit—the spirit of God himself that blazes there, and his word is the word of God.

The English government (and I do not mean the English people—that is a different thing) the English government may not know it, but they are afraid of Saint Gandhi simply because he is speaking with the voice of God, even as did Jesus, the Christ—by the Sea of Galilee—hundreds of years ago.

Will the people of India hold out? Will Gandhi succeed? Is the world to learn the lesson that war is murder—that Christ's way is the better way—that love is the "greatest thing in the world"?

Let us all watch India, and Gandhi!

I AM flying my last wide flight and am very, very sad. All the world lies dark beneath its snow and sunshine. Only the children are happy. Children are always happy. That is, most always.

¶ England and Ireland are still trying to make peace. The difficulty is first, Ireland does not trust England and claims that Ireland is a free and independent country. It happens that there is a little piece of Ireland called Ulster which does not want to be free and independent and especially does not want to be connected with the rest of Ireland. So the puzzle is how to make Ireland united and almost independent and yet keep her as part of the British Empire, and at the same time make Ulster satisfied as a part of Ireland. The job of doing this is so difficult that the British Prime Minister, Lloyd George, has not been able to get away and attend the Disarmament Conference at Washington.

¶ In another part of the British Empire, Egypt, the natives, among whom are a number of colored people, want also to be free from the domination of England. England has promised that she never meant to annex Egypt and would give her her freedom; but recently when Egyptians came to England to arrange a treaty of independence they found that England was going to make her free except that she wanted to keep an English army anywhere in Egypt that she pleased, and that she wanted to make it impossible for Egypt to make any treaties with foreign countries without England's consent, and other provisions which made the so-called independence a farce. The Egyptians went home without arranging the treaty.

¶ Still further across the world in India several hundred millions of brown people are much incensed at the injustice of English rule. A large part of them are trying to secure their freedom, not by fighting but by refusing to "co-operate". That is, they will not pay taxes, they will not buy goods in the stores, they will not attend the courts or the English schools, etc. Their leader is named Gandhi.

¶ A Disarmament conference is sitting in Washington. The object of it is to see if the civilized nations of the world cannot spend less money in preparing to fight each other, especially as most of the people of the world do not want to fight. The president of the United States therefore has invited various nations to talk the matter over in Washington. When they got there, Secretary of the State, Hughes, proposed that the American, British and Japanese navies be cut down so that the first two should be equal to each other and Japan should be three-fifths as large. In addition to this they have been trying to talk about China; but the difficulty there is that Great Britain, France and Japan have already seized valuable parts of China, and valuable privileges, and do not want to give them up. The United States would like to have some of these privileges too and therefore is championing the rights of China. Meantime it looks as though China would get chiefly promises.

¶ Europe borrowed a great deal of money from the United States during the war and it is difficult to repay it because there is no international money and international debts have to be paid by goods. Europe cannot export goods to the United States in order to pay her debts unless she has raw materials out of which she can make the goods. The United States controls much of the raw material like cotton and food so the whole matter of paying these debts is very difficult.

¶ The peace treaty between the United States and Germany has at last been signed.

Balfour, the great English statesman, and Aristide Briand, Prime Minister of France.

¶ The Prince of Wales has gone on a visit to India and Japan. The English are afraid that the Indians will not want to see him.

¶ Two Italians have been sentenced to death for murder in Massachusetts. Many people think that they are not guilty and that they were sentenced because they had radical views of government. There is a wide-spread agitation throughout the world to save these two men.

¶ There has been a revolutionary movement in Portugal by which a new government has been installed and many prominent leaders killed. The former king and queen of Hungary, attempted to seize their former government. They arrived in an airplane but were compelled to leave and are now in exile on the island of Madeira.

¶ Great effort is being made to aid the famine stricken inhabitants of Russia. Sufficient food to feed a million people for five months is on its way and yet this is not enough.

GOODBYE, dear kiddies. I do not know whom I shall tell all I see hereafter. Nobody I suppose. Besides if I do not fly I shall not see. No, I am not crying. Crows cannot cry. It's a fine thing to be able to cry—sometimes.

¶ Senator Philander C. Knox of Pennsylvania, a prominent American statesman is dead.

¶ A proposed strike of the employees of the railroads has been stopped by the action of the United States Railroad Labor Board.

¶ United States will keep an army of 5,600 troops in Germany; the rest will be gradually withdrawn.

¶ President Harding made a speech in Birmingham, Alabama, where he asked for the right to vote for Negroes, just wages and education. He also said that he did not believe in "social equality," whatever that is.

¶ The extra session of Congress has adjourned and after a few days the same men came back to the regular session. President Harding addressed them on subjects for legislation.

¶ There are 54,421,832 persons 21 years of age and over in the United States, who are thus possible voters.

¶ President Harding has signed a bill which devotes seventy-five million dollars to good roads throughout the United States.

¶ There are in the United States 13,920,692 foreign born inhabitants.

¶ A great strike of clothing makers is in progress in New York because the employers want to pay by the piece instead of by the day.

¶ During the last election two states had colored parties who nominated candidates. In Louisville, Kentucky, colored men were nominated for Mayor and city officers while in Virginia the colored people nominated their own candidates for Governor and all state officers. 20,000 people voted for the colored candidates in Virginia.

¶ The Nobel prize for literature, which is given every year and amounts to about $25,000, has been given this year to Anatole France, a great French writer.

¶ Charges for freight on farm products have been reduced throughout the United States.

¶ People of Porto Rico, a large number of whom are colored, are trying to get rid of Governor Riley who seems to have made himself unpopular by injudicious remarks and actions.

¶ The tax bill recently passed by Congress will raise three and one-fourth billion dollars to pay the expenses of the United States government for the current year.

¶ A treaty has been signed between the United States, Great Britain, France and Japan to guarantee each other's possessions among the three thousand islands of the Pacific.

¶ Fifteen American war ships are to be sold at auction.

¶ A fire in Augusta, Georgia, destroyed two million dollars worth of property.

¶ We sent a military man to be governor of the Philippine Islands and very naturally he thinks that the Philippines should continue to be under the domination of the United States. The people do not agree with him.

¶ Marshal Foch, after visiting thirty States of the Union and being much impressed by the kindness of Americans, has returned to France.

¶ A French Negro, René Marin, who is an employee in the French Colonial service in Central Africa, has written a novel, "Batouala", which is about Negroes in Central Africa. It has received the Goncourt prize as the best French book of the year.

Our Little Friends

THE JURY

I AM a little girl nine years old, residing here now, having recently moved from Columbus, Ga. I am a dear lover of books, and every spare moment I am at the Dryades Street Library, reading.

Seeing THE BROWNIES' BOOK there, I was delighted to read it. For the past six months I've been trying to write little poems. One of them I was asked to send you for publication.

Should you think it not worth publishing in your next edition, please send it to me.

Let me hear from you.

I am in the fourth grade.

SPRING

Spring is here, Spring is here,
The time we children think so dear,
When the birds begin to sing,
And the flowers begin to grow,
Then you know that Spring is here.

Spring is here, Spring is here,
When all the children come so near,
When I can see
The little bee,
Then you know that Spring is here.

I AM twelve years and have been a little author in my home. I have been writing stories at home ever since the year 1917. But I have never sold them. I once wrote to the Author's Press for their six courses but I saw nothing in them which would do me any good because I was a gifted author. I have some of the most gorgeous stories that anyone would enjoy reading. I am very heart-broken. May I ask one small question? Will you pay me for my manuscripts? If so, I would like to appear at once. Everybody that hears I want to become a writer grants me a success and I hope you do too. I am waiting every moment.

Yours truly,
OBIETH HARDIN,
Gaffney, South Carolina.

THERE was once a little girl whose name was Lillian. She always played with her doll. It was a big, beautiful, brown doll with long black curls. Lillian loved it very much and took it everywhere she went.

One day while Lillian was in the yard playing her attention was attracted to a little bird singing in the tree above her. She was so busy watching this little bird that she dropped the doll and broke it. This made Lillian very sad, indeed, for she knew that dollie must go at once to the doll's hospital to be made well again.

With tears streaming down her cheeks, she picked dolly up, put her in her carriage and rushed her to the hospital. There she begged the doll doctor to make dolly well. The doctor told Lillian that dolly would have to have an operation and a new head. This frightened Lillian very much, but after asking him not to hurt her baby she went home.

At the hospital dolly made friends with several other dolls, a big French doll, a Japanese doll and a Scotch lassie. Her stay there was very pleasant. Lillian went to visit her often and carried her messages from the little Chinese doll who lived next door.

On Christmas Eve dolly was sent home in a Red Cross Ambulance. She brought back two of her friends, the French and Japanese dolls.

On Christmas day Lillian gave a beautiful party for all the dolls of the neighborhood. Soon, Lillian's doll married a big brown soldier doll and lived many, many happy years.

Goodbye dear Brownies! How I shall miss your letters! JESSIE FAUSET.

THE MELODY MAN

JAMES ALPHEUS BUTLER, JR.

WHEN the autumn leaves whistle down to the ground, and Old Man Winter promises his arrival, the whole atmosphere of the forest seems to take on a golden aspect, and one finds it unnecessary to await the golden glow of the sunset to notice this. The reddish-yellow of the falling leaves, the dark branches of the trees fast becoming bare, the industriousness of the little denizens of the woods preparing for the long, bleak months to come, are all familiar sights. Yet only a visitor might enjoy the picturesque autumn of the little town of Avondale to the fullest extent, only a stranger might perceive and thoroughly enjoy the wonderful autumn atmosphere which envelops the entire town itself—even to the snug houses—for all of this was familiar to the inhabitants of the village.

Two little children—a boy and a girl—sat upon the porch of one of these snug little houses.

"I'm dreadfully tired of these old piano lessons," Emily Thomas said as she swayed back and forth in her little rocking chair. "Every Monday and Wednesday and Friday—Paul, I think that's too much, don't you?"

"Yes," said Paul, a robust little boy of twelve, "and I'm awfully tired of that old violin professor. He makes me tired with his 'do this, an' do that.' And he always wants me to count aloud. I think that is very silly."

"That's just the way it is with Miss Van Ness."

"And there's old Jack Smith—always guying me about playing ball whenever he sees me going to take my lesson. Always braggin' that he doesn't have to bother with any old stuck-up professor. It makes me angry to have to go in there with him—the professor, I mean—and all the other fellows are out having a good time."

Just then their mother's voice was heard from within.

"Children," she called, "you had better begin your practicing now. You know your teachers say you must devote at least one hour an afternoon to practicing."

Paul said "Pshaw!" but they both went in, for they were both obedient children, and Paul immediately began playing the scale of C Major on his violin, while Emily began her piano finger exercise.

II

ONE typical autumn day, not very long afterwards, there came into the little village of Avondale a tattered old man, almost dressed in rags. Yet from those garments shone a most benevolent old countenance which seemed to be kindness, and gentleness itself. The hat which he wore was minus a crown, and his shoes were much too large for him. His coat seemed mere drapery around him, for the sleeves were torn into shreds. Still this seemed not to alter in the least the impression which he gave to the few people he met as he came into the town. For, upon looking into his eyes, a strange, intense feeling seemed to come over you, it seemed as if you were gazing into the deep blue of a soul as mighty as the sea, as clear and pure as crystal, as humble as the Dove of Peace. And under his arm he carried a wooden box wrought in the semblance of an ancient violin case. Who knew what compelling melodies might emerge from the instrument which one was confident that the box contained!

At first no one paid very much attention to this little old man with the strange looking box which he held so tightly. It was true that whoever chanced to gaze into his eyes was struck with wonder and awe and often with a strange embarrassment—he gazed so sadly, his stare was so haunting. But these villagers, busy with other affairs, promptly forgot the torn old man, and gave their attention to their own pressing affairs.

No one knew from whence he came nor cared to take the trouble to find out. No one knew his purpose in entering the village, and no one knew where and how he lived while there.

On the second day of his stay in the village he chanced to be walking up Poplar Street, and his step was slow and uncertain. He seemed to be glancing at the houses as if trying to find out who lived in there by merely looking at them. Twice he stopped and seemed as if he would sit down, and twice he shook his head and moved sadly on. Then suddenly a rock came sailing with intense speed from an alley and struck the violin case. Almost at the same time there came a "Yee--ho!" from the same alley and a boy with a sling-shot scampered away. The old man stopped and opened his violin box. And then he withdrew his old instrument, with four patched strings.

Now it was just about time for a school to dismiss. The children, happy at the thought of freedom, emerged in a joyous, boisterous crowd and came down the street in a jolly throng. Among them, leading in the laughter and play, were Paul and Emily Thomas.

Suddenly the crowd spied the old man looking fondly at his violin. Paul ran ahead and shouted in glee:

"Hark, hark, the dogs do bark,
The beggars are coming to town,
Some in rags, some in jags,
And some in velvet gown."

The crowd was elated. Every one shouted in glee. "Oh, look at the rag man." "Say, mister, want a coat?" "What a fine derby he has on. No crown!" "Ain't that head bald though." "He's got on rags now. His velvet gown must be in his fiddle-box."

But this did not last very long. Suddenly the old man put his violin under his chin and made several long strokes with his bow. Then he launched into a melody—the most wonderful melody the children had ever heard. They became quiet in an instant. They stared at him with large and incredulous eyes. Paul and Emily hardly knew what to think. A ragged man like that playing such wonderful music!

The old man seemed to have the charm of the Pied Piper. From one and two blocks around the children swarmed around him to hear the wonderful music. He seemed to carry their little minds off into the land of far, far away. It was as if some good wizard had come to them and suddenly crowded them into a crescent boat and sped them to the Land Where Dreams Come True.

But good things must end, and at last the old man finished his melody. When he stopped, it seemed as if the children had been released from a spell. As if awakening from a dream which ended too soon, they clamored around him and cried "More—more—oh, please, just one more piece."

But the Melody Man shook his head and, placing his violin back in his box, silently, sadly went his way.

III

EMILY and Paul saw no more of the Melody Man that day. Paul was rather quiet and thoughtful all of the afternoon. When he took his violin from his box he looked at it a long time before beginning to play. When he did finally begin practicing he drew long bows, and wondered if his violin, too, were capable of bringing forth the melodies which the old man had played.

He thought of the way he had led the crowd into making fun of the old man at their first sight of him. And something seemed to tell him that he had done wrong in doing this—he was almost sorry. All that afternoon he thought of the old man with the violin playing for the enchanted children. All afternoon there was before him the vision of the kindly old face, the bent, but firm, body covered with tattered clothes.

He did not rush out today to play with his little chums, as he usually did as soon as the hour which he was compelled to give to his daily practice ended. Instead he went to his mother who was sewing upon the front porch.

"Mother," he said, "I heard a most wonderful man today."

"Is that so?" asked his mother. "Who was he, Paul?"

"An old man, and he played a violin."

"A violin!"

"Yes, mother. All of the children were just coming from school and they met him, too. He was dressed almost from top to bottom in rags, and he had a violin that must be a hundred years old, and he played in the street for us. I liked it so very much!"

"And I thought my little boy didn't like a violin."

"When I heard the old man play I was sorry I had objected to practicing. If I could just play as he did! Oh, mother, do you think it will ever be possible?"

"Why of course, Paul."

"Will I be able to make people dream as he made us dream?"

"Of course."

"Will I be able to make people cry?"

"Yes, if you practice each day."

"And laugh, too?"

"Why, of course, Paul."

The little fellow jumped up and clapped his hands in glee.

"Oh, mother, I'm going to practice every day —every day! I'm never going to miss one. Maybe some day I can do just like the Melody Man!"

The next day was Saturday and since there was no school Paul set out to look for the Melody Man. Jack Smith had told him just that morning that he had seen him playing a "fiddle" further down the street, and Paul was anxious to hear him again.

He walked down Poplar Street and then turned down a sort of alley that led to the part of town where the poor little boys and girls lived. He hardly expected to find the Melody Man in that part of the town, yet it seemed as if something guided his footsteps in that direction. About a half an hour later he was glad he had come into that part of the town. For suddenly there came to him the soft notes of a violin!

With quickened footsteps Paul headed towards the spot from which the notes came. He turned a corner and seemed to burst upon a gathering which almost startled him.

For there, in the midst of a crowd of poor little girls and boys, was the Melody Man playing his violin. It was a beautiful and inspiring sight even though it was in the poor part of the town. The Melody Man was the center of the group and sat upon the dilapidated steps of an old house. His gray, long hair seemed to wave back and forth as he nodded to the rhythm of his music. He seemed to be in exactly the right atmosphere, and seemed to be filled with indescribable joy at the cheer and diversion he was bringing to the people in this crowded street. Even the grown people were listening to the notes which arose from the soul of the Man. From many windows wearied heads were thrust out, in many shop doors there suddenly appeared faces and bodies transformed and enthralled by the music of the Melody Man. Those notes of the Melody Man, seemingly so gentle and modest, rang out as trumpets in the environment of the slums so unaccustomed to such things.

Paul approached and watched and drank in the notes, until suddenly the man stopped and laid his fiddle aside.

"Little children," he said in a strange, feeble voice that gave the impression of being cracked, "do you want to hear a story?"

Everybody cried out as one, and the Melody Man, nodding his head, began his narrative. All the children settled around in comfortable attitudes.

"I am going to tell you a story," began the Melody Man, "that is not unlike my music. It is going to be a tale of one who set out on a noble mission and of what befell him. It is going to be a tale of cheer, and of sorrow." And the Melody Man stared ahead and seemed to be looking backwards into the past.

"Boys and girls," he continued, "there was once a youth, a fine lad, who had neither mother nor father. But his voice was as fresh as the morning, his brow was massive like the mountains and gave hint of a soul as big as life itself. When he smiled it was as if a thousand fairies cast a spell of joy upon you.

"The greatest ambition of the lad was to bring joy to people who knew not what joy was, to cheer those whose shoulders were laden with worry. And the Almighty had blessed him with a Gift with which he might carry out his noble desires. And this gift was a passionate understanding of the soul of music and its relation to human beings.

"So one day, with the light-heartedness of youth, the lad set out to serve humanity with a violin under his arm. It must have been that the very birds recognized in him a friend, for whenever he happened along the road they would always pour forth their most beautiful songs, and they even seemed not to fear him. And to reward them the lad would sit by the side of the road for hours playing for them and imitating their songs with his magic bow and fiddle.

"Time passed and the lad traveled far and wide with his fiddle playing for all and everyone he met, and especially for those who were poor and downcast and despondent. And there was many a heart which he raised from the mire and muck of despair and worry.

"The lad became an old man. He had traveled all over the land of his home and had seen foreign countries—even to the most remote corners of the earth where savages dwell. And during this time he had made friends with Princes, and Kings, and the Rulers of the earth, and even gathered enough of the world's riches to suffice him for the rest of his life. So he decided to build him a big house in which there could be seen the most splendid things man could make, and live in it for the rest of his days.

"But when the old man went to live in his house a strange thing happened. He never felt at home in it. He had no people around him —no open-eyed children to play for, no worn and worried people of the slums to cheer and bring joy to. In his large, dreary house there was nothing but evidence of worldliness, of gold, and all of his life he had been a vender of dreams. It seemed to the old man that he would go crazy if he had to live there.

"So this old man went into his attic where he had thrown his ragged garments when he came to live in the big house and donned them again. And he found his old violin box which had accompanied him on his journeys, and once more he set out as he had done throughout his life. And to this day he has never returned to the big house that he built for himself."

At the end of his tale the Melody Man arose. His kindly countenance lit up in an all-embracing smile. The children clapped in glee. Then he spoke again. "And, now, my little children, I will have to go on my long journey again. For in some other town there are children just like you waiting on a Melody Man to come into their lives."

The children were sad when he said this. They clung to him and begged him with all the ardor of childhood not to go. But the Melody Man was firm, and sadly shook his head.

IV

THAT evening Paul and Emily sat on their porch with their mother and father. Paul was relating to his father the tale which the Melody Man had told that morning. His father was very interested.

"Well, Paul," he said, at its conclusion, "do you think the tale which the Melody Man told you might be true?"

"Why, no sir," answered Paul. "I thought he just told it for fun."

Mr. Thomas leaned back in his chair and smiled. And then he spoke. "As a matter of fact," he said, "the Melody Man is a great violinist. I knew of him when he was young and famous. At that time his name was on the lips of the world." Mr. Thomas paused. "Throughout his life," he said, "he loved to play for the poor folks who cared to listen. This was what brought him fame and fortune, and besides he seemed to enjoy influencing the poor, unlucky people. Recently, I heard, he left his mansion to continue his work—his great work. And that is your Melody Man, though few people recognize in him the great violinist of the last century."

"Why— —" began Paul.

But just then he stopped. For, trudging up the road, there was the Melody Man himself.

It was dusk. In the deepening gloom there could only be distinguished the bent figure of an old man, with a case clasped tightly under his arm. He held a staff in his hand with which he helped himself along. A hollow reverberation emanated from the violin case, because there were no plush linings within it and the violin was moving about because it did not fit. As he walked, the thump of his stick was followed by the thump of his boots on the pavement.

He passed under a glowing street lamp, and what the light revealed was an inspiration.

There was first of all the splendid figure—that of a man old but still possessing poise—the poise of one who is distinguished. And there was the countenance—a countenance radiating all that savors of the pathos of life, the joy of service, the grandeur of a life given to humanity and the uplift of children who have scant opportunity for witnessing the most beautiful creations of the mind of man. It was a countenance of contentment brim full of the noble happiness which comes from the consciousness that one has done something for his brother who hasn't had the same opportunities he has had. It was a countenance filled with the expectancy of the greater services which lay ahead to be performed, and which seemed to look forward to the performance of them with an eagerness to serve unparallelled.

And as his figure passed away into the dusk of evening and on, on into the distance, the Thomases felt as if something divine had passed before their vision.

Emily broke the silence.

"Mother," she said sweetly, "I'll never refuse to practice again in all my life."

Paul said, "I wouldn't miss another day of violin lessons for all the gold in the world."

And they all were soon silent with thoughts of the Melody Man who brought joy to inhabitants of this world of sordidness.

May they, too, be as faithful to humanity as the Melody Man!

VALEDICTORY

MESSRS. DuBois and Dill announce with regret the discontinuance of THE BROWNIES' BOOK. Recognizing the great need which exists for literature adapted to colored children, and indeed to all children who live in a world of varied races, we have for two years made the experiment of publishing at our own expense, THE BROWNIES' BOOK. The experiment has cost us about $7,000. The total revenue has been about $4,000, leaving us some $3,000 in debt. The total number of subscribers to THE BROWNIES' BOOK has gradually risen to 3,500 and it is increasing very slowly. The magazine cannot, however, pay expenses with less than 15,000 subscribers. As there is no prospect of getting this number of subscribers within less than four or five years we cannot afford to continue the experiment.

The fault has not been with our readers. We have had an unusually enthusiastic set of subscribers. But the magazine was begun just at the time of industrial depression following the war, and the fault of our suspension therefore is rather in the times, which are so out of joint, than in our constituency. It is possible that at some future time we may see our way to republish THE BROWNIES' BOOK.

In the meantime we intend that no subscriber shall lose anything by the suspension. We can reimburse subscribers in several ways. First, by a direct return of the balance due in cash; secondly by arranging with the CRISIS magazine to transfer our indebtedness and fill out subscriptions with the CRISIS; thirdly, by letting subscribers invest the balance due in the purchase of books; and fourthly by letting the subscribers contribute to our debts and thus become co-workers with us in this beautiful venture of the balance in any other way in which they can suggest. We shall be glad to hear from our subscribers on this point.

In the meantime may we express to both parents and children our appreciation of their staunch support.

Little People of the Month

THIS month our little people consist of four high school students, one in Maine, 2 in Ohio and one in Oklahoma.

Doris Madeline Johnson who lives way up among the snows of Bangor, Maine, entered a competition for the music of her class ode. Eight of the nine judges declared her music was the best and when she graduated she conducted the orchestra of seventy pieces which played the ode. Of course Doris had a little advantage over some of the other folks because her family are all musicians. Both her father and mother, who came from Norfolk, Virginia, have musical ability; one brother is a violinist and a sister is a 'cellist while another sister won a gold medal as a drummer and xylophonist.

At the Martin's Ferry High School in Ohio, Kenneth Randall led his high school class with a grade of 95 in a class of 62, the next highest average being 91.

At Odena, Ohio, Alverna Blanchard was the only colored pupil in her high school class and made the highest average, 98.

Passing on down to Oklahoma we meet Miss Annie H. Coffey, who is only 15 years old. She completed the 8th grade at Wewoka at the age of 11 years and was valedictorian. She was the youngest pupil in the whole county, among both white and colored pupils, to take the 8th grade examination. As there was no high school at her home she went to the high school at Muskogee and there graduated in a class of 50 pupils at the age of 15. She is in college at Wiley University now.

THE FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH

PONCE DE LEON sailed for many weeks searching for the mythical FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH, located in the newly discovered America. Countless tales had assured him that frequent baths in its exhilirating waters were quite enough to restore his fading youthfulness.

Standing to-day in Neptune Park at St. Augustine, Florida, is the FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH, a show place for visitors, an accepted tradition of old Spain, but without medicinal power and the subtle charm of The Quakers in Russia?

"Why, I thought the Quakers were those queer people in Philadelphia! The ones that don't believe in War and say 'Thee' when they mean 'You'!"

Lots of people think that, Friend! But—well—

The Quakers are in Russia and they're feeding 50,000 hungry people every day. Without regard to race, creed or politics.

They still don't believe in War.

But they've been saying "Thee" in every language in battle-scarred Europe for the last six years—to 5,000,000 poor devils who were hungry.

They're saying "Thee" in Russian now, to 50,000 people a day—grown-ups as well as children—and giving them food.

They could feed ten times that many—if they had the money.

Will "Thee" help them, Friend?

The Week

ALMOST all the news from Washington about the progress from day to day of the Far Eastern negotiations needs to be accepted with a large dose of scepticism. It is in general untrustworthy, although its untrustworthy character is by no means entirely the fault of the correspondents. They must have something rather definite to report even though the actual happenings are wholly indefinite and tentative; and there are, of course, many people connected with all the delegations who have ideas and purposes of their own to serve, different from those of their colleagues, who are only too willing to supply news which is more definite than true. This false or partly false news quickly spreads throughout the whole body of correspondents, who communicate anything they are supposed to learn one to another; and the next morning the majority of the Washington dispatches pass on to their readers the more or less erroneous account of what is supposed to have occurred. The reports are denied or modified the next day, but in the meantime it may have served the purpose of the person who had launched it on its career. In interpreting the Washington news the reader should, consequently, refrain from attaching much importance to the budget of any one or two days. It is only documents, official announcements and reports which are confirmed for many successive days which are entitled to count. Even they usually require a sophisticated interpretation.

UP to the time these lines go to press nothing very definite and authentic has emerged from the scrimmage. The play has started, but it remains obscure to the spectator on the bleachers which of the players is carrying the ball and whether or not he is or is not gaining his distance. In the beginning the Chinese took the initiative; but they did not hold it for long; and for a while there was a general impression in Washington that the game was up. It looked as if they had allowed the ball to pass to their opponents and as if their chance of winning a success was gravely compromised. But this gloomy view was certainly an exaggeration. The Chinese, it is true, are not strong enough to carry the ball except behind an extremely well-organized and vigorous interference, but they and their supporting interference are not yet broken up and they have not lost the ball. While it remains doubtful how much it will gain, the pro-Chinese party is still aggressive and is still pushing along.

IT was the four Root resolutions coming after the ten Chinese principles which created the impression of weakness and loss by the Chinese party. The Chinese principles were general, but if they were adopted they would have obligated the governments which accepted them to a revision of the worst clauses of the existing treaties and of the most objectionable of the customary practices of foreign governments in China. The Root resolutions, on the other hand, merely repeated the old phrases, except in the case of the fourth, which was

...ous; it looked consequently like an ... to prevent any beneficial principles of legislation about China which the Conference might achieve from being applied to past abuses. This interpretation was natural, but it was only partly correct. The Root resolutions were not any more final than the Chinese statement of principles. The latter expressed in general the maximum which the friends of China hoped to obtain. The former expressed the minimum which all members of the Conference were ready to concede. The final result would lie somewhere in between. But the Root resolutions do not supersede the Chinese statement of principles as a basis of discussion. The Chinese principles are being hung on the appropriate hooks provided by the agenda, and they continue to constitute in this form the order of business of the Far Eastern Committee of the Conference. There is a secure hook for all of them except the tenth, which provides for future conferences about the Far East. That proposal does not need any official pretext for being ultimately adopted. Either future conferences on the Chinese question will succeed the present conference or there will be war in the Pacific. Nobody except Hearst wants war.

THE outcome is still in doubt. It is in doubt for one unexceptionable reason. The public and probably the negotiators have no means of knowing (1) how firmly the American government will back up the Chinese (2) how firmly the British government will back up the Americans at the expense of offending Japan and (3) how much the Japanese are willing to yield without breaking up the Conference. The shrewdest and best informed observer can only venture a more or less plausible guess about the result which will follow from the interaction of these three incalculable forces. Recently the friends of China had considered the prospect less encouraging because the English official publicity played up the importance of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, but there is nothing conclusive about this symptom. It is still reasonable to anticipate that the Conference will bring into existence a beneficial change in the position of China. The benefit in specific agreements will not amount to as much as the friends of China would like, but whatever they are they will be clean benefits. The American government will not purchase them by conditions which will prejudice the future harvesting of a larger crop. In the meantime during the course of the negotiations Secretary Hughes is entitled to the confidence of his fellow citizens. He has earned it by his behavior up to date and as each successive crisis arises, he earns it more rather than less.

TAXATION is one matter that is not likely to be laid at rest for long by any action of Congress. When taxes are heavy, as they must be for a generation, there will necessarily be great discontent among those who think they are unfairly burdened, or that they have the power to roll the burden over to others' shoulders. Least of all is it to be expected that our recently enacted taxation law will enjoy long life. It is fully satisfactory to nobody. It denies substantial relief both to the lower income classes and the higher ones. It abandoned the profits tax, foolishly, we believe, and refused to levy a sales tax, wisely, in our opinion. Senator Penrose has declared that the present is to be regarded as merely a temporary measure, and that the question is to be reopened with a view to fixing permanent rates. A new drive for the sales tax is in prospect. It may succeed, but we see no reason why it should. The agricultural bloc remain coherent, and are gaining in self-confidence. By the time the Penrose group of tax reformers have got the tax question well opened up, it is quite possible that the agricultural bloc will have made up their minds that dropping the profits tax was a mistake, and that no opportunity is to be missed for putting it back on the statute book.

ONE feature of the tax law which should have received general commendation is strangely enough practically ignored by the press. That is the abolition of the tax on transportation, an impost that meant an effective increase in railway rates of five percent on freight and eight percent on passenger traffic. There was never anything to be said in favor of such a tax except that it afforded a substantial revenue. In criticism of the tax it was fairly to be urged that it acted to depress traffic, the very economic life of the country, and rested most heavily on those products and localities that are already discriminated against in the traditional structure of railway rates. Transportation taxes are an invention of the robber barons of the Dark Ages. They may properly be applied in time of war, along with similar inventions that are not too obsolete. Peace has no place for them. They are gone, we hope, forever.

SENATOR KENYON has introduced a bill which comes at such an emergency and is, as far as it goes, so sensible that one hopes it may soon be used as a beginning for the relief of unemployment. Senator Kenyon proposes the familiar plan of holding up necessary public works until a time of depression and unemployment. Department heads would be required to make plans for such work well in advance, and would be allowed

As for the United States's policy so far as revealed, the test question is whether Mr. Root's four points are meant to sanction the status quo in China. If events as they continue to develop show that such is their main intent, then we may be sure that the administration in order to secure itself politically with the American people, is willing to bargain with Japan and Great Britain at the expense of China. There has been a cryptic intimation that the recognition of China's sovereignty by these Root principles is equivalent to enforcing against her all the treaties and commitments which she has signed—for otherwise China would not be sovereign in her treaty-making power! This ingenious device is worthy of that type of American legal mind which has found that it is interference with the liberty of the American workingman to do anything to place him in a secure position of freedom. But it is almost inconceivable—unfortunately not quite—that the problems of the Far East should be approached in this spirit.

Of course it is something to improve China's condition for the future. But the forces which are operating because of the things that have been done in the past will not stop operating because a Conference of powers in Washington decides that such and such things shall be done in the future. The only successful way to regulate the future is by dealing with conditions that now exist. Diplomats are wont to square the circle and perform other impossibilities. To consecrate the status quo in China and then to resolve that things shall be done differently in the future is another of these miracles of diplomacy.

Is the American press going to feed that portion of the American public which requires a happy ending to every novel and drama? Or is it going to take the risk of offending American sentiment and pride by ceasing to proclaim every move as a great advance, and every remark of a foreign diplomat as a tribute to American success, and a reason for swelling American pride? The danger is the greater because our vanity got such a terrible prick at Versailles—a wound that had much to do with our withdrawal into our shell. Now that we have put our heads out again, we are looking for solace and compensation. There are foreign diplomats skilled enough to salve our wounds while they achieve in fact their own ends. If we are not too much inclined to spend our energy in gladsome cheering, we are more likely to attain that "happy ending" to the Washington drama which is so much needed by our mental habit and by our still sore pride.

...cond Journey to Pan-Africa

IN 1919 Pan-Africa was a phase of war—a ...ing attempt to call the attention of a world in travail to the plight of a race. The cry was heard but hardly understood, for other and greater cries drowned it. But in 1921 there seemed to come a chance to test the depth and meaning of Pan-African consciousness.

Three sets of audiences gathered in London, Brussels and Paris for the Second Pan-African Congress. In the English gatherings were Negroes and mulattoes from West and South Africa, British Guiana, Grenada, Jamaica, Nigeria and the Gold Coast; Indians from India and East Africa; colored men from London and twenty-five American Negroes. The voices were outspoken after a rather timid and apologetic opening. The resolutions—strong and clear, with their plain leaning toward industrial democracy, went through without a dissenting voice, though some older representatives of white British philanthropy were evidently not content.

This British attitude showed itself best in a conference arranged by the Aborigines' Protection Society with Sir Sidney Olivier, former Governor of Jamaica, in the chair. Their secretary promptly put the burden of position on us by offering three resolutions for our adoption, on Land, Labor, and Conscription in Africa. Our committee replied that a demand for "sufficient lands" "to provide for the economic independence of the family units" in Africa did not go far enough; that we agreed with their opposition to the new slavery and did not agree that France had no right to conscript her black as well as her white citizens, so long as conscription was her policy, and so long as she recognized racial equality; and that France did come nearer this recognition than any other modern land. Then we in turn changed the subject and spoke freely of the future relations of philanthropy and the Negro problem, laying down the principle that Negro effort aided by white cooperation must be the rule rather than white effort carried on without reference to the opinion and wishes of black folk or with only casual consultation of picked representatives.

In contrast to this attitude was our conference with the foreign relations committee of the Labor party. There we sought to let men like Clynes, Sidney and Beatrice Webb, Lowes Dickinson, Mrs. Philip Snowden, Leonard Woolf, C. P. Buxton, Sir G. Fordham and others, know the real oneness of black and white labor problems. They were not perhaps entirely convinced, but they were deeply ympathetic and were plainly ...tion rather than hoping to give advic...

In Belgium the scene changed. We had here audiences predominantly white and local, but the Belgian Congo was strongly represented, the American group was increased, and the French colonies and Abyssinia appeared. Not only was this a change of personnel but the language difficulty was to the fore, leaving the thirty Americans for the most part linguistically stranded; and, too, a new spirit was in the air. We sensed the Fear about us in a war-land with nerves still taut. It had taken swift work with M. Frank, the Colonial Minister, and others, and probably some diplomatic interchanges, to keep us from being denied admission to Belgium, and particularly the use of the State building, the Palais Mondial. The opening session was palpitating with curiosity and the press tables were crowded. Two Generals graced the platform where presided the black Senegalese, Blaise Diagne, President of the Congress and French Deputy and High Commissioner of African troops. A white French deputy was also there, an Abyssinian, and an American colored woman; the Colonial Office was represented by two officials who pointedly declined platform seats; there were also present, a group of international students, several hundred white Belgians, and many black Congolese.

For two days the speeches went on smoothly—too smoothly, I felt, because nothing was being said but platitudes—not a word about the past in the Congo; not a word about the present; only a hint of a future with some education, some recognition of the chiefs, some industrial betterment. To this was added every effort to show what Belgium had done for the Negro. And here there was much to be said: we stood astounded before the crowning wonder of that museum at Tervurien. It was marvelous—the visible, riotous wealth of the Congo, the startling size of the vast African empire destined to make Belgium but a physical fraction of her own black colonial self; the beauty—the infinite, intriguing, exquisite beauty of Negro art. And yet in its midst and centre, at the end of the long, straight, beech-lined avenue of ten miles, sat Leopold II in ivory; while in the Congress he had not been mentioned!

It was in no spirit of trouble-making but as a simple duty that I rose the last afternoon and read in French and in English the resolutions of London. I did not dream of the consternation which I would cause; but even if I had, it was my evident and bounden duty to read our adopted charter of complaint and hope, even in Belgium. I had previously made it plain in correspondence that we came not for "revolution" but certainly for calm and reasoned complaint, and I was unprepared to hear the word which London received without protest, called "Bolshevist" and "absolutely inadmissible" in Brussels.

Diagne, the Senegalese Frenchman who presided, was beside himself with excitement after the resolutions were read; as an under-secretary of the French government, as ranking Negro of greater France, and perhaps as a successful investor in French colonial enterprises, he was undoubtedly in a difficult position. Possibly he was bound by actual promises to France and Belgium. His French was almost too swift for my ears, but his meaning was clear: he felt that the cause of the black man in Belgium and France had been compromised by black American radicals; he especially denounced our demand for "the restoration of the ancient common ownership of the land in Africa" as rank communism. Panda, the young black leader of Negro Congo in Belgium, was curiously perplexed, and my heart went out to him. White friends—his foster mother, a Belgian general, several members of philanthropic bodies—eddied about him and about Diagne with advice and warning, while several Belgian officials made speeches and reporters hunted for copy.

Meantime, the colored Americans were pressing rather peremptorily for the appointment of a committee on the question of our London resolutions—forgetting the almost unlimited power of a French presiding officer. I was both alarmed and cheered. At least the question had been laid before Belgium and the world. We would not leave a Negro World Congress without really mentioning the truth of our problems. On the other hand, if it could be said that our Congress ended in an uproar—or if our French and Belgian colleagues could be induced to withdraw, the Pan-African movement would receive a severe, perhaps fatal, check. Paul Otlet, a white Belgian, "father of the League of Nations" and co-secretary with Senator La Fontaine of the Palais Mondial, sought to calm the waters by a harmless proposal which Diagne rushed to a vote, even allowing guests and visitors a voice, and swamping Pan-Africa momentarily under the opinion of white Belgians. Mr. Otlet's proposition declared Negroes "susceptible" of advancement from their present backward condition and that their development would rid humanity of a weight of 200 millions of ignorant incompetents, and that collaboration between races on a basis of equality was an urgent duty today. He proposed, therefore, a federation of all uplift agencies of Negroes and their friends centring in the Palais Mondial, Belgi...

aragraphs but consented to hav especially marked as being the opinion of Black America but reserved by Black France for consideration at the next Congress.

Back of this serious internal difference of opinion and policy, which future Congresses must thresh out, lay a subtler and more fundamental problem: Europe asked, What do these hundred, more or less, persons of near and far Negroid ancestry really represent? Is this a real Pan-Negro movement or the work of individuals or of small groups enthusiastic with an idea but representing little?

And we ourselves could not answer. Of the hundred and fifty millions of African Negroes, few were conscious of our meeting. But a few were: in South Africa—even in far Swaziland—in Kenya, East Africa—in the Egyptian Sudan, in Angola, in Liberia and British West Africa, in Nigeria and the Gold Coast, in the French and Belgian Congo and throughout the Americas, many black men knew definitely of our meeting and some attended. But how far did we really represent and voice them and how far were we merely floating in the air of our dreams and ambitions?

We were undoubtedly an intelligentzia—a small group of intellectuals interpreting to some extent but more certainly seeking to guide the public opinion of our group. Was our interpretation honest and clear, and would our guidance be followed? Who shall say until Time itself tells? But certainly there is today no gainsaying the ground swell in the Negro race—the great, unresting, mighty surge; it is reported by every colored official, it is feared by every colonial power, it is sensed by every intelligent Negro in every part of the world. What is it? Sometimes it is revolt against slavery; sometimes revolt against land theft; sometimes complaint against low wages, always a chafing at the color-bar.

What part did the Pan-African Congress play in this worldwide feeling? It did not cause it, as many accuse; it but partially and fitfully voiced it. But it did do three things:

1. It brought face to face and in personal contact a group of educated Negroes of the calibre that might lead black men to emancipation in the modern world.

2. It discovered among these men more points of agreement than of difference.

3. It expressed the need of further meetings and strengthened the permanent organization.

W. E. Burghardt DuBois.

The Ambush

He sat in the hedge on the field side, thinking. He had lots to think about, and it was a grand, early summer's day. He took his wife's letter from his pocket; it was the last he had had from her.

They were all well at home, they were trying not to fret about him. The boy was growing great and had lots of talk. Did he hear about Crowleys, she asked. She was afraid to put more in the letter about it, but the lads from Kerry would tell him. She thought she'd give up the house and go and live in the town with her mother. Dunne's house was burned, and theirs was searched four times in two weeks. Bride Flaherty was taking this letter to Tralee and maybe he'd get it somehow. He was to keep his head up, and not forget what Bride had told him.

He laid the letter down. In a few minutes he must tear it up. Yes, he remembered what Bride had told him. He looked at his hand—there it was, a great long life line.

"Begor, boy, ye'll never die on the field of battle!"

Bride was a great one for the fortunes. Well, well, he was glad his wife put him in mind of it. Tomorrow they'd be in action, he was making for the place now, he had lots of time so he could sit and think. His home, it rose before his mind. He'd made a good choice of a wife anyway. There were few who had so snug a home. She was great entirely for the flowers, well he remembered the rows of sweet peas, rambler roses. Yes, she was all for them. Flowers weren't the whole thing . . . Lord! how he longed to be back, as he remembered how she fed him. He hadn't eaten food as good since he left home.

Ah well, well, he must turn his thoughts from these things yet a while, from the thought of his fine young son. He'll have the Irish on him from his cradle, please God. He smiled as he thought of himself in years to come telling the boy of the fights they made for freedom, of the life of a man on the run. Ah well, please God, the boy will never have to endure it.

He stood up, stretched himself. This thinking hurt. He'd made up his mind he'd make for Costelloe's for a bit of dinner. The Costelloes were his wife's third cousins. The boys were in the movement and he knew he'd find a welcome there. He carried no equipment, he wore no uniform, to do either meant death on sight—if a lorry chanced to pass. There was a chance of that without either. Sure, wasn't there a price on his head?

Diagne's precipitate acceptance of this program pleased neither its promoters, like the aged General Sorelas, former pupil of the great Cardinal Lavigerie—nor yet the American Negroes who envisaged a bigger, stronger movement and who saw little to encourage them to hope that Belgium was ready to lead in the restoration of Negro civilization. Their strong but calm stand finally brought order out of threatened chaos: the Otlet resolutions were declared adopted, but the London manifesto was held for further consideration, to be debated on and finally voted on in Paris. After adjournment, groups of whites and blacks stood about until dark, discussing in French, Flemish, Spanish, Portuguese and English, the meaning of that whirl of deep feeling which flared before adjournment.

We came to Paris with a sense of strain and apprehension, only partially allayed by a long, frank conference with Diagne who acknowledged that his methods in Brussels were high-handed but contended that he had only sought to prevent the "assassination of a race!" The Paris meeting was different from both London and Brussels. It was not "official"—it had clear and determined elements of revolt. It was outspoken and it was bitter with complaint. The variety of groups represented was larger than in London or Brussels, and included besides the United States, the former German colonies, the Portuguese colonies, French Senegal, Congo, and the West Indies, British West India, the Philippines, and Annam. There was no attempt to control the Congress in the interests of any one point of view. None of the colored deputies of the French Parliament attempted to have their way exclusively. Every attempt at smooth platitude was thwarted. "We are a little France," cried the Haitian Minister diplomatically. "Yes, but France did not give freedom to Haiti —Haiti took it," answered the Americans amid the wild applause of young Haiti; and they added that when America seized Haiti, it was not France but Black America which made the only effective protest.

"We are getting on all right in the French Congo," cried a black Congolese in halting phrase, but he was followed by a white Frenchman, Challaye, with circumstantial denunciation of French methods in her Congo.

French and English officials, two ex-governors from Africa, and many prominent whites watched the proceedings and reporters questioned us; above all one thought was uppermost: What did this Congress mean? What was back of it? What were our objects? Especially we were asked re- West Indian "Africa for the Africans" movement, which apparently proposed the forcible expulsion of the whites. It was not easy to explain at first that this Congress was a meeting for conference and acquaintanceship, for organization and study; that it did not as yet represent any complete, settled and adopted policy, but that its members almost unanimously repudiated any policy of war, conquest, or race hatred. On the other hand, we did agree on an unalterable belief in racial equality and on the general proposition that the government and policy of Africa must be designed primarily for the good of the Africans themselves and not primarily for the profit of colonial powers.

Here it was that we encountered the central Fear of France: the main reaction of that organized thrift of Central Europe which is today governing and leading economic reorganization after the war. France recognizes Negro equality not only in theory but in practice; she has for the most part enfranchised her civilized Negro citizens. But what she recognizes is the equal right of her citizens, black and white, to exploit by modern industrial methods her laboring classes, black and white; and the crying danger to black France is that its educated and voting leaders will join in the industrial robbery of Africa rather than lead its masses to education and culture. This is not yet true, but men like Diagne and Candace, while unwavering defenders of racial opportunity, education for blacks, and the franchise for the civilized, are curiously timid when the industrial problems of Africa are approached.

For instance, they asked us to omit from the French version of our English manifesto, seven paragraphs which emphasized and particularized our arraignment of predatory capital in Africa. The gist of the paragraphs lay in these words:

> If we are coming to recognize that the great modern problem is to correct maladjustment in the distribution of wealth, it must be remembered that the basic maladjustment is in the outrageously unjust distribution of world income between the dominant and suppressed peoples; in the rape of land and raw material; the monopoly of technique and culture. And in this crime white labor is particeps criminis with white capital. Unconsciously and consciously, carelessly and deliberately, the vast power of the white labor vote in modern democracies has been cajoled and flattered into imperialistic schemes to enslave and debauch black, brown and yellow labor, until with fatal retribution, they are themselves today bound and gagged and rendered impotent by the resulting monopoly of the world's raw material in the hands of a dominant, cruel and irresponsible few.

The Americans insisted upon including th...

Social Equality and Racial Intermarriage

W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS

THERE is no doubt but that at the bottom of the race problem in the United States is the question of "Social Equality": and the kernel of the "Social Equality" question is the question of intermarriage.

These questions moreover are made almost impossible of rational discussion because of the intense bitterness and hatred which their mere mention gives rise to: one party hotly begins the discussion by intimating in plain terms that blacks are degenerates and prostitutes, commerce with whom on any plane is monstrous. The other party retorts with a record of millions of mulattoes and mixed bloods, the deliberate degradation of black womanhood and the criminal lust of the white race the world over. With such beginnings there is no rational end of discussion, no reasonable enlightenment.

Let us here, however, seek to forget a moment the hateful and hurtful and set down in cold phrase the main elements of the problem.

1. The sexual intermingling of race groups and more particularly of the lightest and darkest races is regarded by many folk as physically monstrous.

As a scientific dictum this is false. From earliest records racial mixture has been the rule and not the exception and there are today no pure races and no scientific line can be drawn between races. There is no scientific proof that the intermingling of any and all of the branches of the present human family does not produce normal human beings.

2. It is, however, believed by many that while race mixture is not physically monstrous, nevertheless certain strains of blood are superior to others; that the darker races have a larger number of inferior strains and that the preservation of the best human culture calls for the survival of the white race in as pure a state as possible.

There is undoubtedly vast difference in heredity, strains of blood leading to the rise of individuals of great ability here and others of criminal and degenerative tendencies there. It is also undoubtedly a great human duty to improve the human stock by rational breeding and by eliminating the unfit and dangerous. But our knowledge of human heredity is at present extremely vague and inexact and it is a monstrous perversion of our proven scientific knowledge to assume that the white race is the physical, mental and moral superior of other races, and that it has a right to secure its own survival and the death of the majority of men by any and all methods. It is quite possible that science will eventually show just as many superior strains in black and yellow as in white peoples, and just as much innate degeneracy in Europe as in Asia and Africa.

3. Racial intermingling, while neither monstrous nor necessarily deleterious, is regarded by many as at present inadvisable:

(a) because of widespread and deep seated racial antagonisms and hatreds.

(b) because of the necessity of group solidarity as a means of transmitting human culture.

(c) because of the value of the group in initiating human culture.

(d) because of differences of taste as to human types of efficiency and beauty.

Here we come to a much more reasonable basis of argument. Humanity always has worked in groups and while these groups have gradually increased in size from the patriarchal family to the nation and even to the "empire" and the race, there is little likelihood that in the next millennium race lines will wholly disappear and we shall emerge as one undifferentiated humanity. Undoubtedly groups and races can and will do much to initiate culture and to transmit tradition. Moreover racial repulsions and antagonisms, within bounds, have their uses and incentives. No one can envisage a dead level of sameness in human types. There is the blue and blonde beauty of the Nordic race; the golden glory of the yellow world; the soft and sensuous allure of the brown people and the starry midnight beauty of the blacks; outside of the mere physical appeal there is every shade of method and conception and thought in differing groups of human hearts and minds, and the preservation and development of this interesting and stimulating variety in mankind is a great human duty.

But how are racial variety and human differentiation to be encouraged?

1. Some think that races can be kept from mingling only by force; that force should take the form of law even if this involves the prostitution of women of the darker races.

This cost is too great. If the only method of keeping races from intermingling is to force them into degradation and inferiority then it is far better to let them intermingle indiscriminately.

2. Some folk would depend on slander and gossip to discourage intermarriage. They would spread the rumor that dark races are diseased and abnormal, make impossible mates and so should be avoided.

This is simply a campaign of lies and again is socially too costly to maintain.

3. Most people depend on social exclusion—the denial of social equality to those with whom intermarriage is for any reason undesirable.

Can Democracy Tolerate Exclusion?

But can democracy and wholesale exclusion co-exist? Our present perverted sexology leads us to regard our every social equal as a prospective husband or wife; and, vice versa, we want to insult and kick anyone whom we may not wish to marry. How singular an attitude this is and how it explains much of our modern marital muddle inside the white race as well as without. Every proposal of increased democratic control in the world has been met by the objection that the excluded classes will seek intermarriage with the privileged classes if they are allowed to rise. The answer has always been: marriage, within certain wide limits. is an individual contract which calls for the consent of the two contracting parties; without that consent, it cannot be consummated. With that consent its legal prevention leads to sexual immorality, as the millions of mulattoes and Eurasians attest.

Moreover, democracy and human culture demand social contact. The white race has been chiefly instrumental in breaking down racial barriers and territorial segregation. Unless human beings meet and meet on a plane of understanding, friendship and courtesy, modern culture is impossible. Social equality, therefore, is a necessity of modern human intercourse. Does it involve intermarriage? Not necessarily. If growing contact of men and women of different races in government, education and art lead to marriages, then this is proof of mutual attraction and mutual consent. Doubtless the social contact of strange groups and races will lead to some such marriages. But it is certain that these marriages will be far fewer in number, and far less deleterious in effect than the illicit sexual relations that have long been the rule.

On the other hand so long as racial and group separation has any adequate reason, in scientific fact, in cultural efficiency, in human taste and beauty, the great mass of individuals of the races will not intermarry, and their attitude will be maintained not by crime, lying, prostitution and personal insult, but by knowledge, courtesy and mutual respect.

"But of Course No Social Equality!"

SARAH N. CLEGHORN

OFTEN when I take children to the Museum of Natural History, and note how they shriek and run away from the painted Indian masks exhibited there, I think of our characteristic American reaction to the question of social equality with Negroes. The children are at the same time fascinated and frightened; they are fascinated by their own fright. They are not intellectually, but emotionally deceived; their judgment is stampeded; they are mesmerized. After a time the braver ones creep back, scurry away, creep back again; they look more closely, they see the grain of the wood, the smearing of the pigments; they even begin, in time, to discern the human intention behind the mask.

Would it be possible for us also to come back after our first startled and excited recoil, and search out some of our reasons for screaming and running away every time we hear or think the words "social equality"? The first thing we should notice, I think, in such an examination, would be that we have no particular dislike for inter-racial contact, as such. "These Southern men, that can't eat in the same restaurant with a colored man," an old Jacksonville doctor once said to me, laughing, "go and pay a colored barber to sozzle his soapy hand all over their mouths." In a Pullman sleeper a colored man is extremely welcome to everybody as long as he is a porter. His black velvet hand smooths down the pillow on which the white cheek is presently to lie. And the last three seats on which the Negroes have to sit in Southern street cars become the first three seats as soon as the car starts on its return journey.

It can't be fear, either, of being eclipsed by the genius of the black race. Against any such fear our undented ignorance of Negro achievements protects us, like a coat of mail. If we see Tanner's pictures in an exhibition, or read James Weldon Johnson's or Claude McKay's poems in a magazine, we assume that the authors are white. I should describe our attitude toward Negro culture as one of mere dull incredulity, mere weakness of the organs of appreciation.

If then we don't mind meeting Negroes, but indeed rather like it, as long as we don't have to meet them on equal terms, but can depend upon a fixed caste advantage over them in every encounter, can we perhaps trace our violent recoil from this dread social equality to some economic motive? Here we are, of course, upon the trail of the universal serpent. But observation of white psychology, either in the North or in the South (for the difference is only one of degree, and perhaps not so many degrees as the white people of both regions imagine) indicates that in this case the economic motives work very obscurely, and work either through, or with, other very powerful springs of action; springs which seem, at all events, more powerful than the economic ones.

The Bugaboo of Intermarriage

Race contempt I believe to be such a cause. But the moment we touch this swollen muscle in human nature, we find that we have touched something more exciting to us than social equality. We find that social equality itself is only a frontispiece for the spectre (to us it always seems a spectre) of intermarriage between white and black. For while we whites are beginning to realize, through all our provinciality, how much we are losing by not seizing the chance to mingle socially with Negroes, and while every time that some frank European comments on our national brusqueness and hard-headedness, our driving, hustling habits, our unimaginative ungraciousness, we think, perforce, of the Negro genius for fun and frolic, the Negro wit and charm, the natural gracefulness of Negro manners, the Negro taste for music and pictorial art; still we believe we must remain fixed forever in our social inequality, because so many voices have so weightily pronounced the doom,

"You can't have social equality without intermarriage."

Intermarriage! Here we are shrieking and scurrying away again. But let us try creeping back and looking at this spectre, just as we did at the other apparition; perhaps we shall be able to discover that it is made of wood and pigment too.

For surely we either have, in both races, a deep and

Playwriting

A professional course in playwriting is offered under the personal supervision of Theodore Ballou Hinckley, Editor of THE DRAMA, assisted by famous playwrights, critics, actors and producers.

PERSONALIZED CRITICISM OF YOUR PLA

The course covers a year of individualized instruction in dr technique. You will be taken step by step through study co books and practice plays, from the simplest rudiments up t actual completion of plays. Your work will receive the indiv attention of Mr. Hinckley. His criticism will be directed at specific needs. He will dissect your plot, your characters, and y dialogue, and give you definite, constructive critcism and help.

PRODUCERS WILL READ YOUR PLAYS

Throughout the entire course, the aim is toward the completion of plays for professional production and not toward mere amateurish effort. Your plays will be analyzed by Mr. Hinckley with the idea of production in mind, and plays of real merit will be brought to the attention of producers. If your manuscript has the endorsement of THE DRAMA, it will receive a reading by managers.

LIMITED ENROLLMENT

Since the work is so carefully personalized, the enrollment is limited to people of real promise. If you have ideas and imagination, you will find the practical dramatic technique and honest competent criticism of this course of inestimable value to you. The South and a Third

THERE has been no real Third Party movement in the United States for fifty years. The main reason for this is the political position of the South. This condition ought frankly to be discussed, in no partisan spirit and without reference to anyone's attitude toward or belief concerning the Negro race. The election of 1920 coincident with a decennial census gives us an unusual opportunity.

Before the Civil War, the Southern part of the United States had a white population whose political power was, man for man, larger than the political power of the North. The reason for this was that the white South in 1860, for instance, not only cast votes for a population of 5,931,483 whites, but also voted three-fifths "of all other persons" that is, of 3,953,760 slaves, amounting politically to 2,372,256 persons. This, however, did not upset democracy in the United States as much as it might have, because the white votes of the South, even with their added power, were distributed on the whole fairly evenly among the dominant parties; so that the Whig appealed to voters North and South with almost as fair a chance of success as the Democrat. But this situation made a Third Party possible only at the cost of the Civil War!

The result of the Civil War, a result which most people have overlooked, was to increase the political power of the white South. This has been partly neutralized in the North by the political power built upon the basis of the unnaturalized foreign born; but on the whole the net result of these facts has been to increase the political power of the South very largely and of the East considerably as against the political power of the Centre and West. This can be proved by the following facts:

If we compare the possible voters (native born persons 21 years of age plus naturalized foreigners) with the votes cast in the presidential election of 1920 we have these percentages:

PERCENT OF POSSIBLE VOTERS DISFRANCHISED

South Carolina	92%	Pennsylvania	58%
Mississippi	91	North Carolina	56
Georgia	89	Vermont
		Oregon	48%
		Massachusetts	46

[illegible]e not wheth[illegible]n American lives Nor[illegible] West or Sou[illegible] whether he loves or hates [illegible]bes, whether [illegible]elieves in the Fifteenth or [illegible] the Thirteen[illegible] Amendment or not, he must [illegible]ee that this co[illegible]dition and free republican [illegible]overnment in the United States cannot co-exist.

How did it come to be tolerated at first? It must be remembered now that the acquiescence of the North in the policy of wholesale disfranchisement in the South which began in Mississippi thirty-two years ago, was based on the following argument: The white voter of the South is faced by an overwhelming amount of black ignorance, which, because of prejudice, votes solidly against the white man—against Property, against Civilization. If now, the Negro is removed from politics, this will leave the white voter free: first, to divide on national issues according to his intelligence and conscience; second, to take up the problems of social development and uplift in his own locality in accordance to the best interest of all, white and black. It was a plausible argument and it gained and still holds the majority of thinking people and it will hold them until they ask, "How far has the result justified the means?"

There has been in the South practically no division of the white vote, except as a matter of political patronage. Third parties like the Populists, the Socialists and the Progressives have made futile appeal now and then, but they have gained no real standing. The Southern states not only have failed to consider great national issues on their merits, but have lamentably failed in their local legislation. There remains in them a state of lawlessness which shames the nation; this is the only part of the civilized world, where men are still publicly burned at the stake, and where mob law is so prevalent that state after state has acknowledged itself practically helpless. Murder in the South outruns the record of all civilization; education, while making noticeable and commendable progress, still lags so far behind the nation, that the South is still the seat of greatest ignorance even among white Americans; and in the face of this the Southern Congressmen almost to a man oppose any federal aid either to stop lynching or scotch the Ku Klux Klan.

[illegible]only put a premium on disfranchise- [illegible]day in the same representation. Underwood and Heflin of Alabama represent a state whose 241,070 votes equal in power the 735,838 votes of Minnesota.

Moreover the subject is sacred. The South is today the seat of political privilege to a degree that would stagger an Englishman, but we must not discuss it. It is bad form. Our wildest and most earnest radicals may propose reform on every subject but this. On this they must become reactionary on pain of public disfavor. But worse than all this, when the United States seeks, by a third party movement, to rearrange its political power in such a way that it can bring to bear political pressure and carry out political ideas, what does it find?

It finds that in the South the policy of disfranchisement has made democratic popular government impossible, even among the whites. It has put into the hands of the Southern whites such astonishing political power that a premium is given secret political manipulation which holds, not simply the Negro, but a large number of whites themselves who are also thus disfranchised, and it allows the remaining rump electorate to threaten political life throughout the country.

No one wishes to "punish" the South. No one wishes to "wave the bloody shirt." No one desires to minimize for a moment the gravity of the problems of race, or ignorance and crime which the South faces. If the only way to cure the social ills of the South was to nullify temporarily popular government in the land, many might contemplate even this enormous sacrifice. But to sacrifice all and get nothing and nowhere is idiotic. It is not the twelve million Negroes who suffer most in this impasse. It is the nation with its hundred million whites. It is particularly the white South. Here not only is political disfranchisement a fact but intellectual disfranchisement follows because of the sinister propaganda which supports politics. The mob mind, the herd instinct is triumphant. Again and again we see the individual tragedy: a young white man, Southern by birth, tradition and belief, sees one matter he would reform, one point of disagreement. He is tolerated a while and then the herd turns and tramples him in fury. It is worse than lynching. The South lynches the bodies of black men, but the souls of white. Behold a nation, which, at the command of rotten [illegible] not allowed in its highest solute protection [of private thout payment] is found to olice power, the natural tendency o extend the qualification more and rivate property disappears. . . . In ain that a man's misfortunes or neces- his shifting the damages to his neigh-

urt concludes that since "private mmunities have seen fit to take the ring only surface rights, we cannot see t that their risk has become a danger he giving to them greater rights than ght." It did not hold that the state was s to prevent mining under cities, but that dertook to do so it must pay the coal owners eir loss.

his dissenting opinion, Mr. Justice Brandeis ceeds from the point of view of the power of community to protect itself, the police power. He points out that the rights of an owner to use property as he pleases are not absolute; that nothing is better settled in the law than that an owner hall not use his property so as to commit a public isance; that this abridgment of his right is in substance a taking of part of the value of his property for which the law has never required payment; and that the rights of the community are not less in cases where it has purchased property than where it has not.

But Justice Brandeis's most telling argument, on the law, is when he comes down to the specific application of the principles which the majority of the Court would not deny. He reminds the Court that it has sustained state laws which were so drawn as absolutely to forbid in the circumstances before the Court the use of oil tanks, brickyards, livery stables, billiard halls, an oleomargarine factory, and, best known of all, liquor, because their use under the circumstances was deemed detrimental to the public interest. And yet in none of these cases did the governments compensate the owner—unless the compensation be, he says quietly in his last sentence, "the advantage of living and doing business in a civilized community."

kly did here and in the Child Labor Case—call a halt in the trend of the law's development based solely upon its own conceptions of public policy. It is a supreme act of statesmanship, which under the Constitution has become the function of the Court, and it is far more important for the American people to recognize this and insist that the men who are to exercise this power truly represent the American democracy than it is to criticize any particular exercise of the power.

In the present case Justice Brandeis's view seems the superior statesmanship. It is frankly a qualification of a property right, but as this spinning globe comes to have living upon it more and more human beings, it is inevitable that the freedom of action of these individuals must become more and more limited. For property rights of the kind here in question are, as Justice Holmes has himself well said, merely rights to course of conduct. Of course, in this process it is essential that the burden of transition be not so thrown upon the individual as to discourage his productive effort—as, for instance, it was for a time thrown upon the food producer of Russia. But it is equally important that the cost of transition be not too heavy for society in its organized capacity.

In the present case it would seem that the social risk involved in suspending mining operations under cities until the development of science permitted it to be safely done would be less than in burdening the government with the cost of buying outright all rights in the subsoil. Taxes as well as the limitation of conduct discourage individual initiative. In many previous cases similar to this the Supreme Court found the balance in favor of not burdening the government. We agree with Justice Brandeis that there is nothing in this case to alter the balance.

folk. There are 390,039 white folk twenty-one years of age and over in South Carolina. Yet South Carolina cast but 66,140 votes in 1920 and some of these were Negro. In that state voluntarily and involuntarily over 300,000 white voters were disfranchised. Moreover of the 376,930 Negroes twenty-one years of age and more, not all were debarred by ignorance. Only 205,819 of these were reported illiterate in 1920, leaving 171,111 who can read and write. Allowing for inaccurate census reports there must be 100,000 Negroes in South Carolina, quite intelligent enough to vote, who were disfranchised by compulsion, along with the 300,000 whites. Moreover 54,339 by census report and in all probability 75,000 of the 300,000 whites could not read and write.

If we take ten Southern states (Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia) we find a voting population of 11,088,224. Of these 3,508,061 are Negroes, leaving 7,580,163 white voters. The total votes cast in 1920 were 2,175,007. Allow for non-voting women, and primary voters who were not interested further, and also for Negroes who did vote, and we must conclude that from three to four million voters of the South are disfranchised; or in other words, every time a black man is denied a vote in the South a white man is also voluntarily or involuntarily disfranchised.

We may also sense difficulties in the Eastern states although not so clearly because of lack of data. For instance in California, Iowa, Ohio and Kansas the possible voting population is between 55 and 60 percent of the total population, while in Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New York and Pennsylvania half or less of the population are voters showing probably the political power accruing to the East over the West by the presence of foreign born who are not encouraged to become naturalized citizens.

If we group the states we get even more striking results. The South (Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas and Virginia) cast 2,175,007 votes in the presidential election of 1920, electing 94 representatives to Congress or 23,138 voters per representative. New England and the Middle Atlantic states cast 7,616,927 votes for 123 representatives or 61,927 per representative. The So[illegible]

[illegible] representatives or 92,319 [illegible] representativ[illegible] the great Middle West [illegible]ois, Indiana, Kansas, Michigan, Minne[illegible] Nebraska, [illegible] Dakota, Ohio, South Dak[illegible] Wisconsin) 10,088,606 votes for 127 representatives or [illegible] 439 per representative. Finally the Northwe[illegible] (California, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Washingto[illegible] and Wyoming) cast 1,945,604 votes for 24 representatives or 81,067 per representative. If we take the votes cast per representative in Congress in the Presidential election of 1920 we have these results by states:

VOTES CAST PER REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS

South Carolina	9,449	Idaho	67,471
Mississippi	10,312	North Dakota	68,592
Georgia	12,394	Maryland	71,211

This shows not only the political advantage which the East has over the Middle West, Northwest and the Southwest, but also the tremendous and unbelievable power of the South. If we arrange this as a map, we shall find the United States looking somewhat like this, distorted according to the political power of the various divisions:

appealing to it, is repeatedly a tremendous failure, and the only thing we are at present able to do, is to give overwhelmng and sweeping majorities, now on this side and now on that, tearing down in our impotent rage both the good and the bad, in order in some blind way to rebuke the bad. No sooner are Progressives or Farmer-Labor voters able to split the reactionary Republican party than they find themselves able to do nothing but to put the Democratic party, just as reactionary, into power; and the result is that in sheer desperation they then have to turn and throw the Democrats out by giving up the third party movement and acting with the Republicans. This has been our political program for fifty years and it is going to be our political program for fifty years longer unless we openly and frankly face the problem. It is the wide-flung custom to sneer at democracy in the United States. But before we condemn it, let's try it.

There is, of course, a bare possibility that sometime a tidal wave will utterly upset the Republicans and substitute the third party as chief opposition party, repeating the revolution of 1860. But this third party will find itself between the devil and the deep sea: if it keeps itself progressive and ever so slightly radical it will have to fight not only the conservatism of many former Republicans but also the entrenched oligarchy of the Southern Democrats. If on the other hand, in order to avoid this contingency, it makes overtures to the conservatives, it has two paths open to it: To gain the Northern conservatives, it must give up its progressive thought; to gain the Southern oligarchy, it must agree to sustain the present political power of the South. This is precisely the rock upon which the "Bull Moose" split.

The Farmer-Labor party and the new Congressional "Bloc" are facing the same thing. Imagine the progressive Western Farmers' group joining hands with Pat Harrison of Mississippi! Pat Harrison represents a constituency where 10,000 people wield as much power as 90,000 people in Ohio. And Mr. Harrison will work with a progressive party only on condition that this balance of political power be not t. ached.

The call for pr. gressive elements to meet in Washington had among its prominent signers, Huddleston of Alabama, where 24,000 people have as much voice in government as 75,000 people in New Jersey.

Inside th Wall

SINCE Marco Polo brou the gifts of K Khan to Venice many rs ago, foreig have been explaining China each other. all the world no other and has had s much interpretation. China's r moteness and complexity, its reluctance to swing promptly into line, all tempt the alien visitor to try his hand. No doubt the temptation is keenest in its first stages. If you are a foreigner, say the Chinese, and do not write a book your first two weeks in China, you may not write a book at all.

You start, perhaps, with Canton. Your first bit of China is the floating city on the river. Your first five minutes produce two bright-eyed little men squatting on a shaky deck, playing dominoes; an old lady drinking floods of tea from the curved spout of her kettle; a young girl kneeling on her heels beneath a rattan awning, combing her hair before a two-inch pocket mirror; a busy mother fastening a block of wood to her baby's back, so that she can haul it back to safety when she hears the splash. . . . You see these people, and assure yourself that they are normally complex human beings, that all of them have hopes and fears and secrets, different each one of them in some manner from another; that there are a hundred thousand of them on the river, and four thousand times that many on its shores.

Yet it is easy, despite the best resolutions, to come away from China and talk about these people as if each one of them were identically like all the others. "The Chinese," millions of them lumped together, are avaricious, or they are generous to a fault; they are great cowards, great heroes, or just too proud to fight; they want a Manchu emperor on the throne again, or they would fight to the last ditch for their republic. . . . So two equally earnest foreigners will testify, at the end of the same number of weeks' or months' or decades' observation. Men who would scorn to generalize about steamships or typhoons will generalize like troopers when they talk about four hundred million Chinese people.

II.

An incision into any alien brain at the end of its first week in China would certainly

, when one na has appropriated rst or last syll the last or first syllab other name: hang Shu Yuan and Yuan Ki, or Chang Lin and Lin Chang Ming.
Chinese names are troublesome. And news from China would be easier reading, in the West, if Chang were Jones and Ming were Smith. Putting names into convenient English would make the cables less mysterious. To be sure, that innovation would scarcely unravel the intricacies of Chinese politics for us, and perhaps not measurably increase our interest in them. For we are none too interested in politics at home. Still, though we understood no better, we might feel less resentment. And China would be the gainer if that happened. What one nation finds baffling in another it frequently associates with what it does not like. Some day a monument may rise in Peking, to that inventive spirit who finds the right equivalent for Chang and Lin and Ming.

III.

Chinese politics are none too prosperous. And one reason is certainly because the country is so poorly hooked together: immense distances everywhere, with nothing modern spanning them. Here, for instance, are China's two chief ports, Hong Kong and Shanghai. No railway links them, and no highway on which travel is anything less than an adventure. The only open road is a wide curve at sea.

Railways will be developed slowly. Meantime a speculative foreigner may wonder how much the radio would help. Railways are intricate and expensive, but the radio costs next to nothing, needs no engineering, is no more intricate than a folding opera hat. To be sure, remote parts of China speak different dialects; but subject only to that disadvantage, why not a thousand sending stations scattered through the country, a hundred thousand receiving sets, villages instantaneously in touch with one another, the ether humming with messages back and forth, messages explaining away misunderstandings that cause friction, messages convincing the North of its common interest with the South, messages persuading China to a new national unity?

That is one way the radio might be used, but would be. Whoever has spent a radio his

Soo Koo: How I Killed my Mother-in-Law. . . ."

Inventions that approach the sublime seem destined to contribute incidentally to the ridiculous. Yet he is a poor nationalist who scorns the stale joke and sentimental ditty. In the long run national unity is less a matter of noble declamations than a common appreciation of what is funny and what noble. Station W.L.B., at Tientsin, may yet come to China's rescue, broadcasting Silver Threads Among the Gold.

IV.

Soochow is as good a place as any, to wonder whether China wasn't sovietized a thousand years ago. It is a little city on the Yangtze River, fifty miles from Shanghai, cut up with canals like Venice —its St. Mark's an open square before a Buddhist temple, with chow dogs instead of pigeons, shops selling crockery cats and whistles, young girls with bangs and ear-rings buying cotton blouses, crowds of boys around the phonographs playing faint gay records in the peep-shows.

Soochow has no city council, no city manager, no budget experts and no budget. It gets along without most of the appurtenances of public effort common to the West. Government neither begins nor ends in City Halls and Voices of the People. No one thinks instinctively of mayors and police chiefs if a bolt of silk is stolen, or a street needs paving, or two men come to blows about a singing girl. Government is rather the affair of heads of families, heads of clans, heads of guilds and temples. It is impersonal and impromptu. And in some ways, perhaps because it is so old that it is coming into vogue again, it looks ultra-modern. For it is "decentralized." It is partially constructed on economic lines. And it is what the modern scientists of politics call "pluralistic": the state itself is not supreme; even in the most modest state affairs it shares authority with the church, the family and the trade association. Soochow is run by little half-official soviets. And so, apparently, are most Chinese cities. If China were suddenly to adopt the system it already has, what has been archaic for ten centuries might seem a great experiment.

tions. Therefore it is somewhat funny to my friends that in Connecticut I am officially classified as a farmer. When my wife and I got back from a year or so in war-torn and peace-torn Europe, we found that New York was even worse, and we fled up to the country, and in a corner of Weston township found a farm of fifty acres or so, two thirds of which is rocks, cliffs, trees, river, and impenetrable thicket. Thus we are relieved from necessity of much authentic farming, but we have had a lot of fun converting a corn-crib into a garage, transporting stone fences somewhere else, damming the river to make a swimming-pool, and converting an old house into something livable. These things are so fascinating that the difficulty is to get any writing done at all.

CAROLINE SINGER

From a drawing by C. LeRoy Baldridge

Witter Bynner ("Chinese Procession") was associate editor of "McClure's Magazine" for four years after he was graduated from Harvard. Later he gave this up and devoted himself mainly to writing. When Mr. Bynner visited China he went not into the China of tourists, but into the real China, living in Chinese hotels, consorting with natives. Mr. Bynner, who is living at present in Santa Fé, was recently adopted into the Hopi Indian tribe, receiving the name of "Mountain Antelope."

W. E. Burghardt DuBois ("Back to Africa") is a graduate of Harvard, and represents those negroes who do not believe in emigration, but who purpose to fight for full political, civil, and social rights in the United States. He is editor of "The Crisis," a magazine which is the official organ of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Many negro leaders in the past have proposed that the negro race return to Africa. In the eighteenth century the Negro Union of Newport proposed it. Later an actual start was made by Paul Cuffee, who in 1815 and at his own expense and in his own ship took a score of negro families to West Africa. The first negro college graduate, John Russworm of Bowdoin, went to Africa to teach, and finally comes Marcus Garvey, a Jamaica negro, with a new proposal to-day.

When Dr. DuBois returned the proofs of this article to us, he asked that the word negro should be capitalized. We should have been glad to do this in the circumstances if word had reached us in time, but, unfortunately, it did not arrive until after the pages had been cast.

CENTURY MAGAZINE usage, governed by the Century Dictionary, has always been to capitalize racial names; but negro has been classed as a color designation, which we would no more capitalize than we would capitalize white man. The negro leadership of our country, however, feels that a principle is at stake here, and that usage has made negro a racial name.

Adriana Spadoni ("The Wax of the Abruzzi") will be remembered by readers of THE CENTURY MAGAZINE for three other stories of the Italian district of New York City. She claims that she has no biography, no past, and no future; nothing but a seething present, with an unfinished novel and a broken type-writer. However that may be, she is the author of two successful novels, "The Swing of the Pendulum" and "The Noise of the World." She has been a settlement-worker in Chicago, in New York, and in San Francisco, which is her native city, although her father was born in Bologna, her mother in London, and they met in China. In speaking of this story, she suggests that we try to find for ourselves "the pleasure which you can so easily have by walking through Little Italy, upper or lower, next July at the Feast of Our Lady of Carmel. Be sure to buy a candle, one of those with scarlet saints and azure virgins, tipped and shod with gold, winging upward to the wick. Make the pilgrimage of the church afoot or a-knee, but be sure that you make it all the way up to the high altar, where the arms and legs and bank-notes and jewelry heap beyond credence."

Back to Africa

By W. E. Burghardt DuBois

It was upon the tenth of August, in High Harlem of Manhattan Island, where a hundred thousand negroes live. There was a long, low, unfinished church basement, roofed over. A little, fat black man, ugly, but with intelligent eyes and big head, was seated on a plank platform beside a "throne," dressed in a military uniform of the gayest mid-Victorian type, heavy with gold lace, epaulets, plume, and sword. Beside him were "potentates," and before him knelt a succession of several colored gentlemen. These in the presence of a thousand or more applauding dark spectators were duly "knighted" and raised to the "peerage" as knight-commanders and dukes of Uganda and the Niger. Among the lucky recipients of titles was the former private secretary of Booker T. Washington!

What did it all mean? A casual observer might have mistaken it for the dress-rehearsal of a new comic opera, and looked instinctively for Bert Williams and Miller and Lyles. But it was not; it was a serious occasion, done on the whole soberly and solemnly. Another might have found it simply silly. All ceremonies are more or less silly. Some negroes would have said that this ceremony had something symbolic, like the coronation, because it was part of a great "back-to-Africa" movement and represented self-determination for the negro race and a relieving of America of her most difficult race problem by a voluntary operation.

On the other hand, many American negroes and some others were scandalized by something which they could but regard as simply child's play. It seemed to them sinister, this enthroning of a demagogue, a blatant boaster, who with monkey-shines was deluding the people and taking their hard-earned dollars; and in High Harlem there rose an insistent cry, "Garvey must go!"

Knowledge of all this seeped through to the greater world because it was sensational and made good copy for the reporters. The great world now and then becomes aware of certain currents within itself,—tragedies and comedies, movements of mind, gossip, personalities,—in some inner whirlpool of which it had been scarcely aware before. Usually these things are of little interest or influence for the main current of events; and yet is not this same main current made up of the impinging of these smaller swirlings of little groups? No matter how segregated and silent the smaller whirlpool is, if it is American, at some time it strikes and influences the American world. What, then, is the latest news from this area of negrodom spiritually so foreign to most of white America?

The sensation that Garvey created was due not so much to his program as to his processes of reasoning, his proposed methods of work, and the width of the stage upon which he essayed to play his part.

His reasoning was at first new and inexplicable to Americans because he brought to the United States a new negro problem. We think of our problem here as the negro problem, but we know more or less clearly that the problem of the American negro is very different from the problem of the South African negro or the problem of the Nigerian negro or the problem of the South American negro. We have not hitherto been so clear as to the way in which the problem of the negro in the United States differs from the problem of the negro in the West Indies. For a long time we have been told, and we have believed, that the race problem in the West Indies, and particularly in Jamaica, has virtually been settled.

Let us note the facts. Marcus Garvey was born on the northern coast of Jamaica in 1887. He was a poor black boy, his father dying later in the almshouse. He received a little training in the Church of England grammar-school, and then learned the trade of printing, working for years as foreman of a printing plant. Then he went to Europe, and wandered about England and France, working and observing until he finally returned to Jamaica. He found himself facing a stone wall. He was poor, he was black, he had no chance for a university education, he had no likely chance for preferment in any line, but could work as an artisan at small wage for the rest of his life.

Moreover, he knew that the so-called settlement of the race problem in Jamaica was not complete; that as a matter of fact throughout the West Indies the development has been like this: most white masters had cohabited with negro women, and some had actually married them; their children were free by law in most cases, but were not the recognized equals of the whites either socially, politically, or economically. Because of the numbers of the free negroes as compared with the masters, and because of their continued growth in wealth and intelligence, they began to get political power, and they finally either expelled the whites by uniting with the blacks, as in Haiti, or forced the whites to receive the mulattoes, or at least the lighter-hued ones, as equals.

This is the West Indian solution of the negro problem. The mulattoes are virtually regarded and treated as whites, with the assumption that they will, by continued white intermarriage, bleach out their color as soon as possible. There survive, therefore, few white colonials, save new-comers, who are not of negro descent in some more or less remote ancestor. Mulattoes intermarry, then, largely with the whites, and the so-called disappearance of the color-line is the disappearance of the line between the whites and mulattoes, and not between the whites and the blacks or even between the mulattoes and the blacks.

Thus the privileged and exploiting group in the West Indies is composed of whites and mulattoes, while the poorly paid and ignorant proletariats are the blacks, forming a peasantry vastly in the majority, but socially, politically, and economically helpless and nearly voiceless. This peasantry, moreover, has been systematically deprived of its natural leadership because the black boy who showed initiative or who accidentally gained wealth and education soon gained the recognition of the white-mulatto group and might be incorporated with them, particularly if he married one of them. Thus his interests and efforts were identified with the mulatto-white group.

There must naturally arise a more or less insistent demand among the black peasants for self-expression and for an exposition of their grievances by one of their own group. Such leaders have indeed arisen from time to time, and Marcus Garvey was one. His notoriety comes not from his ability and accomplishment, but from the Great War. Not that he was without ability. He was a facile speaker, able to express himself in grammatical and forceful English; he had spent enough time in world cities like London to get an idea of world movements, and he honestly believed that the backwardness of the blacks was simply the result of oppression and lack of opportunity.

On the other hand, Garvey had no thorough education and a very hazy idea of the technic of civilization. He fell easily into the common error of assuming that because oppression has retarded a group, the mere removal of the injustice will at a bound restore the group to full power. Then, too, he personally had his drawbacks: he was inordinately vain and egotistic, jealous of his power, impatient of details, a poor judge of human nature, and he had the common weakness of untrained devotees that no dependence could be put upon his statements of fact. Not that he was a conscious liar, but dream, fact, fancy, wish, were all so blurred in his thinking that neither he himself nor his hearers could clearly or easily extricate them.

Then came the new economic demand for negro peasant labor on the Panama Canal, and finally the Great War. Black West-Indians began to make something like decent wages, they began to travel, and they began to talk and think. Garvey talked and thought with them. In conjunction with white and colored sympathizers he planned a small Jamaican Tuskegee. This failed, and he conceived the idea of a purely negro organization to establish independent negro states and link them with commerce and industry. His "Universal Negro Improvement Association," launched August 1, 1914, in Jamaica, was soon in financial difficulties. The war was beginning to change the world, and as white American laborers began to be drawn into war work there was an opening in many lines not only for Southern American negroes as laborers and mechanics, but also for West-Indians as servants and laborers. They began to migrate in larger numbers. With this new migration came Marcus Garvey.

He established a little group of his own Jamaica countrymen in Harlem and launched his program. He took no account of the American negro problem; he knew nothing about it. What he was trying to do was to settle the Jamaican problem in the United States. On the other hand, American negroes knew nothing about the Jamaican problem, and they were excited and indignant at being brought face to face with a man who was full of wild talk about Africa and the West Indies and steamship lines and "race pride," but who said nothing and apparently knew nothing about the right to vote, the horrors of lynching and mob law, and the problem of racial equality.

Moreover, they were especially incensed at the new West-Indian conception of the color-line. Color-lines had naturally often appeared in colored America, but the development had early taken a far different direction from that in the West Indies. Migration by whites had numerically overwhelmed both masters and mulattoes, and compelled most American masters to sell their own children into slavery. Freedom, therefore, rather than color, became the first line of social distinction in the American negro world despite the near-white aristocracies of cities like Charleston and New Orleans, and despite the fact that the proportion of mulattoes who were free and who gained some wealth and education was greater than that of blacks because of the favor of their white parents.

After emancipation, color caste tended to arise again, but the darker group was quickly welded into one despite color by caste legislation, which applied to a white man with one negro great-grandfather as well as to a full-blooded Bantu. There were still obvious advantages to the negro American of lighter hue in passing for white or posing as Spanish or Portuguese, but the pressing demand for ability and efficiency and honesty within this fighting, advancing group continually drove the color-line back before reason and necessity, and it came to be generally regarded as the poorest possible taste for a negro even to refer to differences of color. Colored folk as white as the whitest came to describe themselves as negroes. Imagine, then, the surprise and disgust of these Americans when Garvey launched his Jamaican color scheme.

He did this, of course, ignorantly and with no idea of his mistake and no wit to read the signs. He meant well. He saw what seemed to him the same color-lines which he hated in Jamaica, and he sought here as there to oppose white supremacy and the white ideal by a crude and equally brutal black supremacy and black ideal. His mistake did not lie in the utter impossibility of this program,—greater upheavals in ideal have shaken the world before,—but rather in its spiritual bankruptcy and futility; for what shall this poor world gain if it exchange one race supremacy for another?

Garvey soon sensed that somewhere he was making a mistake, and he began to protest that he was not excluding mulattoes from his organization. Indeed, he has men of all colors and bloods in his organization, but his propaganda still remains "all-black," because this brings cash from the Jamaica peasants. Once he was actually haled to court and made to apologize for calling a disgruntled former colleague "white"! His tirades and twistings have landed him in strange contradictions. Thus with one voice he denounced Booker T. Washington and Frederick Douglass as bastards, and with the next named his boarding-house and first steamship after these same men!

Aside from his color-lines, Garvey soon developed in America a definite and in many respects original and alluring program. He proposed to establish the "Black Star Line" of steamships, under negro ownership and with negro money, to trade between the United States, the West Indies, and Africa. He proposed to establish a factories corporation which was going to build factories and manufacture goods both for local consumption of negroes and for export. He was going eventually to take possession of Africa and establish independent negro governments there.

The statement of this program, with tremendous head-lines, wild eloquence, and great insistence and repetition, caught the attention of all America, white and black. When Mr. Garvey brought his cohorts to Madison Square Garden, clad in fancy costumes and with new songs and ceremonies, and when, ducking his dark head at the audience, he yelled, "We are going to Africa to tell England, France, and Belgium to get out of there," America sat up, listened, laughed, and said here at least is something new.

Negroes, especially West-Indians, flocked to his movement and poured money into it. About three years ago he had some 80,000 members in his organization, and perhaps 20,000 or 30,000 were paying regularly thirty-five cents a month into his chest. These numbers grew in his imagination until he was claiming 4,500,000 followers, and speaking for "Four hundred million negroes"! He did not, however, stop with dreams and promises. If he had been simply a calculating scoundrel, he would carefully have skirted the narrow line between promise and performance and avoided as long as possible the inevitable catastrophe. But he believed in his program and he had a childish ignorance of the stern facts of the world into whose face he was flying. Being an islander, and born in a little realm where half a day's journey takes one from ocean to ocean, the world always seemed small to him, and it was perhaps excusable for this black peasant of Jamaica to think of Africa as a similar, but slightly larger, island which could easily be taken possession of.

His first practical step toward this was to establish the Black Star Line, and here he literally left his critics and opponents breathless by suddenly announcing in 1919 that the Frederick Douglass, a steamship, had been bought by his line, was on exhibition at a wharf in New York, and was about to sail to the West Indies with freight and passengers. The announcement was electrical even for those who did not believe in Garvey. With a splendid, audacious faith, this poor black leader, with his storming tongue, compelled a word of admiration from all. But the seeds of failure were in his very first efforts. This first boat, the Yarmouth (never renamed the Frederick Douglass probably because of financial difficulties), was built in the year Garvey was born, and was an old sea-scarred hulk. He was cheated in buying it, and paid $140,000 for it—at least twice as much as the boat was worth. She made three trips to the West Indies in three years, and then was docked for repairs, attached for debt, and finally, in December, 1921, sold at auction for $1625!

The second boat that Garvey bought was a steam yacht originally built for a Standard Oil magnate. It, too, was old and of doubtful value, but Garvey paid $60,000 for it, and sent it down to do a small carrying trade between the West Indies Islands. The boat broke down, and it cost $70,000 or $80,000 more to repair it than Garvey paid for it. Finally it was wrecked or seized in Cuba, and the crew was transported to the United States at government expense.

The third boat was a Hudson River ferry-boat that Garvey bought for $35,000. With this he carried excursionists up and down the Hudson during one summer and used it as a vivid advertisement to collect more money. The boat, however, ran only that summer, and then had to be abandoned as beyond repair.

Finally, Garvey tried to buy of the United States Shipping Board the steamship Orion for $250,000. This boat was to be renamed the Phyllis Wheatley, and its sailings were advertised in Garvey's weekly paper for several months, and some passages were sold; but the boat never was delivered because sufficient payments were not made.

Thus the Black Star Line arose and disappeared, and with it went some $800,000 of the savings of West-Indians and a few American negroes. With this enterprise the initial step and greatest test of Mr. Garvey's movement failed utterly. His factories corporation never really got started. In its place he has established a number of local grocery stores in Harlem and one or two shops, including a laundry and a printing-press, which may or may not survive.

His African program was made impossible by his own pig-headedness. He proposed to make a start in Liberia with industrial enterprises. From this center he would penetrate all Africa and gradually subdue it. Instead of keeping this plan hidden and working cautiously and intelligently toward it, he yelled and shouted and telegraphed it all over the world. Without consulting the Liberians, he apparently was ready to assume partial charge of their state. He appointed officials with high-sounding titles, and announced that the headquarters of his organization was to be removed to Liberia in January, 1922. Such announcements, together with his talk about conquest and "driving Europe out," aroused European governments to inquire about Garvey and his backing. Diplomatic representations were made to Liberia, asking it how far it intended to coöperate in this program. Liberia was naturally compelled to repudiate Garveyism, root and branch. The officials told Garvey that he or any one else was welcome to migrate to Liberia and develop industry within legal lines, but that they could recognize only one authority in Liberia and that was the authority of the Liberian Government, and that Liberia could not be the seat of any intrigue against her peaceful neighbors. They made it impossible for Garvey to establish any headquarters in Africa unless it was done by the consent of the very nations whom he was threatening to drive out of Africa!

This ended his African program and reduced him to the curious alternative of sending a delegate to the third assembly of the League of Nations to ask them to hand over as a gift to his organization a German colony in order that he might begin his work.

Thus the bubble of Garveyism burst; but its significance, its meaning, remains. After all, one has to get within Garvey to know him, to understand him. He is not simply a liar and blatant fool. Something of both, to be sure, is there; but that is not all. He is the type of dark man whom the white world is making daily, molding, marring, tossing to the air. All his life whites have laughed and sneered at him and torn his soul. All his life he has hated the half-whites who, rejecting their darker blood, have gloried in their pale shame. He has stormed and fought within, and then at last it all burst out. He had to guard himself before the powers and be careful of law and libel and hunger, but where he could be free, he snarled and cursed at the whites, insulted the mulattoes with unpardonable epithets, and bitterly reviled the blacks for their cowardice.

Suppose, now, for a moment that Garvey had been a man of first-rate ability, canny, shrewd, patient, dogged? He might have brought a world war of races a generation nearer, he might have deprived civilization of that precious generation of respite where we have yet time to sit and consider if difference of human color must necessarily mean blows and blood. As a matter of fact, Garvey did not know how to approach his self-appointed task; he had not the genius to wait and laboriously learn, yet he pompously seized the pose; he kept extremely busy, rushed hither and thither. He collected and squandered thousands, almost millions. He would, he must, succeed. He appeared in the uniforms of his dream triumphs, in 1921 with an academic cap and gown, weird in colors; in 1922 with cocked hat, gold lace, and sword—the commander-in-chief of the African Legion! He did not quite dare call himself King Marcus I, but he sunned himself awhile in the address of "your Majesty." He held court and made knights, lords, and dukes; and yet, as he feverishly worked, he knew he had failed; he knew he had missed the key to some dark arcanum. He grew suspicious, morose, complaining, furious at the "fools" and "scoundrels" who were "plotting" his ruin and the overthrow of his cause. With all the provincial backwoods love of courts and judges, he rushed into and reveled in litigation, figuring in at least fifty suits, suing for libel, breach of contract, slander, divorce, assault—everything and anything; while in turn his personal enemies sued him, rioted against him, and one shot him, so that to-day he dares not stir without a sturdy body-guard.

Beaten and overwhelmed with loss and disappointment, he will not yet surrender, and seeks by surrounding himself with new officials and by announcing new enterprises—a daily paper, a new line of steamships, and the like—to re-form his lines. So he sits to-day. He is a world figure in minute microcosm. On a larger field, with fairer opportunity, he might have been great, certainly notorious. He is to-day a little puppet, serio-comic, funny, yet swept with a great veil of tragedy; meaning in himself little more than a passing agitation, moving darkly and uncertainly from a little island of the sea to the panting, half-submerged millions of the first world state. And yet he means something to the world. He is type of a mighty coming thing. He voices a vague, formless, but growing, integrating, human mind which some day will arrest the world.

Just what it has cost the negro race in money to support Garvey it is hard to say, but certainly not less than a million dollars. And yet with all this there are certain peculiar satisfactions. Here has come a test to the American negro which he has not had before. A demagogue has appeared, not the worst kind of demagogue, but, on the contrary, a man who had much which was attractive and understandable in his personality and his program; nevertheless, a man whose program anybody with common sense knew was impossible. With all the arts of the demagogue, Garvey appealed to crowds of people with persuasive eloquence, with the ringing of all possible charges of race loyalty and the bastardy of the mulatto and the persons ashamed of their race, and the implacable enmity of the whites. It was the sort of appeal that easily throws ignorant and inexperienced people into orgies of response and generosity. Yet with all this, coming at a critical time, when the negro was hurt at his war experience and his post-war treatment, when lynching was still a national institution and mob-law a ready resort; when the rank and file of ignorant West-Indian negroes were going wild over Garvey, the American negroes sat cool and calm, and were neither betrayed into wild and unjust attacks upon Garvey nor into uncritical acceptance.

His following has ebbed and flowed. Its main and moving nucleus has been a knot of black Jamaica peasants resident in America as laborers and servants, mostly unlettered, poor, and ignorant, who worship Garvey as their ideal incarnate. Garvey is bold. Garvey lashes the white folk. Garvey downs the mulattoes. Garvey forever! no matter what he does. Does he steal? Better let him steal than let white folk. Does he squander? It 's our money; let him waste. Does he fail? Others have failed.

It is this blind and dangerous nucleus that explains Garvey's success in holding his power. Around these are a mass of West-Indians, resident in the islands and in the United States, who have honestly supported Garvey in the hope that this new leader would direct them out of the West-Indian impasse of low wages, little educational opportunity, no industrial openings, and caste. Especially they seized upon the Black Star Line, as isolated islanders would, as a plan of real practical hope. This group reached sixty or seventy thousand in number during Garvey's heyday, but with the failure of his enterprises it is rapidly falling away.

With these groups have always been a number of American negroes: the ignorant, drawn by eloquence and sound; the grafters who saw a chance of sharing spoils; and with these some honest, thinking folk who paused and inquired, "Who is Garvey, and what is his program?" This American following, though always small, grew here and there, and in centers like Norfolk, Chicago, and Pittsburgh reached for a time into the thousands. But, on the whole, American negroes stood the test well.

Garvey's proposal of such a new, autonomous, and hostile black world in league with the brown and yellow peoples brought from American negroes a simple Missouri "Show us." They asked: "What are you doing, and how? What are your concrete and practical proposals?" They did not follow the more impatient counsels of "Garvey must go." They did not slander or silence or ignore him. The two hundred negro weeklies treated him fairly, and audiences listened to his words and read his literature. And right here lay his undoing, for the more his flamboyant promises were carefully compared with his results, the sooner the utter futility of his program was revealed.

Here is a world that for a thousand years, from the First Crusade to the Great War, had been breaking down the barriers between nations and races in order to build a world-wide economic unity and cultural solidarity. The process has involved slavery, peonage, rape, theft, and extermination, but it is slowly uniting humanity. It is now proposed to turn back and cut out of this world its black eighth or its colored two thirds. Not only is this virtually impossible, but its attempt to-day would certainly involve the white and colored worlds in a death-struggle whose issue none can surely foretell. The power of the yellow, black, and brown worlds to-day is the economic dependence of the white world on them, and the power of the white world is its economic technic and organization. The super-diplomacy of race politics to-morrow is to transmute this interdependence into cultural sympathy, spiritual tolerance, and human freedom. Not in segregation, but in closer, larger unity lies interracial peace.

Not with entire clearness and yet with a certain fundamental and tremendously significant clarity the American negro realizes this, and as yet no demagoguery or pipe dreams have been able to divorce him from the facts. The present generation of negroes has survived two grave temptations, the greater one, fathered by Booker T. Washington, which said, "Let politics alone, keep in your place, work hard, and do not complain," and which meant perpetual color caste for colored folk by their own coöperation and consent, and the consequent inevitable debauchery of the white world; and the lesser, fathered by Marcus Garvey, which said: "Give up! Surrender! The struggle is useless; back to Africa and fight the white world."

It is no ordinary tribute to American negro poise and common sense, and ability to choose and reject leadership, that neither of these programs has been able to hold them. One of the most singular proofs of this is that the latest support of Garveyism is from the notorious Ku Klux Klan. When Garvey saw his Black Star Line disappear, his West-Indian membership fall off, and his American listeners grow increasingly critical, he flew South to consult the Grand Cyclops of the Invisible Empire. Whether the initiative came from him or from the Klan is not known, but probably the Klan invited him. They were indeed birds of a feather, believing in titles, flummery, and mumbo-jumbo, and handling much gullible money.

Garvey's motives were clear. The triumph of the Klan would drive negroes to his program in despair, while the Klan's sympathy would enable him to enter the South, where he has not dared to work and exploit the ignorant black millions. The Klan's object was to encourage anything that would induce negroes to believe that their fight for freedom in America was vain. Garvey's secretary said that the Klan would probably finance the Black Star Line, and Garvey invited the Grand Cyclops to speak at his convention. But Garvey reckoned without his host. A storm of criticism rose among negroes and kept Garvey explaining, contradicting, and repudiating the unholy alliance, and finally drove it under cover, although Garvey openly advertised the Klan's program as showing the impossibility of the negro's remaining in America, and the Klan sent out circulars defending Garvey and declaring that the opposition to him was from the Catholic Church!

Again it is High Harlem, with its music and laughter, its conversations shouted aloft, its teeming, bantering, pushing crowds, its brown and black and cream-like faces, its crisp and curling hair. As the setting sun sends its last crimson light from the heights that hold the Hudson from the Harlem, it floods 138th Street and lights three blocks. One is a block of homes built by the Equitable Life Assurance Society, but now sold to negroes, some crowded, some carelessly kept, but most of them beautiful, even luxurious, perhaps as handsome a block as middle-class America, white or black, affords. Next the sun softens the newness of a brick block on Seventh Avenue, stretching low and beautiful from the Y. W. C. A., with a moving-picture house of the better class and a colored five-and-ten cent store built and owned by black folk. Down beyond, on 138th Street, the sun burns the raising spire of Abyssinian Church, a vast and striking structure built by negroes who for a hundred years have supported one organization and are now moving to their newest and luxurious home of soft carpets, stained windows, and swelling organ. Finally, the dying rays hit a low, rambling basement of brick and rough stone. It was designed as the beginning of a church long ago, but abandoned. Marcus Garvey roofed it over, and out of this squat and dirty old "Liberty Hall" he screams his propaganda. As compared with the homes, the business, the church, Garvey's basement represents nothing in accomplishment and only waste in attempt.

Yet it has a right to be. It represents something spiritual, however poor and futile to-day. Deep in the black man's heart he knows that he needs more than homes and stores and churches. He needs manhood—liberty, brotherhood, equality. The call of the spirit urges him restlessly to and fro with all men of the despised and forgotten, seeking, seeking. Misled they often are, and again and again they play in microcosm the same tragic drama that other worlds and other groups have played. Here is Garvey yelling to life, from the black side, a race consciousness which leaps to meet Madison Grant and Lothrop Stoddard and other worshipers of the great white race. It is symptomatic and portentous. If with a greater and more gifted and efficient Garvey it sometime blazes to real flame, it means world war and eternal hate and blood. It means the setting of the world clock back a thousand years. And yet the world's Garveys are not solely to blame, but rather every worshiper of race superiority and human inequality. On the other hand, back of all this lurks the quieter, more successful, more insistent, and hopeful fact. Races are living together. They are buying and selling, marrying and rearing children, laughing and crying. They are fighting mobs and lynchers and those that enslave and despise, and they have not yet failed in that fight. Their faith in their ultimate and complete triumph are these homes, this business block, this church, duplicated a hundred thousand times in a nation of twelve million. Here, then, are the two future paths, outlined with a certain sullen dimness in the world's blood-crimson twilight, and yet to be descried easily by those with the seeing hearts. Which path will America choose?

The Segregated Negro World

THERE is a singularly widespread feeling of complacency in the United States, among both white and colored people, at the development of the American Negro in business and industry. This is looked upon partly as the natural result of the economic propaganda of the late Booker T. Washington and partly as a result of the philanthropic attitude of those white employers who are willing " to give the Negro work."

In truth, there are two quite different tendencies manifest in this economic development of Negroes.

On one hand, there is the spread of Negroes in national industry conducted by the whites. From the earliest times, the Negro has been a decisive factor in American economic life. He was the industrial foundation of the four great crops which made modern international trade—rice, sugar, tobacco and cotton. Especially in the sugar and cotton kingdoms he was and is indispensable. His status here was for three and a half centuries chiefly that of a slave laborer. Before emancipation, however, he began to expand both as slave and freeman into general labor and skilled industry. Since emancipation, this tendency has continued, although it has met opposition and has been a halting and uncertain development. From the earliest times, white labor has opposed Negro labor in America. But the opposition before emancipation usually took the form of opposition to slavery, although in the West, and in the fifties, this began to be transmuted into opposition to Negro labor, slave or free, because of the naturally low economic social status of the free Negro.

Today, a half century since emancipation, the Negro worker still has his difficulties. In the first place, he usually enters the lowest and worst paid positions with the most difficult working conditions and with little or no chance of advancement. One has but to view the housing offered Negroes in the employ of the companies in the newest steel merger: well-bred pigs ought not to be housed as colored workers are housed in and around Coatesville, Pa., by the Midvale, Bethlehem and other steel companies. Then, too, there is the modern attitude of white labor: In the South, carrying over into emancipation the economic rivalry between whites and blacks in slavery days, the newly enfranchised white laborers have disfranchised colored laborers and united by law, mob rule and secret organization to reduce black labor to as low an economic status as is possible. In the country districts this has resulted in the convict-lease system and in widespread peonage. In the cities it has been less successful, but still keeps the wages of black laborers down and restricts their economic opportunities. In the North the labor unions have, by direct enactment as in the case of railway unions, or by national policy or the votes of local bodies, kept the number of Negroes admitted down to a minimum so that the fight for the union shop has meant practically a fight against Negro labor as well as for better wages and better conditions of work.

The war has changed conditions partially, and by restricting immigration has made the Southern black labor the reservoir for common labor toward which the great basic industries are more and more turning. Laborers, therefore, from the South are coming North in large numbers and finding employment in the steel and iron industries, in coal mining, in brick-making and as general laborers in dozens of industries. Continuously there has been a demand for colored women as servants, and this now is being gradually enlarged by openings for them in certain sorts of industries and some factories.

There are, then, in general American industry today some three million farm laborers and farmers in agriculture; one million and a quarter general laborers and washerwomen; seven hundred thousand servants and five hundred thousand artisans. The economic advance of the Negro here indicated is clear, but it has been a most difficult and heart-rending battle, and it still leaves the black folk dissatisfied, protesting and eager for change. It involves usually segregation and limited opportunities for advancement.

A Closed Economic Circle

On the other hand, and contrasted with this, there is another kind of economic development into which the Negro is entering in small numbers, but with breathless eagerness. This is an attempt to form in the United States, a closed economic circle for and by colored people. According to this plan, colored people employ and are employed by colored people, so as to form reciprocal service, covering as completely as possible, all economic activities. I have described this tendency elsewhere,* as " the Group Economy." It consists of such a co-operative arrangement of industries and services within the Negro group that the group tends to become a closed economic circle largely independent of the surrounding white world. The recognition of this fact explains many of the anomalies which puzzle the student of the Negro American.

" You used to see numbers of colored barbers; you are tempted to think they are all gone—yet today there are more Negro barbers in the United States than ever before, but also at the same time a larger number than ever before cater solely to colored trade where they have a monopoly. Because the Negro lawyer, physician, and teacher serve almost exclusively a colored clientele, their very existence is half forgotten. The new Negro business men are not successors of the old; there used to be Negro business men in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore catering to white trade. The new Negro business man caters to colored trade. So far has this gone that today in every city of the United States with a considerable Negro population, the colored group is serving itself with religious ministration, medical care, legal advice, and education of children; to a growing degree with food, houses, books, and newspapers. So extraordinary has been this development that it forms a large and growing part in the economy in the case of fully one-half of the Negroes of the United States and in the case of something between 50,000 and 100,000 town and city Negroes, representing at least 300,000 persons, the group economy approaches a complete system."

* Atlanta University Studies, No. 12, 1907.

Increased Self-Sufficiency

This was in 1907. Today, sixteen years later, the movement has been tremendously accelerated so that among the colored people of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Richmond, Chicago, Indianapolis and St. Louis and a hundred or more other cities, as well as in thousands of towns, the colored man employs a Negro physician and a Negro dentist; he buys some part of his goods at Negro stores, especially drug stores and small groceries; he educates his children wholly or in part in his own schools; he gets his amusement in halls owned or rented by Negroes, in moving picture houses conducted by them, and, now and then, in theaters owned by them; almost invariably he goes to a Negro church, served by a Negro minister; and usually to a colored Y. M. C. A. with a colored secretary; often, too, to a colored Y. W. C. A.; he reads carefully a colored weekly newspaper and usually a colored monthly magazine; he more and more often hires, for repairs, colored carpenters, plasterers and painters and automobile mechanics; he lives in a colored neighborhood, either owning his own house or, in a considerable number of cases, renting from a colored landlord; he carries life insurance in a colored organization; if he eats outside of his home, it is usually in a colored restaurant; in the annual election, he votes for one or two colored candidates or for white candidates who categorically promise to make appointments of colored policemen, street-sweepers, and, now and then, appointments of higher grade. All the organizations, fraternal, social, philanthropic, to which he belongs are, with very few exceptions, composed of colored people. He has almost no social contact of any sort, even casual, with white folk.

All of the above activities are quite usual, but others are coming to the fore—larger groceries and some dry-goods stores are demanding his patronage. To a rapidly increasing extent, he is being employed by colored corporations or organizations as executives, clerks, stenographers, laborers and janitors. This is still a very small percentage of the total Negro employment, but it is an appreciable percentage and a growing one, and one with a significance far beyond its facts and with peculiar psychological results.

For instance, I received this morning in the mail two circulars—one is from "The Afro-American Food and Drug Company," located at Columbus, Ohio, with an "authorized capital of $1,000,000." It says, among other things: "It is one of the policies of this company, outside of its purely commercial features, with its great money-making possibilities for the shareholders, to give employment to colored men of ability as officials, employ all factory help from colored men and women, and do all in its power to allow the Negro producers of the United States to control their own products and better their financial condition. One of the by-laws suggested by Dr. Berry and approved by the board of trustees is that the colored citizens be given first chance to purchase these shares and therefore keep the profits within the race."

The other circular is from "The Progressive Realty Company, Inc.," owners of the "Shady Rest Club and Golf Grounds," Westfield, N. J. This says: "The Progressive Realty Company, owners of Shady Rest Club House, Golf Grounds and Amusement Park, is distinctively a Race Organization and is incorporated under the laws of the State of New Jersey. It is officered and directed by some of the most prominent and sagacious business men of New Jersey and New York City. The company is striving in every possible way to make Shady Rest the "Playground" of the Race in the East, and you are assured that it will be conducted on the highest plane of decorum, and a certain degree of exclusiveness will be maintained at all times in order that members of the club may be enabled to enjoy to the fullest extent the privileges for which they pay."

In all this development (and I have simply sketched its main outlines and sought no complete picture), Negroes are evincing tremendous energy and esprit de corps. Pictures of new organizations and buildings appear in their pictorials, groups of officers and employes, figures of income. White people, too, express, on seeing and hearing of such enterprises, great gratification, and, upon the slightest pretext, make glowing speeches to prove that this is the way to the millennium.

Is the Outcome Likely to be Good or Bad?

In truth, the development is not nearly as satisfactory and inspiring as such persons say or think. It is not a direct advance, it is a great flanking movement entailing hard work, long effort and industrial war. What we have shown in these two industrial developments of the black man is the same thing which we see in Negro life throughout the United States; the attempt of the Negro to develop as an American citizen, and the attempt, on the part of his whie fellow-citizens, to stem that development and hold it within definite and unyielding limits of low wage and semi-peonage; the consequent escape of the ambitious and talented and venturesome, together with a large and larger following of the black masses into a segregated economy.

The segregation is developing, and its future development is going to be tremendous. There is no reason in the world why under a regime of law and order, American Negroes should not raise raw material, fashion and manufacture it, sell it to themselves and to others and, at the same time, furnish each other all sorts and varieties of personal service. All this is going to be very costly; it is going to mean duplication, ruinous competition, and new race enmities and rivalries; but the compensation offered is escape from prejudice and slavery and with it a chance to develop industry, talent, artistic sense and executive ability.

The point which white America needs to consider is this: When this group has once built itself into a great self-sufficing and self-protecting organism, a mighty economic fist, impenetrable and sternly closed so as to be aggressive and immune to punishment; and when Negroes thus build up an economic power and patriotism beside which philanthropy and national patriotism fades into nothing—what then? Just as race prejudice and religious fanaticism drove the medieval Jew into an economic organization which still remains one of the most complete and invulnerable on earth, in the same way the present economic attitude of America toward the working Negro may develop an economic monster.

Of course, much depends upon the Negro himself. Most white folk have a simple faith that he is always going to be too idiotic and too ignorant, too torn by internal jealousies, to effect any organization which they need respect or fear. I would not advise such white Americans to be too sure of their assumption. I have always had a good deal of faith in black folk. But in twenty-five years of active work among them, they are astonishing even me, at the ability, tenacity and dogged determination with which they are organizing themselves in economic and social lines. And I have a feeling that the results in these matters in the next twenty-five years are going to jar the complacency of those who are counting on the eternal exploitation of cheap Negro labor, and of those who think they are settling any human problem by segregating it and then trying to forget it.

The Negro "In His Place"

LESLIE PINCKNEY HILL

IT ought to be possible to realize in this world a civilization built upon the principle of interchange of service. Every civilization whose story we have, from Herodotus to Wells, has attempted to raise a lasting structure upon the opposite principle of competition. All of these attempts have ended in disaster. Competition, with its corollaries of self-interest and of individual and group isolation, has everywhere led to the might-makes-right doctrine, and to those forms of short-sighted capitalism that foster civil strife within nations and international conflict.

There can be little hope of a settled peace on earth until individual nations are willing to think and act in terms of the general good rather than in terms of self-interest. But no nation can be in itself competent to contribute to the new social order of the world that does not look well to those modes of thought and conduct within its own boundaries by which its public opinion is formed and its moral influence determined. Only in this broad light can our domestic problems take on their true significance and reveal their relationship to the whole world problem. Capital and labor, employer and employe, white race and black race, these antagonisms become within each nation in some degree the measure and touchstone of its power and its will for peace.

At present we have cause for great misgivings. Within our nation there is still one broad social judgment that is sure to lead to inter-racial antagonisms and destructive competition rather than constructive co-operation. This judgment, destined to work increasing evil, is the false judgment about the place of one-tenth of our own population—the Negro tenth. Throughout the South the Negro has a place to keep, and that place is to be determined by the surrounding white group. It is, frankly and brusquely, the place of the menial. The Negro who "keeps his place" is, in the South and in much of the North, acceptable. The Negro bent on self-improvement and self-expression, who, in other words, will not keep his place, becomes at once the "problem."

The whole race question of the South revolves about this judgment. It is this judgment that restricts the colored citizen not only to menial labor alone, but to a narrow and degrading social environment. The Jim Crow car, the "peanut" gallery, the exclusion from public libraries, the short-term ungraded school, the segregated districts in which Negroes dwell, and the crowning horror of lynching—all these are but the natural features of one destructive judgment. In China and Japan, in Turkey and India, this attitude of the dominant white group in America toward the minority black group is well known. Not infrequently the Germans, the Turks and the Japanese have expressed an unwillingness to believe without reservations in the disinterestedness of a nation in world affairs whose domestic conduct—American lynching pre-eminently—belies its professions.

Now at bottom it is probably nothing more than the fear of Negro competition that hardens the South today in its anti-Negro expressions, and explains that recrudescence of the Ku Klux Klan which exploits in garish manner the idea of white supremacy. The land and all the fruits thereof, the kingdom and the glory and the power of it, must forever be the safe possessions of white people. Here riving the nation from within is that corrupting thought that keeps the word at strife without. Mr. Geroid Tanquary Robinson, in that stimulating study of Civilization in the United States by thirty eminent Americans, says: "It is perhaps safe to say that the long preoccupation of the American majority with the development of its material inheritance has brought to the majority a heavy heritage of materialism. One may hazard the statement that the prejudice of America's native white majority against the Negroes, the Indians, the Jews and the Asiatics, is now and has always been in some sense attributable and proportional to the majority's fear of some action on the part of the minority which might injure the material interests of the majority."

Here the case is plainly stated. It is not at all any question merely of color or of inferiority, of race stock or of race traditions, that causes the white South to prescribe for Negroes the menial rank. It is fear of that competition which race prejudice so powerfully stimulates at the very time it denies the existence or the possibility of it. There is in the South today the same fear of competition that wrecked Germany and swept all of Europe into the world war. And this fear has long ago revealed a certain fundamental and progressive weakening of the national strength at the very moment when the whole world needs to be assured that we are strong, and growing stronger. Says Mr. Robinson again: "Today the white South is still under the influence of a system of life and thought that is far more enduring than the one institution which gave it most complete expression. The Emancipation abolished slavery, but it did not rid the master of the idea that it is his right to live by the labor of the slave. The black is not yet relieved of the duty of supporting a certain proportion of the white population in leisure; nor does it appear that the leisured Southerner of today makes a better use of his time than his ancestors did before him."

The South, with the Negro under its feet, lulls itself into a sense of false security by merely prescribing an inferior place for that vast black human mass upon whose sacrificial labor its social and its economic structure is built. The Negro, chafing under these assumptions, is doubly determined to throw them off, to disprove them. He is set with all his energy to get land, to build up homes, schools, and churches, to develop business, to learn the lessons of organization, to achieve political freedom, and to measure his stature in all things by the standard of the American citizen. This means keener competition on a higher, broader plane than ever before. It means the widening of the breach between the races indefinitely with all its consequent unhappy implications. It becomes clearer and clearer that black man and white man are destined in this land to "march to fate abreast." That fate may yet be bright. The way is still open to peace.

Let the place of the Negro in our citizenship be determined by his energies and his intelligence, by his ability to assimilate American culture, by the positive contribution he makes to the progress of the nation. Let the South encourage him in self-respect, in education, in business, in the discriminating exercise of the ballot. No race or nation has yet been found worthy or capable of setting metes and bounds or of prescribing any place for any other race or nation.

When the Negro Migrates North

CHARLES S. JOHNSON

THE sudden migration of a half million Negroes from Southern and Northern States within the three year period following the outbreak of the World War was neither a social accident nor the expression of a distinctive racial peculiarity. It was significant for reasons that lie even deeper than the sentimental revulsion from an hostile environment. The factor of repression was indeed present and for the past thirty years there has been a normal yearly movement of about ten thousand Negroes to the North. But the mobility of the white population up to the period of the World War exceeded even that of the Negroes. During the past thirty years the increase in the population of cities has been three times that of the country districts, and among Negroes the increase has been twice as great. In both instances the increase has been due to migration. Strange as it might seem, in 1910, nearly fifty years after the theoretical privilege had been granted Negroes to live where they pleased, 95.2 per cent. of the Negroes born in the South still lived there, many of them in bitter spiritual revolt against their traditional status. Further, the migration of Northern Negroes to the South as late as 1915 was increasing. In 1900, 27,000 Northern Negroes were living in the South, and in 1910, 41,000. The reason for this was by no means remote. They could not earn a living in the North.

As one of the heritages of slavery the chief occupation of Negroes in the North has been domestic and personal service. In New York City twenty years ago nearly sixty per cent. of the Negro men and ninety per cent. of the Negro women in gainful occupations were forced to seek employment in some form of domestic or personal service. In Chicago as late as 1910, sixty-one and eight-tenths per cent. of all the Negroes were so engaged. In industry they were unessential and consequently were given no consideration whatever. The unskilled work for which they might have been employed was willingly accepted by recent immigrants. The yearly immigration to the United States consistently exceeded the entire Negro population of the North.

Out of about five hundred occupations listed by the Bureau of the Census in 1910, three-fourths of the Negro population were limited to two. The intensive competition among Negroes themselves for jobs, the extremely small margin of advancement and the hidebound income limitations are immediately apparent. The cessation of immigration during the war and the enactment of restrictive legislation offered the first opportunity for Negroes to break out of their old economic stockade and out of the South. The use of Negro workers in industry made necessary by the reduction in the volume of immigration not only evidenced the indisposition of employers generally to give them an equal chance with other labor when white labor was available, but limited, as might be expected, their work to the positions for which recent immigrants were used—unskilled labor. In Pittsburgh a study of the Negro Migrant by Abraham Epstein revealed that ninety per cent. of those employed were doing unskilled work. In sixty-six Chicago plants visited by the investigators for the Chicago Commission on Race Relations in 1920, of 12,500 Negroes working 11,300 were doing unskilled work. These are typical of every Northern industrial community.

WE may tire of "inspired news" but some sorts of inspiration are better than others and the recent news that has come out of that source of all true inspiration, the State Department at Washington, has obviously been aimed at the rapid conversion of the American people to the idea of the recognition of Mexico. The Government announces the appointment of a commission to discover, in cooperation with a Mexican commission, bases of "mutual understanding" between the two countries. Simultaneously we are told that President Obregon is now showing an admirable tendency to protect foreign property-holders just as faithfully as other governments protect them. We are told that President Obregon has "attracted attention" by his earnest efforts to restrain the activities of "extreme agrarians, Socialists, and Reds" and has brought pressure on the more radical governors of states. We are told various other things, all calculated to explain any otherwise inexplicable amiability or fairness toward Mexico exhibited by our Government. We think the apologists of the State Department protest unnecessarily. The American people are willing to be decent without excuse; they are glad that their Government is ready to recognize a friendly neighbor. The high standing of our commissioners—a former Ambassador to Japan and a former Secretary of the Interior—shows that the Administration intends its action seriously.

IN the name of self-respect and common political honesty, how can Charles E. Hughes and Herbert Hoover remain in Mr. Harding's Cabinet? They were of the thirty-one Republicans who signed their names to an appeal to advocates of the League of Nations to vote for Mr. Harding as the surest way of getting the United States into the League. Now Mr. Harding comes out again most positively on the subject, declaring that we shall not enter the League by the front, back, side, or cellar door, that the question has been passed upon and adjudicated by the Executive, the Congress, and the electorate, and that it is forever closed. There is no mention even of the once-promised association of nations, merely the most flat-footed assertions that, so far as the Harding Administration is concerned, the League question is settled. This leaves Mr. Hoover and Mr. Hughes, it seems to us, much in the position of confidence men who buncoed certain people into voting for Mr. Harding upon bogus pretensions. Surely decency dictates their prompt retirement with the best excuses they can possibly make? But the old Cabinet guard never resigns or retires. And what makes Mr. Hughes's position the more amazing is that he is now busily engaged in explaining that adhesion to the world court will not put us into the very League he told the country we would surely enter if Mr. Harding won.

INSPECTOR GOTTFRIED is a German official at Ludwigshafen. He was ordered by a French officer to send a telegram reporting a runaway train. He refused, giving as justification the order of his Government not to obey French officers. The train was derailed. No one was hurt, but a French court-martial has just sentenced Gottfried to twenty years imprisonment at hard labor. One can imagine the sympathy our papers would have had for Gottfried if he had been a Belgian in 1914 or 1915. Newspapers carry brief dispatches—"Passive Resistance Intensified." The personal dramas behind the phrase are of epic quality but we are too dulled by war emotions to comprehend. When ten thousand families are expelled because their wage-earners obey the orders of their own distant Government rather than of the foreign soldiery at their doors it is heroic tragedy to every one of them. Six or eight years ago the details of such personal dramas filled our newspapers and thrilled their readers. The Ruhr is daily repeating the story of Belgium, the age-old history of military occupation—high-handed officers, assaults on girls, deportations, imprisonments, twenty-year sentences—but we are too dulled to listen. After all, these are "only Germans."

DE VALERA may still be free, but with Liam Lynch dead and Dan Breen captured the heart of the military resistance to the Free State is gone. Republicanism is of course not dead—the opposition to Republicanism justified itself only by the belief that a Republic now would mean war with England. The Nation believed, when the Free State treaty was signed, that it was better to accept it for the time than to risk more war. We deplored the resort to arms of the militant minority, which apparently reach. The present air strength of Great Britain totals but thirty-eight squadrons, and the completion of the 1925 program will increase that to only forty-seven squadrons. The French program calls for 220 military squadrons with a grand total of 2,000 machines. On the other hand England is just commencing to fortify her "royal route to India" by building up squadrons for Egypt, Anatolia, Mesopotamia, and India. In Constantinople, during the arrival last September of British troops, every other British officer was an Air Service man. In October, after the Mudania armistice, they melted away, going not back to England, but to various points throughout the empire.

Italy, with a powerful post-war airplane and airship industry, has lately had a complete reorganization of its air service. Premier Mussolini, in order personally to supervise this work, has assumed the direction of the recently created Bureau of Aeronautics with the title of High Commissioner of Aeronautics. This is the first time in history that a Prime Minister has taken the portfolio of minister of aviation, and the act indicates the importance that Italy attaches to her air strength. With a natural mountain barrier on the north, and with two long coasts protected by adequate auxiliary armaments, Italians believe they will be immune from attack by sea or land. In rehabilitating her huge 1918 air strength, Italy has provided for a 1923 expenditure of 280 million lire. Seventy squadrons are to be built up.

Poland and Czecho-Slovakia, under French tutelage, each with twenty-seven squadrons, are rapidly developing a powerful air force as an offset to the Russian armies. But Russia is not neglecting her air service. Early last summer a shipment of fifty latest-type Fokker war planes arrived in Moscow, together with a complement of Dutch and German pilots and mechanics. How many such shipments had preceded this one was not disclosed, but it is known that cadre and depot organizations exist for seventy active-service squadrons.

Japan, of course, profits most from the use of auxiliary arms. Both military and naval men point out that a large program of auxiliary armaments makes her master of the Orient, and Japan, fully appreciating her position, has adopted these auxiliary arms on a tremendous scale. Japan is said to have under construction more light cruisers than there are in all the countries of the world. She is also rapidly turning out submarines of short and long range. With the French building up her army aviation (which already includes thirty-four squadrons) and the British her naval aviation, and with the establishment of aircraft factories in different parts of the country, Japan has advanced more rapidly than any other country in aeronautics. A year ago our Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce announced that aircraft manufacturers in this country were having difficulties in obtaining spruce for aircraft because Japan had bought up the year's available supply. Last year's naval aviation appropriations alone approximate $20,000,000.

Nor has the United States neglected her air forces. With very little publicity, the United States air services have built up an active military air force of fifty-three squadrons, which places the United States second in military air strength, and nearly 40 per cent stronger than Great Britain.

The Hosts of Black Labor

By W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS

AMERICAN industry is slowly beginning to awake to the fact that there is in this country a great reservoir of labor which has been only partially tapped. The South has nine million black folk of whom five million are productive workers. As a mass they are ignorant and unskilled, but they are ambitious, willing to learn, and for the most part at present wretchedly underpaid. Lynching, lawlessness, lack of schools, and disfranchisement have slowly but surely made them ripe for change.

What is America doing with these black laborers? We may envisage four hosts who must deal with them—the planter, the manufacturer, the union laborer, and the Northern Negro. The planter inherits a tradition from which he seldom escapes. This tradition regards the Negro laborer as a serf, without a vote, with little education, low wages, and medieval conditions of work. The manufacturer, North and South, has as his ideal a surplus of common labor, whether black or white, which will keep wages low by severe competition and periodic unemployment. The union laborer proposes so to restrict and monopolize skilled labor as to compel the employer to grant a living wage. These three hosts are pretty well known; but there is a fourth who is not so often thought of. He is the Northern Negro, the representative of the 1,725,141 Negroes established in the North either a generation or more ago or by more recent migration, who have, except in the case of the newest comers, found an industrial place and a racial philosophy and who are the first to be affected by a widespread migration from the South.

These, then, are the four hosts waiting to welcome or repel the Southern black laborer. What has been the result of their and his interactions? We can perhaps best trace it by noticing the gyrations of a little black dot on the map of the United States. This little black dot represents the center of gravity of the Negro population in the United States. This little dot was near Petersburg, Virginia, in 1790. It moved south and then west until 1910, when suddenly and for the first time in American history it struck eastward, and in 1920 was nine and one half miles farther east and nineteen and one half miles farther north than ten years before.

What does this mean? It means that between 1870 and 1910 the Negroes sought economic salvation in the free land of the West and Southwest and that the migration in this direction offset the considerable migration north and east; but that with the beginning of the World War there occurred the greatest revolution in migration which the Negro has known for a century; and that by actual census figures, the net gain of the North and West and loss of the South between 1910 and 1920 was 334,526 black folk.

This northward movement of the Negro population was renewed in the fall of 1922. The great Northern industrial plants sent out a call for semi-skilled and unskilled labor. Just as the cutting down of immigration during the war made a scarcity of common labor, so the new immigration laws together with expanding business are having the same effect at present. The result can be felt all through the South; not as a sudden movement, but as a gradual and expanding tremor.

It is emphasized by the attitude of the white South.

There is still the slave-holding psychology. The Commissioner of Labor in Georgia openly declares that his department is going to stop the "enticing" of Negroes away by arresting "labor agent parasites" and "heavily fining" them; and by other methods of law and force. Can he keep Negroes in the South by these methods? A colored spokesman for five families talked last December to a reporter of the Memphis Commercial Appeal: "They claimed to have been kept in debt year in and out by landowners. One man, who refused to give his name, said he had worked ten years on one plantation, and this year in settling up he had only $50 coming to him. He claimed this would not pay for clothing for his family, let alone buying provisions. What live stock they had in the year 1921 was sold to help them through the crisis when cotton was at its lowest price." To this debt-peonage have been added in recent years the ravages of the boll-weevil. The secretary of the American Cotton Association notes the depopulation of cotton plantations by both white and black farmers on this account and notes that no young mules have been shipped to the cotton belt since the spring of 1920.

The result of all this may be easily conjectured. A colored minister of the Methodist Episcopal church writes: "As district superintendent for seven years, touching twenty-five counties in Mississippi, the State which had, according to the census of 1910, almost one-tenth of the Negro population of the United States of America, my observation and experience lead me to state that the exodus is still on and will no doubt continue gradually toward the North and West for some years. In many places hundreds have gone within the last few months. Many churches have depleted memberships because of the exodus. Seventy-five were counted that left one community within twenty-four hours." The Memphis Commercial Appeal of December 24 declared that within ninety days more than 12,000 Negroes had left the cotton fields of Mississippi and Arkansas for the industrial plants of Chicago, St. Louis, and Detroit. It stated that on an average 200 Negroes leave every night from Memphis northward on the Illinois Central, taking with them not only their household goods, but often several months' provisions.

The Columbia, S. C., State notes the departure of Negroes from South Carolina, and W. P. Conyers, a white citizen of South Carolina and former member of the State Board of Pardons, said in a recent speech: "We have educated many Negroes, and it is from this class of educated, intelligent, industrious, thinking Negroes that the emigrants are coming. It is from the very class of Negro that the South can least afford to lose. But the thinking Negro, the Negro with some education, some ambition, a desire to better care for his family and educate his children, is going North in large numbers. And he doesn't come back."

From Georgia we learn that some "13 per cent or 32,000 of the total number of Negro farmhands in Georgia is estimated to have moved North during the last twelve months." South Carolina and Florida offer figures almost as startling, while the migration during one recent week of more than 5,000 unskilled Negro laborers from North Carolina has resulted in the shutting down of some fifty highway construction projects. From Arkansas, one gentleman writes us, "there is a certain alarm in all circles over the large outflow of Negroes to Northern points. It amounts to a veritable exodus and there seems to be no means of stopping this migration.

This is the crux of the matter. To be sure it is reported that thousands of the newcomers are finding employment at relatively high wages, but this does not settle the matter. First of all there is no sign that even this continued migration of its labor force is really impressing the South. There is no real diminution of Southern lynchings; there is no disposition to let the Negro vote; there is some improvement in schools, but this is usually in cities and seldom in the country districts; and above all there is the sinister growth of the Ku Klux Klan. Despite this, little Southern papers continue to declare fatuously—we take the words from the Gaffney, South Carolina Ledger: "The South is the home of the Negro and nowhere on earth can he receive the consideration he does at the hands of Southern white men!"

These statements are not true and Negroes know they are not true. They know too that in the long run the South cannot keep them from migrating in spite of offensive measures of various sorts. And the Negro is increasingly determined not to submit to Southern caste rule.

This does not minimize his difficulties in the North. First he must find a job, and between him and the better jobs stand the labor unions. Undoubtedly in the North the attitude of the labor union has reflected the attitude of the white public. There has been a determined effort to keep the black laborers out of the skilled unions, and while the unions have had to give in here and there, there has been little real change in this policy of exclusion. No Negro today can belong to any of the railroad unions and the various "full crew" laws were simply methods of driving out Negro competition. Whenever there is an attempt to unionize labor beyond the highly skilled field immediately the race problem comes to the fore as in East St. Louis and in the late steel strike. In the South in the same way the unionized white laborer is willing to furnish mobs to keep the black field hand "in his place."

But with common labor scarce and semi-skilled labor unorganized the Negro can gain a foothold, although often this involves "scabbing" and increased hatred and prejudice. He accepts low wages and long hours because even these are better than Southern peonage. And with this situation the Northern industrial barons are perfectly content and congratulate themselves.

In addition to this the new Negro laborer is immediately forced upon the established Northern Negro group. Now the position of this group is not strong economically nor socially. Its security depends largely upon the non-agitation of the race problem. If racial differences are not emphasized by newspapers or by new facts the Northern Negro becomes gradually a citizen judged by his individual deserts and abilities. If, however, there comes a sudden new migration, the level of intelligence and efficiency in these newcomers is almost inevitably below that of the Negro already established in the North. Public opinion lumps the new with the old without discrimination. New racial irritation, hatreds, and segregations arise. The problem of new dwelling-places becomes severe and it is a double problem, for not only must the new black men have homes to shelter them, but the white home owners must, as far as possible, protect the beauty, moral level, and value of their homes.

The Northern Negro, therefore, faces a peculiar dilemma. He knows that his Southern brother will and must migrate just as he himself migrated either in this generation or of personal investigation in Russia last summer, are simple and definite:

1. The idea of sequestration originated not with the Government, but with a group of priests and their parishioners in the famine areas who petitioned the Soviet Government, in the name of Christ, to use their idle properties for the saving of human lives.

2. Precedent for such action was found in the uniform practice of the Czar's Government in taking church treasures for public uses whenever necessary or convenient. I was shown records in Moscow of requisitions on the churches by different Czars of 7,000 rubles for a canal, 8,000 rubles for ammunition, other thousands for bridges, army horses, a gate in Moscow, etc. In 1916 the Archbishop recommended to Petrograd that the treasures of a certain very rich monastery should be seized for the support of "the war against the heathen," i.e., the Germans. This recommendation was indorsed by the Holy Synod, and duly approved by Czar Nicholas; but before the Government could act, the revolution had ended its power.

3. Sequestration of church properties was placed in the hands of a special commission. Articles were not to be seized until after a careful inventory had been made of all treasures available, and only under the following conditions: Nothing to be taken which was necessary to religious uses; nothing to be taken which had artistic value; nothing to be taken which had historic value. In every case final authorization had to be given by a member of the Moscow commission. I was told personally by a provincial governor of two instances where his recommendations that certain articles be seized for famine relief were vetoed by the commission. One concerned a huge silver chest, containing the bones of a saint; this was ordered preserved because the silversmith had attempted to copy in his work the design of the former sepulcher, and the chest, therefore, had historic value. The second veto concerned a bishop's cap, adorned with 1,800 matchless pearls; this, also, was left untouched by order of the commission, because it was adjudged to have historic and artistic value. The commission's control of the sequestration policy was so strict that returns were exceedingly disappointing. Famine relief planned by the Government on the basis of this policy was halted badly for sheer lack of resources.

The conflict with the Roman church, as bitter today as ever, has centered upon no one specific issue. It is to be remembered, in this connection, that the Soviet order of January, 1918, gave the Roman Catholics a degree of religious liberty which they had never enjoyed under the oppression of the old regime. They were recognized as on an equal level with all other religionists, and given freedom to use their churches and practice the observances of their faith. From the beginning, however, the Romanists carried on a campaign against the Government. Thus they refused to recognize the nationalization of church property, holding that the buildings and all they contain are the property of the Pope. They also refused to obey the laws against the teaching of religious dogmas to minors. It is because of the recalcitrancy of the priesthood in these matters that the Soviet Government has closed the Roman Catholic churches until the law shall be obeyed. The celebration of the mass, however, is entirely legal, and is going on regularly in parish buildings and private houses.

What we have, in all these instances, are open conflicts over matters of ecclesiastical rights of property and procedure. Only in the case of the denial to the churches of the right to teach their children the doctrines of their faith can we find anything even remotely suggesting persecution. In all other matters the laws have been written in terms of freedom and executed in the spirit of tolerance.

Lastly, there is the spiritual phase of the present situation. I refer here to the awakening within the Orthodox Church itself of long-buried forces of enlightenment and liberation, which are gradually shaping themselves into various movements of revolt, parallel to the Protestant movements which everywhere appeared in the era of the Reformation. The most conspicuous of these movements is known as the Living Church, and is headed by the two distinguished prelates, Antonin and Krasnitsky.

The libels against the Living Church and kindred groups are becoming familiar. We who are the spiritual descendants of exactly similar groups of three and four hundred years ago seem to take especial delight in defaming these men in Russia who are trying now to do what our fathers did under like circumstances. Thus it is said that Antonin, who has suffered martyrdom for years in the spirit of a Savonarola and a Huss, is half-witted. It is said that Krasnitsky, who is doing his work today as Luther did his yesterday, is ambitious. It is said that these men and all their associates in the Living Church are the paid tools of the Soviets in the work of breaking up the church and extinguishing religion. No slander is too vicious to hurl against these Protestant reformers of our modern day. But I attended the first Congress of this Living Church in Moscow in August last. With the exception of my interpreter I was the only non-Russian present, so far as I know. I watched proceedings, listened to speeches, talked with priests—and this is what I believe:

These men in the Living Church are reformers of true apostolic courage, zeal, and sincerity. They have revolted against the corruptions and oppressions characteristic of a hierarchy bound hand and foot to the interests of a tyrannical dynasty. They have their roll of martyrs, for in the dark days of the Czar they were not afraid to speak. Now, with the overthrow of the Czar and the establishment of religious freedom under the Soviets, they see their opportunity come at last to purge the church of its ills and restore something of the purity and simplicity of the religion of Jesus. I saw them with the dust and weariness upon them of long journeyings from the Caucasus, the Ukraine, Siberia. I watched them as they sang and prayed and debated. I heard them talk of ending the hierarchal organization of bishop, archbishop, patriarch, etc., and restoring the churches to the people; of simplifying the ritual and the services, that the people might participate in devotions unto God; of revising the creeds that superstitions and dead dogmas might be done away, and truth be sought again. Always there was discussion of the "living church"—a church that should be alive in thought, in service, in love for humankind.

Sincere, courageous, devoted, these living churchmen still knew all too little how to move forward effectively to the goal they saw so clearly. From the long-established Reformation of the West must come the leading and sympathy they so sorely need. Hence the satisfaction with which I read of American Protestants who are even now in Moscow lending a hand to these Russian brethren.

The attitude of the Communist toward the Living Church and similar protestant movements is various. Few are sympathetic, for few have any interest in religion and the church. Many are openly contemptuous, regarding this movement only as an attempt to save what cannot and should not be saved. Still others are cynical; these sectarian movements are embarrassing to the Orthodox Church and therefore exceedingly convenient to the Government. All are at the worst indifferent, at the best eager to help a movement which represents inside the church the revolution which has taken place outside the church. So the Government at the least keeps hands off; at the best, as on the occasion of the Moscow Congress, lends aid and comfort. A new protestant reformation is well under way, and the Government is not unfriendly!

In surveying the situation in Russia, as thus presented, it is well to remember what the revolutionists have in mind when they talk or act upon religion. They do not see religion as we see it, or understand it as we understand it. What they see and well understand by religion is the Orthodox Church, the old established hierarchy, the greatest compound of ignorance, superstition, and corruption that the world has ever known. Final judgment on this church, which has masqueraded all these years in Russia as religion, was passed by Leo Tolstoi in his Reply to the Holy Synod on the occasion of his excommunication in 1901. He wrote:

> I am convinced that the teaching of the church is theoretically a crafty and injurious falsehood, and practically a conglomeration of gross superstitions and sorceries beneath which true Christianity has utterly disappeared. . . . If one ventures to remind men that all these prayers, masses, candles, images have no connection with the teachings of Christ, that he simply commanded men to love one another, not to return evil for evil, not to kill their fellows, then immediately all those who profit by the lie burst into indignation and protest with incredible boldness that Christ taught none of those things. . . . If there exists anything sacred it is not their pretended sacraments, but this obligation to denounce religious imposture as soon as we perceive it. . . . If Christ should return today and see what is done in his name in the churches, he would not fail to fling far away from him, with a great and most righteous anger, their communion cloths, banners, crosses, chalices, candles, and images, all the instruments of their sorcery, all that helps them to turn men aside from God and his teaching.

It is against this abominable perversion of religion that a revolution is now well under way. The vast upheaval of the reformation, in other words, has just now come to Russia. In the cataclysmic circumstances of such a phenomenon it is not surprising that fanatical errors are sometimes made, as in the case of the law forbidding the teaching of theological doctrines to minors; and occasional outrages committed, as in the case of the execution of the Vicar-General, Butchkavich. But to interpret such events in terms of widespread and deliberate persecution, to declare that the revolutionists of Russia inside and outside the church seek the extermination of religion, is ridiculous. As we have been told for years that the Bolsheviki are anarchists seeking to destroy society, and the refugees the true representatives of order and progress, so we are now told that the Bolsheviki are atheists seeking to extinguish religion, and the Orthodox Church the true representative of Christianity. Such solicitude for this church, especially from Protestants enjoying centuries of emancipation from the influences it represents, is touching in the extreme! But the vile deceit cannot succeed. True religion is coming to its own in Russia; the days of darkness are drawing to a close.

Lo, the Poor Railroads!

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

IF there is anybody in this whole wide, wide world to whom I venture to offer the indignity of pity, it is the executive manager of almost any American railroad.

Senator Cummins tells me that if the railroads do not meekly accept the consolidations which the Interstate Commerce Commission will suggest to them, he will bring in a bill which will outrightly force them to do it.

Senator La Follette tells me that the "Progressive Bloc" in the Senate and in the House will undoubtedly be ready next winter with a bill, or bills, which will teach the railroads to do a great many things very much better in the "progressive" sense.

Senator Couzens is sitting in his office in the Senate Office Building with streams of data on railroads flowing across his desk in preparation for the happy days when Senator La Follette in the next Congress will attack the railroads and when the railroads will attack Senator La Follette and when Senator Couzens will come crashing onto the field against them like Blücher at Waterloo.

The "official White House spokesman"—the journalistic marionette through which the President ventriloquizes his views to the American public—says that the railroad question will be "a paramount question" in the next Congress.

Meanwhile in railroad managerial circles I learn that in the course of the last ten years the railroads of this country have been able to increase their total stock issues from the sum of $8,500,000,000 to the sum only of $8,900,000,000.

I simultaneously learn that our population and our agricultural productivity and our industrial productivity have increased so rapidly, and our present prosperity has expanded so exuberantly, that the railroads feel obliged this year to contemplate and to undertake unprecedented expenditures for new equipment.

They must meet these new expenditures almost exclusively out of earnings or out of borrowings and not out of any new full-risk investment by any new stockholders. Interstate Commerce Commissioner Eastman, who seems to have a special interest or a special duty in such matters, tells me that since the passage of the Transportation Act of 1920 there have been only two instances in which important railroads have got out any important issues of new stock.

The situation thus illustrated has been succinctly and poignantly described by Mr. Robert S. Binkerd, vice-chairman of the committee of Eastern railroads on public relations. He observes that the railroads are in this year 1923 authorizing an expenditure of more than a billion dollars for cars and locomotives and trackage and other facilities; and he observes that investors will buy equipment trust certificates on which they get a stated interest but will not buy new stock on which they would have to take an unstated chance; and he says:

> "The railroads are being obliged to increase their creditors without increasing their partners. They are being obliged to increase their percentage of fixed charges and to decrease their margin of safety for solvent operation."

They are pushed into this position while our oil companies have accumulated such enormous surpluses of profits that they are abundantly able to prosecute a most desirable but highly expensive search for petroleum in foreign fields in South America, in Asia, in Africa.

The Week

HIRAM JOHNSON has done himself no good and Mr. Coolidge no harm, by suggesting that the President has purchased the support of Henry Ford with Muscle Shoals and tax revision. If Ford really desired to be President, no such arrangement would mean anything to him; and in any event, Mr. Coolidge has too much common sense to offer such a bargain. It is much more likely that Ford on impulse decided that he had had enough of the peculiar sort of publicity he has been getting for the past year or two, and followed the dictates of his momentary allegiance. Ford's radicalism was never very deep nor wide. Someone had pumped into his head a theory about fiat money, just as someone else once made him believe that he could stop the war with his Peace Ship. But the true test of a man is in the way he conducts his private affairs; and nothing in Ford's business career is incompatible with [illegible] conservative Republican [illegible] that he is the sort of in- [illegible] bribed with an offer of [illegible] to make the most stupid [illegible] reading of his character.

IF Mr. Ford "stays put" (and there is of course nothing to prevent his suddenly changing his mind again at any moment from now until the election on the ground that the President is not the man he thought him) he aids Coolidge only by removing the possible menace of a third party, and not by bringing voters to his aid. Probably not one percent of the people who wanted Ford for President would take his advice as to voting for some one else. They followed Ford, not as an ordinary political leader, but as mystical, half-magical superman. They are willing to believe that he could have accomplished miracles in the White House; but not even he can make the figure of the President appear other than what it is, to them. As matters now stand, the Ford sentiment will have no effect on the politicians who will control the two conventions. If the Democrats select a liberal, such as McAdoo, to make the race against Coolidge, undoubtedly a majority of the former followers of the automobile man will be found in the Democratic camp.

ON principle we are opposed to the bonus. Granting that most of the soldiers were set back financially by their terms of service, we can yet see no reasonable ground for adjusted compensation. When the nation is at war good citizens must expect to take risks and losses. It may be argued that the government pays the full price for the money and material taken for war purposes and should therefore pay the full price for man power, that is, the equivalent of what the men would have earned if they had stayed at home. This reduction of men and materials to a common basis has something abhorrent about it. If it were made, however, we should not arrive at a flat rate bonus. The farm hand returned from the war lost li[illegible] in comparison with the small dealer who found [illegible] business divided up among his competitors. [illegible] bonus bill passes, there will still remain a [illegible] class inadequately compensated for their lo[illegible] We see no reason why they should [illegible] with ad[illegible]ional de[illegible]mands [illegible] assurance [illegible] hat they receive under the pres ss for more on the ground that the compensation needs further adjustment.

ET we are not warranted in exaggerating the nancial consequence of the bonus, as Secretary Mellon seems to do. An annual charge of $225,-00,000, or even of $250,000,000, will not ruin nation which in a year of modest prosperity has surplus revenue of $300,000,000 at the very east, after deduction of an ample sinking fund the public debt. We can pay the bonus and main perfectly sound, financially. What we lose the chance to cut the income tax. We have in effect a struggle between the income tax payer and the ex-service men for the millions that the Treasury does not need. The income tax payer is backed by most of the press of the country, but the ex-service men control directly and indirectly a colossal vote. Each side professes the purest public spirit, and each side is perfectly aware where its self-interest lies. When one looks at the matter in this light, neutrality appears to be the proper attitude. Who shall say that the income tax payers, mostly in comfortable circumstances, have a better right to the Treasury surplus than the ex-service men, a majority of whom are poor?

THE contest would not have been so evenly balanced if the alternative to the bonus had been, not reduced income taxes, but the more rapid payment of the public debt. We have eight billions coming due within five years. If we have to refund most of this debt, it will be done at a relatively high interest rate. Leaving taxes where they are and rejecting the bonus would enable us to pay off at least half of the eight billions, and give us correspondingly better terms on the rest. Nor would the case for the bonus be strong if the alternative were a reduction in the customs duties which enable the manufacturers of the Eastern states to make large profits at the expense of the farmers and laborers. As we showed in our last issue, prosperity is most unevenly distributed, at present. The purely agricultural sections are suffering severely from the tariff, not only because it raises the price of everything the farmer has to buy, but because it keeps out foreign goods that would be sent here to pay for our surplus agricultural produce. But Secretary Mellon advances no such salutary program of tariff reduction. He is squarely backing the income tax payer against the ex-service man. If he gets beaten, there will be small reason why the average citizen should be deeply concerned.

AT France intends to do about the approach-famine in Germany is now fairly clear. The man r... that a $70,000,000 loan for for... priority over ...parations ... govern-to cereals and fats. There is every reason believe that when the question of the loan come up to a vote, France will interpose the one neg ative ballot necessary to prevent action. Her of ficial propaganda about "large sums of German money abroad" which could be used to rescue the starving millions is, of course, nonsense. M. Poincaré knows perfectly well that such sums as do exist are private, not public funds; and that the government has neither the legal right nor the extra-legal power to seize them. The suggestion is as fantastic as it would be to propose that the United States should seize the New York bank balances of French business houses to apply on the debt France owes us. No; the French attitude has a specific purpose. When the necessary priority has been refused and Germany is desperate, France will offer to relent in exchange for additional concessions as to the Ruhr. M. Poincaré, in other words, will gamble with the lives of millions of innocent men, women and children to gain for his government further temporary advantage in the course upon which it is embarked.

THE coming Labor government in Great Britain is casting its shadow before. It has already caused the abandonment of the huge, costly and needless naval base at Singapore which would have undone much of the work of the Washington Conference and would certainly have provoked retaliatory enterprise on the part of Japan, against whom it was aimed. The present lull in continental affairs must be attributed to the necessity for marking time until Mr. Macdonald and his associates have taken control. Probably the present demand that France come to terms with the Russian government is due to the realization that an agreement with Moscow will be one of the corner-stones of the new British policy. The Nationalist bloc in Paris has every reason to be apprehensive also over the prospect that the Labor government will carry out its indicated intention of calling a general conference of the nations to consider the European muddle. Such measures as this probably indicate the scope of the important activities of the laborites in the near future. Asquith, putting Lloyd George firmly in his place, announces that the Liberals will form a coalition neither with the Conservatives nor the Labor party. The latter, therefore, cannot hope to do much during its first tenure in office. Before the capital levy or the nationalization of public utilities can be considered seriously, the party must secure from the country a far clearer mandate than it now possesses.

incompatible with its exercise. If the organization is necessary, and no one will be bold enough to deny the necessity in this case, individual rights must be withheld. Equity offers, however, to continue the exemption to members of the Actors' Fidelity League who were in good standing September 1, 1923. In other respects the document submitted by Equity is an admirable one. It guarantees that it will not interfere in the casting of plays; or dictate to authors as to matter, plot or text; or attempt to regulate salaries. Further it agrees to remain open to all actors who desire to join, and not to raise its initiation fee. Sympathetic strikes are barred. Arbitration of differences is provided for. Certain other provisions are inserted for the benefit of the actor, which do not seem to involve hardship to the management.

These proposals formed the basis of discussion between Messrs. Emerson and Gillmore representing Equity, and Messrs. Lee Shubert, Lawrence Weber, and Winthrop Ames representing the Producing Managers' Association, in September and October. The discussions have hitherto proved fruitless. The essential point at issue remains the Equity shop, which a Producing Managers' Association refuses to cede. It is this point which will cause a strike or lockout in June, 1924, unless it is settled. Public opinion will play an even more decisive part in this than in other industrial disputes, because the theatre is so directly dependent on public favor. A guide to its verdict is afforded by the decision of Judge Julian W. Mack who, as arbitrator, in 1921 passed upon the lawfulness and expediency of the application of the Equity shop to producers not formally exempted by the agreement of 1919.

> I should be setting myself against the broad current of opinion of the great majority of the Courts in this country, and the body of informed and impartial public opinion, if I held that the Union Shop or the Equity Shop is in itself unlawful or against public policy. Nor would my own study of industrial problems, and such experience as I have had in arbitrations between employers and unions in various industries, prompt me to reach any such conclusion.

The Negro Takes Stock

CHIEF AMOAH III of the Gold Coast spoke at the London session of the Pan-African Congress. He is small, black and earnest, a descendant of ancient rulers of the Gold Coast, never enslaved; and now a cocoa merchant resident in London many years. He was a significant figure.

For Mr. Hutchinson, a London mulatto barrister, also from West Africa, told us one night how, a quarter of a century ago, he himself planted the first cocoa tree in that region and how today Nigeria and the British West Coast are the greatest cocoa-producing areas in the world. But singularly enough the economic development there has not been at all according to modern theory. It has not been a case of the advent of foreign-owned capital with captains of industry driving native slaves, but a development of peasant proprietorship on small plantations with black owners working in a leisurely way as they wish, being their own masters, and yet turning out this mass of products.

It was at this point that Sir Sidney Olivier, former Governor of Jamaica, impressed upon us, in his remarks, that just here Africa could teach the modern economic world. The independence of the black worker, his demand for leisure and art, the word of the newer science as to the possibilities of his normal human developments—all this emphasized the need of an international Pan-African movement to conserve African genius and power and to fight for the black man's freedom.

All is not well in West Africa, we were again and again told, because the black man there has so limited a voice in his own government. His is a crown colony of the restricted type with only figureheads and favorites appointed to the advisory council of the governors, and these councils without decisive power. In the great Imperial Conference in London there was not a single black face and perhaps the greatest fact brought before the Pan-African Congress was this disfranchisement of fifty million Negroes in the British Empire.

Yet all hope is not lost: there was no direct voice from South Africa in our counsels—to reach the natives there is not only a matter of distance but of intervening white opinion—but all over England and Europe the presence of General Smuts, Premier of the Union of South Africa, forced this problem continually to the fore; for if the black man is still confined beneath the service of imperial politics, the brown man of India has found voice and power. Again and again Smuts was compelled to interrupt his Sermon on the Mount about the naughty and stubborn French to explain that any effort in South Africa to recognize the manhood of Indian or Negro would overthrow "white civilization" at the Cape.

The sinister influence of this intransigeance of South Africa is seen in Mozambique. The new Portuguese Colonial Code is most liberal and recognizes the full Portuguese citizenship of educated natives with the right to vote. Until recently, the magistrate [illegible] of pleasure who meets a company

t must not be inferred that all producing man-rs took advantage of all possible methods to ploit the actor, any more than that all producing anagers went broke between Omaha and Ogden;
t the evils were general and Equity, by its omulgation of the Equity contract, has done uch to mitigate them. This contract stipulates at the actor shall not be called on to rehearse ore than four weeks without salary, and that he hall be guaranteed two weeks of paying work.
Within the first ten days of rehearsal he may be dismissed without penalty; after that he is entitled to two weeks' notice. The number of performances a week, on regular salary, is limited to eight.
Costumes are provided by the management. As insurance against stranding, the producer is bonded to an amount sufficient to bring the company back to its starting point. Equity itself advances the money; for the fiscal year of May 1, 1921, to April 30, 1922, when productions fell in scores by the wayside, it spent $14,202.22 for stranded companies. Equity not only acts as attorney for the actor in adjusting his claims with his employers; it also undertakes to guarantee the rights of the employer. If a member breaks his contract without notice, it is responsible for his penalty of two weeks' salary. It has reduced contract jumping by two-thirds. In short, Equity is concerned not merely with the question of hours and wages —with the latter it has, in fact, nothing whatever to do—but with regulating the working conditions of its members and preserving their morale—a fundamental necessity, one would say, to artistic success.

The matter of morale is at the root of two factors in the policy of Equity which have been most subject to questions and attack. One is the Equity shop, the other, affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. Both are matters of labor policy. The Equity shop is a provision by which members of Equity will work only in an all-Equity company. This does not mean that a manager is bound to employ only Equity members. He may send out as many non-Equity companies as he likes, but within the same company he may not have both union and non-union actors. Undoubtedly this rule operates as a means of pressure to induce actors to join Equity. It is, however, far from compulsion. And it is to be noted that as all actors, whether members or not, profit by the improvement of conditions and especially by the general use of the Equity contract, it would be a real danger to the organization to have its rank and onstant c with f llow actors who,
esponsibilities,

y the same privileges and status. Up to the esent time, however, the Equity shop has not been obligatory upon the members of the Producing Managers' Association—the strongest body of theatrical employers with which Equity has had to deal, of which more must be said later. It was this alignment of employers which forced the issue of Equity's affiliation with the Federation of Labor, and also brought organized labor to recognize the right of the actor, as a fellow worker, to its protection. By this association Equity gains support for legislation for the benefit of actors—who, few in numbers and largely disfranchised by the necessity of travel, possess little political influence. Above all it secured the intervention of a powerful ally in the critical moment of its history.

Equity did not secure its present position without a long series of negotiations and a fight. It was founded in May, 1913, at a meeting of some 300 actors. In 1914, it had 760 members; in 1915, 2,000. In 1916, application was made for membership in the A. F. of L., but was refused.
In 1919 Equity was strong enough to demand not only the acceptance but the fulfillment of its contract by the leading producers. Committees were appointed, meetings were held. At one of them a leading manager was asked: "Do you consider this contract fair?" He answered: "Absolutely."
"Will you use it?" "Yes, when you make me."
In this temper negotiations were broken off. A lockout was ordered and a strike called. According to the Equity view the lockout came first. In any event when Equity offered to arbitrate, and in a commendably generous spirit submitted the names of Messrs. Taft and Hughes as arbitrators, the managers refused. Then it was that the application to the Federation of Labor was renewed and accepted, and with the generalship of trained industrial strategists the battle was won.

Equity's settlement with the Producing Managers' Association was, however, a compromise.
By its terms the member firms of the Association were excepted from the operation of the Equity shop clause, and they do not have to bond their road companies, the guarantee of the Association being accepted. There is thus a certain inducement to producers to join the Producing Managers' Association, as for the actor to join Equity—a circumstance which should tend to stabilize conditions in the industry. The present agreement, however, expires in June, 1924, and already the lines of a new conflict are drawn. The chief point of opposition is in the proposal of Equity to end the exemption of the Producing Managers' Association from the Equity shop agreement. The reasons for the Equity shop have already been stated. Wha ssity of some international action. Here is eat, fertile and rich territory; our Congress continually reminded by voices within and out that an astonishing piracy on a huge scale ere being deliberately perpetrated. England is g the land from the natives, enslaving and ning them to native reserves and mistreating hem outrageously. One speaker said, "There is ample evidence to show that flogging and shooting of natives in that region have developed into a system. For trivial, imaginary and suspected offences a varying number of lashes with the 'reim' or the 'kiboko' is inflicted on the helpless and inarticulate natives. From time to time death ensues as a result of these brutalities. The verdicts invariably returned by the jury (composed exclusively of white settlers) are a scandal and the sentences imposed by the judges are in consequence utterly inadequate."

On top of this, the East Indians, pushing in here and demanding a share of this vast theft of land and exploitation of labor, are through the influence and fears of South Africa disfranchised politically and economically and are protesting against this with the utmost vigor and indignation. How singular, this threefold battle, and how impossible is a West Coast native growth here, with its foundation in native land ownership!

As to the great valley of the Congo in th and black forests of Belgian sovereignty there was almost complete silence in our Congress. The Union Congolaise, an organization of black men in Belgium and Belgian Africa, had nothing to suggest but the erection at the mouth of the Congo of a great memorial statue to the black soldiers who died in the Great War! I fear such a stone figure would look with tears upon even the reformed régime in the Congo! The fundamental conception of the Congo as a place where capital can make huge profits by using labor of the cheapest price and driving it by physical force still seems dominant.

Our French group sent the assistant secretary of our organization, resident in Paris, and one member of the Bureau Permanent. But French Negrodom is at once the most inactive and at the same time the most inspiring part of our movement. Inspiring because France has gone further, much further, in recognizing the manhood of black folk than any other white nation. One West African girl told me at the Congress of her isolation in British Africa, as an educated woman, between the natives and the British official rulers, but of the joy and naturalness of social intercourse in French Senegal where she went to visit her uncle.

Here then is France challenging the rest of the white world by bidding for the military and industrial support of black men. England, America and white Europe are aghast at the prospect. What can they do?

They have one clear path along which France points: Make black Englishmen, black Americans and Belgian Congolese have cause to believe in the justice of their countries and the possibility of developing real black manhood under their flags. France has played this trump card.

As was natural, America dominated the Third Pan-African Congress with the attempt to spread the results of her experience in organized fighting. A black bishop of a church body which has three-fourths of a million American blacks spoke to us and told us that he was on his way to dedicate a school in Basutoland, given by the colored women of Ohio!

We were not a large group at this Third Congress—only thirteen countries and six American states as against thirty countries in 1921. But we have, I believe, weathered a natural crisis of growth in a time of universal industrial crisis and we can look forward to a Congress in the West Indies in 1925 in the midst of the growing a

...e Executive Committee of the Third Pan-African Congress, meeting in London and Lisbon in November, 1923, regards the following matters as those which seem to them to embody the legitimate and immediate needs of the peoples of African descent.

1. A voice in their own government. 2. The right of access to the land and its resources. 3. Trial by juries of their peers under established forms of law. 4. Free elementary education for all; broad training in modern industrial technique; and higher training of selected talent. 5. The development of Africa for the benefit of Africans, and not merely for the profit of Europeans. 6. The abolition of the slave trade and of the liquor traffic. 7. World disarmament and the abolition of war; but failing this, and as long as white folk bear arms against black folk, the right of blacks to bear arms in their own defence. 8. The organization of commerce and industry so as to make the main objects of capital and labor the welfare of the many, rather than the enriching of the few.

These seem to us the eight general and irreducible needs of our people.

Specifically and in particular we ask for the civilized British subjects in West Africa and in the West Indies the institution of home rule and responsible government, without discrimination as to race and color.

We ask for such areas as Northern Nigeria, Uganda and Basutoland, a development of native law, industry and education with the specific object of training them in home rule and economic independence and for eventual participation in the general government of the land.

We ask for French Africa the extension of the citizenship rights of voting and of representation in Parliament from Senegal and the West Indies to other parts of the colonies as rapidly as the present comprehensive plans of education can be realized.

Babbitt at Angkor

WE bought Babbitt at Singapore. The ends of the earth meet at Singapore, and in Kelly, Walsh's admirable book shop on Raffles' Square a whole importation of Babbitt piled itself comfortably alongside The Ramayana. The Ramayana was part of our Indian luggage; Babbitt we dropped into our bags without much thinking what we were doing, we two Americans whose taste for vanished civilizations had brought us half way round the world to see the ruined cities and temples of Cambodia.—Afterwards the irony of destiny overtook us for carrying Main Street to Angkor.

Melancholy country Cambodia, with a sinister spell even in the sunshine: swamp and marshland edged endlessly by bush jungle and inhabited by long-legged cranes and water-buffaloes and a humble little brown people who live half in, half out of the water, too. toward the formation of the much-needed cooperative wholesale.

Who would have believed, a few years ago, that three non-profit-seeking cooperatives of several thousand members each could succeed in the heart of competitive business, New York City? Is it not interesting to know that there are two cooperative restaurants flourishing in the Wall Street section and two in the uptown business district? They serve 65,000 meals a month. "Our Cafeteria," now known as Cooperative Services, Inc., started less than four years ago. It has had a calm, steady growth, nothing very spectacular. Yet the 1,900 members, who have received $14,000 in savings-returns in addition to 6 per cent interest on their capital stock, will tell you that there is a demand for cooperative service even in gay New York. A recent addition to their activities has been the Cooperative Laundry, which is washing 1,500 bundles of its members' cloth[illegible]thly at a distinct saving.

Some of these were organized by union bakers who despaired of ever getting better wages and conditions through legislation. Strikes, too, had been of little effect. So the workers started to finance and run their own bakeries. They sold shares also to the consumers. As a result the working class as a whole has benefited. The presence of the "co-op" in many a town has driven down the prices of competing private bakers, day by day. And in time of strike, for instance, the great textile strike of 1922, 170,000 loaves of bread were sent from the cooperative bakeries in Massachusetts to the strikers' food kitchen.

Throughout the land there is a growing understanding of cooperation. Two training-schools for cooperative employees and executives are running annual courses of six weeks each. The colleges and special schools are giving increasing time to courses in cooperation. Spurious, fraudulent, and fanciful schemes have been put out of business by publicity, by court proceedings, or forced to the wall bankrupt. Henceforth they will have little chance of securing a foothold in the United States. Americans are beginning to know real cooperation from "fake."

Cooperators in this country are at last building solidly and laying deep foundations. Most countries have built a cooperative movement first and later sought to add a cooperative culture. In the United States we are building a culture upon which to found the growing movement. We shall succeed. But we must work everlastingly to make ourselves bigger than our problems.

[illegible]he Primitive Black Man

By W. E. BURGHARDT Du BOIS

I BEGAN to notice it as I entered southern France. I formulated it in Portugal. I knew it as a great truth one Sunday in Liberia. And the Great Truth was this: efficiency and happiness do not go together in modern culture. Going south from London, as the world darkens it gets happier. Portugal is deliciously dark. Many leading citizens would have difficulty keeping off a Georgia "Jim Crow" car. But, oh, how lovely a land and how happy a people! And so leisurely. Little use of trying to shop seriously in Lisbon before 11. It isn't done. Nor at noon; the world is lunching or lolling in the sun. Even after 4 p. m. one takes chances, for the world is in the Rocio. And the banks are so careless and the hotels so leisurely. How delightfully angry Englishmen get at the "damned, lazy" Portuguese!

But if this of Portugal, what of Africa? Here darkness descends and rests on lovely skins until brown seems so luscious and natural. There is sunlight in great gold globules and soft, heavy-scented heat that wraps you like a garment. And laziness; divine, eternal languor is right and good and true.

I remember the morning. It was Sunday, and the night before we heard the leopards crying down there. Today beneath the streaming sun we went down into the gold-green forest. It was silence—silence the more mysterious because life abundant and palpitating pulsed all about us and held us drowsy captives to the day. Ahead the gaunt missionary strode, alert, afire, with his gun. He apologized for the gun, but he did not need to apologize to me, for I saw the print of a leopard's hind foot. A monkey sentinel piped, and I heard the whir of the horde as they ran.

Then we came to the village. How can I describe it? Neither London nor Paris nor New York has anything of its delicate, precious beauty. It was a town of the Veys and done in cream and pale purple—still, clean, restrained, tiny, complete. It was so simple and quiet there in the great wide world. Its arms were wide—it was no selfish place, but the central abode of fire and hospitality, was clean-swept for wayfarers, and the best seats were bare. They quite expected visitors, morning, noon, and night; and they gave our hands a quick, soft grasp and talked easily. Their manners were better than those of Park Lane or Park Avenue, Rittenhouse Square or the North Shore. Oh, much better and more natural! They showed breeding.

The chief's son—tall and slight and speaking good English—had served the late Colonel Young. He made a little speech of welcome. Long is the history of the Veys and comes down from the Eastern Roman Empire, the great struggle of Islam and the black empires of the Sudan.

We went on to other villages—dun colored, not so beautiful, but neat and hospitable. In one sat a visiting chief of perhaps fifty years in a derby hat and a robe, and beside him stood a shy young wife done in ebony and soft brown, whose liquid eyes could not meet ours. The chief was taciturn until we spoke of schools. Then he woke suddenly—he had children to "give" to a school. There was a pile of brown coffee heaped in the center of the village. I see the last village fading away: they are plastering the wall of a home, leisurely and carefully. They smiled a goodby—not effusively, with no eagerness, with simple friendship, as we glided under the cocoa trees and into the silent forest, the gold and silent forest.

And there and elsewhere in two long months I began to learn: Primitive men are not following us afar, frantically waving and seeking our goals; primitive men are not behind us in some swift foot-race. Primitive men have arrived. They are abreast, and in places ahead of us; in others behind. But all their curving advance line is contemporary, not prehistoric. They have used other paths and these paths have led them by scenes sometimes fairer, sometimes uglier than ours, but always toward the Pools of Happiness. Or, to put it otherwise, these folks have the leisure of true aristocracy—leisure for thought and courtesy, leisure for sleep and laughter. They have time for their children—such well-trained, beautiful children with perfect, unhidden bodies. Have you ever met a crowd of children in the east of London or New York, or even on the Avenue at Forty-second or 142nd Street, and fled to avoid their impudence and utter ignorance of courtesy? Come to Africa and see well-bred and courteous children, playing happily and never sniffling and whining.

I have read everywhere that Africa means sexual license. Perhaps it does. Most folk who talk sex frantically have all too seldom revealed their source material. I was in West Africa only two months, but with both eyes wide. I saw children quite naked and women usually naked to the waist—with bare bosom and limbs. And in those sixty days I saw less of sex dalliance and appeal than I see daily on Fifth Avenue. This does not mean much, but it is an interesting fact.

The primitive black man is courteous and dignified. If the platforms of Western cities had swarmed with humanity as I have seen the platforms swarm in Senegal, the police would have a busy time. I did not see one respectable quarrel.

Wherefore shall we all take to the Big Bush? No. I prefer New York. But my point is that New York and London and Paris must learn of West Africa and may learn. The one great lack in Africa is communication—communication as represented by human contact, movement of goods, dissemination of knowledge. All these things we have—we have in such crushing abundance that they have mastered us and defeated their real good. We meet human beings in such throngs that we cannot know or even understand them—they become to us inhuman, mechanical, hateful. We are choked and suffocated, tempted and killed by goods accumulated from the ends of the earth; our newspapers and magazines so overwhelm us with knowledge—knowledge of all sorts and kinds from particulars as to our neighbors' underwear to Einstein's mathematics—that one of the great and glorious joys of the African bush is to escape from "news."

On the other hand, African life with its isolation has deeper knowledge of human souls. The village life, the forest ways, the teeming markets bring an intimate human knowledge that the West misses, sinking the individual in the social. Africans know infinitely fewer folk, but know them infinitely better. Their intertwined communal souls therefore brook no poverty or prostitution—these things are to them ununderstandable. On the other hand, they are vastly ignorant of what the world is doing and thinking and of what is known of its physical forces. They suffer terribly from preventable disease, from unnecessary hunger, from the freaks of the weather.

Here, then, is something for Africa and Europe both to learn; and Africa is eager, breathless, to learn—while Europe? Europe laughs with loud guffaws. Learn of Africa? Nonsense. Poverty cannot be abolished. Democracy and firm government are incompatible. Prostitution is world old and inevitable.

Whereupon Europe proceeds to one of two programs:

1. To force Africa into modern work-slavery by whip and gun.

2. To tempt Africa into work profitable to Europe by catering to her present wants.

And then across these programs with absolutely no reference to them logically or physically run the amazing missionary efforts.

The net result is disintegration. Disintegration toward death as in the Belgian Congo. Disintegration toward European life as in French Senegal. Disintegration toward modern machine methods as in Sierra Leone. Disintegration by absorption into another group as in Liberia, where the new Liberian is more and more of native blood and American training.

Most people would disagree with the attempt to force Africa into work slavery and assume that this program is obsolete in Africa. It is not. It is, on the whole, the main and predominant program. On the other hand, the second program of catering to the wants of Africa may be good and may be bad, and is usually bad. Everything depends upon which wants are catered to, and how they are catered to, and with what objects and ideals. One may cater to the wish for alcoholic stimulants by synthetic gin, or one may cater to the need of knowledge by establishing schools; and between these two runs the gamut of the universe. As a matter of fact, what one does cater to is to those wants the satisfaction of which makes the largest profit for the importer. And one does this without any reference to the ultimate effect upon the people. One copies the beautiful cloth patterns of the West African artisan and his dyes, and floods West Africa with machine-made garments, beautiful and striking in many ways, but far less beautiful, of course, than the native garment, and at the same time driving the native artisan out of the market.

What shall one do? Here again one must do the thing most profitable to the importer. Bring down palm oil and ivory and wild rubber. All this beginning of trade and intercourse with the modern world is a matter which ought to call for the wisest thought and most far-seeing philanthropy. It is left today in the hands of the most selfish and ignorant white traders. One could envisage in West Africa a missionary effort that would uplift the world: trained physicians and nurses, masters of industrial processes guided by ideals which make industry cater to human development and uplift; wise men trained in anthropology and history to observe and copy the ancient and in many respects magnificent native organizations; and teachers who know how to teach.

Black Folk and Birth Control

By W. E. B. DuBois, Ph. D.
Professor of Sociology, Atlanta University

THE American Negro has been going through a great period of stress, not only in this depression, but long before it. His income is reduced by ignorance and prejudice and his former tradition of early marriage and large families has put grave strain on a budget on which he was seeking, not merely to maintain, but to improve his standard of living.

As slaves, every incentive was furnished to raise the largest number of children possible. The chief surplus crop of Virginia and other border States consisted of this natural increase of slaves and it was realized in the consequent slave trade to feed the plantations of the lower South and Southwest. Frederick Bancroft has shown us that this trade, in the decade 1850-60, involved average annual sales of nearly 80,000 human beings, representing $100,000,000 of capital.

Even then birth control was secretly exercised by the more intelligent slaves, as we know from many reminiscences.

After emancipation, there arose the inevitable clash of ideals between those Negroes who were striving to improve their economic position and those whose religious faith made the limitation of children a sin. The result, among the more intelligent class, was a postponement of marriage, which greatly decreased the number of children. Today, among this class of Negroes, few men marry before thirty, and numbers of them after forty. The marriage of women of this class has similarly been postponed.

In addition to this, the low incomes which Negroes receive make bachelorhood and spinsterhood widespread, with the naturally resultant lowering, in some cases, of sex standards. On the other hand, the mass of ignorant Negroes still breed carelessly and disastrously, so that the increase among Negroes, even more than the increase among whites, is from that part of the population least intelligent and fit, and least able to rear their children properly.

There comes, therefore, the difficult and insistent problem of spreading among Negroes an intelligent and clearly recognized concept of proper birth control, so that the young people can marry, have companionship and natural health, and yet not have children until they are able to take care of them. This, of course, calls for a more liberal attitude among Negro churches. The churches are open for the most part to intelligent propaganda of any sort, and the American Birth Control League and other agencies ought to get their speakers before church congregations and their arguments in the Negro newspapers. As it is, the mass of Negroes know almost nothing about the birth control movement, and even intelligent colored people have a good many misapprehensions and a good deal of fear at openly learning about it. Like most people with middle-class standards of morality, they think that birth control is inherently immoral.

Moreover, they are quite led away by the fallacy of numbers. They want the black race to survive. They are cheered by a census return of increasing numbers and a high rate of increase. They must learn that among human races and groups, as among vegetables, quality and not mere quantity really counts.

Army Bars Mixed Marriages, Sanctions Illegitimate Babies!

(Defender Washington Bureau)

WASHINGTON—The U. S. War Department this week admitted in effect that it sanctions illegitimate children rather than allow interracial marriages!

Official army policy stands pat in its refusal to allow a Negro soldier to marry a white British woman, although he is the father and she the mother of an expectant baby.

"Such marriages are considered to be against the best interests of the parties concerned and of the service," is the army's position as expressed by Col. James D. Givens, deputy commander of the Army Air Forces in Europe.

This view is supported by Major General J. A. Ulio, adjutant general of the War Department, who declares that final word on mixed marriages is up to theater commanders.

The Defender exclusively presents this week documentary evidence of how the War Department policy is preventing an American Negro soldier from giving his name to [illegible] child.

Morals

Both the British girl and her parents also, with the Negro soldier, who must remain unnamed because his parents are under the impression that he is married, appealed for permission to go through with the marriage.

Six high army officials in the Air Corps rejected the appeal which said in these moving words: "The highest morals in the world are Christian morals and our religion teaches us to assume our responsibilities in marriage. I am the father of our expected child and it is morally right for me to provide a home for the child and the mother."

Rejection of the appeal confirmed long-time unofficial reports that official army policy bars interracial marriages in Britain—even though it means that a child will be born illegitimately.

British Problem

Children born out of wedlock are resulting in a complicated British problem, which authorities have been grappling with in vain for some months. Many British churchmen have privately condemned the stand of the U. S. War Department in virtually sanctioning the birth of illegitimate babies rather than allow white women to marry colored soldiers.

The Defender's documentary evidence marks the first occasion in which written proof has been presented that the army is officially barring interracial marriages despite the fact that this rule conflicts sharply with all church doctrines and all codes of morals.

The 22-year-old Negro soldier, who is Protestant and comes from New Jersey, filed his application for permission to marry an 18-year-old British girl of Catholic faith back on November 11, 1945. In his original letter he asked that the army waive the usual two-month waiting period because of the coming birth of an expected child.

A letter from the girl and her parents granting their approval accompanied the application.

One month later on December 11, 1944, the application was returned marked "Disapproved." Signing the refusal to allow the marriage was Lt. Col Charles H. Campbell, adjutant general.

The Negro private then made his touching appeal of the verdict addressing it to the commanding general of the European Theatre of Operations. Replying bluntly to the reason given by the adjutant general that "such action is against public policy," the Negro soldier declares that the decision was made purely because of his race.

"Whose public policy does it refer to?" asks the private. "Certainly not England's. There is no law forbidding racial intermarriage in England. Nor does it refer to the uniform policy of the United States. There is no federal law against it and if my case were brought before the Supreme Court I would be upheld in accordance with the Constitution. There are many states which permit marriage between the races and my own state, New Jersey, is one of them." Then the private continues: "It is interference with the divine order or marriage as well as personal freedom of choice to forbid my marriage to the girl I love and to whom I desire to fulfill my moral responsibility. Both of us understand what we are doing. We know that there are those who do not approve and who, because of their lack of humanity, would impose hardships and embarrassments upon us. We have considered this and still want to be married. We love each other, have obligations to each other and we see no reason why we should not be permitted to marry as normal people."

Policy Not Changed

The appeal was forwarded to higher officers with the notation: "EM (colored) desires to marry white girl."

On January 11, two months after his original application, the Negro private received final word from the commander of the U. S. Strategic Air Forces in Europe, Col. Givens, that "the policy of this headquarters regarding mixed marriages has not been changed." The officer refused to send the application to higher headquarters because of refusal of approval in a "somewhat similar case."

SOLDIER BURNED TO DEATH WITH 1100 PRISONERS

Charred Remains Taken From Murder Barn At Gardelegen

GARDELEGEN, Germany — An American Negro soldier was one of 1,100 victims brutally burned to death in an old barn near here by teen-age Nazis in one of the most bestial exhibitions of the present war.

The soldier, known only as "John," had allegedly been confined with the political prisoners he died with because of his frequent attempts to escape. Survivors questioned by American army officers following the Allied break-through reported that the political prisoners had been hunted like deer before the arrival of U. S. troops.

The Volkssturm (People's Army), assisted by the Jugend (Hitler Youth), was ca[illegible] the massacre w[illegible] a large barn [illegible] unfortunate prisoners were shot, others burned. Although some of the Nazis who took part in the mass murders have been apprehended and others have been suicides, the ringleaders are still at large.

It is said that the Negro soldier and the other prisoners were murdered because Nazi party leaders considered them a threat to the personal safety of their Nazi superiors if liberated.

The Gardelegen incident is by no means the first instance of a Negro soldier being brutally murdered by the Nazis. The bodies of a large number of Negro members of the Third Army were found in the Rhine area recently where they had been shot through the head by Nazi SS troops.

Delegates Juggle Colonial Question; White, DuBois Ask Equality Of Races

By METZ T. P. LOCHARD
(Editor-in-Chief, Chicago Defender)

SAN FRANCISCO — The flood of oratory which marked the first days of the world security conference here has now subsided and the parley has settled down to the essential business of tackling its main problem — the shape of the structure of the future peace.

An impressive number of international experts voice the view that the colonial issue contains the potential seeds of another world conflict. Partly on account of indispensable raw materials which abound in some of the colonies and the inevitable mad scrambling for such a market by the Big Powers at the close of the present war, and partly on account of irresistible urge and greed for territorial expansion together with economic and political sphere of influence.

Important as this question seems, there is up to this moment no positive assurance that it will be posed in the full light of its admitted implications. While it is being whispered in hotel lobbies by ultra-cautious delegates, it is yet a deep mystery as to what delegation, where and when the colonial question shall be raised.

All Duck Issue

Russia, though sympathetic, cannot with propriety stir the question. For one thing she has no colonies, and for another her political system does not countenance such a plan.

China is, of course, concerned with her right to reclaim Hong Kong, Manchuria and Singapore.

America is interested in the military fortification of bases already conquered in the Pacific and such

SAN FRANCISCO — Two Negro consultants asked the United States delegation this week to demand an "equality for all races" declaration in the world organization charter before the United Nations Conference.

Dr. W. E. B. DuBois and Walter White of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People asked that these three provisions be written into the Dumbarton Oaks proposals:

1. Equality for all races.
2. A bill of rights for all the people of the world.
3. Abolition of the colonial system in favor of an international agency to which the colonial powers would report.

Liberia has a small nation council plan.

Small nations have an even greater stake in working for world security than the large countries, Clarence L. Simpson, chairman of the Liberian delegation, declared.

For that reason the Liberian delegates will seek enlargement of the proposed security council to include a greater number of secondary nations.

Ask Fair Selection

Mr. Simpson also disclosed his government's plan for a fair selection of smaller nations to serve two-year terms on the security council, which is an alphabetical arrangement, giving every country an opportunity to be represented in turn.

Mr. Simpson, a serious young man, is fully aware that this is his nation's opportunity to speak while the world is listening. He has been

SAN FRANCISCO—Among the 46 nations at the United Nations conference, which are likely to support the proposal for world trusteeship over the colonies to provide for advancement of colonial peoples?

This question is likely to be answered in the next few days in view of recent efforts to speed the work of the conference and the definite decision by the U. S. delegation on its particular stand.

Secretary of State Edward Stettinius' announcement at his first press conference that the question had been settled and that the United States was prepared to discuss the question may be taken to mean that the Army, Navy and State Department have agreed on some proposal that will be presented when the question arises.

It is hoped that the position of the State Department prevails. It is believed that the State Department is favorable to the establishment of a colonial body with considerably more authority than the old mandates commission of the League of Nations. The Army and Navy reportedly had asked for unilateral control over dependent territories. They have not raised the questions of mandated areas and other dependent areas except under the control of the Japanese.

Looks to China

When the question arises to whom can the colonial peoples look to champion their hopes? Who will befriend the predominantly colored people who inhabit colonial areas?

First, I think the Chinese delegation will be prepared to argue for the expansion of the trusteeship principle. The Chinese have vital interests at stake and want to share fully in whatever setup for Asia comes out of the war. They want to participate in the controls established to demilitarize Japan and prevent future Japanese aggression. They want freedom of trade to set up businesses in countries of southeast Asia now in control of Europeans.

Foreign Minister T. V. Soong greeted reporters at the airfield to meet his plane with the statement that he most certainly was in favor of trusteeship for dependent peoples.

For several reasons it is important to have Dr. Soong on our side. Namely, he is one of the four chairmen of the steering committee, which decides the policy for the commissions and committees that are the working force of the conference organization. He is a representative of new capitalist in China, and a member of one of China's wealthiest families.

Among other delegations from the Pacific area, the Philippine group, headed by General Carlos Romulo, resident commissioner in Washington, can be counted on not only to favor a colonial commission with considerable authority but will also speak for an interna-

Color Line Absent At Frisco, DuBois Finds

By W. E. B. DuBOIS
(Official Consultant, American Delegation to United Nations Conference)

SAN FRANCISCO — I attended the opening plenary session of the United Nations Conference on International Organization. We sat in a great opera house, built as a memorial to the soldiers who, as the Mayor of San Francisco said, "died in vain" in the first world war.

Before us rose four golden columns against a cerulian blue background with three festoons drooping between, and the massed brilliance of the flags of 46 nations.

Down below as the blue-green podium, with green garlands, and above and at the sides leered the golden masks of tragedy and comedy. On the mezzanine floor was massed the press with its machines, races and sects of the world, snapping and grinding. Its engineers ran crouching to and fro, up and down the aisles. In the seats under blazing lights were all types of mankind, all languages and shades of color. Arabia and China, India and Africa were conspicuous, Latin-America and all Europe and America.

Franklin Roosevelt was curiously absent. God lacks a sense of drama, otherwise he would have let the dead President make here his last speech and appearance. There, too, was an absence of music. A military band screeched intermittently, but no one listened. It may have been playing national anthems, but I could not hear. A great music of organs and trumpets ought to have sounded, but there was severe simplicity, perhaps even a little over done. Only one fine note, and that was the minute of silent meditation.

The ceremonies were rather con-

House Gets Petition To Halt Filibuster On FEP

By VENICE T. SPRAGGS
(Defender Washington Bureau)

WASHINGTON, D. C. — Provoked to action by the continued disgraceful horseplay of the House Rules Committee, Rep. Mary T. Norton (D., N. J.), took to the saddle herself in a determined fight to get her bill for a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission to the House floor.

By-passing the hostile committee, which she indicted as being "very, very unfair" to the Labor Committee of which she is chairman, the veteran dean of congresswomen placed a petition to discharge the bill on the speaker's desk.

In the first hour-and-a-half, 59 of the required 218 members signed the petition. Only 10 of these were Republicans. Mrs. Norton expressed confidence that the petition will have the required number of names in record time.

The bill has been before the Rules Committee for more than two months. For three days Southern Tory Democrats, joined by equally reactionary Republican fellow committeemen, engaged in talking the bill to death. Chairman Sabath (D., Ill.), proved himself no match for the smirking Southerners, whom he leaned over backwards to appease. Indeed, he found himself in the end an unsuspecting victim of their chancery and admitted his inability to get the committee to vote a rule.

Rep. Baldwin (R., N. Y.), a staunch supporter of the FEPC measure, predicted that either by action of the Rules Committee, which an unconfirmed rumor asserts President Harry S. Truman is prodding into action, or through

Urge More Mixed Combat Units

NEW YORK.—Mixed Negro and white combat units in every branch of the armed forces were urged this week by more than 50 civic, government, labor, religious and fraternal leaders.

These colored and white leaders joined with Cong. Adam Clayton Powell Jr., Congresswoman Helen Gahagan Douglas, Mrs. Mary McLeod Bethune and Henrietta Buckmaster in a declaration to President Harry Truman and the Secretary of War praising the Army's organization of mixed combat units on the western front. The extension of this policy was asked.

Among other signers of the declaration, according to the National Negro Congress, were Rev. Stephen H. Fritchman, Lewis Merrill, Max Yergan, Howard Fast and Arthur Huff Fauset.

Probe Of Major League Jim Crow Due; Czar Silent

(Defender Washington Bureau)

WASHINGTON—Rep. Vito Marcantonio of New York this week introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives authorizing the Commerce Department to investigate alleged racial discrimination in major league baseball.

"Baseball is America's greatest sport," Marcantonio said, "and it is silly to pretend that Negroes are not among the best players, when we have a Negro, Joe Louis, as our boxing champion; Jesse Owens was one of our greatest track stars, and Paul Robeson and others have been outstanding college football players." The New York legislator calls the attitude of baseball, "contrary to American sportsmanship," and added, "I think the feeling is artificial. I am sure that if a Negro hit a home run he would get just as much applause as anyone else."

One of the first questions put to Sen. Albert B. "Happy" Chandler following his appointment as czar of baseball concerned the discrimination because of race stand of organized baseball. Answered the commissioner: "I have no knowledge of discrimination in fact."

101 Jailed Airmen Freed, Transferred To Ky. Base

WASHINGTON — The 101 Negro airmen, arrested at Freeman Field, Ind., for their refusal to sign a Jim Crow order, were cleared of all charges and freed by the War Department this week.

Twenty-four hours after their release, the 477th Bombardment Group, to which they are attached, was transferred to Godman Field in Kentucky, Col. Robert R. Selway, who issued the Jim Crow order, is still in command of the 477th, only Negro bomber squadron in the Air Forces, it was reported.

The mass release leaves only three officers still under arrest, Lts. Shirley B. Clinton, Roger C. Terry and Mardsden A. Thomason. The NAACP is pressing for their release and has indicated that if they are brought to trial legal counsel will be supplied by the association. Judge William H. Hastie will be chief counsel for the men, and Theodore Berry of the Cincinnati NAACP will be associate counsel.

World Watches U.S. Handling Of Negro As Key To Future

When Peace Comes...What?

By ROBERT REDFIELD

Robert E. Park used to say that the American Negro became successively a population, a folk, and a race.

Imported from Africa with native traditions interrupted, the Negro arrived here as so many human beings, as so many laborers. Without common language or customs, these men and women were at first a mere population.

Thereupon, in the relative isolation of the plantations but with the raw materials of living provided by white men and with whatever vestiges of African life remained, the Negro developed the only important American folk life.

Later, as education and sophistication gave him awareness of his position and the will to change it, he became conscious of the cause for which he would, and must, struggle. And so he became a race, not in the anthropological sense, but in the sociological sense of an ethnic group conscious of its distinct nature and common interests.

This remark was probably first made by Park more than a score of years ago. When he first made it, the problem of the American Negro was thought of as a problem of the United States. It was recognized as the outstanding social problem of this country.

The important change that has occurred since that time is the conversion of this local and national problem into an international, a world-wide problem.

When Peace Comes...What?

So perhaps now it may be said that the American Negro has undergone yet another change. Perhaps it may now be said that the Negro has become an international responsibility. He is a responsibility to all men of all racial origins who want a peaceful and a just world. And he is a new responsibility to himself. For his conduct, and the solutions reached as to his problem, now stand, as a symbol, for all men who are denied justice and equality, in all parts of the world.

We might also say that whereas a generation ago the Negro has become, in the sense explained, a race, he will be, after this war, the race. He will be, at least, the most critical and symbolically significant case of a people denied full participation in human civil and political rights because of race.

Two Plans of Living

In this world, two plans of human living contend, as never before, for supremacy. One plan denies human rights, adopts expediency as its rule, and makes the individual a mere means to the strength of the state or an imagined dominant "race." The other plan extols human rights, adopts moral principle as its rule, and places the human individual above state or imagined "race."

The end of the war will not see the end of the struggle between these two ways of living. It will rather bring about a re-definition of the struggle between them.

During the war the totalitarian states fight for the first plan, and the United Nations, on the whole, represent the other plan. But everybody knows that within the United Nations there is internal struggle between these two plans of living. The end of the war will remove the immediate and obvious adversary of the democratic and liberal way of life.

As another result, it will make plain to view the internal struggle. The struggle between the two plans for living will be seen for what, more lastingly, it is: a struggle that goes on within every nation, every community, every heart. It will be seen to be both local and international, both personal and global.

Symbol of Conflict

The American Negro will lie across the battleground between these two plans for human living. No other group anywhere in the world presents so sharp a conflict between the ideal of democracy, the proposition that all men are created equal, and the great qualifying fact of injustice and prejudice.

This country, great in power and paramount in democratic leadership, is the same country that cannot solve the problems of its own persisting racially directed injustices.

The American Negro will receive the anxious gaze of struggling minorities in every land, and the American white man will have upon his conscience a wrong that works against not only himself but against his fellow men who stand, in other communities, for the democratic and liberal way of life. As Paul Robeson said, the cause of the American Negro has become part of the struggle against fascism.

Interests Clash

It will not be seen to be so by most men, white or Negro. As the white man will seek to preserve social arrangements which are easy and comfortable and convenient to him, so the Negro will seek to change them, not in the interests of all men, white and Negro, but in order to get some immediate advantage for himself.

The Negro too will see the short-run interests, will cry out with the immediate pain. He will follow the political leader who promises him a better job even if the leader be corrupt. He will see the white returned soldier take the job which he, the Negro, held during the war, and he will nurse his natural anger or vent it in mere expressions of bitterness.

So, too, the white man will seek to restore the Negro to the positions of social and economic subordination which he occupied in the local communities before the war. "The laws of biology will reassert themselves after the war," writes a southern editor.

The conflict will be felt, on the whole, as many local struggles, as so many little unconnected attempts of a subjected minority to wrest an increment of material security from a dominating group. It will be in part blind, in part clouded with fear or resentment. In part it will go on as it has always gone on.

And yet, in ever increasing part, it will be understood by those of both races who are thoughtful, and who read and reflect, that this is no longer a matter of who gets what somebody else has and hasn't enough of himself. It will be more and more seen to be a conflict, not between white and Negro, but between free and slave, between men of good will, of all races, and men of power, of all races.

It will be recognized as a part of the great effort toward a decision as to whether the world will be ruled by expediency or by principles of justice, by what serves me, or by what serves all men. Insofar as Americans, Negroes and whites, see the problem of the American Negro in these terms, we shall go forward toward the right.

Dubois—

spicuously American, English; no other tongue was heard, no allusion to their cultures. There came in first 17 young folk in military dress: soldiers, sailors, WACs, WAVES and SPARS.

I was sorry there was no colored face among them. It would have been a world-wide gesture of significance, if some one had thought of that, but there were a number of things here unthought of. Four men sat on the platform, and a voice. The young white-haired Edward Stettinius presided.

Where Are Colonies?

The President of the United States spoke from Washington in a flat mid-western voice; clear, not altogether logical in sequence, but stressing on the whole what needed to be stressed. We represent here the overwhelming majority of all mankind — do we? Where are the colonies? The Governor of California, that astute politician, made a conventional speech, the best speech of the day in thought and diction was that of the Mayor of San Francisco.

Then Stettinius welcomed the conference, and said two words: "Always the West has meant Future" and "We meet on the ocean named Peace."

The audience in all the short, but simple ceremony was tense. It was composed of older people. There were bald heads and gray hair; many women. There were few soldiers and no youth. Outside, the masses craned their necks and stared. They cheered Russian Foreign Minister Molotov, but no one else. They eagerly sought glimpses of other celebrities.

Plenty of Color

Naturally I looked for color. It was there, and one the whole conspicuous. To my consternation I came near being photographed with the Indian delegation. Three hand-picked stooges of Great Britain, one turbaned: but I escaped. I saw the Vice President of Liberia but did not see the Ethiopians. The Arabians were distinctly Negroid.

American Negroes appeared by magic as I walked down the steps of the opera house. There was the president of Howard university and Rayford Logan. There were the editors of the Chicago Defender and the Pittsburgh Courier. Noble Sissle was there, Mrs. Bethune and Mr. White, and representatives of the National Baptist association. The city stood with open arms. They transported guests from the civic center to the hotels gratis and with smiling courtesy. There was no conspicuous evidence of the color line. Quite the contrary.

And so now we are on our way, and the world is in conference with arrangements near perfection for hearing and listening over all the globe. There remains but the matter of knowing what to do and how to do it.

Durham—

Vice President of Liberia for more than a year.

Liberian delegation headquarters are in the Mark Hopkins Hotel.

San Francisco and the entire Bay Area has opened doors wide to the consultants, observers and press representatives, and others who are getting the Negro point of view across.

Stettinius Plea

So far, there has been a complete absence of discrimination in the arrangements made by the State Department. Negro consultants, observers and Negro press are housed indiscriminately.

Secretary of State Edward Stettinius in his opening remarks stressing the need for world amity declared:

"We have to work effectively, in close cooperation together toward rising standards of living and greater freedom, and opportunity for all peoples, of every race and creed and color."

The Federal Council of Churches is represented here by Baptist Rev. Horace of Monumental Baptist church and Rev. J. C. Austin of Pilgrim Baptist church, both of Chicago. Dr. Mordecai Johnson, president of Howard University, is also a member of the church delegation, as unofficial observer.

Dr. Mary McLeod Bethune, president of the National Council of Negro Women, appointed by the State Department as a consultant to the conference, presented her view in a statement which said:

Big Opportunity

"The Negro in America has an unprecedented opportunity in the San Francisco parley on World Security to lift his sights to encompass a world view of the problems of peace, and to think in unison with the representatives of forty-six nations on the most effective means of settling national differences, of adjudicating all national and international grievances justly and equitably.

"This opportunity challenges the Negro not only to broaden his personal viewpoint, but to establish, on a firmer basis, the elevation of his own status in America.

"Through this conference, the Negro becomes closely allied with all the darker races of the world, but more importantly he becomes integrated into the structure of the peace and freedom of all people everywhere.

Voice of Minority

"I am particularly interested in the trend of thought of the darker peoples of the world who are no longer a numerical minority. One of the big questions of the conference will be how best to set up machinery for the inclusion of all small and dependent peoples whose status is undetermined, yet whose voice is needed in clinching a durable peace.

"It is heartening and unique that we are, in contrast to the pattern of all previous wars, striking boldly while yet in the agony and suffering of a war-torn world, for the design of a lasting peace.

"I am sending out a meditative petition for wisdom, guidance, good judgment and courage for all the heads of our great nations who must unitedly make the decisions at this history-making World Conference."

Indian Speaks

Sir A. Ramaswami Mudalier, Chief of the Indian delegation, told the third plenary session of the conference that the proposed world organization could not secure the necessary co-operation of the world's nations unless it is based upon the clear principles of justice, equality, and respect for the fundamental rights of all human beings.

He said that in all the talk about the prevention of aggression for world security and the use of force in suppressing aggressors, "We must not forget the causes of war are the economic and social inequalities that exist between nations and races."

He made a plea for the recognition of the part that India has played in the fight against our enemies.

He said that there were two and a half million Indians under arms and that the size of this great army was next the size only to the armies of the four sponsoring nations of the conference—China, Great Britain, Russia, and the United States.

He made passing reference to the Indian demands for independence, saying, "I believe in sovereign rights as much as anybody, but the world has come to the state where the emphasis is not on independence but in interdependence."

other outposts she may be able to obtain by grant or concessions by the Dutch and the Portugese for defensive purposes.

What then of Liberia, Ethiopia, and Haiti? The colonial question is essentially a question of the darker races. Will the delegates from the dark countries take it upon themselves to propose drastic revision of the colonial system and remove the yoke of oppression from the necks of the subject people? The prospects are not very bright for such a proposal to come from those quarters.

Haiti Muffs Chance

The delegates from Liberia, Ethiopia and Haiti display a shocking lack of aggressiveness and vigor. One of them, the Haitians, passed up a splendid opportunity last Saturday to address the plenary session of the conference which was presided over by Vice-Commissar V. M. Molotov, chairman of the Russian delegation. The failure to speak in their turn before the full membership of the United Nations delegations, accredited observers and representatives of every important newspaper in the world, is considered by many as having doomed any frontal attack on the question of the colonies.

The Ethiopian delegates are worried lest credentials are not in order—because Haile Selassie has not expressed as yet his nation's official sympathies on the death of President Roosevelt. The Emperor issued the credentials to these delegates in Addis Ababa, and then he left on a trip to the southern part of Ethiopia where, for the past three weeks, it has been impossible to communicate with him. The Ethiopians are wondering whether they are legally accredited to a nation in mourning in view of the fact that their country has not paid its proper respects.

Indians Quiet

By general consensus, the very nature of the composition of the Indian delegation makes it hopelessly ineffective. For, it is consisted of three British Knights, who will veto any resolution that is critical of the British Empire colonial policy. At a recent press conference, Mrs. Vijaya Pandit, the sister of Jawaharlal Nehru, described them as having not the slightest representative capacity, no sanction of mandate from any responsible groups in India. "They are," she said, "the nominees of the British Government."

The only remaining possibility lies with the French who have given notice of their intention to sponsor a broader plan of democratic administration of their colonials as recommended by the late governor-general of French Equatorial Africa, Felix Eboue.

Should France introduce the question, then it is likely that the discussion will take place in one of the committees forcing an examination of the following points: (1) Establishment of a colonial commission, (2) The right to investigate grievances and claims independent of the colonial government, (3) the right of native population to petition the commission for redressing overt acts, and (4) A time limit for complete autonomy of colonial peoples.

tional bill of rights containing a racial equality clause.

In press interviews Romulo has already expressed pride in the example of the U. S. in setting a time period for developing the Filipinos to exercise the right of self-determination. This example has had a powerful influence throughout all Asia and because of Romulo's contact with the State Department, it seems reasonable to suppose that his statement has the authority of an actual U. S. decision.

Two other nations — Australia and New Zealand — both favor the establishment of colonial commission with broad powers. This was specifically stated by the Australia delegation's head deputy, Prime Minister F. M. Forde. Although his other proposals of amendment of the Dumbarton Oaks Charter bore an extremely negative and disruptive character, Forde said that his government favored such commission. However, his reasons are not far to seek. Australia has maintained from the beginning of war that victory and peace is won only through coalition effort.

Claims Share of Glory

The Canberra government has been piqued by the tendency of some United States circles to claim more than their share of glory for checking Japanese aggression. Prime Minister Curtin leaves no one in doubt that his government is prepared to assert claims to full participation in the post-war set-up in the Pacific.

For the same reasons New Zealand's delegation will be found backing a colonial commission. Australia and New Zealand have a regional security pact which was signed at Canberra last year. Their policies on trusteeship are virtually identical.

However, the Netherland delegation will not be so friendly, for it controls over 70 million Indonesians. In a press statement Dr. Elco Van Kleffens, head of the Dutch delegation, said that the conference trusteeship principles are not applicable to some people because they were "free," having been given autonomous status by the Queen.

Role of French

Nor is it possible to assign a specific place to the French delegation with the colony of Indo-China in Asia and a majority of colonial land in Africa. Finance Minister Rene Pleven, formerly colonial minister, is not a delegation head, and will not be present on the steering committee. Whether the De Gaulle delegation is committed to policies formulated jointly with the late Felix Eboue cannot be determined at this time.

As for European nations, it is almost definite that three delegations representing the Soviet Union and two newly admitted Soviet Republics—the Ukraine and White Russia — will cast their votes in favor of colonial commission. This flows from the whole policy of Soviets which has been and remains to seek broadest unity of Allied nations in every phase war and post-war organization. If the unilateral principle of trusteeships are adopted, the Soviet republics would be frozen out without anything to say on vital economic and political problems inherent to the colonial situation.

As for Greece, Norway and Luxembourg, it is anybody's guess.

was called to draft in the form of a treaty the plan developed at Dumbarton Oaks for an international organization to keep the peace by force. In fact, that seems to be the only method by which greedy and land-hungry nations can be made to behave now: by force. We are not as yet civilized, it seems, beyond that point. Strange to note, two of the most peaceful nations in this world, yet surrounded by quarrelsome and war-mongering neighbors, are not included in the conference. They are Sweden and Switzerland, that have learned to be honest and decent to all people. Poland, the hate-center, that transplants much of its hatred to America against black people, is also unrepresented.

At the conference every little unstable government is seeking a cure-all for its internal and external ills. India, teeming with millions, but dismembered by British imperialism, already says that Britain has handpicked a delegation of stooges to plead its cause. Gandhi says they are "worse than no representation at all" insofar as freedom for India is concerned. Haiti, Liberia and Ethiopia, all with a multitude of sins, within and without, and all at various times victims of international dishonesty, treachery, strife and exploitation for the first time will get their human bill of rights before a seemingly impartial group of nations. Haiti, above the rest of the dark-hued, is most vociferous in its demands that racial discrimination be outlawed. How it will dovetail this request with its own mulatto and black problem within its own household remains one of the great inconsistencies that the conference will have to tackle. Liberia is more concerned with the economic phase of the conference than with the purely issue of color. So is Ethiopia that objects to being classified with Negro races.

MANY NATIONS come to the conference with unclean hands. While the progress of races necessarily demands the cultivation of a cosmopolitan or international spirit, there are delegates at the conference representing countries who for centuries have violated every code of decency in their relationships with less fortunate peoples. The colony-holding brigands like Belgium, Holland, England and the Netherlands that have exploited, mistreated and oftimes murdered millions of colored natives will listen to the complaints of their victims for the first time before a world-wide audience. England is the most embarrassed (if it possibly can be embarrassed) in such a congress of humanity. That's why it has carefully handpicked its delegates to represent the "black voice of the British Empire" and sent Anthony Eden to watch and guide them. But here is just a part of the story of how Mr. Winston Churchill's government is treating black people today while he sends his troops elsewhere to bring democracy to white people, and to conferences to talk about "peace."

The blacks in South Africa are more terrorized, exploited and oppressed than in any other country in the world. Hitler has nothing new to teach British politicians in race-baiting, for in South Africa the blacks are not considered or treated as human beings. They suffer far worse than the Jews in Fascist Germany. The present area of the Union of South Africa is about 417,917 miles. Of this the white population, numbering about 2 millions, own about 80 per cent, while nearly 7 million Bantu have been allowed less than 10 per cent.

The natives are completely segregated from the white population in Reserves and Locations. Those living in the rural districts are confined to the Reserves. About 3 million Africans are now living within these areas. They are practically helots, and must not leave unless they have various passes to show white officers. Most of the lands allocated to them are unsuitable for agricultural and pastoral purposes, and are over-congested. To avoid starvation the natives are forced to sell their labor to white farmers and mining companies at a mere pittance. There is no redress for the natives against this system, nor is there any escape, for if they run away they are liable to arrest. Their movements are hemmed in by a number of passes which assist the police in keeping strict surveillance over them. In addition to the poll and hut tax receipts there are ten other passes which the natives are obliged to carry. And so on the horror goes.

THIS DEGRADATION of standards of public conduct has grown so rapidly with the advance of the British Empire that it is befitting, that some 40 other nations reprimand Mr. Churchill and his government at this conference, and demand corrections of these social blunders for world security and peace, else if this vulgar and stupid treatment of mankind continues we just as well prepare for World War III. If this conference does nothing more than expose England in its every variety of trickery, dishonesty and deceit in dealing with darker races, it will have served a good purpose in the interest of humanity. England, above all, comes into the conference "dripping with blood."

People, Politics And Places

Bad Conduct Increasing

ONE OF THE MOST disturbing situations I found after four months' absence from the United States is the decided increase of belligerent and often bad-mannered Negroes in public places.

The very first day of my return to the United States I heard a story, told by a man who has devoted virtually his entire life to an uncompromising fight for complete equality for the Negro. He told of boarding a New York City street car. Just ahead of him, a distinguished-looking white man, obviously a gentleman, stepped on a colored woman's foot as the street car started suddenly. He apologized.

But when the woman turned and saw that it was a white man, she launched into a tirade of profanity at the top of her voice which lasted more than twenty minutes until the man, embarrassed, left the car.

My friend who told the story said that the tide of anti-Negro feeling rose so perceptibly throughout the car that you could almost feel it as a tangible object.

Foul Manners Don't Help

NEGROES HAVE ample justification for being bitter. Mistreatment of Negro servicemen and civilians, continuation of racial discrimination and the evaporation as the end of the war approaches of the fine pronouncements about "freedom" and "democracy" are enough to make any minority group resentful. But bad manners and futile belligerence do not supply the answer. They merely complicate and make more difficult the problems of the far larger percentage of Negroes who approach the solution of their problems intelligently.

What is more, many potentially valuable allies of the Negro can either be alienated or made less effective when they espouse the cause of the Negro.

Use Heads As Well As Lungs

WHAT IS the answer? When a Negro sees another member of his race making a spectacle of himself in a public conveyance or other public place, he could quietly attempt to induce the obstreperous one to stop making a spectacle of himself.

In some cases, certain risks would be run, especially if the trouble-maker is drunk. But it is imperative that we take that risk. A handful of loud, ill-mannered Negroes raising hell can undo in five minutes the good which has been done over a period of years by 98 per cent of decent, self-respecting Negroes.

Let's don't hand another weapon to our enemies with which to make the lot of the Negro even more difficult. The Bilbos and Rankins already have enough clubs to use against Negroes. The problems we face now and in the more trying days after the war is over, are going to be tough enough without further complication arising out of the actions of a minority. There must be no compromise in our fight for full equality; but let us use our heads as well as our lungs in the fight for equality.

Second Thoughts

Lesson in General Semantics

THE RELATIONSHIPS of simple arithmetic are known as additive relationships. Two plus two equals four. Three minus one equals two. To an extraordinary degree, additive assumptions underlie our thinking. Upon them is based our feeling that if John gets richer, James must be getting poorer; and conversely, that if I am getting poorer, somebody else (probably the Jews) are getting richer.

Additive assumptions have a considerable place in race and religious persecution. In terms of these assumptions, gentiles can be persuaded that their misfortunes are due to something "taken away from them" by Jews; whites can oppose increased opportunity for Negroes, feeling that the latter's gain necessarily involves, by simple arithmetic, the former's loss.

Throughout human history, men and nations have acted on additive assumptions. Men have prospered, or tried to prosper, by snatching valuables from others; nations, by snatching territory from each other. The victors have always gritted their teeth and waited for the chance to snatch everything back again, with something extra to boot if possible. So the game of snatch goes on eternally.

In some simple situations, there is justification for the additive point of view. If there are 100 chickens to 100 customers, and the first 10 customers get 10 chickens apiece, the others are not going to get any. In times of scarcity, therefore, people are compelled to think in these arithmetic terms. Most people believe, even today in an age of potential plenty, that the rules of the game require that we snatch each other's chickens and that we "protect our standard of living" by preventing others from having any chickens.

Reciprocal Trade Agreements

IN THE ARGUMENTS against the continuation of our reciprocal trade agreements, there is a constant appeal made to our additive habits of thought. If we help China or South America to prosper after the war, so the argument runs, we can do so only by becoming poorer ourselves. We must "protect our standards of living" by trying, by means of tariff barriers, to prevent anyone from doing business except ourselves.

Henry A. Wallace's ideals, scornfully described as a "quart of milk for every Hottentot," are again assailed from the point of view of additive assumptions. The implied threat is that if the Hottentots get milk, your children will have to do without. Reactionaries, therefore, jeer at "plans to make Uncle Sam the Santa Claus for all the world" and angrily denounce the "dreamers" who want to set up "an international WPA."

And, talking about WPA, the attacks on that much maligned institution were also made on additive assumptions. People were made to feel that the gain of WPA workers meant a loss for those not on WPA. The facts were, of course, otherwise. Those not on WPA kept their jobs or remained in business because WPA workers had money to spend. But facts mean nothing when your mind is imprisoned by primitive assumptions.

Two Plus Two Equals What?

"IF I HAVE one apple, and you have an apple, and we trade, we still have only one apple apiece." Such are the simple additive relationships of an age of scarcity. So we try to grab the other fellow's apple without giving up our own.

But commerce, equitably conducted, is what Korzybski calls a "time-binding" or co-operative activity. The results of co-operation, like the results of intellectual interchange, are not additive; they are cumulative. "If I have one idea, and you have an idea, and we trade, we both have two ideas." Similarly, if I have more apples than I can eat, and you have more milk than you can drink, and we trade some of my apples for some of your milk, we both enjoy an increased standard of living. Intellectual life, science, and modern commerce are non-additive in their effects. The more you help others prosper, the more you prosper yourself.

It is vain, however, to try to tell the real reactionary mossback that the way to American prosperity is to help other nations prosper, or that the way to happiness for the majority is to guarantee the happiness of minorities. Because of the additive assumptions in his thinking, he will stare at you blankly and tell you that you are an idiotic dreamer.

One of the aims of general semantics is to see to it that the next generation doesn't grow up with additive assumptions.

World View

Catholics and the Peace

THIS COLUMNIST saw something in New Orleans during a recent visit to that city which comes to mind today as I re-read the Catholic bishops' denunciation of the Crimea agreement.

It was nothing new for the South: It should not have shocked me, since I spent my first 20 years below the Mason and Dixon line. Yet, I admit that I was somewhat horrified. And I thought about it again and again during the last few months.

It was on the rear end of a New Orleans street car, the end with the signs saying "For Colored Only." This end was congested, while above the sign, toward the forward part of the car, were many vacant seats. In the congested end, our people were cramped and standing. Suddenly two black nuns got on the car. It was the first time I had ever seen a Negro nun.

As they squeezed into the cramped rear end, a Negro stevedore asked the conductor to move up the "For Colored Only" sign, so several of the vacant seats could be used and the nuns could be seated.

But what was my astonishment when one of the nuns, the elder, spoke to the stevedore. "Never mind, son," she said. "We'll stay in our place."

Philosophy of Complacency

THIS INCIDENT left a permanent mark in my thought. I felt an immense pity for the two nuns, who had become resigned to acceptance of an intolerable world. But I felt deep outrage at the idea that millions of human beings, who have within their grasp the potentialities for making a better world, are persuaded to reconcile themselves to hunger and poverty and misery and racial hatred, and to renounce their aspirations and their power for making a better world.

I knew, of course, that millions of Catholics throughout the world reject in their daily lives this fatalism and complacency. And indeed, the record of Catholic patriots in the European underground refutes those who would lump all Catholics together as a reactionary force. In point of fact, many of the most heroic of the fighters against fascism have been Catholics, including numbers of Catholic priests.

But the historical fact stands, nevertheless, that the influence and weight of the Catholic hierarchy and church has been thrown on the side of reactionary forces and institutions. The principle of the separation of church and state, as practiced in the United States and the Soviet Union, is a deterrent to such reactionary influence. And perhaps that is one reason why the political policies of the Vatican and the hierarchy have been directed against an extension of real democracy in the world.

Hence, it is not surprising that the most recent Nazi peace offer, coming before the interment of the body of Franklin Roosevelt and timed to encourage the U.S. Fifth column to renewed effort in order to salvage fascism, should coincide with the Catholic bishops' denunciation of the Crimea decisions, which spelt the death of fascism.

Challenge to Negro Catholics

NEGRO-AMERICANS, however, can have no interest in the salvaging of any part of fascism, or in the conservation of autocratic and despotic governments anywhere in the world. Nor have we any interest in policies which lead to divisions among the powers and the development of antagonisms that can only culminate in World War III.

The bishops' division of the world into genuine democracy and "Marxian totalitarianism" is precisely such a divisive program. It would set the so-called democratic countries against the Soviet Union, and attempt another such crusade as Hitler tried, which has already cost us so much in human life and sacrifice.

We Negro-Americans have a few ideas of our own about "genuine democracy" outside of the so-called "Marxian totalitarian" Soviet Union. We know the Soviet policies in regards to racial equality and freedom for minorities are the most advanced in the world. And on the basis of fact we can reject the bishops' classification as a spurious one.

But Negro-American Catholics have a real responsibility in this respect. They look for the remedy for ills of the conscience to their church and their priest. But they should look for the remedy for ills of their social and political status to their government, and to the compact it has entered with the other United Nations — signalized at Yalta in the Crimea—to win the war, destroy fascism completely, and build a prosperous and peaceful world.

Relief

GOING the rounds are alleged gloatings of prejudiced whites over departure of the Roosevelts from the White House. They are endless and tiresome, but we can vouch for three typical ones from D. C.

A colored newsboy hawking "extras" on the President's death, reports a white who inquired what the extra was all about, then commented: "Well, the Negra's friend is gone now."

A white waiting in a cigarette line told a colored man ahead of him: "Go on back to the end of the line, Roosevelt's dead now."

A Congressman's wife at tea said in presence of her colored maid: "If that woman had stayed another year, we would actually have had race equality."

* * *

Strategy

REV. THOMAS KILGORE, popular Winston-Salem leader, outsmarted city fathers who were sabotaging his campaign to get colored voters registered. When the city registrar, using all the well-known devices, insisted on taking over an hour to register each colored applicant, thus discouraging the others waiting uncomfortably in the long line, he asked what time the registrar closed.

"We hope that door is locked, even when inside there gets registered," he was told.

It was then mid-afternoon, and Kilgore passed word along for all colored applicants to leave and meet at his church immediately. They did. Promptly at 5:45, they re-appeared at the City Hall, 1400 strong and every one crowded INSIDE before the door could be closed at 6.

The registrar took one look around realized he couldn't go home until he registered every one of them, and knew he was licked. He signed up the whole bunch in less than an hour.

Distinction

JOHN H. YOUNG III, now on Washington Bureau Pittsburgh Courier, was once football coach at Jackson college, Jackson, Miss. To keep out troublesome gate crashers at a big game, he hired a white guard who sort of went along with the park.

In midst of the game, several urchins climbed the fence, and the guard ran out on the field, shouting for all to hear—"You g—damned niggers get back over that fence."

John, furious, called after him—"Cut out using language like that around here."

The guard in hot pursuit of the boys, yelled back over his shoulder, "Oh I didn't mean your niggers, John, I mean these other niggers."

Retreat

Speaking of international conferences, good authority cites an incident at the Assembly of Nations in Chapultapec, Mexico City some two months ago. It seems the Mexicans, either accidentally or on purpose, seated Sen. Tom Connally of Texas, chairman of the powerful Senate Foreign Relations committee, next to the Haitian delegate during one session.

Old Tom didn't like it, but didn't quite dare complain. He just sat and suffered. That is he sat until the photographers were admitted, then he was taken suddenly ill and spent the balance of the session in the men's room. All the pictures show his seat vacant.

The Winds Of Time

An Estimate of FDR

I PRESUME that what we should be thankful for is that Franklin D. Roosevelt did not die while Garner was vice president. That would have been too awful to contemplate. What fills us with regret is that Henry Wallace was not continued as vice president. What faces us is the fact of President Truman.

Franklin Roosevelt did three things: one, the New Deal; two, his emphasis on race relations, and three, the war.

Of these three, the New Deal was of the greatest importance. For the first time a political party in the United States took upon itself as a distinct duty to plan the increase of wage income at the expense of profits. Of course this attack upon profit has been going on in English-speaking countries ever since English enfranchisment in the early nineteenth century. But never before in America has the head of the state and a leader of a great party stated it as a clear aim; that wages must be increased and security of work and income guaranteed the laborer by open and determined effort to cut down the amount of wealth and income which has been going to capitalists and employers.

Most Hated Man

IT IS THIS PHASE of Roosevelt's career which made him one of the best hated men in America. There were certain kinds of business men and commercial organizations which never forgave this aspect of the New Deal. Indeed so strong and bitter was the opposition that in his third and fourth terms President Roosevelt retreated from his more advanced stand for economic reform but he nevertheless accomplished the curbing of credit organizations, the federal recognition of union labor and a complete reorganization of the Supreme Court which led it to give wide recognition to his fundamental philosophy.

With the regard to the race problem, Mr. Roosevelt not only followed the attitude of his predecessors toward the recognition of Jews and their problems but did it at a time when anti-Semitism was spreading in the world. Going beyond this he gave the American Negro a kind of recognition in political life which the Negro had never before received. Instead of appointing machine politicians to certain designated positions in his gift, he appointed a series of unusually well-trained advisers. To be sure men like Weaver and Hastie had little power beyond advice but they were men whose advice was of so high a calibre, it had to be listened to.

Beyond this Roosevelt took three steps: he extended international and customary courtesy toward the heads of three Negro states: Ethiopia, Liberia and Haiti. This had never happened before so openly and definitely. In addition to this he spoke out on the conditions in the South and frankly called the South our Number One economic problem.

Finally, he went almost beyond his authority to establish the FEPC as a record-breaking precedent, emphasizing the fact that the basis of the race problem in the South is poverty based on unemployment and low wage.

Truman Heir to FDR Policy

THE THIRD WORK of President Roosevelt was to put the United States in the second World War in alliance with Russia. This was a tremendous step. Without it Hitler would have conquered Europe and Japan would have conquered China. Europe under Hitler would have been a center of race-hate and new slavery and the splendid economic planning of Germany would have been used to depress the workers of the world rather than solve our economic problems of the distribution of wealth.

Japan would have spread in Asia—an Asiatic version of capitalist domination. Hitler and Japan could not be overcome without the aid of Russia and in order to aid Russia, Roosevelt had virtually to recognize communism as at least a respectable and efficient form of government. This in itself was epoch-making.

The heir to this policy is President Truman. He started political life as a machine politician. He did not have the opportunity of liberal education and he was born in a former slave state. All this is against him but he deserves charity and sympathy for his tremendous task. He may do far better than his antecedents indicate.

Yesterday And Today

Are Wars Inevitable?

I DON'T KNOW how far back in history the "theory" of the inevitability of wars goes, but in the last generation and in the present period the notion has powerful currency. Nor do I know to what extent this "theory" has influenced people, and actually aided and abetted wars and warmakers, but it has exerted profound and bloody effect.

It seems to me that there has been more talk about the possibility of World War III than the probability of world peace. You can hardly pick up a newspaper or book or turn your radio dial without hearing some "prophet" or out-and-out skeptic wisely tell you that the seeds of the next war are being or already have been sown. "Wars are inevitable," you hear. "There have always been wars and there always will be," says another "philosopher."

Even a good mind and a good person like Walter White can echo that sentiment. In Mr. White's case he uses the World War II idea as a threat if the world doesn't buckle down to the business of straightening out the "racial" issue. I don't think it's a good tactic.

Truman Sets Example

THE FIRST TIME I heard this defeatism expressed in the current war was about two years ago when we had barely begun to fight the Japanese militarists, when we were retreating. The mayor of a great Eastern city called for big families, saying we would have to fight Japan 30 years from now—before we were seriously fighting Japan the first time!

A recent example is the book with the cynical title, "The Gentlemen Talk of Peace," in which all kind of violence everywhere is freely predicted. Such "oracles" abound today—and they are creating the mood for a possible new global war at that.

If you spread the psychology of hopelessness, despair and defeat widely enough, you will make people believe the outlook is hopeless, war inevitable. The pity is that so many socially useful and responsible people fall for this trap, mistaking their pessimism for political clarity.

What I liked in the first address of President Truman was his awareness of this note of defeat already abroad in society, and his attempt to cope with it. I think this was one of the most important passages of his speech:

"In bitter despair, some people have come to believe that wars are inevitable. With tragic fatalism, they insist that wars have always been, of necessity, and of necessity wars will always be. To such defeatism men and nations will must not and cannot yield. The hope of humanity is not hopeless [illegible] the secret weapon of the forces of liberation."

Hope, and, of course, the President said, the faith and courage of the peace-loving nations to defend themselves.

How About Peace Period I?

IF THE SAN FRANCISCO conference begins the process of dispelling from society this deep-seated, overpowering and historically unscientific sentiment, then it will step out on the road to progress.

I come upon this fear in Negro circles frequently. I hear people say, "There's going to be a big race war some day." I hear whites say this too.

No, these are our fears. We pick them up from others behind the scenes who hope, and perhaps plan these things. After such notions root themselves sufficiently in society the fight against such negativism becomes more difficult.

But if all of us will concentrate on the idea of peace and progress, progress by peace, and peace by progress, we can move into the future on a new level. We can even help usher in Peace Period I.

Saga Of A Guerrilla Fighter

IN COMING DAYS as the war rushes to a swift climatic conclusion, many will be the personal narratives that find their way into new books. But few war books, if any, will ever match the grim excitement, the fresh, human touch, the unexcelled earthiness of Ira Wolfert's current chronicle of a U. S. guerrilla fighter in the Philippines. In writing the saga of Navy Lt. I. D. Richardson in "American Guerrilla in the Philippines," (Simon & Schuster, N.Y. $2.75) Wolfert has combined one of the most thrilling stories of the war with a marvelous tribute to the indomitable courage of the Filipino people.

In essence, the crack newsman and novelist takes up where William L. White left off in his "They Were Expendable." This is Wolfert's tale of one expendable, a survivor of the famous PT boats that smashed Jap ships to bits with their torpedoes. Lt. Richardson tried to get away from the Philippines but didn't succeed. Together with a handful of companions who knew nothing of the sea, he set out to reach Australia, 1300 miles away, in a crude native boat. A storm upset the boat and their plans. After 13 hours in open sea, they finally got to land.

Lt. Richardson ended up becoming a guerrilla fighter on Leyte. He eventually became responsible for the hidden radio setup that guided General MacArthur back to the islands.

While "American Guerrilla in the Philippines" is essentially the story of an American hero, in Wolfert's skilled hands it also becomes a beautiful and moving toast to the valiant Filipino army of Col. Ruperto Kangelon. Says Wolfert: "Wherever a fascist conqueror has tried to stand, the people have risen under his feet as guerrillas. That's the human race for you, and the Filipino people take their place big in it, just as big as the biggest."

Invasion Beaches

WOLFERT'S DESCRIPTION of how the Filipinos on Leyte organized their secret government, complete with laws, taxes and health measures, to battle the Japanese is a testament to the love of liberty in the Philippines and is a happy augury for the future of that courageous land. Richardson was in the middle of it all, earning himself the rank of major in the guerrilla forces. His epic, as told by Wolfert, is one of the most absorbing to come out of the war.

Another remarkable job in bringing the war back home to the people, of putting history down on paper in terms of everyday people is done by Navy Lt. Com. Max Miller in his "The Far Shore" (Whittlesey House, N. Y. $2.50). Complete with a splendid set of photographs, "The Far Shore" relates a rather unpublicized phase of Navy operations—the taking of an invasion beach.

Miller was in on the Normandy and Southern France invasions. He tells his story of these typical amphibious operations with simple, poignant episodes that make this book stirring reading from cover to cover. Unfortunately although Negro seamen played a big part in these operations, Miller skips over them with but passing mention.

Main Street's Neighbors

JUST AS the war chronicles continue to roll off the presses in increasing numbers, the growing interest in postwar prospects too seems to be the theme of more and more books. Newest is a rather shallow, evidently hastily-done volume by foreign correspondent Melvin K. Whiteleather. Despite the rather attractive title, "Main Street's New Neighbor" (J. B. Lippincott, Philadelphia. $3) author Whiteleather is a bit on the heavy side in his writing and somewhat off beam in his political analysis of our foreign neighbors of the future.

Whiteleather starts with two strikes against him by attempting to assay politically the difficult problems of such varied nations as Britain, France, Russia and Germany. He has very little to offer that is new, being limited for the most part to repetition of what too many other correspondents have said in far better writing. The usual crop of cliches and stereotypes about Russia are warmed over and presented with a bit of new relish.

Compared to Johannes Steel's "The Future of Europe" (reviewed here last week) Whiteleather's book reads like the sorry product of an amateur in international politics.

WATCH AFRICA

Watchword For Thinking People

By W. E. B. DU BOIS

In 1949, this is the watchword for thinking people of America: Watch Africa; tear down the curtain of silence and deliberate suppression of facts.

Remember that today there are signs of international conspiracy to make the countries of Africa the slums of the world; to steal their land and materials and get power of life and death over millions of blacks. Poverty and disease already prevail; and there is deliberate plans to keep the Africans in ignorance.

There is no doubt about all this; but it will be difficult to get the facts to let the world know the truth.

I have repeatedly appealed to magazines to publish facts about Africa. I have asked newspapers to carry news and in nearly all cases my plea has been turned down.

No one country is guilty! Great Britain is going to make Africa her source of cheap food. France is going to use Africans to fight against her own workers and help retain her hold on Asia. Belgium is rushing to increase the profit that she made during the war. Portugal is going to continue to play stooge to British capital. Italy is seeking to overcome the poverty of her masses by inflicting greater poverty upon Africans. Germany is going eventually to push her manufactures into Africa in return for materials.

STREAMLINED SLAVERY

In Africa itself, the world is trying to keep Ethiopia choked in her mountains away from commerce on the high seas. Egypt and Great Britain are rivals in trying to control the black labor of the Sudan. The United States is bribing Liberia and strengthening her grip by army, navy and investment.

The awakening peoples of the West Africa are being cajoled, called "Communists," and given half-loaves of "Self-Rule." White minorities are ruling ruthlessly in East Africa, South Arica, Rhodesia and Southwest Africa.

Instead of civilized peoples being willing to let labor exploitation disappear from the world, they are willing to concentrate on the degradation of black folk; forgetting where the sympathies of the majority of mankind, including hundreds of millions of colored Asiatics, is tending in the coming struggle of world races.

What we need now for salvation is light, more light on Africa.

THE CULTURAL AND SCIENTIFIC CONFERENCE FOR WORLD PEACE

An Editorial

THE editors of JEWISH LIFE wish to pay tribute and express their gratitude to the organizers and participants of the great Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace, held in New York City, March 25th to 27th. Despite unparalleled hysteria and provocation, cultural and scientific leaders of America and of other lands gathered to discuss that forbidden theme—peace. Prior to the meeting a campaign of defamation was set rolling under the aegis of the State Department, which had characterized the conference as a communist affair. Visas were denied to most of the delegates from non-communist countries in order to give credibility to this thesis. The great "free press" of America outdid itself in its frantic shrieks, in its calls for provocation, in its attempts to distort this great event and to malign its participants.

One actually had to see in the flesh the few hundred that gathered to picket the conference, to get a picture of the State Department's concept of what constitutes real Americanism. Aside from a few misled individuals, the majority of the line consisted of Christian Front elements, groups of people who had fled from central Europe because they feared just punishment by the new people's governments for having collaborated with the nazis, an assortment of clerical fascists and some members of the Social Democratic Federation, who felt quite at home with these fascist elements.

But inside the halls of the conference were people of a different kind: men and women of culture, creative workers and scientists, the truest and finest representatives of their countries. These were men and women who sought peace in order to preserve culture, who sought the friendship of peoples in order to advance their own people and all mankind. There was no hysteria at the conference but only calm and reasoned judgment and firm determination to undertake the great patriotic duty of fighting for peace.

The State Department and the press betray an almost maniacal fear of the word "peace." Those who dare to speak of peace and to rally the people are hounded, persecuted and subjected to intimidation.

For Jewish people the cause of peace is especially close. The very mention of the threat of a new war has implications that can be ignored only at the risk of indifference to our complete extinction. Where will the Jew be safe? In Israel? In Europe? In Asia? In America? If the nazis are revitalized and the scum of Europe, who collaborated with Hitler, are mobilized, if people like those who picketed the Peace Conference became spokesmen for America, is there safety for the Jew anywhere? Our course can only be to stand side by side with those who are the enemies of war and therefore the friends of our people and its survival.

Recently the Central Committee of the Polish Jews sent a memorandum to the World Jewish Congress urging its participation in the World Conference for Peace to be held in Paris on April 20th to 23rd. It urged the Congress to "demonstrate publicly and unequivocally where it stands in this grave period of struggle between the forces of peace and progress and the forces of war and aggression. We believe that neutrality in any form on this question objectively aids the cause of those who are against the peace aspirations of the Jewish people."

Certainly the survivors of the Warsaw ghetto, of Maidanek and of Treblinka, the handful that is rebuilding life anew on the ruins of the old, have a right to make this demand of a world Jewish body that claims to speak in the name of the Jewish people. We do not know what answer the Congress leaders have already given or will give to this request. But we are aware that too many of them have, by their actions over the past few years, demonstrated their readiness to join the imperialist camp, and that others who fear to state this publicly have attempted to cover up their tracks by proclaiming the so-called theory of neutrality.

In the columns that follow we print excerpts from some of the speeches delivered at the historic peace conference, so that those who were not so fortunate as to attend, may read for themselves the views of a number of men, who, though differing on many questions, occupy common ground for the cause of peace.

NO MORE WAR!

By W. E. B. Du Bois

This Cultural and Scientific Conference for world peace has been a success. In a time of hysteria, suspicion and hate, we have succeeded in bringing face to face in friendly meetings, one of the largest gatherings of creative artists and thinkers the world has seen; and it would have been quite the largest if all who wished to come were here. Meeting together for three full days, we have found wide agreement and sympathy, we have established ideals and friendships belting the globe. We have not and are not now in complete agreement on all matters; but in one vital respect our agreement is complete: No More War!

We are of many minds and backgrounds, separated not only by space but by the terrible barriers of language and social patterns; we face deliberate crime, ignorance and misunderstanding. These three: but we firmly believe that the greatest of these is misunderstanding.

We know and the saner nation knows that we are not traitors nor conspirators; and far from plotting force and violence it is precisely force and violence that we bitterly oppose. This conference was not called to defend communism nor socialism nor the American way of life. It was called to promote peace! It was called to say and say again that no matter how right or wrong differing systems of beliefs in religion, industry or government may be, war is not the method by which their differences can successfully be settled for the good of mankind. To the defense of this absolutely indisputable thesis, proven by oceans of blood and worlds of human suffering, we have invited the cooperation of all men; and that cooperation to abolish war does not compel or even ask men to surrender their opinions. It simply insists that force is not reason and beliefs cannot be changed by suppression.

But there is one aspect of our conference which has forced itself upon the attention of us all. That is the effort of the press and certain leaders of public opinion to spread the idea that some persons here are by their beliefs and actions so beyond the pale of humanity as to deserve neither sympathy nor confidence. Particularly have the people of the Soviet Union been singled out for something bordering on insult and repeatedly accused of war-mongering and aggression. I do not pretend to be an expert on Russia but seeing what the press can do to a conference like this in misinterpretation and distortion, I wonder if what is called aggression in the Balkans may not be liberation of landless serfs and giving their ignorant masses in 25 years such education as American Negro slaves have not received in 75; and of sending their former masters not to the legislature but scurrying over the earth like rats distributing lies.

All this I do not know but it can be true. I do know that if the press has lied about Russia as it has lied about American Negroes for 300 years, I for one will condemn neither Russia nor communism on such testimony. But beyond and above this there arises before this conference the plight and cause of the vast majority of mankind who are not white. These colored races, the Chinese, Japanese, Indians and Indonesians: the peoples of Africa, many of those of South America and most of those of the Caribbean, with 15,000,000 Negroes of the United States—these are the vast majority of mankind, whose condition and future are the crucial test of the attitudes of those peoples who today demand mastery of the world. Secluded for the most part in colonies or dominated areas, they have been enslaved and insulted, kicked in the teeth and used for the rape and exploitation of the British, French, Dutch, Belgian, Spanish and Italian empires. This great America, this vast and rich land around you is built on the slavery, toil and degradation of Africans; here until well into the second half of the nineteenth century they were sold like cattle and New York did not stop to picket abolitionists, they tarred, feathered and killed them. Today in this land we have risen from the dead not to full manhood and citizenship but to the place where we can at least stand and yell our own protest. We thank the America that helped us.

But we know well that unless we had helped ourselves, we would still in New York City be exactly where our brothers are in Mississippi, where I ride in Jimcrow cars and would be kicked out of any hotel or public library. When such a nation arraigns Russia, all that I with the best will can remember is that the Soviet Union alone of all modern nations has prohibition of race and color discrimination written into its fundamental law and that unlike similar words in our constitution, their law is enforced.

I saw the birth of the League of Nations and I sat in San Francisco when the United Nations was born. In both instances I worked and pleaded for the darker peoples, particularly those in imperialist colonies. We got mandates at Geneva which meant nothing. We got trusteeships at San Francisco and there again a determined blocking of all real meaning of colonial freedom by the united effort of Great Britain and the United States and the sole opposition of Russia. Again in the Marshall Plan the nations helped are the colonial imperialists and no colored people unless, like Chiang Kai-shek, they are puppets of world exploiting investors.

I tell you, people of America, the dark world is on the move! It wants and will have freedom, autonomy and equality. It will not be diverted in these fundamental rights by dialectical splitting of political hairs. We know what the Atlantic Pact proposes for the protection of colonial serfs of European imperialists. We know why Italy has been promised Ethiopia's territory by the Department of State. We know why the President of the United States goes fishing when the charter of Negro American rights is laughed to death by Democrats and Republicans, and lynching and disfranchisement go merrily on. We know all this and so does every dark man on earth. The white race may, if it will, tax itself into poverty, and arm itself for suicide, but the vast majority of mankind will march on and over them to freedom and self-rule! . . .

W. E. B. DU BOIS is an eminent Negro author and scholar who helped found the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He was honorary chairman of the panel on Writing and Publishing and delivered the above speech at Madison Square Garden on March 27.

NO PLACE TO HIDE

By Rabbi Louis I. Newman

If church and synagogue leaders were so minded today, they might attempt to go into the sub-cellars to escape the cyclones of opinion raging in the world. But they realize that literally and figuratively "there is no place to hide." Moreover, they would consider themselves derelict touching their mission as religionists were they silent or evasive in the presence of the issues at stake.

Religionists, who have seen two terrible world wars, look with horror upon the prospect of a still deadlier Third World War, and they are determined to do their utmost, whatever the misunderstanding and the cost, to prevent its coming. The war system seems more entrenched than ever, and in an atmosphere of mutual suspicion and incitement, nations are piling up armaments lest they be at "the mercy of an incident." In our boasted 20th century culture we have seen many religionists and laymen abandon the concept of "One World" motivated by the ideal of cooperation; instead, we hear the menacing drum-beat of new war-makers; we see the expenditure of vast sums which otherwise might be utilized for domestic improvement on behalf of the people; we find ourselves victimized by all-pervasive conditioning so that multitudes are preparing themselves to die in the belief that another war is unavoidable. Ecclesiastics preach in the name of the "Prince of Peace," but they urge a new "Holy War" as a punitive measure against those with whose economic and political program they disagree.

Now, as always, it is the duty of the church and synagogue to be faithful to the Isaianic vision of a world in which "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Problem of 20th Century Is Problem of Color Line

By W. E. B. DuBOIS

WE are just finishing the first half of the Twentieth Century. I remember its birth in 1901. There was the usual discussion as to whether the century began in 1900 or 1901; but, of course, 1901 was correct. We expected great things . . . peace; the season of war among nations had passed; progress was the order . . . everything going forward to bigger and better things. And there was the not so openly expressed, but even more firmly believed, the rule of white Europe and America over black, brown and yellow peoples.

DR. W. E. B. DuBOIS

I was 32 years of age in 1901, married, and a father, and teaching at Atlanta University; with a program covering a hundred years of study and investigation into the condition of American Negroes. Our subject of study at the turn was education: the college-bred Negro in 1900, the Negro common school in 1901. My own attitude toward the Twentieth Century was expressed in an article which I wrote in the Atlantic Monthly in 1901. It said:

"The problem of the Twentieth Century is the problem of the color-line . . . I have seen a land right merry with the sun, where children sing, and rolling hills lie like passioned women wanton with harvest. And there in the King's Highway sat, and sits, a figure veiled and bowed, by which the Traveler's footsteps hasten as they go. On the tainted air broods fair. Three centuries' thought have been the raising and unveiling of that bowed human soul; and now behold, my fellows, a century new for the duty and the deed! The problem of the Twentieth Century is the problem of the color-line."

What Has Been the Result?

This is what we hoped, to this we Negroes looked forward; peace, progress and the breaking of the color line. What has been the result? We know it all too well . . . war, hate, the revolt of the colored peoples and the fear of more war.

In the meantime, where are we; those 15,000,000 citizens of the United States who are descended from the slaves, brought here between 1600 and 1900? We formed in 1901, a separate group because of legal enslavement and emancipation into caste conditions, with the attendant poverty, ignorance, disease and crime. We were an inner group and not an integral part of the American nation; but we were exerting ourselves to fight for integration.

The burden of our fight was in seven different lines. We wanted education; we wanted particularly the right to vote and civil rights; we wanted work with adequate wage; housing, without segregation or slums; a free press to fight our battles, and (although in those days we dare not say it) social equality.

* * *

We Were Oppressed . . .

In 1901 our education was in perilous condition, despite what we and our white friends had done for thirty years. The Atlanta University Conference said in its resolutions of 1901: "We call the attention of the nation to the fact that less than one million of the three million Negro children of school age are at present regularly attending school, and these attend a session which lasts only a few months. We are today deliberately rearing millions of our citizens in ignorance and at the same time limiting the rights of citizenship by educational qualifications. This is unjust."

More particularly in civil rights, we were oppressed. We not only did not get justice in the courts, but we were subject to peculiar and galling sorts of injustice in daily life. In the latter half of the Ninteenth Century, where we first get something like statistics, no less than 3,000 Negroes were lynched without trial. And in addition to that we were subject continuously to mob violence and judicial lynching.

* * *

Disfranchised by Violence

In political life we had, for twenty-five years, been disfranchised by violence, law and public opinion. The 14th and 15th amendments were deliberately violated and the literature of the day in book, pamphlet and daily press, was widely of opinion that the Negro was not ready for the ballot, could not use it intelligently, and that no action was called for to stop his political power from being exercised by Southern whites like Tillman and Vardaman.

We did not have the right or opportunity to work at an income which would sustain a decent and modern standard of life. Because of a past of chattel slavery, we were for the most part common laborers and servants, and a very considerable proportion were still unable to leave the plantations where they worked all their lives for next to nothing.

There were a few who were educated for the professions and we had many good artisans; that number was not increasing as it should have been, nor were new artisans being adequately trained. Industrial training was popular, but funds to implement it were too limited, and we were excluded from unions and the new mass industry.

We were housed in slums and segregated districts where crime and disease multiplied, and when we tried to move to better and healthier quarters we were met by segregation ordinance if not by mobs. We not only had no social equality, but we did not openly ask for it. It seemed a shameful thing to beg people to receive us as equals and as human beings; that was something we argued "that came and could not be fetched." And that meant not simply that we could not marry white women or legitimize mulatto bastards, but we could not stop in a decent hotel, nor eat in a public restaurant nor attend the theatre, nor accept an invitation to a private white home, nor travel in a decent railway coach. When the "public" was invited, this did not include us and admission to colleges often involved special consideration if not blunt refusal

Finally we had poor press . . . a few struggling papers with little news and inadequately expressed opinion, with small circulation or influence and almost no advertising.

This was our plight in 1901. It was discouraging, but not hopeless. There is no question but that we had made progress, and there also was no doubt but what that progress was not enough to satisfy us or to settle our problems.

We could look back on a quarter century of struggle which had its results. We had schools; we had teachers; a few had forced themselves into the leading colleges and were tolerated if not welcomed. We voted in Northern cities, owned many decent homes and were fighting for further progress. Leaders like Booker Washington had received wide popular approval and a Negro literature had begun to appear.

* * *

The Real Battle Was On

But what we needed was organized effort along the whole front, based on broad lines of complete emancipation. This came with the Niagara Movement in 1906 and the NAACP in 1909. In 1910 came the Crisis magazine and the real battle was on.

What have we gained and accomplished? The advance has not been equal on all fronts, nor complete on any. We have not progressed with closed ranks like a trained army, but rather with serried and broken ranks, with wide gaps and even temporary retreats. But we have advanced. Of that there can be no atom of doubt.

First of all in education; most Negro children today are in school and most adults can read and write. Unfortunately this literacy is not as great as the census says. The draft showed that at least a third of our youth are illiterate. But education is steadily rising. Six thousand Bachelor degrees are awarded to Negroes each year and Doctorates in philosophy and medicine are not uncommon. Nevertheless as a group, American Negroes are still in the lower ranks of learning and adaptability to modern conditions. They do not read widely, their travel is limited and their experience through contact with the modern world is curtailed by law and custom.

Negro's Greatest Advance

Secondly, in civil rights, the Negro has perhaps made his greatest advance. Mob violence and lynching have markedly decreased. Three thousand Negroes were lynched in the last half of the Nineteenth Century and five hundred in the first h[alf] of the Twentieth. Today lynching is comparativ[ely] rare. Mob violence [still] has deserved [its] in evidence, and sum[mary] and unjust court p[roceed]ings have taken the place of open and illegal acts. But the Negro has established, in the courts, his legal citizenship and his right to be included in the Bill of Rights. The question still remains of "equal but separate" public accommodations, and that is being attacked. Even the institution of the "jim-crow" in travel is tottering. The infraction of the marriage situation by law and custom is yet to be brought before the courts and public opinion in a forcible way.

Third, the right to vote on the part of the Negro is being gradually established under the 14th and 15th amendments. It was not really until 1915 that the Supreme Court upheld this right of Negro citizens and even today the penalties of the 14th amendment have never been enforced. There are 7,000,000 possible voters among American Negroes and of these it is a question if more than 2,000,000 actually cast their votes. This is partly from the national inertia, which keeps half of all American voters away from the polls; but even more from the question as to what practical ends the Negro shall cast his vote.

Question of Occupation

He is thinking usually in terms of what he can do by voting to better his condition and he seldom gets a chance to vote on this matter. On the wider implications of political democracy he has not yet entered; particularly he does not see the economic foundations of present civilization and the neces-

Foreword

THE roots of the future are always bedded in the past. The future, the next fifty years, of the American Negro will be a natural outgrowth of the past half century. For that reason, The Pittsburgh Courier believes it important that the record of the past fifty years of American Negro achievement, and failure, should be examined to discover a guide and inspiration for the years that lie ahead.

The Pittsburgh Courier has invited some of our foremost students, thinkers and writers to examine the record of the American Negro during the past fifty-five years and to write their comments. These studies and comments will be published in full-page feature articles every other week in 1950. They will cover Negro progress in the fight for civil rights, in education, in labor, in the church, in fraternal orders, in insurance, in politics, in government service, in art, in literature, in agriculture, in health, housing, sports and other fields. Some of the persons who will participate in this symposium, a PITTSBURGH COURIER FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY FEATURE, will be Walter White, James Ivy, Dr. Charles Thompson, Theophilus Lewis, Albon L. Holsey, Col. Campbell C. Johnson and a score of others.

The feature this week begins this new history of FIFTY YEARS OF NEGRO ACHIEVEMENT. It is written by Dr. W. E. B. Dubois, a brilliant part of the age which produced him. For this occasion, Dr. DuBois has employed the best of his unusual talents to compose an over-all survey of Negro life during this past half century. This is DuBois at the acme of his skill—writing beautifully, trenchantly, challengingly. Here Dr. DuBois presents not simply the mere facts, but the facts that make you think and swell with pride.

sity of his attacking the rule of corporate wealth in order to free the labor group to which he belongs.

Fourth, there is the question of occupation. There are our submerged classes of farm labor and tenants; our city laborers, washerwomen and scrubwomen and the mass of lower-paid servants. These classes still form a majority of American Negroes and they are on the edge of poverty, with the ignorance, disease and crime that always accompany such poverty.

If we measure the median income of Americans, it is $3,000 for whites and $2,000 for Negroes. In Southern cities, 7 per cent of the white families and 30 per cent of the colored families receive less than $1,000 a year. On the other hand the class differentiation by income among Negroes is notable: the number of semi-skilled and skilled artisans has increased or will as membership in labor unions. Professional men have increased, especially teachers and less notably, physicians, dentists and lawyers.

The number of Negroes in business has increased; mostly in small retail businesses, but to a considerable extent in enterprises like insurance, real estate and small banking, where the color line gives Negroes certain advantages and where, too, there is a certain element of gambling. Also beyond the line of [illegible] of Negroes have made [illegible]. All this [illegible] there has arisen in the Negro group a distinct stratification from poor to rich. Recently I polled 490 Negro families belonging to a select organization forty-five years old. Of these families 127 received over $10,000 a year and a score of these over $25,000; 200 families received from $5,000 to $10,000 a year and eighty-six less than $5,000.

Following American Pattern

This is the start of a tendency which will grow; we are beginning to follow the American pattern of accumulating individual wealth and of considering that this will eventually settle the race problem. On the other hand, the whole trend of the thought of our age is toward social welfare; the prevention of poverty by more equitable distribution of wealth, and business for general welfare rather than private profit. There are few signs that these ideals are guiding Negro development today. We seem to be adopting increasingly the ideal of American culture.

Housing, has, of course, been a point of bitter pressure among Negroes, because the attempt to segregate the race in its living conditions has not only kept the more fortunate ones from progress, but it has confined vast numbers of Negro people to the very parts of cities and country districts where they have fewest opportunities and least social contacts. They must live largely in slums, in contact with criminals and with fewest of the social advantages of government and human contact. The fight against segregation has been carried on in the courts and shows much progress against city ordinances, against covenants which make segregation hereditary.

Literature and art have made progress among Negroes, but with curious handicaps. An art expression is normally evoked by the conscious and unconscious demand of people for portrayal of their own emotion and experience. But in the case of the American Negroes, the audience, which embodies the demand and which pays sometimes enormous price for satisfaction, is not the Negro group, but the white group. And the pattern of what the white group wants does not necessarily agree with the natural desire of Negroes.

* * *

Negro Literature Divided

The whole of Negro literature is therefore curiously divided. We have writers who have written, not really about Negroes, but about the things which white people, and not the highest class of whites, like to hear about Negroes. And those who have expressed what the Negro himself thinks and feels, are those whose books sell to few, even of their own pople; and whom most folk do not know. This has not made for the authentic literature which the early part of this century seemed to promise. To be sure, it can be said that American literature today has a considerable amount of Negro expression and influence, although not as much as once we hoped.

Despite all this we have an increasing number of excellent Negro writers who make the promise for the future great by their real accomplishment. We have done something in sculpture and painting, but in drama and music we have markedly advanced. All the world listens to our singers, sings our music and dances to our rhythms.

In science, our handicaps are still great. Turner, a great entomologist, was worked to death for lack of laboratory; just never had the recognition he richly deserved, and Carver was prisoner of his inferiority complex. Notwithstanding this, our real accomplishment in biology and medicine; in history and law; and in the social sciences has been notable and widely acclaimed. To this in no little degree is due our physical survival, our falling death rate and our increased confidence in our selves and in our destiny.

Influence of American Press

The expression of Negro wish and desire through a free press has greatly improved as compared with 1900. We have a half dozen large weekly papers with circulations of a hundred thousand or more. Their news coverage is immense, even if not discriminating. But here again, the influence of the American press on us has been devastating. The predominance of advertising over opinion, the desire for income rather than literary excellence and the use of deliberate propaganda, had made our press less of a power than it could be, and leaves wide chance for improvement in the future.

In comparison with other institutions, the Negro church during the Twentieth Century has lost ground. It is no longer the dominating influence that it used to be, the center of social activity and of economic experiment. Nevertheless, it is still a powerful institution in the lives of numerical majority of American Negroes if not upon the dominant intellectual classes. There has been a considerable increase in organized work for social progress through the church, but there has also been a large increase of expenditure for building, furnishings, and salaries; and it is not easy to find any increase in moral stamina or conscientious discrimination within church circles.

The scandal of deliberate bribery in election of Bishops and in the holding of positions in the churches without a hierarchy has been widespread. It is a critical problem now as to just what part in the future the church among Negroes is going to hold.

* * *

Question of Social Equality

Finally there comes the question of social equality, which, despite efforts on the part of thinkers, white and black, is after all the main and fundamental problem of race in the United States. Unless a human being is going to have all human rights, including not only work, but friendship, and if mutually desired, marriage and children, unless these avenues are open and free, there can be no real equality and no cultural integration.

It has hitherto seemed utterly impossible that any such solution of the Negro problem in America could take place. The situation was quite similar to the problem of the lower classes of laborers, serfs and servants in European nations during the Sixteenth, Seventeenth and Eighteenth centuries. All nations had to consist of two separate parts and the only relations between them was employment and philanthropy.

That problem has been partly solved by modern democracy, but modern democracy cannot succeed unless the peoples of different races and religions are also integrated into the democratic whole. Against this large numbers of Americans have always fought and are still fighting, but the progress depite this has been notable. There are places in the United States, especially in large cities like New York and Chicago, where the social differences between the races has, to a large extent, been nullified and there is a meeting on terms of equality which would have been thought impossible a half century ago.

On the other hand, in the South, despite religion, education and reason, the color line, although perhaps shaken, still stands, stark and unbending, and to the minds of most good people, eternal. Here lies the area of the last battle for the complete rights of American Negroes.

* * *

There Are Disquieting Signs

Within the race itself today there are disquieting signs. The effort of Negroes to become Americans of equal status with other Americans is leading them to a state of mind by which they not only accept what is go[illegible]merica [illegible] and threaten[illegible] equally. This is p[illegible] the development of [illegible]rld culture.

After two world wars of unprecedented loss of life, cruelty and destruction, we are faced by the fact that the industrial organization of our present civilization has in it something fundamentally wrong. It went to pieces in the first world war because of the determination of certain great powers excluded from world rule to share in that rule, by acquisition of the labor and materials of colonial peoples. The attempt to recover from the cataclysm resulted in the collapse of our industrial system, and a second world war.

In spite of the propaganda which has gone on, which represents America as the leading democratic state, we Negroes know perfectly well, and ought to know even better than most, that America is not a successful democracy and that until it is, it is going to drag down the world. This nation is ruled by corporate wealth to a degree which is frightening. One thousand persons own the United States and their power outweighs the voice of the mass of American citizens. This must be cured, not by revolution, not by war and violence, but by reason and knowledge.

Most of the world is today turning toward the welfare state; turning against the idea of production for individual profit toward the idea of production for use and for the welfare of the mass of citizen. No matter how difficult such a course is, it is the only course that is going to save the world and this we American Negroes have got to realize.

We may find it easy now to get publicity, reward, and attention by going along with the reactionary propaganda and war hysteria which is convulsing this nation, but in the long run America will not thank its black children if they help it go the wrong way, or retard its progress.

Address Of Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois

at the St. Thomas Chamber of Commerce, 27 February, 1952.
At St. Thomas, V. I.

* NOTE: William E. Burghardt Du Bois, born at Great Barrington, Mass., 1863, was educater in the public schools, Fisk University (A. B.), Harvard (A. M. and Ph. D.), and University of Berlin. Teacher at Wilberforce and Atlanta Universities. His famous book, "The Souls of Black Folk," ranks with the best in literature. Much of Du Bois' prose is essentially poetic. His one great prose poem, "A Litany of Atlanta," "Done in the Day of Death, 1906," was wrung from his soul by the horrors of a race riot in which nearly a score of people, most of them innocent, were killed and wounded. According to world famed critics, "There is hardly a more powerful piece of writing in American literature; no student of English can afford to overlook it."

All my life the West Indies have fascinated my imagination. First, because on them my father's father was born and later because in the last 35 years I have from time to time travelled along the flowering peaks of this famous chain of submerged mountains whose heights [illegible] Club. Jamaica, Haiti, Puerto Rico with islands dis[illegible]ing southward to the windward seas. With the world I have felt increasingly the inherent paradox of this center of the work and play of modern human culture, beauty and poverty. This combination is not peculiar to the West Indies but in our day here lies in microcosm the problem of our time. How shall the work of man be carried on so as to make mankind happy and not for the most part miserable as has been true in the history of the world?

Of this struggle the West Indies have for five centuries been a deliberate laboratory where Europe experimented in organized industry first importing and impounding workers as tools, then, in the 19th century using them as wage earners and finally in the 20th beginning to wonder if in this area of the world there could arise a common wealth of free men skilled in modern technique and intelligent enough to carry on government by democratic methods and yet help and not hinder the economy of the world. Not that this is yet widely admitted, only its possibility is surveyed. And it must be contemplated because of the sheer logic of the situation; the equitable climate, the natural resources, the abundance of flower and fruit which from the first stamped these as the long sought fortunate isles of everlasting life.

Yet, try as we will to forget—and we do try—what has happened to this paradise? Every sort of cruelty and pain, war, murder and slavery, and such long drawnout hunger, disease and ignorance that the children of the West Indies have run away and sought refuge in every corner of the universe, robbing this land of its most valuable product: its own brain and blood which were and are more valuable than sugar, fruit, mahogany and fibre. This, even now, we do not quite believe. We still look upon the West Indies as sources of goods and not men, much less of the thought and feelings of men. This is direct heritage from the past when these islands became for the first the great source of European capital—that is, of good raised in order to obtain more and other goods and not for direct consumption by the worker or owner. Thus out of the West Indies arose that greatest discovery of modern times, the capitalist system on which modern civilization has been built. This system was not perfect as no human invention is or can be. So today in mid Twenthieth Century we find ourselves striving in blood and sweat to rescue the advantages of capitalism in order to use its miraculously increased power of production to abolish and not prolong poverty, disease and ignorance.

This world problem of all men and nations it not a foreign problem or a problem solely of vast nations. It is, on the contrary, especially the problem of such a community as this and reduces itself to a plain, pressing question; For what do the Virgin Islands exists? For the health and happiness of their people right here and now—workers and housewives, merchants and teachers and civil servants, or are they and must they be areas where Americans and British can make the largest returns by any methods they please to use? It is no longer possible to argue that what makes the largest profit for the foreign business man is necessarily the best policy for the Virgin Islander. Just as it is equally clear that unless the work of the Virgin Islander satisfies his own needs he will have no interest in it. Manifestly then, what must take place in West Indian industry is; that in this industry in what it does, whose wants it fills and how its income is distributed, the people of these islands must have voice and consideration. If they do have such voice there will eventually live on these islands a class of efficient workers skilled in modern technique and intelligent enough to know their real needs and seek them not in opposition but in cooperation with the peoples of the earth.

This is, of course, axiomatic, but many of you will see difficulties. Some will ask can you develop such workers in the Virgin Islands? This is but echo of that past which firmly believed that West Indians could never become a free working class. Others will ask but can workers effectively exercise any real voice in industry—determining what good shall be made, what wage shall be paid and what prices shall be charged? The general answer will be—No! And that answer will be given not only here but by some persons in almost every modern land. But this answer contradicts Democracy in which most intelligent men have long professed firmly to believe. For Democracy is voice in one's own government and government is that which rules your actions and what rules the action of human beings more completely than his work and the earning of a living? If a worker is to have no voice in industry by which he earns his living then he can never be a free citizen of a democracy. Many persons firmly and honestly believe this. They say "Yes" persons may vote, they may hold office, they may help make laws, but most men are not capable of helping plan and direct industry and even if they were they should not be permitted to do so. If this is true (and I am not pausing to argue this) I am simply saying that if it is true then let us stop talking about Democracy because democracy is impossible and we must continue to be ruled by small groups of men chosen by chance or wealth on the assumption that most men can work but cannot determine the work which they must do or share in the result which is rightly theirs. [illegible] if a community like this could [illegible] this conclusion, they must remember, and this is important [illegible] yoh [illegible] the world does [illegible] with it—that the [illegible] the 20th century is the rise of the working class not simply to a vote in political life but to voice and power in industry. This is especially true in the United States and Britain and more and more true in Eastern, Northern and Western Europe and slowly starting to be true in Asia and Africa. It is the meaning of what we call the modern labor movement, the rise of Trade Unions, the legislation for social uplift in housing, social security and wage—floors and particularly of universal compulsory education. Social uplift in the 20th century is not the philanthropy of the 19th, but the social power of the free worker.

At what then does the Virgin Islander today aim? Does he envisage a great people part of an island empire separated by green and shining waters yet united by the blood of Africa in culture and history working together to satisfy their needs under the severe discipline of modern technique and intelligent enough to recognize not

THE RED CROSS

Every public-spirited individual is familiar with the Red Cross and the work it does to relieve human suffering, but how many of us know that this organization, which has become internationally famous, derived its name from its emblem—a Greek cross on a white ba[illegible] ground—very simple [illegible] of chapters established into 1944, civilized countries of the world to world following a conference in Geneva in the year 1864. At that conference an international treaty was formulated the rules of which have served to carry medicine and food to friend and foe alike in times of war.

Most of us, however, are more familiar with the American Red Cross as founded by Clara Barton and which operates under a charter granted by the Congress of the United States on January 5, 1905 with the president of the United States as its customary head. This familiarity stems from the ever presence of this particular branch in this and surrounding areas in times of distress brought about by hurricanes, fires and earthquakes as well as for relief for economic destitution and public health services

The symbol of this organization has become a welcome sight at times of disaster, whether in peace or war.

Here is the Virgin Islands the work of the Red Cross has even more added significance. The help to stranded seamen, those made homeless by hurricanes and fires, the benefits derived by children whose parents are unable to provide such necessary items as eye glasses, dental care, milk and medicine as well as ass stance given to families of men who through economic reasons or induction into the armed forces are off the island bears witness to the public service rendered by this movement.

Today the 1952 Red Cross Fund Drive begins and as is customary everyone in the community will be approached for contribution toward reaching the quota as set for the Virgin Islands. Now more than ever it is imperative that every one make special efforts to contribute. The threat of war and the resultant conflicts and suffering lurks at our doorsteps. Remember the best way to meet disaster is by being prepared—the only way the Red Cross can be prepared to meet the occasion should it arise is by your contribution—Give now.

only their essential needs but the ways of planning their satisfaction in accord with the best interest of the human race? This will not be complete freedom. It will be discipline. It will not leave the kind of product and its price to be determined in London and New York exclusively but they will be determined with due regard to the wish of St. Thomas.

This result will be hard to plan and harder to achieve. That I grant you. But that it is imposible I deny in the face of all that the world has said and believed in the past and still widely and stubbornly clings to. Men here and elsewhere will attempt this ideal in different ways and with failure, setbacks and widely differing results. But the end is written in the stars. Human work is going increasingly, in the future to be guided by those who perform it and its results are going to be distributed justly among the participants in a democratic society We will preserve capital in order that labor may work efficiently but capital will not rule because capital is Things while workers are Men. Men will rule because they fulfill the wants of men and have the intelligence to know the value of these wants and how to meet them.

Such masters of industry will not be misled by the ideal of conceiving the West Indies merely as the playground of the idle rich but rather guide these islands towards a place where the man of moderate means and the sick of no means and the West Indians themselves may enjoy for reasonable sums this paradise of sun and sea. Above all a land where the workers gain by discipline, by free enterprise that is limited by public welfare and individual initiative that never lets your effort stop or discourage mine and thus leaves for the world that end of all life Art; that creative effort for fullness of sentiment and emotion, for Music and Dancing, for History and Fancy; for the higher and simpler life in which the human spirit blooms and unfolds.

Where else but right here, my masters, can man imagine a finer setting for those finer arts, which today stagger in war and drown in blood? Here it can begin! Here it can flower! Here and Now!

EMILE A. BERNE, Agent

Rosenberg clemency campaign is growing

public anxiety and to give assurance that those charged with the protection of vital information were alert and diligent in the performance of their obligations."

THERE'S NO DISPUTE: The government's admission that one of its important witnesses lied on the stand was minimized by the judge. The prosecution, in an affidavit, confirmed a defense charge that its "surprise" witness, produced on the last day of the trial to identify the Rosenbergs as a couple who had come to him for passport photos a few months earlier, had been taken secretly—and illegally—to court to look at the Rosenbergs the day before he took the stand. From the witness chair he swore he had not seen the Rosenbergs since he had taken their photos.

Judge Ryan conceded that the defense charge "is not disputed" but found there "was no motive of falsehood" and the lie "does not stamp the witness with perjury." The judge similarly dismissed impressive scientific testimony that the alleged atom-bomb secret had long been public knowledge.

DEATH HOUSE DIARY: Last month in his cell in Sing Sing's death house, Julius Rosenberg began a diary; after each day's entry he notes the number of days of life left to him and his wife. Throughout the document he maintains their absolute innocence, writes of the prosecution:

They wanted me to confess to crimes I did not do, to bear false witness against innocent people and to allow myself to be used as a tool to create anti-Soviet and anti-Communist propaganda to add to the hysteria and the cold war. . . . The only documentary evidence produced by the government to tie us up with this case was a tin collection can: "Save a Spanish Republican Child." . . .

This can was supposed to be used to collect funds to aid the innocent victims of . . . Franco. We admit we are ardent anti-fascists. Not only did we donate money to help refugees but we collected funds and signed petitions to aid the Republican cause.

I remember when the rebellion broke out in Spain, and my wife and I decided to help the Loyalists. Ethel had studied voice. She is a coloratura soprano and she sings beautifully. I had studied Spanish in college and I taught her the words to two songs: "Tango de las Rosas" and "Ay-ay-ay." Then, together with a few of our friends, we went to Times Square on Saturday night. Ethel sang these two Spanish songs and "No Pasaran," and the rest of us held the corners of a Spanish Republican flag. The people contributed generously, coins and dollar bills. The public was overwhelmingly in favor of the Republican Spanish cause. . . . For this we are condemned, with 42 days more left to live.

The remaining days to live were already under 30; but the fight for clemency was growing each day here and abroad. Preparations went ahead for a prayer vigil in Washington, D.C., on Jan. 4 even though permission to use the National Guard Armory, the capital's largest hall, was rescinded last week with no reason given. These were some of the new organizations and individuals joining the movement for clemency:

CHICAGO: The Student Government of the University of Chicago voted 19 to 16 to authorize letters and appeals to the President urging clemency. A meeting sponsored by the University of Chicago Committee on the Rosenberg Case heard Prof. Malcolm Sharp of the Law School:

If [the death sentence] is likely to do altogether disproportionate harm to our old conservative doctrines of liberty and free association, and make international settlement more difficult. . . .

The only intelligible theory on which this sentence could be based is one of deterrence. But the judge gave no attention to this and reverted to a primitive revenge theory. . . .

The sentence was never reviewed. It rests on the judgment of one judge, who revealed great emotional tension, and confusion of mind, and it is uniquely severe in peace time. . . . It will increase the tendency to attack anyone with political beliefs that are unpopular, and increase red-baiting and fear. These are very deplorable, and not counter-balanced by the spy peril.

The Southside Committee for Clemency made public an open letter to Mr. Truman signed by more than 80 prominent citizens of the community, including many University of Chicago educators.

WASHINGTON, D.C.: The Baptist Ministers Conference of Washington and Vicinity, in a letter signed by Rev. Edward Thomas, president, and Rev. E. C. Smith, chairman of the civic committee, wrote the President that the organization

. . . most humbly petitions you to temper justice with mercy in the case of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg. Since no one has ever paid with life for the crime of which they stand guilty, it is our prayer that these two be spared the supreme penalty.

NEWARK, N.J.: Four Essex County clergymen, including Rev. Dr. Arthur J. Dumper, dean of Trinity Cathedral, Newark, petitioned the President for clemency.

PABLO PICASSO
They remember Dreyfus

OAKLAND, CALIF.: The executive board of the East Bay Division of Local 6, Intl. Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union, adopted a resolution asking the President for clemency, and voted:

- To send a delegation to the Oakland Tribune protesting its refusal to accept a paid advertisement listing the signatures of hundreds of petitioners for clemency;
- To ask all shop stewards to circulate clemency petitions;
- To allow a speaker on the Rosenberg Case to appear before the next East Bay membership meeting.

TRADE UNIONS: Joseph P. Selly, intl. pres., American Communications Assn., in a letter to the President said that clemency

. . . would be greeted throughout the world by the Jewish people and by all people who will see in that generous act a sign of humanity and decency.

Other N.Y. unions that took action included the CIO United Shoe Workers Local 65; AFL Jewelry Workers Local 1; N.Y. Board of the Marine Cooks & Stewards; CIO Furniture Workers Local 140; and AFL Painters Local 704.

In Detroit the 218-member General Council of Ford Local 600 (57,000 members) of the United Auto Workers, CIO, adopted a resolution urging clemency.

CANADA & ENGLAND: From Canada came a petition signed by 15 Canadian war veterans, all with active service records in World War II.

From London came this letter from the Natl. Rosenberg Defense Committee adressed to Julius Rosenberg:

We are sending you our best wishes and greeting in this, your time of suffering. We are gathered at the Holborn Hall in London to protest against vicious witch-hunt, whose victims you are. The assembled 300 citizens of London will send their protest to the American Embassy tonight and demand a retrial of your case. We shall continue to fight for the retrial, for we know that your innocence can be proved.

FRANCE: In France the Rosenberg campaign took on proportions reminiscent of the great public outcry against the Dreyfus frame-up. The French Comm. for the Defense of the Rosenbergs includes Louis Aragon, leading poet; Fernand Leger, muralist, who decorated UN headquarters in New York; author Jean-Paul Sartre; screen actress Francoise Rosay; and Prof. Weill-Halle, member of the Academy of Medicine.

The committee was organized by the Movement Against Racism, Anti-Semitism and For Peace, whose honorary president is artist Marc Chagall. Other leading members include Gabriel D'Arbousier, vice-president of the French Assembly; Albert Bayet, president of the College of France; Aime Cesaire, Deputy; Yves Farges; Grand Rabbi Kaplan; and Alain Le Leap, secy.-gen. of the General Confederation of Trade Unions.

The official paper of the organization, Droit et Liberte (Right and Liberty), in its latest issue devoted almost three of its six pages to the Rosenberg case. It reported a capacity crowd of "several thousand" at a Rosenberg meeting in the Salle de la Mutualite Dec. 8. Pablo Picasso presided. Speakers included some of the top names in French public and professional life.

ITALY: Three winners of Italy's top literary award, the Primio Viareggio—Carlo Bernari, Marcello Venturoli and Renata Vigano—protested to Mr. Truman and to U.S. officials in Italy. For Ethel Rosenberg

"The cobblestones roused my interest for their variety of colors: red, blue, green and grey. Especially during the endless winter months, when one longs for a little bit of lively green, my color-thirsty eyes feasted on the brightness of these stones and drank their stimulation from them. More so now that summer's come: what wonders and excitement one can find between these stones. . . ."

Rosa Luxembourg: "Letters from Prison"

In defense of beasts

THE eruption of the epithet "goose" in the British parliament warns us of a possible movement bound sooner or later to take place. I am sure the geese, jackasses, rats, sheep, donkeys, mules, snakes, goats and elephants will sooner or later protest vigorously against the misuse of their names and misreading of their characters by human beings. I have a feeling that the friends of Mr. Shinwell ought certainly to be required to apologize, but not to Mr. Churchill; rather to all geese!

In my personal experience which extends back to early association with geese as a student in Germany, I have always found them exceedingly well-bred, dignified and much more consistent in their outlook upon the world than Mr. Churchill. I myself have been guilty of calling people "rats." I am afraid that that also is unfair to the average rat who, so far as I have known the breed, is not at all deceitful, but on the contrary rather frank, and prone to bite only when pushed into a corner.

THEN there is this matter of donkeys, mules and jackasses; terms used currently in a very derogatory way, implying ignorance and stubbornness. As applied to Congressmen and as a symbol for a current political party, they are grossly unfair. The donkey is, to be sure, democratic, but not Dixiecratic. The mule is more appropriate. Most of these animals, whom I have met, are placid and polite, having manners far better than the average American. They may not be classed as bright, but how many of us are today?

Elephants have a right to resent being used as examples of overweight or symbols of a political party which recently bought the Presidency at the highest price ever paid. For their own purposes elephants are of quite handy size; and fancy comparing these frugal beasts, satisfied with peanuts, with a party so in debt that the Chase National Bank is already foreclosing!

Snakes I would particularly defend. They are not sneaking, poisonous and hateful as men contend, but lively, silken and shy, and rarely carry poison; and then only in self-defense from cruel, clumsy Heels. Sheep have most deeply been maligned. Their skins formerly were universally used as evidence of high intellectual training. Lately, learning being cheaper, universities have for purely economic reasons substituted paper, but sheep had no hand in this and probably resented it. At any rate, instead of representing stupidity I would say that most sheep are conservative or perhaps even reactionary because of current subversive trends.

MUCH more could be said in this line, but what I am emphasizing just now is that a movement of these beasts, perhaps in a convention, could put up a pretty good defense against being continually maligned and caricatured by the general run of human beings; and could initiate a strong attack upon writers, members of Congress, legislators, and judges in particular.

I shall certainly attend such a convention when it is held, and put in a word of support even at the risk of being jailed for contempt of most of our current courts. After all, this habit of wholesale attack of human beings on beasts, birds and insects has got to stop. We may I suppose, if we wish, ruin our own rights, dignities and freedoms; but let us leave something decent in the world when we leave it after the Third World War.

OBITUARY

Robert Minor

ROBERT MINOR, artist, newspaperman, "winner of lost causes" in half a century of people's battles, died in New York Nov. 24 as the result of an ailing heart at the age of 68.

Texas-born Bob Minor had been one of the nation's best-known and highest-paid political cartoonists (San Antonio Gazette, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, N.Y. World). He foresook this career to become a people's journalist-artist—but did more than record the battles he saw; in many cases he led them. He suffered jail terms and beatings on picket-lines; once a court-martial sentenced him to death—for denouncing the intervention against the Russian revolution while serving as war correspondent. Among the many causes for which he fought were freedom for Tom Mooney and for the Scottsboro Boys, the rights of labor and the unemployed, and the Spanish Republic.

He was a founder of the U.S. Communist Party and when he died was helping the defense of its leaders on trial under the Smith Act. More than 1,000 gathered for funeral services Dec. 1 in New York's St. Nicholas Arena.

The American Negro in my time

Dot 32-33-0

W E B DU BOIS

The greatness of Dr. Du Bois comes from more than embracing the whole of modern Negro history within his own lifetime. He has written its basic chapters with "poetry and courage", with a vision sharpened by hatred of oppression wherever it occurs. On his eightieth birthday in February 1948, Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru cabled greetings which reflected a widespread feeling: "India remembers with gratitude your sympathy during her struggle for freedom".

I WAS born four years after the close of the American Civil War which abolished legal slavery of Negroes in the United States. My active life covers the time from 1890, when I received my Bachelor's Degree from Harvard, to the present.

A word must be said as to the prelude of my day. The North did not conquer the South in order to abolish slavery. The majority of Americans, including Abraham Lincoln, were willing for slavery to continue to exist in the South; but the North refused to let the South secede and thereby break up the economic and social unity of the nation. The North had become the centre of processing and manufacture. The South was an agricultural region, with its great crops of raw material like cotton, and minor crops like sugar. This union of cheap raw material and manufacturing was profitable to the North, while the South might have found a better market in Europe. But the North refused to have the union disrupted in this way.

In the ensuing Civil War, the North, in order to obtain victory, had to use the Negroes first as labourers and then as armed soldiers. For this reason the South surrendered. It was threatened by the loss of its labouring force which was supporting its soldiers in the field; and it knew that these black labourers could be turned into a million soldiers. In fact, 200,000 were under arms at the time of the surrender, and the South itself tried to attract Negro soldiers to its ranks. But it started too late and gave up in despair.

Thereupon, the South agreed to submit to continued economic and social unity with the North, but on condition that it was allowed to restore slavery in all but the name. There were three kinds of opposition to this programme. First, the resistance of the freedmen themselves, who had long revolted against slavery either by force or by running away and finally as soldiers in the war. Secondly, the pressure of a large group of Americans, white and Northern Negro, who were determined upon the abolition of slavery; and thirdly, by the organized industry of the North which feared that the restored South, with increased political power due to emancipation and by alliance will the agrarian West, would lower the tariff walls which had built up manufacturing in the North; and also might repudiate the war debt or add to it the debt of the States which had rebelled.

These three conditions led the nation to give the ballot to the freedmen in 1867, despite the often expressed warning that without education, land and some minimum of capital, the freedmen would never be able to defend their rights. The resulting bargain of 1877 between Northern financiers and Southern planters, resulted in the disfranchisement of the freedmen in the South by tacit agreement, and reduction of these freedmen to serfdom and colour caste, on condition that the political power of the South was to be used to retain high traiff rates and pay the National debt in gold.

There was thus created a new and unusual status: a democracy with more than a twelfth of its inhabitants disfranchised; a caste system depending on skin colour or previous condition of servitude, with resultant rotten boroughs whose power lay in political control based on disfranchisement. And in addition to this, a working class divided into two parts by colour and privilege, yet competing for the same jobs and wages; which meant of course that the lowest paid labour would oust the privileged white labour from much of its work. Hates, crime and violence developed in these ways.

In to this situation I was born and began my work.

There were in the United States in 1890 some 7½ million persons of acknowledged Negro descent who formed nearly 12 per cent of the total population. There were many other Americans of Negro descent with so small a proportion of Negro blood that they were not classed as Negroes. Also within the so-called Negro group there was a large proportion, officially stated as 15 per cent but probably 35 per cent or more, of persons who were descendants not only of Negroes but of European whites and of Indian.

As a group these people were poor, ignorant and diseased, chiefly as the result of the slave system which had existed legally for 271 years. By 1890, half the Negro breadwinners of the nation were partially submerged by a bad economic system, an unjust administration of the laws, and enforced ignorance. A million and three-quarters economically just above these, began fighting a fierce battle for admission to the industrial ranks of the nation—for the right to work. They were handicapped by their own industrial history, which has made them often shiftless and untrustworthy. A quarter of a million stood at the head of the Negroes, and by a peculiar self-protecting group economy were making themselves independent of prejudice and competition.

At the beginning of the twentieth century 2 million Negroes were occupied as farmers, a million as labourers and servants, and most of the rest as artisans of various sorts, with a few teachers and clergymen; making the total of Negroes in gainful occupations about 4 million. In the registration area, the Negro death rate was 30 per thousand, or nearly twice that of the whites; and as most of the Negro population lived outside this area, the discrepancy of the total Negro population was even greater. During the first decade of the new century, a concerted effort was made to strengthen a legal Negro caste system in the former slave states. This new caste separated Negroes in education, travel, on railways and streetcars and in the use of public facilities, like parks and railway stations; and limited or totally denied the right to vote. These laws applied principally to the South but customary action in accord with these laws was followed in many Northern states.

From this depth of half citizenship, the Negroes began to organize and fight for social progress. They first demanded political and civil equality, but as progress towards this was slow, they offered compromise. The first distinct proposal came from the Negro leader, Booker T. Washington, who in 1896 proposed that Negroes should cease to demand political rights and restrain their effort towards civil and social rights but ask for technical training for industry. This program received wide acquiescence from southern and northern whites and from some Negroes. But gradually it was opposed bitterly by a group of young Negroes who contended that: first, the Negro must have educated leadership in accord with the best modern methods; second, he must insist on political rights in order to meet the competition of white workers; and third, he must not give up his demand for civil and social rights. An organization taking this stand was formed at Niagara Falls in 1905, and issued a manifesto in 1906 demanding equal rights:

"We will not be satisfied to take one jot or tittle less than our full manhood rights. We claim for ourselves every single right that belongs to a freeborn American, political, civil, and social; and until we get these rights we will never cease to protest and assail the ears of America. The battle we wage is not for ourselves alone, but for all true Americans. It is the fight for ideals, lest this, our common fatherland, false to its founding, become in truth the land of the Thief and the home of the Slave—a by-word and a hissing among the nations for its sounding pretensions and pitiful accomplishment."

Three years later this movement merged into a larger movement known as the NAACP (the National Association for the Advancement of Coloured People). This united coloured and white people in one organization, which was incorporated in 1909. I was asked to come as Director of Publication and Research. I began my work by publishing and editing a small magazine called the Crisis, which was first issued in November 1910. It started with a circulation of 1000 and by 1918 we were selling over 100,000 copies a month.

With this organization of Propaganda, together with a legal bureau and with lectures and writers, the NAACP was able to organize one of the most effective assaults against prejudice and reaction which the modern world has seen. We placed before the country a clear-cut statement of the legitimate aims of the American Negro and the facts concerning his condition. We began to organize his political power. We started a campaign against lynching and mob law, and we gained a series of court victories before the highest courts of the land.

I attended the great Races Congress held in London in July, 1911, which would have marked an epoch in the cultural history of the world, if world war had not followed so quickly. Amongst the many Indian sponsors of this Congress were Bipin Chandra Pal, G. K. Gokhale, Surendranath Banerjee, and a modest barrister from Johannesburg known as Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi. The tone and scope of the Congress were set by an opening contribution from a scholar of truly remarkable learning and personality, Professor Brajendranath Seal.

Returning to New York, I faced the political campaign of 1912. The attitude of Taft, candidate of the Republican Party, was disappointing; but I thought that the Bull Moose movement under the first Roosevelt might be a refuge for us. I proposed this plank for the Chicago meeting in 1912:

"The Progressive Party recognizes that distinctions of race or creed in political life have no place in a democracy. Especially does the party realize that a group of 10,000,000 people who have in a generation changed from a slave to a free labour system, re-established family life, accumulated $1,000,000,000 of real property, including 20,000,000 acres of land, and reduced their illiteracy from 80 to 30 per cent, deserves and must have justice, opportunity and a voice in their own government. The party, therefore, demands for the Americans of Negro descent the repeal of unfair discriminatory laws and the right to vote on the same terms on which other citizens vote."

Jane Addams, Joel Spingarn and others supported it, but Theodore Roosevelt would have none of it. Woodrow Wilson became president of the United States, and I joined Bishop Walters of the African Zion Church to secure a statement of his attitude towards the Negro. He wrote over his signature "his earnest wish to see justice done to coloured people in every matter; and not mere grudging justice but justice executed with liberality and cordial good feeling. I want to assure them that should I become president of the United States they may count upon me for absolute fair dealing in everything by which I could assist in advancing the interest of their race in the United States."

For this reason I supported Wilson, and tried to induce as many Negroes as possible to do the same. But unfortunately, with his accession to the presidency in 1913, there opened for the American Negroes a period of six years of cruelty, discrimination and murder. This was because the southern democracy had come to power for the first time since the Civil War; because of resentment in the South against the NAACP; and especially because of increasing economic rivalry between white and coloured workers. No less than 20 bills advocating race segregation in various ways were introduced into Congress. In addition, Wilson segregated nearly all the federal coloured employees in Washington, herding them in separate rooms with separate eating and toilet facilities. When we protested, Wilson angrily dismissed the Committee and declared their language "insulting".

There followed a number of city ordinances segregating Negroes in housing, and in 1915 the United States seized Haiti and killed 3000 of its citizens. Then came the attack upon the American Negro in the film "Birth of a Nation"; mob murders had so increased that nearly 100 Negroes were lynched during 1915.

In 1917 we entered the world war and there came the draft with colour discrimination and mob rule. First, the nation refused to allow coloured soldiers to volunteer in the army. Then, when war was declared, the draftees were segregated according to colour which meant that some 83,000 Negro draftees had to train in separate encampments where almost no preparation had been made for them. Nearly all were sent South to be insulted under southern law and custom. Hundreds were drafted regardless of their home duties and physical health, and some draft boards like that of Atlanta had to be dismissed for open race discrimination. Once in camp most of the coloured soldiers were trained as labourers and not as soldiers. There have been few periods in the history of the American Negro when he was more discouraged and exasperated.

The NAACP fought back to secure decent treatment in encampments; to see that reasonable numbers of Negro soldiers went to the front as soldiers bearing arms; and to ask that some Negroes be commissioned as officers. The opposition to Negro officers was intense and bitter. A conference of Negro organizations was called in Washington and adopted resolutions which I wrote:

"We trace the real cause of this World War to the despising of the darker races by the dominant groups of men, and the consequent fierce rivalry among European nations in their effort to use darker and backward people for purposes of selfish gain, regardless of the ultimate good of the oppressed. We see permanent peace only in the extension of the principle of government by the consent of the governed, not simply among the smaller nations of Europe, but among the natives of Asia and Africa, the Western Indies and the Negroes in the United States."

Efforts were made in Washington to placate the Negroes. A Negro Civil Consultant was appointed in the War Department, and two Negro regiments planned. After much agitation, it was decided that since Negroes could not be trained in a regular officers' camp, a separate Negro camp should be instituted. This was resented by many leading Negroes, but finally in October 1917, 639 Negro officers were actually commissioned.

In 1917 migration of Negro workers out of the South began in order to man the war industries in the North. Perhaps a quarter of a million came North during the year, and as a result this was a time of division and hesitation among the coloured people. I felt it in my own thought. I tried on the one hand to be patriotic and ask Negroes to "close ranks" and wholeheartedly join in the war. On the other hand I refused to give up criticism and complaint. I tried to have the voice of Africa and the Negro people heard during the Congress of Versailles; and through the French Black Deputy from Senegal I succeeded in holding a Pan-African Congress in Paris in February 1919, with some 57 delegates from various groups of Negroes.

I discovered during my sojourn there a less than human document which the Americans had issued to guide the French in treating the Negroes. I had it published in the Crisis, and for a time our mailing privileges were withdrawn. Then they were hastily restored, and we sold 100,000 copies of the Crisis that month.

The year 1919 was for the American Negro one of extraordinary reaction. There were two causes: the competition of Negro workers pouring into Northern industry, while the South was deprived of its customary cheap labor; and the resentment of American soldiers, especially those from the South, at the recognition which Negroes received in the World War. There were during the year race riots in 46 American cities. In Chicago in August 38 Negroes were killed, between 35 and 50 in Arkansas, and 6 in Washington. For a whole day the city of Washington in July was actually in the hands of a black mob fighting with hand grenades against the aggression of whites.

The NAACP thereupon staged the determined fight against lynching. A national conference was held in New York City; and among those who signed the Call was an ex-President of the United States, an Attorney General and Governors of seven states. The chief speaker at Carnegie Hall was the Chief Justice of the United States. We gained victories before the Supreme Court in the Grandfather Case of 1916, the Segregation Case of 1917, and the Arkansas Case; and in the freeing of Dr. Sweet, who had been sentenced to death in Detroit for defending his home against a mob.

Between 1918 and 1928, I made four trips to Europe in addition to the three made before 1918: to France during the Congress of Versailles; to England, Belgium, France and Geneva during the earliest days of the League of Nations; to Spain, Portugal and Africa in 1923 and 1924; to Russia in 1926.

Meanwhile the American Negro population was changing. The nine million of 1900 had grown to thirteen million in 1940 and probably fifteen million in 1950. White immigration had reduced its ratio to the total population from one-twelfth to one-tenth, but that tenth was a far more powerful body in education and income than the twelve per cent of 1900. By migration, 30 per cent of the Negro population was now in the Northern states instead of ten per cent as at the beginning of the century. The Negro death rate decreased markedly, but was still much higher than that of the whites. Most important, however, was the development of economic and social classes among Negroes. A professional and business class had arisen, with incomes from $3,000 to $50,000 a year, and with it grew up the clerical, artisan, domestic and labouring classes. About half of the Negro population now lives in cities, a great change from the 23 per cent in 1900. But the rural Negroes are still very poor, and of the total Negro group, city and country, in 1940, 49 per cent had annual incomes of less than $500 a year, compared with 17 per cent of the whites. The Second World War improved the condition of Negroes by increasing employment and entrance into trade unions. Meanwhile the education of Negroes increased. Before 1914, less than 5,000 Negroes had received the bachelor's degree, while over 6,000 received such degrees in the single year 1947. Illiteracy has fallen from 44 per cent in 1900 to perhaps 20 per cent or less to-day.

These vast social changes have brought new and intricate problems of development. American Negroes have now entered the current of world affairs. Their labouring classes are part of the labour of the world; their incipient capitalists are part of world capital investors. Their intelligentsia are among the thinkers of the world. They no longer form a group entirely segregated and apart; indeed they are no longer one solid group or so far as they are, their inner struggle parallels the struggle of the modern world.

In 1936, through a grant given me by the Oberlaender Trust, I made another trip to Europe for purposes of study. I spent five months in Germany, and a second visit of ten days in Russia which took me across the whole land from Moscow to Otpur. I had short visits in Manchuria, China and Japan and came home by way of Hawaii.

It is difficult for me to realize what has happened to the world since 1940. Ten years have passed: the most fateful and arresting in the history of modern civilization. I have found myself forced on conflicting currents but, on the other hand, I have become more and more convinced as to the future path which the world and my people ought to follow. My belief in Socialism, in the social control of wealth and state ownership of capital has become firm. After three trips to Russia (the last in 1949), I consider the Soviet Union the most hopeful of modern states; and with it I couple the People's Republic of China and the new governments of Poland, Czechoslovakia and the Balkans. I am deeply sensitive, at once, of the terrible struggle which these countries have had to establish their regimes, and of the numberless mistakes and crimes which have been committed during the revolution. I am not at all sure that any smaller toll of blood could have brought the present result.

Yet I do not believe that, in the economic revolution through which the present world is bound to go, force or violence is necessary. Mankind surely is coming to the stage when great and revolutionary change can be brought about by reason and peace. Indeed, that seems to me to be the only conclusion to which men can come now that we are on the threshold of a Third World War which may destroy present civilization. Peace is not an object in itself; it is a method, a path to an ideal. We who ask for peace, and peace now, do not for a moment believe that peace will settle all or any of the deep and serious differences between men and nations. What we insist upon is that by no other method save peace can we be in a position to begin the settlement of world problems. Happily, I have gathered from many signs that this is also the feeling of the peoples and governments of India, China and most of the Asian nations.

So American Negroes face a new change in their problems. We have today more than ever before among us the rich, the well-to-do and the poor. And we have got to face this problem as most of the rest of the world has faced it. If we are wise, we will realize that the day of exploitation of the poor by the rich is passing: we must socialize our wealth. We must take up the cause of the masses; we must submit to that discipline which is going to result in a more equitable distribution of wealth among us; we must work for the abolition of poverty and its natural concomitants: ignorance, disease and crime. This is the new problem which faces the American Negro,—the problem which many other coloured and colonial peoples have already faced. We have not yet frankly faced it, but as I look back upon the struggles of my time I feel sure that we will.

Unfortunately, I was born poor—and coloured—and almost all the prettiest roses I have seen have been in rich people's yards —not in mine. That is why I cannot write exclusively about roses and moonlight—for sometimes in the moonlight my brothers see a fiery cross and a circle of Klansmen's hoods. Sometimes in the moonlight a dark body swings from a lynching tree—but for his funeral there are no roses.

"MY BELIEFS ARE NONE OF YOUR BUSINESS"

Dr. Du Bois insists State Dept. give him passport

Early last June, Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, distinguished American historian and scholar, a Fellow of the American Assn. for the Advancement of Science, received an invitation to Poland. It came from the organizers of World Festival of Youth and Students for Peace and Friendship, scheduled for Warsaw July 31-Aug. 14. The letter to Dr. Du Bois (he will be 88 in February) said in part:

"As you know, it is expected that 30,000 young people, from over 100 countries, will come together at this Festival to express their desire to live side by side with one another in peace and friendship.

"It would be a great honor for us, and a source of tremendous encouragement and inspiration to young people everywhere, if you were able to be with us in Warsaw, and we sincerely hope that you will be able to take advantage of our invitation. Your activities for peace and human brotherhood are known and admired by young people in all countries.

"We look forward to receiving your reply at the earliest possible moment."

* * * *

On June 7 Dr. Du Bois applied for a passport. He has held American passports since 1892, but has been denied one since January, 1952. On July 2 he received a communication from Frances G. Knight, director of the Passport Office of the State Dept., dated July 1. Following are excerpts from Mrs. Knight's letter:

"I regret to inform you that after careful consideration of your application for passport facilities, the Department of State is obliged to disapprove your request tentatively on the ground that the granting of such passport facilities is precluded under the provisions of Section 51.135 of Title 22 of the Code of Federal Regulations. . . .

"In your case the Department has concluded that your case falls within the scope of Sections (a) and (c) of the aforementioned Regulations since it is alleged that you are a Communist and as the Congress which you wish to attend is Communist inspired.

"Under Section 51.137 of the Regulations you may present your case and all relevant information informally to the Passport Office. If you desire to take advantage of this provision you may appear before a hearing officer of the Passport Office and you may be represented by counsel. In such case, you will be required to submit a sworn statement as to whether you are now or ever have been a Communist.

"If you do not desire a hearing, the Department will give consideration to any written statement under oath which you may desire to submit concerning the matter, provided that you include therein a statement as to whether you are now or ever have been a Communist.

"If a reply to this letter is not received within 30 days, it will be assumed that you do not wish to have your case reconsidered at this time."

On July 13, Dr. Du Bois sent this letter to Mrs. Knight:

"I regard the reasons which you give as both illegal and personally insulting. For 60 years I have held passports from the United States, beginning with Passport No. 42015, issued June 24, 1892, by the Acting Secretary of State, William F. Wharton. With these passports I have made 13 trips to Europe and visits to Asia, Africa and the West Indies. During this time I have never been accused of crime and have received recognition of many kinds, including the rank of United States Special Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to the Republic of Liberia.

FIGHTERS BOTH
Dr. Du Bois with the late Vito Marcantonio

"My continued and continuing advocacy of world peace once brought the demand that I register as a Foreign Agent. I refused, was indicted and acquitted by a Federal Court.

"The regulations of your department which you adduce are not statute law, but represent the effort of the State Department to arrogate to itself the judicial right to inquire into and judge my political beliefs and opinions. This is an unconstitutional assumption of power. As a free American citizen, I maintain that it is none of your business what I believe or think so long as I transgress no law. Nor will I be intimidated by secret "allegations" of unnamed informers which have no stature in law.

"I therefore absolutely refuse to sign or submit to you or anyone else any affidavit concerning my beliefs nor have you any right to decide what lawful assemblies I shall attend or whose voices I shall listen to.

"I therefore repeat my demand for a passport, in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, the laws of the land and the decision of the courts. Further refusal will confirm my conclusion that you are resting your hope for continued illegal procedures on the cost of litigation which you assume only the rich can afford."

* * * *

Late in July, shortly before the Festival was to open, Dr. Du Bois received from Mrs. Knight a reply to his letter. There was no date on the Knight letter. It said:

"The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of July 13, in regard to your passport case. The matter is being given careful consideration and you will be advised as soon as a decision is reached."

* * * *

In response to this letter, which ignored Dr. Du Bois' indictment of the Passport Office, Dr. Du Bois wrote on Sept. 8:

"Referring to your letter without date, may I say that in my application for a passport, June 7, 1955, I asked to attend the World Festival of Youth in Warsaw, July 31 to Aug. 14, 1955; and also to visit Czechoslovakia and other countries for reasons of health and recreation.

"You have delayed decision on my passport until the World Festival with 30,000 youth from 114 nations is over. This was, I assume, deliberate on your part. Nevertheless, I write to say that my application for a passport still stands and I wish to repeat my application to visit Poland, the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Germany, France and England for health and recreation. My wife wishes to accompany me. In accord with your letter of mid-July without date, may I ask for a decision in my case as soon as possible."

* * * *

There the matter stood at presstime: Mrs. Knight had not yet replied. As in the case of Paul Robeson, the State Dept. has raised a wall to contain our country's noblest cultural figure at a time when the President of the United States has been pleading with socialist nations to improve cultural relations between East and West.

And the world looks on.

AMERICANS!

Let's restore democracy to America

By W. E. B. Du Bois

TO YOUR TENTS, AMERICANS! We have gone far enough into this morass of fear, war, hate, lying and crime. We face a crisis and our first great duty is here and now.

For the time being, never mind the Soviet Union; forget China; ignore Germany!

Come back home and look at America.

Come back to the problem of American Negroes which we have muddled over for 300 years.

• In 1655 Spain laid plans for bringing to America 3,000 black men from Africa each year. The colonizers ignored Las Casas who worked for the abolition of slavery in Spanish America, and knighted John Hawkins in his slave ship, called the "Jesus."

• In 1755, new, free America held 300,000 black folk, nearly a fourth of the total population, in human slavery; we ignored Milton, Baxter and Burke and refused to stop the African slave trade.

• In 1855, the Supreme Court was about to declare that, from the birth of the nation, Negroes had no rights which a white man was bound to respect; and the South was ready to risk Civil War to make slave territory of the whole United States.

There followed a century of war, violence and Color Caste, until the nation ashamed, started back toward Democracy. Lynching reached climax and declined; Negroes were disfranchised and then began to vote and hold office; Negro education increased, but not as fast as it should increase. Then, in 1954, the Supreme Court declared race segregation in public education was unconstitutional because it retarded education.

• In 1955, murder, violence and economic repression began to increase, especially in Mississippi, and also widely throughout that part of the nation which once fought for human slavery and long refused to obey the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution. Southern governors and United States senators threatened to nullify the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court.

What are we going to do about it? There is but one right path: the restoration of democracy in the United States.

WE ARE TOLD that we can do nothing: that South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas, as well as many parts of other Southern states, are superior to the people of the U. S.; and that as the Justice Dept. of the U. S. has just said, when a 14-year-old black boy is murdered in Mississippi, and no one is punished, the nation is powerless.

Is that true?

We have argued at length on the power of the Federal government and of the states. It is the considered opinion of the nation that the state and the locality should be responsible for local government, while the Federal government deals with the larger over-all matters which cannot be of simply local concern. But this means that the democracy which the Federal government, by virtue of Article 4, Section 4 of the Constitution, must guarantee each state, must be enforced in each state; that the people of the locality must have a voice in their own government and choose their own officials.

In that county of Mississippi where the boy Till was murdered, the majority of the population have no right to vote. They have no voice in the legisture or city councils. They sit on no juries. They do not share

McMANUS AND ARONSON CALLED AGAIN

McCarthyism revival seen in Eastland press probe

THE SENATE Internal Security subcommittee, headed by Sen. James Eastland (D-Miss.) set Jan. 4 for the opening of public hearings in its continuing witch-hunt of the press.

Summoned to appear at 1:30 p.m. in Room 318 of the Senate Office Building in Washington on opening day are the GUARDIAN's general manager John T. McManus and executive editor James Aronson.

Last month McManus and Aronson, along with 35 other New York newspaper employes and veteran members of the N. Y. Newspaper Guild appeared before the committee in closed session. One reason for the assault on the press was given last week by N. Y. Daily News columnist John O'Donnell (12/27):

> "This investigation has as its background frequent charges (some soundly justified, in this reporter's opinion) that news reports of the early hearings held by the late Sen. McCarran of Nevada . . . and the later hearings by Sen. McCarthy were given a false emphasis and twisted interpretation, in print and on the air, when they finally reached the eyes and ears of great segments of the republic."

TOTAL SERVITUDE: Of all New York dailies only the N. Y. Post has denounced the hearings. In an editorial (12/27) the Post quoted O'Donnell ("whose relations with the Eastland Committee are notoriously intimate") and charged the hearings were a "punitive expedition" against the press which had criticized "excesses of the Congressional inquisitors." The editorial then sounded the alarm:

> "If the U. S. press is prepared to have its news-columns policed by Senator Eastland of Mississippi and John O'Donnell of the News, it is headed for total servitude. It is time for publishers and editors to stand up and be counted. The silence has already been disgracefully long."

As the hearings approached there seemed to be an effort to recreate the mood and settings of the McCarthy era. Between Christmas and New Year's Day, the Eastland Committee issued a "Handbook for Americans" covering "The Communist Party in the United States of America—What It Is—How It Works." In it the committee answers its own questions from its own previous witch-hunts, lists "most typical sponsors of front organizations," tells how to spot a "sympathizer" and defends the use of informers.

"RADICAL RIGHT": Also during the holiday week, the Times, singled out for attack by the witch-hunt, published a three-column survey of "detention camps" established under the McCarran Act to hold "security risks" in time of national emergency. The Times reported six camps ready to accommodate 5,000 immediately; "thousands more could be put in detention camps as fast as they were rounded up." While dis-

A PETITION FOR AMNESTY

Prominent citizens ask President to free jailed Smith Act victims

SINCE WORLD WAR I it has become almost traditional that U. S. political prisoners (a category not recognized by U. S. governments since the Civil War) go to jail under Democratic presidents and are freed by Republican presidents. When amnesty for political prisoners has been proclaimed it has been almost always at Christmas time.

In line with this tradition, a group of 46 prominent U. S. citizens, including Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, on Dec. 20 petitioned President Eisenhower for a Christmas amnesty for 16 Communist leaders still serving prison sentences under Smith Act convictions, and for a postponement in the cases of 180 others who are currently on trial or awaiting trial or whose cases are on appeal.

The petitioners acted independently (their appeal came as a surprise to the Communist Party) and each one signed as an individual. They stressed their "fundamental disagreement with the philosophy of the Communist Party and with essential elements in its program" but said they are "motivated . . . by their attachment to the democratic way of life." They asked that sentences of those still in prison be commuted to time served.

NEW TREND: The appeal noted that several of the prisoners are elderly and ill, and that their trials "were carried through in a period of the 'cold war' and in an atmosphere often marked by hysteria." They quoted a dissenting opinion of Supreme Court Justice Hugo L. Black in 1951 in which he emphasized that none of the Smith Act defendants had been charged with acts aimed at overthrowing the government but were accused only of planning sometime "in the future to teach and advocate the forcible overthrow of the government."

STARTED BY MUSTE: Signers included Norman Thomas, six times the Socialist Party's candidate for President; Henry Steele Commager, Prof. of History at Columbia; Elmer Rice, playwright; and Lewis Mumford, author.

The amnesty appeal was initiated by the Rev. A. J. Muste, secretary emeritus of the Fellowship of Reconciliation. A pacifist, the Rev. Muste himself was given a suspended jail sentence last week as one of 20 persons who defied an air raid drill last summer by refusing to take shelter. He enlisted the support of Thomas, Mumford and six others, including Dean John C. Bennett of Union Theological Seminary, who, as an initiating committee, solicited the other signatures.

The 16 still in prison are:

Alexander Bittelman, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Philip Frankfeld, Betty Gannett, Gus Hall, V. J. Jerome, Arnold S. Johnson, Albert F. Lannon, George Meyers. Jacob Mindel, Pettis Perry, Carl Ross, Sid Stein, Robert Thompson, Louis Weinstock, and William W. Weinstone.

BACK TO JEFFERSON: First great campaign for amnesty for political prisoners in the U. S. came in 1798 in behalf of victims of the Alien & Sedition Laws. It was a key issue in the election in 1800 of Thomas Jefferson, who nullified the laws and freed all those jailed under them.

In 1886 four Haymarket Martyrs in Chicago were executed, but an amnesty campaign won a commutation of sentence to life imprisonment for four others, who were eventually pardoned by Gov. John Peter Altgeld in 1893.

During World War I thousands of political dissenters, war resisters, pacifists, unionists and radicals of all opinions were imprisoned, but by 1924 all of them were freed. They were all prosecuted under President Woodrow Wilson who refused to intercede for any of them after the war. Biggest campaign was waged in behalf of Socialist leader Eugene V. Debs, who was sentenced to 10 years for opposing the war. On Christmas Day, 1921, Republican President Warren G. Harding released Debs and 23 other political prisoners. Harding's successor, Calvin Coolidge, released the last of the wartime prisoners during Christmas, 1923. (In 1937 President Roosevelt issued full pardons to a number of the World War I victims.)

In 1936 California Gov. Olsen pardoned Tom Mooney who had been framed 20 years earlier during the hysteria of World War I. In the early part of World War II President Roosevelt pardoned Earl Browder, then head of the Communist Party, who was serving a sentence under a charge of violating passport regulations.

OTHER SIGNERS: Following are other signers of the Smith Act amnesty plea:

'No reaction'

THE PRESIDENT and his Attorney General weren't unmindful of the Christmas spirit of forgiveness. On Dec. 23 Mr. Eisenhower gave full pardons to 42 persons who had long since served their full sentences for what the N. Y. Times called "relatively minor felonies." One of those pardoned was a man convicted of manslaughter in 1898. A soldier who shot an elderly German couple to death after they gave him a ride as a hitch-hiker had his death sentence commuted to 55 years at hard labor.

White House press secretary James C. Hagerty told reporters that he had heard "no reaction" to the appeal for amnesty for the Smith Act victims.

THE NEW YORK PROTEST AGAINST THE TILL MURDER

Let's restore democracy to America

in the election of Sheriff H. C. Strider, in whose hands the enforcement of the law lies.

Till was murdered in the Third Congressional District of Mississippi; in that district live 412,547 persons of whom in 1950, 308,752 were colored. There were 270,000 persons of voting age in this district. Yet Frank E. Smith, the U. S. Congressman, was chosen in 1950 in an election where 7,058 voted. Compare this with the Third Congressional District of New York, with a population of 317,414 persons in 1950; here in the election which chose L. W. Hall, 164,341 persons voted. In Mississippi most Negroes and many whites did not vote.

If the Negroes of the county where Till was murdered had the right to vote, his murderers would be punished. If we are trying to recognize state rights and refusing to impose Federal enforcement of local law and order on states, counties and towns, then democratic government must prevail in these states, and the government must not be solely in the hands of local landlords and merchants, while labor is largely held in peonage.

THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT to the Constitution of the United States says:

> 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of Electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State. [The 19th Amendment in 1920 barred denial of the right to vote on account of sex.—Ed.]

What right have representatives from Mississippi to sit in Congress and legislate for the nation, so long as democracy is denied most of her citizens?

The failure of national democracy in one state means its failure in the nation.

The South has refused to make the Negro really free despite the 13th Amendment; despite the 14th Amendment, the South has disfranchised most Negroes and still counts them as the basis of its representation in Congress. So that for years the South (which is the most poverty-stricken, most ignorant and most diseased part of the United States) has in Congress at least three times the political power of the North and West.

In spite of this, in the face of this, we boast to the world of our democracy. We stand ready to teach democracy to the world.

DOES THE WORLD BELIEVE US? If it does, then we cruelly deceive it as to what democracy can accomplish if it has a real chance.

If the world does not believe our boasting, then we are wasting our strength in war, murder and destruction, crying for a democracy which we do not ourselves possess.

To your tents, Americans!

Set your own house in order before you try to rule the world, or to buy its submission with five billion dollars in foreign subsidies.

W. E. B. Du BOIS BEGINS HIS SERIES

The Negro in America today

By W. E. B. Du Bois

THERE IS CURIOUS and puzzling contradiction in current reports on the status of the Negro in the United States. It is said on the one hand that his progress is marvellous and his present status so encouraging that time and patience will soon see the Negro recognized in law and custom as an American, with all the rights enjoyed by other Americans.

In support of this view are cited the increasing number of Negro voters and office-holders; the recent decisions of the Supreme Court against segregation; and a general disposition in the nation to recognize the Negro as a citizen.

Contradicting this view is the fact that Negro suffrage is progressing but slowly and the Negro vote is still practically suppressed in many states; that in the South the Negro fills almost no public offices; and that murder, lawlessness, economic oppression and injustice in the courts are still the lot of millions of Negroes; that segregation in schools still remains in most of the South, and complete nullification of the Supreme Court decision is bitterly advocated.

NO NATIONAL SURVEY: The solution of this contradiction lies in the fact that it is true that the emergence of American Negroes from slavery in 1863 to partial freedom 90 years later is remarkable and hopeful. But it is equally true that American Negroes are not free compared with the working classes of the Western world or of the Soviet Union and China; that white color caste in some groups and places, especially in the North and West, has largely disappeared, yet in general it still prevails widely in the South; and it is true that as a group the Negro is poor, ignorant and sick, despite his struggles. He has difficulty in getting work and his wage is invariably substandard. In considerable portions of the United States, it is no exaggeration to say that a Negro still gets less consideration than a dog.

Just what the total situation is, reduced to actual facts and figures, nobody knows exactly and everybody guesses broadly. The United States as a nation has doggedly refused to conduct or encourage a scientific and complete study of the Negro population, because it feared to face the facts, whether favorable or discouraging. The national census deliberately hides the total picture. Twice Atlanta University has proposed and begun such a study: in 1896 to 1914, and again in 1941-44. In neither case could adequate support and cooperation be secured.

SECURITY IN ISOLATION: Many individual and group studies have been made, culminating in the Gunnar Myrdal report in 1944; nevertheless, today, no one can say with accuracy how far and how fast the Negro is escaping color caste. This is to the shame of American social science. Faced with an unusual opportunity for a laboratory test of human development; with a great group, so segregated by color and social conditions as to be easily made the object of observation and measurement, the opportunity has been deliberately and continuously neglected.

Negroes themselves do not know their condition. They live in widely differing localities and social environments. Wherever they live and under whatever circumstances, they make desperate effort, by protective isolation and careful compliance with public opinion, to achieve security and comfort.

A Negro in Atlanta sends his children to separate schools, attends a separate church, lives largely in sections of the city separate from whites. He pursues limited and largely separate occupations, and is paid lower wages for the same kind of work than whites get. He buys at stores, but is careful to frequent those stores where he knows his patronage is wanted, and where he will be fairly treated. Even in these he will not attempt to eat lunch or try on shoes or hats. He does not frequent parks or theaters except in very special circumstances. In fact, he lives in a world largely Negro; but there he is unmolested and may have a comfortable and successful life. If asked, he declares that he meets little or no race friction, which is true.

NEGROES IN THE NORTH: The city group of Negroes is recruited increasingly by influx from the rural districts. This migration is so large and continuous that while 77% of the Negro population was rural in 1900, in 1950 only 38% were in the country districts. This brings new city problems of crime and delinquency. In the rural communities and the small towns in the lower South, six million Negroes are still near slavery in many districts. They are running away to cities at the rate of tens of thousands a year. Discrimination in housing, North and South, by law and covenant, has been widespread and still prevails despite court decisions.

In the North, Negroes are mainly in the large cities. There the limitations are fewer, but they exist. In New York their chances to earn a living have increased since World War II but still are limited; there are certain jobs for which they do not apply; in the jobs they hold they can seldom expect high pay or promotion. The mass of ordinary workers keep largely to themselves; they do not in any large numbers go to downtown theaters, restaurants or places of amusement; they seldom go to a white church; they join few public organizations. They live largely in a colored world.

SOCIAL BARRIERS HOLD: The well-to-do Negroes move more freely, but not widely; they can enter the more expensive hotels; they can be served at most restaurants but they are not always welcome and realize it; they are invariably refused at summer resorts, at recreation centers and usually at automobile camps; and are not too welcome at many public assemblies. Not a single Negro in New York City has ever become a member of a recognized social club, despite the fact that Negroes have often gained high political position and many have wealth and culture.

They have recently gained high political office—a federal judge; three colonial governors; Congressmen and ministers to foreign lands; state senators; City Councilmen, city judges, Borough President in New York City, etc. Still, in most cases, they are careful not to appear at social functions where their presence might be unwelcome. There have been several instructors in the large universities and a few professors, but not many.

Negroes have advanced in art, especially music; less in literature; considerably in science and the profes[illegible] though in the latter case they are largely confine[illegible] tice among Negroes.

NEXT WEEK: Economic classes among Negro[illegible]

COLOR CASTE AND SOCIAL EQUALITY

How united are Negroes?

By W. E. B. Du Bois

THE OUTSTANDING FACT about the Negro group in America, which has but lately gained notice, is that it is flying apart into opposing economic classes. This was to be expected. But most people, including myself, long assumed that the American Negro, forced into social unity by color caste, would achieve economic unity as a result, and rise as a mass of laborers led by intelligent planning to a higher unity with the laboring classes of the world.

This has not happened. On the contrary, and quite logically, the American Negro is today developing a distinct bourgeoisie bound to and aping American acquisitive society and developing an employing and a laboring class. This division is only in embryo, but it can be sensed.

FRANKLIN FRAZIER
It was published in French

In New York the Negro families receiving an income of $5,000 and more a year form about 10 per cent of the Negro population. That means that they have an income of at least $30,000,000 a year which puts some of them into the capitalist class. On the other hand, there are at least 50,000 Negro families in the city whose income is less than $1,000 a year, which is near pauperism. They are open to exploitation and crime.

THE NEGRO BUSINESSMAN: In the 18th century, the Negro slaves and freedmen were guided within by Negro religious preachers in church units. Then, in the 19th century, they developed leaders in the Abolition movement. After emancipation they had the intelligent leadership of preachers, teachers and artists who, together with philanthropic black men of affairs, guided and advised the group.

But from 1910 until after the First World War, Negro businessmen forged to the front and today they form the most powerful class among Negroes and dominate their thought and action. This class bases its ideals on American business methods and aims. They spend conspicuously, organize for widespread social enjoyment and extravagance and regard the private profit motive as the end of thought and life.

The 300 or more Negro newspapers, with few exceptions, are mouthpieces of this bourgeoisie and bow to the dictates of big business which monopolizes newsprint, world news and credit facilities. Franklin Frazier, a leading American sociologist, once president of the American Sociological Society, has recently emphasized the significance of this development in his Bourgeoisie Noire, published in French in the Librairie Plon, in Paris.

THE NEGRO WORKER: Negro public opinion is thus tied to current American thought either by reasons of security or sometimes by direct money bribery, especially during political campaigns. The dream among the intelligentsia of an independent Negro vote devoted to Negro progress, has therefore largely disappeared except under stress of some particular outrage like the Till murder.

Class differentiation in Negro organizations is developing more slowly than in general life. In the church organizations there is a distinction between the churches of the very poor and ignorant and those of the well-to-do. But in the latter the main support comes from the workers; and in control the physician often shares office and power with the janitor and porter.

In a mass organization like the NAACP, the bulk of support from the beginning has come from the working class. Recently the well-to-do and rich have notably increased their contributions. It is still the dollars of the poor which support the organization and keep it a popular movement, except in some localities. The Negro control of the organization also is still the domain of the Negro intelligentsia rather than the businessman.

Opposite the small Negro bourgeoisie is the great mass of black labor. It is at present only vaguely aware of its conflict of interest with the Negro businessman. This businessman employs a considerable number of Negroes and exploits them quite as much and often more than whites because of the limited jobs open to Negroes. As, however, the Negro laborer joins the white unions, he is drawn into the great labor movement and begins to recognize black business exploitation. But the main mass of American labor is at present in conservative unions under reactionaries like Meany. So far as these unions admit Negroes, the Negroes follow the reactionary philosophy of the white.

Here the black, like the white, is restrained by charges of subversion and fear of loss of jobs.

NEGRO HISTORY WEEK

Democracy in America

port of the Declaration, heralding these self-evident truths, they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. . . . And now the moment has come when these vows must be fulfilled to the letter. In securing the Equal Rights of the freedman, and his participation in the Government, which he is taxed to support, we shall perform those early promises of the Fathers, and at the same time the supplementary promises only recently made to the freedman as to the condition of alliance and aid against the Rebellion. A failure to perform these promises is moral and political bankruptcy . . ."

So in 1876 this nation went into moral bankruptcy; democracy languished and freedom was lynched. Gradually political democracy was disowned of its own children. Walter Lippmann has just voiced this repudiation:

"Where mass opinion dominates the government, there is a morbid derangement of the true functions of power. The derangement brings about the enfeeblement, verging on paralysis, of the capacity to govern. This breakdown in the constitutional order is the cause of the precipitate and catastrophic decline of Western society. It may, if it cannot be arrested and reversed, bring about the fall of the West."

NO, NO! THIS IS NOT HISTORY; it is the fiction which the people of this nation are hearing today from men who prostitute their brains for wealth and security. Democracy planned to educate the mass of people so that they would understand life, rescue, discover, and cultivate talent and genius and let science and art lead the people to the promised land; until the day when the average man would not, to be sure, be a Lippmann, but abundantly able to distinguish between a McCarthy and a Paul Robeson. Instead of this, instead of the education which should be preparing the mass of citizens for guidance of government and understanding of civilization, education has been let to languish; truth has forcibly been kept from the ears of the masses, discussion curtailed, and the destiny of this nation has been pictured not as civilization but as that revival of barbarism which is universal world war.

WHEN WE WELCOMED 38 MILLION IMMIGRANTS from the slums of Europe to our shores, we tried to use them for private profit in exploitation of labor, in degradation of political methods and exacerbation of class divisions. When, fighting back, their trade unions forced high wages and a decent standard of living, what did we teach them to do? To join the colonial imperialism through which Europe blocked the further growth of democracy in the modern world by conquering the peoples of Asia, Africa and America, and stealing their land, labor and material. The wealth and power of nineteenth century Europe was concentrated in the hands of the rich to hold back the escape of the poor into equality.

This colonialism America joined, and now leads. Colonialism has by blood and tears and the jealousies of the the white nations been transformed from outright slavery and theft to wage poverty and private profit, but it remains as the chief method of building white ascendancy on the degradation of the majority of mankind. This has been accomplished by bribing white workers with higher wages and using them as soldiers to keep the dark world in submission. For this purpose the United States leads the world toward war today, by an insane pouring out of wealth for war which is sufficient to realize the highest dreams of the world's greatest minds if used intelligently and not worse than wasted.

OF COURSE EVERYBODY agrees with Mencken and Lippmann and a thousand thinkers that nations should be governed by brains and taste and ability. But to this there is no more royal a road than to government by blood, privilege or "grace of God." How shall we get the brains save by education of the mass? How rare a contribution of talent and genius have we lost in America by malingering, and cheating, and blunt refusal to educate the Negro race! HOW SURELY HAVE WE CURTAILED FREEDOM AND STRANGLED DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA BY OUR "NEGRO PROBLEM"!

By W. E. B. DuBois

IN THE UNITED STATES TODAY, belief in democracy is fading and freedom is more and more limited. Freedom as too many Americans understand it is the opportunity of persons who are smart or lucky to make large personal incomes with the least interference on the part of the government; and with limited opportunity for public opinion to express itself. Democracy reduces itself to the rule of property over jobs and news so that elections present few choices for the voters but register decisions already agreed upon by the groups in control. As a nation, we are convinced that if such groups control "free elections" in Germany, Viet-Nam, Guatemala and the United States, all will be well.

Democracy among the "free democracies of the West" no longer envisages equality. Real equality in a day of machine and technique means essential equality of income. Without that, and with private monopoly of natural resources and private profit from national industry, the working people must obey the owners of wealth. They cannot cast a free ballot. But we no longer believe that even approximately equal distribution of wealth is possible or desirable. We must have poor workers or rich industrial leaders cannot survive. Without masters of wealth, who would furnish the ten million dollars of "expense" which the election of 1956 is going to cost?

YET THERE WAS ONCE A DAY—how long ago it seems! —when this nation dreamed of real democracy, in an El Dorado beyond the golden West, where human beings of every sort, with essentially equal standards of living, with freedom to believe in any creed they chose, could live together in peace. We said that all men should have a voice in their government. If men are ignorant, teach them. If they are poor, see that they have sufficient income to share the surrounding standard of life; if they are sick, heal them; if through inexperience they make mistakes, let them learn by these very mistakes. If they are inherently evil, try by every reasonable method to raise their ethical standards.

What killed this mighty dream before it was fully born? Our own sin and greed. We exterminated the red Indians because we wanted their land. We imported black labor and reduced it to the last stage of exploitation so as to steal all it produced.

Then when the freedom of white men was threatened by the greed of Britain, we awoke and cried to the hills in 1776: "All men are created equal," and we started to free the black slave. But no! Slaves raised cotton. Cotton became king about 1820 and the king's courtiers began to fight to spread Negro slavery all over America so as to make slaveholders a special and superior breed of men. But no nation can exist "half slave and half free." The white worker began to fight in Kansas in 1854 to escape the fatal competition of the black slave. He won when he made Lincoln President in 1861. But the angry slave barons plunged the nation into civil war. Then the nation had to do what it did not want to do. It freed the black slaves, not willingly, but as Charles Sumner said:

> "Reason, humanity, justice were powerless in his behalf; but necessity was irresistible. And the result testifies how wisely the Republic acted. Without emancipation, followed by the arming of the slaves, rebel slavery would not have been overcome. With these the victory was easy."

THUS IN 1863 AGAIN for a moment this nation aimed at democracy and glimpsed "the glory of the coming of the Lord"; a nation of free and equal citizens with no distinctions of class or race. But only for a brief moment. The "dog is turned to his own vomit again." Flushed with the rich loot of war, Northern industry joined the slaveholders' wrath and opened the door to re-enslave the Negro and the white worker beside him in order to make America the wealthiest nation on earth.

Charles Sumner stood in the Senate chamber 90 years ago this very month and warned. The House of Representatives crowded in. The world listened to this man, whom a slavedriver had tried to kill in 1856 on the floor of this very Senate and nearly succeeded, while Massachusetts veiled her face and mourned. Frederick Douglass sat in the gallery and heard. Sumner said:

> "Our fathers solemnly announced the Equal Rights of all men, and that Government had no just foundation except in the consent of the governed; and to the sup-

THE NEGRO IN AMERICA TODAY

The political power of the South

By W. E. B. DuBois

WHAT EFFECT DOES the disfranchisement of Negroes have on democracy in the U.S.? This is a question of national importance. It does not rest on sectional jealousy or bitter memories of the Civil War. It is not a question of race prejudice or of love or hate for Negroes. It is a practical question of democratic government in the U.S.; of permitting public opinion and not private wealth to rule.

As matters stand today, representation in Congress rests on population. If any part of the population is not allowed to vote, then representation in Congress should not be based on this disfranchised part. It is the law that Negroes are American citizens and must be counted in basing representation in Congress. Any section or state which counts the Negro population as basis for its representation in Congress, and then does not allow citizens to vote, not only degrades Negroes but takes from other parts of the nation power which belongs to them. It transfers this power to the disfranchising section. It rewards lawlessness with power. It distorts and ruins democracy. For instance:

SIX AND SIX, BUT . . .: Mississippi and Kansas had about the same population in 1950, and each had in Congress six Representatives, based on that population. Yet Kansas needed 600,000 voters to elect her six Congressmen, while only 150,000 voters were needed in Mississippi. Practically each voting Mississippian went to the polls with four ballots in his hand, where the Kansan had one. Yet Mississippi is one of the most illiterate and lawless states in the Union, and Kansas one of the most intelligent and law-abiding.

Why does Mississippi wield such political power? Because she disfranchises her Negro population and many of her whites, and yet uses that same disfranchised population as basis for her representation in Congress. We reward her crime against democracy by giving her four times as much political power as she deserves.

What can be done about this nullification of democracy in the U.S. by states which for nearly a century have refused to obey the national will?

- We can reduce their representation in Congress, or refuse to seat any of the representatives from such a state.
- We can encourage participation in democracy by basing representation in Congress on the votes cast and not on population.
- The Federal government can take charge of Federal elections and count the votes, and not leave them at the mercy of local politicians who can enhance their own power by disregard of Federal law, or by state laws which conflict with national law. No other nation on earth has, like the U.S., surrendered its power over its own elections to officials over whom it has no control.

NO CANDIDATE SPEAKS: Why does no candidate of either the Democratic or Republican Party even mention, much less discuss, this matter? How can Eisenhower and Stevenson afford not to discuss Negro disfranchisement? Why does no candidate or prospective candidate ask and answer these pertinent questions:

- Can a state refuse to obey the U.S. Constitution?
- Can a state repudiate a Supreme Court decision?
- Will the world believe us when we thus let democracy be nullified?

It may be answered that disfranchisement gradually is disappearing in the South. Is this true, and how far is it true? There are no official figures and no state is compelled to collect or report such figures. Our only unfailing measure is the number of votes cast, and even this depends entirely on what state officials say. The Federal government has no check on these reports.

The nation stands helpless. If Southern Negroes could vote, the states would have greater chance to obey the national will. Only national action can save national democracy.

~~Listen, Fellow Boobs!~~ Just why should the South, most of which is about to secede and use Force and Violence to nullify national law—just why should the South with six and a half million votes, have 92 Congressmen while the Far West with eight million votes has 52?

DU BOIS WRITES AN OPEN LETTER TO NKRUMAH

A future for Pan-Africa: Freedom, peace, socialism

On March 6, 1957, the Gold Coast, a British colony on the West Coast of Africa, will become a Dominion of the British Commonwealth, ranking with Canada, Australia and the Union of South Africa. This former center of the slave trade to America will assume the name of Ghana, an ancient Negro kingdom of northwest Africa which, between the 5th and 15th centuries, included much of the present territory of the Gold Coast.

Ghana will occupy an area about as large as the United Kingdom, with 4,125,000 inhabitants, nearly all of whom are black Africans. Within its borders will lie the ancient kingdom of the Ashanti, which fought six wars against England and, despite insult and humiliation, never surrendered the golden stool of its sovereignty. Ghana will be independent and self-governing and the inauguration of this state will be witnessed by officials from many of the world's leading nations, including the Vice President of the United States.

I have just sent the Prime Minister, Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, the following greeting:

I HAVE your kind invitation of Jan. 22, 1957. In behalf of myself and of my wife, Shirley Graham, I thank you for it and want to say how great was our desire to accept it. But since the U.S. government refused to issue us passports, we must with deep regret inform you of our inability to accept. I have recently also, and for the same reason, been compelled to my sorrow to decline a trip to China for lectures and participation in the celebration of the 250th anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin.

However, because of the fact that I am now entering the 90th year of my life, and because of my acquaintanceship with you during the last 12 years, which cover the years of your imprisonment, vindication, and political triumph, I trust you will allow me a few words of advice for the future of Ghana and Africa.

I venture the more readily to do this because, 40 years ago at the end of the First World War, I tried to establish some means of co-operation between the peoples of African descent throughout the world. Since then five Pan-African Congresses have met and, at the last one in England in 1945, I had the pleasure of meeting you.

TO DAY, when Ghana arises from the dead and faces this modern world, it must no longer be merely a part of the British Commonwealth or a representative of the world of West Europe, Canada, and the U.S. Ghana must on the contrary be the representative of Africa; and not only that, but of Black Africa below the Sahara desert. As such, her first duty should be to come into close acquaintanceship and co-operation with her fellow areas of British West Africa and Liberia; with the great areas of black folk in French West and Equatorial Africa; with the Sudan, Ethiopia, and Somaliland; with Uganda, Kenya and Tanganyika; with the Belgian Congo and all Portuguese Africa; with the Rhodesias and Bechuanaland; with Southwest Africa, the Union of South Africa and Madagascar; and with all other parts of Africa and with peoples who want to co-operate. All the former barriers of language, culture, religion and political control should bow before the essential unity of race and descent, the common suffering of slavery and the slave trade and the modern color bar.

Ignoring the old sources of division and lack of knowledge of and sympathy for each other, Ghana should lead a movement of black men for Pan-Africanism, including periodic conferences and personal contacts of black men from the Sahara to the Indian Ocean. With a program of peace and with no thought of force, political control or underground subversion, a new series of Pan-African Congresses should be held: they should include delegates from all groups and especially from the African congresses which already exist in many parts of Africa and which got their inspiration in most cases from the first Pan-African Congress in Paris in 1919.

THE NEW SERIES of Pan-African Congresses would seek common aims of progress for Black Africa, including types of political control, economic co-operation, cultural development, universal education and freedom from religious dogma and dictation.

The consequent Pan-Africa, working together through its independent units, should seek to develop a new African economy and cultural center standing between Europe and Asia, taking from and contributing to both. It should stress peace and join no military alliance and refuse to fight for settling European quarrels. It should avoid subjection to and ownership by foreign capitalists who seek to get rich on African labor and raw material, and should try to build a socialism founded on old African communal life; rejecting on the one hand the exaggerated private initiative of the West, and seeking to ally itself with the social program of the progressive nations: with British and Scandinavian socialism, with the progress toward the welfare state of India, Germany, France, and the U.S.; and with the Communist states like the Soviet Union and China, in peaceful co-operation and without presuming to dictate as to how socialism must or can be attained at particular times and places.

Pan-African socialism seeks the welfare state in Black Africa. It will refuse to be exploited by people of other continents for their own benefit and not for the benefit of the peoples of Africa. It will no longer consent to permitting the African majority of any African country to be governed against its will by a minority of invaders who claim racial superiority or the right to get rich at African expense. It will seek not only to raise but to process its raw material and to trade it freely with all the world on just and equal terms and prices.

PAN-AFRICA will seek to preserve its own past history, and write the present account, erasing from literature the lies and distortions about black folk which have disgraced the last centuries of European and American literature; above all, the new Pan-Africa will seek the education of all its youth on the broadest possible basis without religious dogma and in all hospitable lands as well as in Africa and for the end of making Africans not simply profitable workers for industry nor stoolpigeons for propaganda, but for making them modern, intelligent, responsible men of vision and character.

I pray you, my dear Mr. Nkrumah, to use all your power to put a Pan-Africa along these lines into working order at the earliest possible date. Seek to save the great cultural past of the Ashanti and Fanti peoples, not by inner division but by outer cultural and economic expansion toward the outmost bounds of the great African peoples, so that they may be free to live, grow, and expand; and to teach mankind what non-violence and courtesy, literature and art, music and dancing, can do for this greedy, selfish, and war-stricken world.

I hereby put into your hands, Mr. Prime Minister, my empty but still significant title of "President of the Pan-African Congress," to be bestowed on my duly-elected successor who will preside over a Pan-African Congress due, I trust, to meet soon and for the first time on African soil, at the call of the independent state of Ghana.

A GEORGIA OFFENSE: MIXED POPCORN EATING

Nightriders fire on Koinonia Farm as interracial settlement battles boycott

By Eugene Gordon

KOINONIA FARM, under harassment by racists (GUARDIAN, Feb. 25), is not only beginning to feel a tightening of the economic screws, but is now under armed attack. The 14-year-old 1,100-acre interracial cooperative near Americus, Ga., reported in a recent newsletter that a wholesale hardware company, a mechanic's shop, and a livestock barn have been frightened into joining a boycott against it. Night-riders have fired on the settlement recently.

NIGHT IN THE COUNTRY: An earlier newsletter described the Jan. 14 destruction of the community's Roadside Market by dynamite. Up to that time there had been no special attempt on anybody's life. But the latest newsletter reports:

"The first effort [to kill] came at 1:15 a.m. on Jan. 29, when a speeding car raked the residence nearest the highway with what seemed to be machine-gun fire. A burst was also fired at the car in which [cooperative member] Harry Atkinson was sitting as he kept watch that night. One bullet entered the car on a level with Harry's head, about a foot and a half to the right. Harry isn't too sure of what happened after that, because he thinks he ducked so hard that his head got caught between the clutch and the brake pedals."

As he ducked, there was a burst at the house in which several people were sleeping.

THE POPCORN SCANDAL: Shortly after nine three nights later "two cars came from the direction of Americus and opened fire with shotguns." A volley blasted the cluster of residences. Stray pellets rained about children playing on a lighted volley-ball court. One shot pierced the window of a house, barely missing a young girl. Sheriff Fred Chappell reckoned that one to be a .22 rifle bullet.

Complaints of Chappell's seeming unconcern with these attacks include the charge that he neglected to respond to an emergency call from Koinonia. Instead of denying it, he gave it credence by indicating that he shared the attackers' viewpoint. One news story quoted Chappell:

"We get reports of whites and Negroes strolling down the street together in Americus. One report said a white girl and two Negro boys walked down the street all eating popcorn out of the same bag."

OR WAS IT PEANUTS? The voluntary, uninhibited social contact of white members with Negro members, arising from their working and living side by side—that seems to be the ghost which never-endingly haunts neighboring white-supremacists. As the sheriff's statement implied, the horror is most aptly symbolized in terms of Negro male-white female relations: very bad when the male is a boy; much worse when he is a man.

A Newsweek report on Koinonia Farm probably relates to the incident reported by Sheriff Chappell:

"Local feeling was summed up by Charles F. Crisp, president of the Americus Bank of Commerce . . . 'But when they deliberately tried to upset our equilibrium by having a white girl and a Negro man walk down the street side by side, eating peanuts out of the same bag—it was a calculated affront . . .'"

Clarence L. Jordan, a 44-year-old Southern Baptist minister and a co-founder of Koinonia, said "the trouble" complained of by the sheriff and the bank president is not always easy to avoid.

He cited an example: "Say our kids are going into town to get [medical] shots. Are we going to run a car in to get white kids shots and then come back and make another trip for the Negro kids? They say: 'They came in to flout our traditions.' We didn't. We came in to get the shots."

THE KKK WAY: Koinonia Farm work-coordinator Norman Long reported last week that, following an Americus fairgrounds rally, a KKK motorcade of 150 robed but unmasked Kluxers had driven into the interracial community. The leader suggested that the way to end the shootings, the house- and cross-burnings and the bombings would be to sell out.

Long said: "We told them that there was another way of life, the American way, which gives us all the freedom to live according to our consciences and that we were trying to practice that way of life by staying here. We told the Klan that there's no freedom in being allowed to live as everybody else lives; that there's freedom only if you're allowed to be different."

Qui est le Dr N'Krumah ?

par WILLIAM E.B. DU BOIS

Les pages que nous publions ci-après ont paru dans le numéro de mai de la revue culturelle nord-américaine Mainstream. Elles constituent un éloge chaleureux de la personnalité et de l'action du Premier ministre du Ghana (anciennement Côte de l'Or anglaise), Etat africain promu à l'indépendance politique le 6 mars dernier (1).

Sans doute pourrait-on faire des réserves quant au rôle qu'est appelé à jouer le Dr N'Krumah, dont on a dit qu'il était « un Washington noir » ou qu'il voulait être « le Nehru du continent noir ». N'Krumah déclare que le Ghana doit demeurer dans le giron du Commonwealth britannique. Il aura une partie difficile à jouer, car les monopoles anglais ont conservé au Ghana des privilèges économiques, et ceux des Etats-Unis intriguent de leur mieux pour s'y ménager des positions dominantes sous couleur d'aide technique ou financière.

Mais il est incontestable que le nouveau chef d'Etat a lutté courageusement pour l'indépendance de son pays, qu'il y jouit d'une immense influence et que les résultats obtenus par le peuple de l'ex-colonie de la Couronne, sous sa direction, exercent sur tous les noirs d'Afrique et d'Amérique un puissant attrait, une sorte de fascination.

C'est ce qui provoque l'enthousiasme du vieux lutteur noir d'Amérique qui a consacré sa vie — une longue vie, car il est âgé de près de 90 ans — à l'émancipation de ses frères de couleur en même temps qu'à la cause de la paix du monde. Le professeur William E.B. du Bois jouit d'un grand renom dans le monde scientifique, comme anthropologiste-sociologue. Il fonda en 1909 l'Association nationale pour le progrès des peuples noirs (N.A.A.C.P.) et dirigea sa revue jusqu'en 1933. Il fut un temps vice-président du « Conseil pour les questions africaines ».

Ses efforts inlassables en faveur de la démocratie et de la paix lui ont naturellement valu la haine des impérialistes yankees, à laquelle il opposa toujours une attitude d'une admirable dignité et un grand courage personnel. Candidat progressiste au Sénat pour l'Etat de New-York en 1950, il tint tête à une campagne raciste forcenée et obtint 200.000 voix. Peu après, la « justice » fédérale le poursuivait pour ne pas s'être fait enregistrer comme agent étranger (!) : il était en effet coupable d'avoir été l'un des animateurs du Centre d'information pour la paix, que les fauteurs de guerre classaient parmi les organisations rouges d'inspiration soviétique. W.E. du Bois fut à cette occasion traité comme un criminel de droit commun. Devant ses juges il revendiqua hautement « le droit de parler en faveur de la paix ».

On comprend que le vétéran de tant de luttes pour la liberté ait été rempli de joie intense par l'accession de la Côte de l'Or à la souveraineté. D'autant plus que le Ghana est aujourd'hui un pôle d'attraction pour toute l'Afrique noire, en même temps qu'un sujet de profond souci pour les colonialistes. Le Figaro écrivait à ce propos le 25 mai dernier : « Au moment où s'ouvre à Londres une conférence africaine qui pourrait mener rapidement à l'indépendance du Nigéria, l'attitude du docteur N'Krumah au Ghana n'est pas sans susciter outre-Manche des inquiétudes assez nettes... Les mêmes observateurs voient enfin, assez bien, le docteur N'Krumah convoquer à brève échéance une conférence des Etats africains indépendants et prendre la tête d'un mouvement dont l'objet serait d'encourager la constitution de l'Ouest africain en un bloc indépendant... Il est bien évident que ces tendances, si elles devaient se confirmer, comporteraient pour la France de sérieux inconvénients en Afrique noire. »

La conférence de Londres dont il est question réunit les trois premiers ministres des régions du Nigéria et les représentants du gouvernement britannique. Le Nigéria est la plus grande des dernières colonies anglaises, elle compte plus de 33 millions d'habitants (1).

L'aspiration générale à l'indépendance y a refoulé à l'arrière-plan les intérêts régionaux limités ; à l'appel du Dr Azikiwe, et appuyés par un vote unanime de l'Assemblée fédérale, les trois premiers ministres se sont entendus avant de partir pour Londres sur la revendication populaire commune : indépendance totale du Nigéria en 1959.

Les profiteurs anglais et français de la colonisation ne cachent pas leurs alarmes considérablement accrues depuis que N'Krumah s'est installé dans la résidence traditionnelle du gouverneur à Accra, qu'il a remplacé le God Save the King par un hymne national nigérien et qu'il envisage un échange de missions diplomatiques avec l'Union soviétique. Autant d'insolences inimaginables encore ces dernières années, qui soulèvent un grand enthousiasme dans toute l'Afrique et encouragent le développement du mouvement de libération nationale à travers le continent. Sans vouloir préjuger de la mesure dans laquelle le Dr N'Krumah œuvrera à réaliser ses rêves que nous fait connaître W.E. du Bois, on peut être certain que ce dernier a raison d'exalter l'exemple contagieux du Ghana.

(1) Voir l'article « Nigéria en mouvement », Démocratie Nouvelle de novembre 1955.

QUAND on se rappelle le mépris insultant que la civilisation blanche, sa littérature, son église, ses universités ont fait planer comme une malédiction sur le peuple noir pendant plus de 400 ans — sans parler de l'esclavage, de la ségrégation, du lynch, il est assez extraordinaire de lire dans cette biographie, la vie limpide d'un homme qui, après avoir connu les pires calamités de cette sombre époque se trouve maintenant à la tête d'une nation, tandis que tous les pays du monde viennent lui rendre hommage.

Le territoire du Ghana n'est pas très vaste, pas plus que l'Angleterre. Mais ses 9 millions d'habitants forcent l'attention par leur importance économique, leur unité culturelle et leur joie de vivre (1). C'est un pays qui a connu l'oppression depuis le jour où cette canaille de John Hankins vint en reconnaître les côtes, sur son bateau « le Jésus », et captura des esclaves qui lui valurent d'être fait chevalier par la reine Elisabeth, jusqu'à celui où, après 6 guerres, étalées sur plus de 90 ans, l'Angleterre, non contente de s'emparer du grand Etat d'Ashanti, humilia le roi en exigeant qu'il vint baiser le pied du nouveau gouverneur blanc.

Aux Etats-Unis

VENONS-EN à Nkrumah. D'origine modeste, il fait ses études dans des écoles de missionnaires puis au collège gouvernemental à Achimota, sous la direction de Kweqyir Aggrey, un professeur africain formé aux U.S.A. et qui l'engage à aller continuer ses études en Amérique. Grâce aux lettres de recommandation d'un chef noir qui avait participé au premier congrès pan-africain, puis convoqué un congrès du même type au Nigéria, il est admis dans un établissement noir des environs de Philadelphie, la Lincoln University.

Les dix ans qu'il passe en Amérique lui donnent l'occasion d'apprendre ce que c'est d'avoir la peau noire « au pays des hommes libres ». Comme il manque d'argent, il cherche du travail pendant les vacances. Il gagne trop peu à vendre du poisson à Harlem. Alors il accepte de travailler dans une fabrique de savon.

« C'était en fait le travail le plus répugnant que j'ai jamais fait. Les camions venaient décharger dans une cour d'énormes paquets de gras d'animal et d'entrailles pourries. Armé d'une louche je devais remplir de cette marchandise infecte une pleine brouette, puis la transporter jusqu'aux machines et recommencer. Bien loin de m'y habituer, j'éprouvais de jour en jour une difficulté croissante à ne pas vomir sans arrêt ».

Il fut aussi garçon de café et plongeur. Plus d'une fois il dut dormir à la belle étoile, dans un parc. Il mangeait pour pas cher dans les restaurants de « Father Divine ». Un jour à Baltimore il osa demander un verre d'eau à un garçon de café, un blanc qui, du doigt lui montra le crachoir.

En plus de cette activité extra-universitaire, il travaillait avec acharnement. En 1939, il obtint son premier diplôme à la Lincoln University et fut élu « l'élève le plus intéressant » de sa promotion. Il aurait voulu entrer dans une école de journalisme à Columbia, mais il était sans le sou et les « missionnaires » en profitèrent naturellement pour essayer de l'orienter vers le Ministère : il suivit à la fois les cours de la Lincoln University (Faculté de théologie) et ceux de l'Université de Pensylvanie, à 50 miles de là.

En 1942 licence de théologie à Lincoln et licence d'enseignement à l'Université. L'année suivante il est diplômé de philosophie. Il ne lui reste plus qu'à rédiger une thèse pour passer docteur. Mais déjà il se passionne pour l'avenir de l'Afrique occidentale et il élabore plusieurs des projets qu'il réalise aujourd'hui. Il a de nombreux contacts avec les autres étudiants africains. Il donne des cours et même quelques conférences.

Mais il faut vivre : « Je travaillais par tous les temps, dans un chantier naval de Chester, de minuit à huit heures du matin. Parfois il faisait si froid que j'avais du mal à décoller mes mains de l'acier et j'avais beau porter sur moi tous les vêtements que je possédais, j'étais glacé jusqu'à la moëlle. A huit heures du matin je rentrai dans ma chambre, et après avoir déjeuné et dormi quelques heures, je me plongeais dans la rédaction de ma thèse ».

Bien entendu la pneumonie ne se fait pas attendre. Aussitôt rétabli, en mai 1945, il quitte New-York pour Londres. C'est en octobre 1945 que je vis Kwame Nkrumah pour la première fois, à Manchester où se tenait le 5e congrès panafricain. Il y avait près de 200 délégués et il faisait partie d'un groupe de jeunes Africains qui revenaient d'un congrès syndical à Paris. Je n'eus pas vraiment l'occasion de le connaître. Il était tout à son travail d'organisation, un peu miteux, et pas bavard. Cependant je fus frappé de sa sincérité et je gardai un souvenir très vif de son intelligence. Nous avions un ami commun en George Padmore, le brillant animateur de ce congrès.

A la tête de la lutte contre le colonialisme

DEVENU secrétaire au secrétariat national d'Afrique occidentale pour qui il éditait une revue, Nkrumah passa deux ans à Londres. Il tenta d'y organiser les travailleurs noirs et d'établir des liens étroits avec les dirigeants du parti travailliste. Il assista à plusieurs meetings du Parti communiste. Mais sa foi dans le travaillisme anglais s'évanouit rapidement : ce n'est pas d'Europe qu'on pourrait diriger l'Afrique. En novembre 1947 Nkrumah quittait Liverpool pour rejoindre la Côte de l'Or, après avoir été retenu quelque temps par les autorités, en raison de son activité politique à Londres.

Au moment de son retour en Afrique occidentale, le système si longtemps vanté en Angleterre de la « gestion indirecte » par l'intermédiaire des chefs de tribu africains commençait à se disloquer. Les chefs n'étaient plus que des mercenaires aux mains des fonctionnaires anglais et après les deux grandes guerres mondiales, le peuple de la Côte de l'Or commençait à renier ses chefs traditionnels et à exiger son indépendance. Conscientes de la faiblesse d'un pays où régnaient la pauvreté, l'ignorance, la maladie, les masses l'étaient aussi de leur force et de la valeur du cacao et des autres produits qui s'en allaient enrichir les Blancs en Europe. Mais elles restaient divisées par les jalousies séculaires entre tribus et les querelles traditionnelles entre chefs dont la noblesse remontait parfois à plusieurs générations. Nkrumah décida de négliger les chefs noirs aussi bien que les souverains britanniques pour s'adresser aux masses qui jusqu'ici n'avaient jamais vraiment participé au pouvoir. La Convention pour l'Unité de la Côte de l'Or fut conçue comme une organisation neutre de dirigeants.

Mais Nkrumah sentit bientôt la nécessité d'une véritable orientation politique et il mit sur pied le Parti de la Convention du Peuple qui exigeait l'indépendance immédiate. Il s'affirma ouvertement socialiste comme il le fait à nouveau dans son livre. Son plan, tel qu'il l'exposait dans « Le Cercle », prévoit la constitution d'une avant-garde révolutionnaire luttant pour l'unité de l'Afrique occidentale et son indépendance. Le P.C.P. eut bientôt des ramifications dans chaque village sur tout le territoire de la Côte de l'Or. Des organismes sociaux couvrant toutes sortes d'activités d'intérêt public, y furent incorporés, il y eut un siège social, des journaux et de nombreux meetings populaires furent organisés.

Alors un incident que Nkrumah avait espéré éviter, vint combler les vœux des autorités britanniques : des démobilisés organisèrent un boycott contre la vie chère, et la police tira sur de paisibles manifestants. La ville tout entière d'Accra fut bientôt aux mains des émeutiers qui pillaient les magasins et attaquaient les blancs dans la rue. Immédiatement Nkrumah et ses proches collaborateurs qui, loin d'être les instigateurs de ce soulèvement, l'auraient vivement déconseillés, furent arrêtés. En fait c'était un mouvement spontané et strictement incontrôlable mais il fournissait au gouvernement un prétexte admirable. Nkrumah avait sur lui un exemplaire du « Cercle » prévoyant la socialisation du pays ; on lui rappela son activité politique à Londres et, taxé de communisme, il dut rester en prison pendant huit semaines. Plusieurs de ses camarades le trahirent. Enfin il fut jugé et condamné à 3 ans de prison.

Mais dehors, le parti tenait bon. Il en était à son quinzième mois de prison quand les élections eurent lieu. Nkrumah, élu avec 22.780 voix sur 23.122 votants, fut relâché et porté en triomphe par une foule immense jusqu'au siège de son parti. Devenu ministre des Affaires économiques, il s'attaqua à diverses réformes : refonte de l'administration, intégration de fonctionnaires noirs, réorganisation du marché officiel du cacao et de l'abattage des arbres malades. Enfin il chercha à susciter les investissements étrangers et à promouvoir l'expansion industrielle.

Cela n'était pas facile, car il se heurtait à l'opposition des fonctionnaires anglais, des chefs noirs et des producteurs de cacao eux-mêmes qui restaient attachés aux privilèges traditionnels des chefs de tribu. Sans relâche, Nkrumah pressait les Anglais de fixer une date précise pour l'indépendance de Ghana, tandis que ceux-ci s'efforçaient d'enterrer ou de mutiler le projet. Ils finirent par exiger de nouvelles élections avant la fin de la session parlementaire en cours, persuadés par les aigris que Nkrumah subirait une défaite écrasante. Contrairement à leur attente, Nkrumah accepta ce « test ». Son parti obtint 72 sièges sur 104. Nkrumah devient premier ministre et le 6 mars l'indépendance de Ghana est proclamée.

Des problèmes à résoudre

ET maintenant ? Une nation si jeune et de 9 millions d'habitants n'a généralement pas grande importance dans le monde moderne — si ce n'est comme butin possible pour les grandes puissances. Mais l'Etat de Ghana constitue une exception : car il fournit la quasi totalité du cacao et du chocolat mondial. Le gouvernement contrôle plus de 20.000 km2 de feuillus. La pêche rapporte chaque année 20.000 tonnes de poisson, et un plan de modernisation des bateaux de pêche vient d'être élaboré. Ghana possède aussi d'énormes gisements de bauxite sans parler du manganèse, de l'or et des diamants. Récemment doté d'un système d'éducation populaire en pleine expansion il peut compter sur l'honnêteté, le courage et l'intelligence de son chef qui connaît bien le monde moderne.

Restent trois problèmes essentiels que Nkrumah doit résoudre : 1°) l'unité de Ghana, par l'intégration des chefs de tribu et de la population musulmane qui vit dans le nord du pays.

2°) Réaliser l'industrialisation afin de se dégager de l'exploitation étrangère. Déjà Nkrumah s'est heurté aux compagnies minières qui, obtenant des concessions à bas prix et des avantages fiscaux disproportionnés réalisaient d'énormes bénéfices, tout en payant des salaires dérisoires ; les éliminer sans délai comme elles le méritent ? Oui, mais où trouver le capital nécessaire à l'exploitation de la bauxite et à la fabrication de l'aluminium ? Où trouver les fonds indispensables à l'aménagement énergétique de la Volta ?

Nkrumah sans prendre aucun engagement a fait preuve d'une réserve prudente : ne pas effaroucher les éventuels bailleurs de fonds, ne pas leur promettre de profits démesurés. S'il peut obtenir des capitaux à des conditions raisonnables, il les accueillera avec joie et leur offrira toute garantie. Déjà il s'efforce de mettre un frein à l'avidité des sociétés minières ; le transport et la vente du cacao ont été nationalisés, ainsi que l'entretien et le renouvellement des plants (1). Sous le contrôle du gouvernement l'industrialisation a pris un bon départ dans les petites industries : savon, allumettes, cigarettes et scieries... Imaginez Ghana traitant seul son cacao !

Troisième problème, et bien plus vaste, encore : Nkrumah a l'intention d'aborder de front et de résoudre la question plus générale de la situation et du sort de l'Afrique noire dans la civilisation moderne. Il se propose de donner suite au programme pan-africain élaboré en 1919 sous l'impulsion des Noirs d'Amérique. Et pour cela Ghana occupe une position-clé.

Nkrumah a l'intention, et cela sera l'un des premiers actes de son nouvel Etat, d'inviter les dirigeants nationalistes à tenir un congrès sur la situation et l'avenir de l'Afrique. L'indépendance, dit-il dans le dernier chapitre de son livre, ne sera pas limitée au territoire de Ghana :

« Désormais le nationalisme pan-africain et l'idéologie politique reposant sur la prise de conscience et l'émancipation politiques de l'Afrique doivent se répandre par tout le continent, et en pénétrer les moindres recoins. Jamais je n'ai considéré l'indépendance de Ghana comme un objectif isolé ; j'y ai toujours pensé comme à un aspect d'une évolution générale à l'échelle du monde. L'un après l'autre, les pays de notre immense Afrique se réveillent et la lutte pour sa liberté continue. Nous constituons une avant-garde dont le devoir est d'aider de toutes nos forces ceux qui sont engagés dans une lutte identique à celle qui nous a déjà menés à la victoire. »

WE REMEMBER HIM FOR HIS CHARACTER

By W. E. B. DuBOIS

This tribute to James W. Ford, Negro Communist leader, who died June 21, was read by the famous Negro historian and sociologist, Dr. W. E. B. DuBois, at a memorial meeting June 25 attended by several hundred persons.

* * *

James Ford was a man to be remembered for his character. That is a word which we do not use often today. We speak of what a man has done or what he possesses. We relate what positions of influence he has occupied. For none of these things are we remembering James Ford tonight. He was, to be sure, a good citizen. He worked for a living. He served as a soldier. He obeyed the law.

But it was not so much what he did as how he did it and why. It was for the kind of human being he was rather than what he accomplished that we honor him tonight, because it is the doer rather than the deed that makes civilization. Massive and magnificent as the building may be, it is the soul and sight of the architect which spells its meaning. The doer transcends the deed and this great truth the world in each age must learn anew.

James Ford was honest; he had manners; he respected women. He could and did work and he was a straightforward radical.

JAMES W. FORD

Let us examine this list of virtues. When James Ford talked, he said what he meant. His words did not have two meanings, and you could believe in his honesty. He might be wrong, but he was honestly wrong. He was a man of good manners. He was neither loud nor rude, but courteous and dignified. He regarded women neither as playthings to be pawed over, nor beasts of burden, but as co-workers with whom he did his share of work. He was a man who did an honest job of work, toiling long and thoroughly until the end.

HE WAS a radical; not one who cursed and complained, but one who believed that this nation needed fundamental change and could get it by clear thinking and right voting. The child of a Negro artisan and a servant, he knew poverty and worked hard for an education, interrupted it to fight as a soldier in the First World War, and completed his education after an honorable discharge from the ranks. He became a socialist because he believed that the object of industry was the welfare of the mass of the people and not the wealth of the few.

He became a member of the Communist Party because he believed that its program of complete socialism was better than any plan of partial or gradual socialism. He became a candidate for the Vice-Presidency on the Communist ticket and campaigned on a platform of peace and reason, leading by open democratic processes to change in our form of economic organization.

He and his party failed, not because he was outvoted, but because the nation never had the opportunity to know what the object of Communism was nor what it had accomplished in the Soviet Union or China. Nor could Americans know the advance which socialism had made and is making all over the civilized world. In addition to a totally false picture of the socialist world and a terrible memory of war, there was added a charge of planned murder and treason against Communist leaders, which led to imprisonment of men for what they were said to think and for nothing they ever did.

Through this time of disappointment and despair, James Ford walked calm and upright, insisting on his beliefs and still expressing his determination to work for a radical reform of this nation.

ON THE fundamental proposition which the Socialists and Communists placed before the nation, the people of the United States never voted, and never had a chance to vote. We went into the First World War after an overwhelming vote for peace. We fought the Second World War side by side with the Communist Soviet Union who conquered Hitler for us. We went into the Korean War against China without any vote at all. Yet we call this a free democracy of the west.

During this time, James Ford went his quiet, courteous way, stating his beliefs and reiterating his platform. There was little he or any radical could do amid cowardice and silence, surrounded by spies and liars. But what Ford did he did openly and clearly, and especially he tried to allay panic and surrender among his own comrades.

His last work was to arouse American Negroes to a realization of what their African cousins were doing to build Socialist states. To this man, our deep appreciation and reverence.

DR. DUBOIS AT 90 OFFERS A PIECE OF ADVICE

To an American born last Christmas Day

On March 2 the Grand Ballroom of New York's Roosevelt Hotel was filled to overflowing with more than 1,000 guests at the 90th birthday party of Dr. W. E.B. DuBois. Friends who hadn't seen each other for five or ten years exchanged excited greetings. There were familiar faces from Jersey, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore and Washington, D.C. The greetings came from all parts of the world. One observer said: "It takes Dr. DuBois to bring out the best in us."

Author Truman Nelson paid glowing tribute to "this Country's First Citizen." Dr. John Hope Franklin, head of the Brooklyn College History Dept., acknowledged the debt he and other scholars owe to Dr. DuBois. He announced that, in partial fulfillment of their obligation, the DuBois Lectures are being established at Fisk University. Former N.Y. Domestic Relations Court Justice Hubert T. Delany presented a handsome, leather-bound book of greetings signed by the guests; and a handsome check to help enable Dr. DuBois to continue his work. Mrs. Eslanda Robeson, who with Angus Cameron headed the Birthday Committee, presided with great charm.

Through all of this the youngest of all the guests reclined in his mother's arms. He uttered not a word, but took in the proceedings with more than casual interest. A grand party came to a perfect end as the oldest of persons present addressed the following words to the youngest:

THE MOST DISTINGUISHED guest of this festive occasion is none other than my great-grandson, Arthur Edward McFarlane II, who was born this last Christmas day. He has kindly consented to permit me to read to you a bit of advice which, as he remarked with a sigh of resignation, great-grandparents are supposed usually to inflict on the helpless young. This then is my word of advice.

As men go, I have had a reasonably happy and successful life. I have had enough to eat and drink, have been suitably clothed and, as you see, have had many friends. But the thing which has been the secret of whatever I have done is the fact that I have been able to earn a living by doing the work which I wanted to do and that work was what the world needed done.

I want to stress this. You will soon learn, my dear young man, that most human beings spend their lives doing work which they hate and work which the world does not need. It is therefore of prime importance that you early learn what you want to do; how you are fit to do it and whether or not the world needs this service.

Here, in the next 20 years, your parents can be of use to you. You will soon begin to wonder just what parents are for besides interfering with your natural wishes. Let me therefore tell you: parents and their parents are inflicted upon you in order to show what kind of person you are, what sort of world you live in and what the persons who dwell here need for their happiness and well-being.

IT WAS MY UNUSUAL good fortune in the first 25 years of my life to learn by effort and hard competition just what I could do; then to get a fairly good idea of what the world was in which I must work. In these years I had seen the United States, North and South; I had lived in England, France, Germany and Italy; I had listened to the advice of some of the world's greatest minds and I had heard from the lips of human beings just what their problems were. Beside this, I had seen the Atlantic Ocean, the high Alps at Berne, the Venus of Milo and the Sistine Madonna.

Then I came home prepared to work. It was then, in the summer of 1892, 66 years ago, that I made a quite unconscious choice: I chose to begin my life work for the pleasure of doing it and the need of its being done and not for the money I was going to be paid for doing it. This was no great and advertised occasion; I asked no advice and none was proffered. I chose without hesitancy or question.

It was in this wise: after borrowing money to pay for postage stamps, I wrote the nation and offered my services. The response was slow and unenthusiastic. But at last three offers came. Wilberforce, a Negro college in Ohio, offered me $750 a year as a teacher. A state school in Missouri offered me $1,050.

I WENT TO WILBERFORCE not because of any martyr complex but because I knew something about Wilberforce. I knew that in 1787, when this nation was declaring all men equal, two black men were on their knees praying to God in the fashionable church of St. George's in Philadelphia. While St. George's was glad to see Negroes practice the true religion, they did not like them to clutter up the aisles of this church and to assail God with such vehemence. Two deacons therefore approached these black men and whispered gently that it would be more seemly if they would finish their prayers in the balcony. The balcony was much nearer heaven than the main floor.

But these Negroes were stubborn. They said, "No, we are going to finish our prayers right here and now. Then we are going to get up and leave this church and we are never coming back." So one of these men, Richard Allen, left the white Methodist church and founded the African Methodist Episcopal church which today is one of the largest Negro organizations in the world.

And one of Allen's successors, Bishop Daniel Payne, bought a site in Southern Ohio and founded a college called Wilberforce. And Wilberforce in 1892 offered me a job teaching which I hastened to accept because at Wilberforce I planned to develop a university like the University of Berlin for the uplift of the Negro race in America.

QUITE INCIDENTALLY, Wilberforce offered me enough to live on during this work. The fact that the Missouri state school offered me $300 more seemed to me of no importance.

Right here, my esteemed great-grandson, may I ask you to stick a pin. You will find it the fashion in the America where eventually you will live and work to judge that life's work by the amount of money it brings you. This is a grave mistake.

The return from your work must be the satisfaction which that work brings you and the world's need of that work. With this, life is heaven or as near heaven as you can get. Without this—with work which you despise, which bores you and which the world does not need—this life is hell. And believe me, many a $25,000-a-year executive is living in just such a hell today.

Income is not greenbacks, it is satisfaction; it is creation; it is beauty. It is the supreme sense of a world of men going forward, lurch and stagger though it may, but slowly, inevitably going forward, and you, you yourself with your hand on the wheels. Make this choice then, my son. Never hesitate, never falter.

AND NOW COMES the word of warning: the satisfaction with your work even at best will never be complete, since nothing on earth can be perfect. The forward pace of the world which you are pushing will be painfully slow. But what of that: the difference between a hundred and a thousand years is less than you now think. But doing what must be done, that is eternal even when it walks with poverty.

And I care not to garner while others
Know only to harvest and reap.
For mine is the reaping of sowing
Till the spirit of rest gives me sleep.

REVOLT IN PARLIAMENT TOO

Labor's 'Daily Herald' joins British drive to ban A-bomb

By Cedric Belfrage

LONDON

A WEEK AFTER THE RALLY launching the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (GUARDIAN, 3/3), London's Daily Herald caused a first-class political sensation by hopping on the CND bandwagon. The clean break with H-bomb "defense" policy, to which the Labor Party committed Britain when it was in power, was particularly startling in a paper long regarded as the organ of Labor's Right-wing.

Coming out in three scare-headlined editorials for unilateral nuclear disarmament as "A Policy for Staying Alive," the Herald after years of sagging circulation suddenly could not meet the demand for copies. From Laborites came two letters to the paper: 69 MP's, including some Right-wingers, supported the Herald's opposition to U.S. nuclear rocket bases here under any circumstances. Party secy. Morgan Phillips, recalling assurances that the Herald would remain "loyal" after the party relinquished its part-ownership last year, expressed the leaders' "profound disturbance." He accused the paper of appearing to "undermine the party," and to "interfere in private discussion between the party and the Trades Union Congress" on a defense-policy statement.

ALREADY NAKED: Repudiating either pacifism or neutrality, the Herald asked for "the pressure of the people—your pressure" to stop Britain in moving any further "along the road to a nuclear hell." It said: "If war starts we shall be exterminated. . . . Britain is already naked; it is an illusion to imagine H-bombs can clothe us in garments of safety or prestige; they can merely bankrupt us. . . . One of the three nuclear Powers must have the courage to break through the fear that petrifies East and West alike. . . . Somebody must start, so let us start —and blazon our actions across the world." Just before and just after the Herald's triple salvo, it was learned that the U.S.S.R. had set off three more nuclear test explosions.

The paper's unexpected stand came after Tory Defense Minister Sandys announced signing of the agreement for an unspecified number of U.S. rocket bases in Britain. On that evening the House of Commons lobby, as during the Suez incident, was filled with hundreds of protesting citizens.

Premier Macmillan, admitting that 80% of the voters in a recent by-election opposed H-bomb policies, said they must be educated to understand the truth. Then defense policy was "debated" through two soporific days in which the nation-wide alarm barely penetrated into a half-empty House.

THE AIM OF DEFENSE: On the government's policy of nuclear reprisals even for non-nuclear "aggression," Labor defense spokesman George Brown "was more vague than the White Paper which he criticized for ambiguity" (Manchester Guardian).

Meanwhile the Liberal Party came out officially for British abandonment of nuclear weapons "if their manufacture, testing and use cannot be stopped" everywhere. The Times was well to the left of the Labor leadership in endorsing the view that, "if Mr. Sandys really means what he said, he should make way for someone who realizes that the aim of defense is to defend us, not to destroy us."

A veteran Labor MP commented after the debate that Brown and party leader Gaitskell seemed to have "nailed their colors to the H-bomb, and left themselves no escape hatch as Gaitskell did after his first speech on Suez and the rank-and-file reaction against it. There is going to be a showdown between those in our party who want the H-bomb and don't want socialism, and those who want socialism and not the bomb." Many Laborites thought the crisis might blow up into an irresistible demand for a change in party leadership. This would presumably mean the leadership passing to Bevan, who is playing his cards very close to the chest.

THE PROSPECTS: While it is the fast-snowballing demand for a British lead in nuclear disarmament that has brought the Labor Party crisis to a head, discontent on other issues has powerfully contributed to it. These include rising living costs and wage-freezes and unemployment, and above all the decontrolling of rents which, next October, may lead to pitched battles between police and thousands of tenants marked for eviction. On rent decontrol even a score of Tory back-benchers are expressing "urgent concern" to Macmillan.

Labor's rank and file are disgusted by their leader's feeble opposition on all these issues. But it is becoming daily clearer that, except in the most solid Tory areas, candidates of whatever party favoring Britain's continued nuclear armament stand a poor chance of election. And a general election is now not far off.

COMING SHORTLY

SELECTED WORKS OF LU HSUN

(Vol. Three)

This volume contains ninety-eight of Lu Hsun's essays written during the Second Revolutionary Civil War (1927-36). They deal with key events in the life and struggles of the Chinese people during this period and reflect important developments in the outlook and thinking of the author.

Lu Hsun's essays have a style all their own. They epitomize his life-long struggle as a thinker and fighter, and the main events in China during the democratic revolution. Although many of his works have been translated, this is the first published selection of English translations of his essays from the above period.

Annals of a Provincial Town

by KAO YUN-LAN

Part of Fukien Province, including Amoy, was occupied by the Japanese forces during their 1937-1945 invasion of China and those were bitter days for its people. In the countryside, traitor landlords battled to keep their land and power by favour of the invaders. They did not hesitate to betray patriot peasants. In the cities, Japanese ronin and Chinese traitors ruled the streets. Selfish merchants traded in Japanese goods. Japanese espionage agencies and Kuomintang reactionaries collaborated in a plot to make Fukien "autonomous." But the people fought back valiantly. Annals of a Provincial Town is a story of that struggle, of the workers, fishermen, youth, intellectuals and others who joined together in a broad united front to free Fukien.

A native of the province, Kao Yun-lan knows his hot-blooded Fukienese well and he portrays them vividly in all their colourful, impetuous ways. His humour is deft and sharp, and his treatment of romantic love in the midst of war, delightfully human.

TUNG TSUN-JUI: The Making of a Hero

by TSO LIN

The life story of an outstanding hero of the Chinese People's Liberation Army. To save his comrades' lives and clear the way for the liberation of an enemy-held city, he destroyed a Kuomintang block-house at the cost of his own life. This book, describing the development of his character as a result of the education given him by the Chinese Communist Party, has had a tremendous influence on young people in China.

put forward by the Chinese Communist Party for the simultaneous development of national and local enterprises, of large, small and medium-sized enterprises, of modern and indigenous methods of production, of combining centralized leadership and mass movements on a broad scale.

Government investments in the industry in 1958 alone nearly equalled those of the entire First Five-Year Plan. In 1953-57, the construction of 33 key chemical plants was undertaken; last year work began on another 53.

Considerable, too, was the output of the small workshops and factories using indigenous methods to make chemical fertilizer, insecticides and other chemicals — which also widely spread technical knowledge and productive skills in the rural areas.

During the spring and summer of last year, Honan Province, as a good example, was energetic in such local manufacture of chemical fertilizers and insecticides. On the average, about 370 jin of chemical fertilizers made by them were applied to each mu of farm land, which was one of the factors for the abundant Honan harvest.

Many advantages make it feasible to spread small chemical workshops using indigenous methods of production more widely in the rural areas. Not requiring very complex equipment or big investments, they yield almost immediate benefits. The skills involved are easy to learn. The rural people's communes are not only a huge market for fertilizers and insecticides but have the raw materials to make them. Once the workshops are built, sweet potatoes, bran, rice husks and grain stalks can be converted into valuable chemicals. This determines the tremendous potential for chemical industry run by the people's communes.

Mass Technical Revolution

In modern chemical plants, the mass technical revolution centres on innovations in production techniques, the invention or improvement of equipment, heightening the quality of products, the manufacture of new products and the application of up-to-date science and technology. By such means, the Yungli Plant in Nanking succeeded in raising its daily output of sulphuric acid by 30 per cent and the Talien Chemical Works raised its daily output of pure soda by 90 per cent. A new catalyst for the production of sulphuric acid has proved six times as efficient as the one previously used.

Innovations have greatly speeded capital construction in the industry. Installations in the Lanchow Synthetic Ammonia Plant were completed in only 15 months, more than a year ahead of schedule. Its early commissioning will mean a lot to industry and agriculture. One of its teams installed two large high-pressure compressors in the record time of 18 days. Generally two months to install one compressor would be rated good time.

The primary goals of the chemical industry in 1959 are to increase greatly the production of chemicals and to ensure the prior development of heavy industry, and at the same time to take care of the needs of light industry and, wherever possible, agriculture. In the meantime, both large plants and small and medium-sized factories will be greatly developed in a co-ordinated nationwide scheme.

CHINA AND AFRICA

by W. E. B. DU BOIS

Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, noted American Negro scholar, who is now visiting China with his wife, the writer Shirley Graham, addressed more than 1,000 faculty members and students at Peking University on February 23, his 91st birthday. Here we present the full text of his speech. — Ed.

BY courtesy of the government of the 680 million people of the Chinese Republic, I am permitted on my ninety-first birthday to speak to the people of China and Africa and through them to the world. Hail, then, and farewell, dwelling places of the yellow and black races. Hail human kind!

I speak with no authority: no assumption of age nor rank; I hold no position, I have no wealth. One thing alone I own and that is my own soul. Ownership of that I have even while in my own country for near a century I have been nothing but a "nigger." On this basis and this alone I dare speak, I dare advise.

China after long centuries has arisen to her feet and leapt forward. Africa arise, and stand straight, speak and think! Act! Turn from the West and your slavery and humiliation for the last 500 years and face the rising sun. Behold a people, the most populous nation on this ancient earth which has burst its shackles, not by boasting and strutting, not by lying about its history and its conquests, but by patience and long suffering, by hard, backbreaking labour and with bowed head and blind struggle, moved up and on toward the crimson sky. She aims to "make men holy; to make men free." But what men? Not simply the mandarins but including mandarins; not simply the rich, but not excluding the rich. Not simply the learned, but led by knowledge to the end that no man shall be poor, nor sick, nor ignorant; but that the humblest worker as well as the sons of emperors shall be fed and taught and healed and that there emerge on earth a single unified people, free, well and educated.

You have been told, my Africa: My Africa in Africa and all your children's children overseas; you have been told and the telling so beaten into you by rods and whips, that you believe it yourselves, that this is impossible; that mankind can only rise by walking on men; by cheating them and killing them; that only on a doormat of the despised and dying, the dead and rotten, can a British aristocracy, a French cultural élite or an American millionaire be nurtured and grown. This is a lie. It is an ancient lie spread by church and state, spread by priest and historian, and believed in by fools and cowards, as well as by the down-trodden and the children of despair.

SPEAK, China, and tell your truth to Africa and the world. What people have been despised as you have? Who more than you have been rejected of men? Recall when lordly Britishers threw the rickshaw money on the ground to avoid touching a filthy hand. Forget not, the time when in Shanghai no Chinaman dare set foot in a park which he paid for. Tell this to Africa, for today Africa stands on new feet, with new eyesight, with new brains and asks: Where am I and why? The Western sirens answer; Britain wheedles; France cajoles; while America, my America, where my ancestors and descendants for eight generations have lived and toiled; America loudest of all, yells and promises freedom. If only Africa allows American investment. Beware Africa, America bargains for your soul. America would have you believe that they freed your grandchildren; that Afro-Americans are full American citizens, treated like equals, paid fair wages as workers, promoted for desert and free to learn and earn and travel across the world. This is not true. Some are near freedom; some approach equality with whites; some have achieved education; but the price for this has too often been slavery of mind, distortion of truth and oppression of our own people. Of 18 million Afro-Americans, 12 million are still second-class citizens of the United States, serfs in farming, low-paid laborers in industry, and repressed members of union labor. Most American Negroes do not vote. Even the rising six million are liable to insult and discrimination at any time.

But this, Africa, relates to your descendants, not to you. Once I thought of you Africans as children, whom we educated Afro-Americans would lead to liberty. I was wrong. We could not even lead ourselves, much less you. Today I see you rising under your own leadership, guided by your own brains.

Africa does not ask alms from China nor from the Soviet Union nor from France, Britain, nor the United States. It asks friendship and sympathy and no nation better than China can offer this to the Dark Continent. Let it be given freely and generously. Let Chinese visit Africa, send their scientists there and their artists and writers. Let Africa send its students to China and its seekers after knowledge. It will not find on earth a richer goal, a more promising mine of information. On the other hand, watch the West. The new British West Indian Federation is not a form of democratic progress but a cunning attempt to reduce these islands to the control of British and American investors. Haiti is dying under rich Haitian investors who with American money are enslaving the peasantry. Cuba is showing what the West Indies, Central and South America are suffering under American Big Business. The American worker himself does not always realize this. He has high wages and many comforts. Rather than lose these, he keeps in office by his vote the servants of industrial exploitation so long as they maintain his wage. His labor leaders represent exploitation and not the fight against the exploitation of labor by private capital. These two sets of exploiters fall out only when one demands too large a share of the loot. This China knows. This Africa must learn. This the American Negro has failed so far to learn. I am frightened by the so-called friends who are flocking to Africa. Negro Americans trying to make money from your toil, white Americans who seek by investment at high interest to bind you in serfdom to business as the Near East is bound and as South America is struggling with. For this America is tempting your leaders, bribing your young scholars, and arming your soldiers. What shall you do?

First, understand! Realize that the great mass of mankind is freeing itself from wage slavery, while private capital in Britain, France, and now in America, is still trying to maintain civilization and comfort for a few on the toil, disease and ignorance of the mass of men. Understand this, and understanding comes from direct knowledge. You know America and France and Britain to your sorrow. Now know the Soviet Union and its allied nations, but particularly know China.

CHINA is flesh of your flesh and blood of your blood. China is coloured and knows to what a coloured skin in this modern world subjects its owner. But China knows more, much more than this: she knows what to do about it. She can take the insults of the United States and still hold her head high. She can make her own machines or go without machines, when America refuses to sell her American manufactures, even though it hurts American industry, and throws her workers out of jobs. China does not need American nor British missionaries to teach her religion and scare her with tales of hell. China has been in hell too long, not to believe in a heaven of her own making. This she is doing.

Come to China, Africa, and look around. Invite Africa to come, China, and see what you can teach just by pointing. Yonder old woman is working on the street. But she is happy. She has no fear. Her children are in school and a good school. If she is ill, there is a hospital where she is cared for free of charge. She has a vacation with pay each year. She can die and be buried without taxing her family to make some undertaker rich.

Africa can answer: but some of this we have done; our tribes undertake public service like this. Very well, let your tribes continue and expand this work. What Africa must realize is what China knows: that it is worse than stupid to allow a people's education to be under the control of those who seek not the progress of the people but their use as means of making themselves rich and powerful. It is wrong for the University of London to control the University of Ghana. It is wrong for the Catholic church to direct the education of the black Congolese. It was wrong for Protestant churches supported by British and American wealth to control higher education in China. The Soviet Union is surpassing the world in popular and higher education, because from the beginning it started its own complete educational system.

The essence of the revolution in the Soviet Union and China and in all the "iron curtain" nations, is not the violence that accompanied the change: no more than starvation at Valley Forge was the essence of the American revolution against Britain. The real revolution is the acceptance on the part of the nation of the fact that hereafter the main object of the nation is the welfare of the mass of the people and not of a lucky few.

Government is for the people's progress and not for the comfort of an aristocracy. The object of industry is the welfare of the workers and not the wealth of the owners. The object of civilization is the cultural progress of the mass of workers and not merely of an intellectual élite. And in return for all this communist lands believe that the cultivation of the mass of people will discover more talent and genius to serve the state than any closed aristocracy ever furnished. This belief the current history of the Soviet Union and China is proving true each day. Therefore don't let the West invest when you can avoid it. Don't buy capital from Britain, France and the United States if you can get it on reasonable terms from the Soviet Union and China. This is not politics; it is common sense. It is learning from experience. It is trusting your friends and watching your enemies.

Refuse to be cajoled or to change your way of life so as to make a few of your fellows rich at the expense of a mass of workers growing poor and sick and remaining without schools so that a few black men can have automobiles.

Africa, here is a real danger which you must avoid or return to the slavery from which you are emerging. All I ask from you is the courage to know; to look about you and see what is happening in this old and tired world; to realize the extent and depth of its rebirth and the promise which glows on yonder hills.

Visit the Soviet Union and visit China. Let your youth learn the Russian and Chinese languages. Stand together in this new world and let the old world perish in its greed or be born again in new hope and promise. Listen to the Hebrew prophet of communism:

Ho! every one that thirsteth; come ye to the waters; come, buy and eat, without money and without price!

Again, China and Africa, hail and farewell!

Birthday Party in Peking

A gala Chinese-style party to celebrate the 91st birthday of Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, the famous American scholar and Negro leader now visiting China with his wife, the writer Shirley Graham, was held at Peking Hotel on February 23. Vice-Premier Chen Yi and other Chinese prominent in many fields of work and Americans in Peking were guests. Scrolls with traditional symbols of longevity decorated the walls. A birthday cake and a bowl of "long life" peaches from Premier Chou En-lai, and candles, flowers and miniature cypress trees stood on the ceremonial table.

Kuo Mo-jo, Chairman of the China Peace Committee, which, with the Chinese People's Association for Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries, was co-host at the festivities, congratulated Dr. Du Bois on behalf of the millions who have the deepest love and respect for him. "We see in Dr. Du Bois a worthy representative of the American people with whom we hope very much to maintain peaceful and friendly intercourse," he said.

Describing present-day U.S. imperialism as Enemy Number One of the peace-loving peoples of the world, Kuo Mo-jo paid tribute to the struggle which Dr. Du Bois has waged untiringly for his ideals in a political atmosphere heavy with deceit and tyranny. He greeted Dr. Du Bois' efforts as "a brilliant demonstration of the American people's love for peace and justice.... Countless American and African working people, groaning under the yoke of monopoly capital and racial prejudice, look upon Dr. Du Bois as the standard bearer of their struggle." Kuo Mo-jo wished the famous Negro leader long life, saying: "Spring has come for mankind. Supported by your continued efforts, future developments will further encourage and strengthen the confidence of the peoples of the United States, Africa and the whole world in a glorious and happy tomorrow."

Well-known Chinese singers and dancers provided entertainment for the party. Outstanding were two Negro folk songs sung in Chinese. Many veteran Chinese scholars, artists and men of letters presented gifts, paintings and poems to Dr. Du Bois. He received a copy of the Chinese translation of his own work, Battle for Peace, and birthday greetings from personal friends in China, the United States, the Soviet Union and many other lands.

Renmin Ribao marked Dr. Du Bois' birthday with an article in its literary columns by the noted Chinese novelist Mao Tun and a couplet by Kuo Mo-jo greeting Dr. Du Bois' great contributions to the cause of peace and freedom.

The Dream of Socialism

by DR. W. E. B. DU BOIS

HUMAN minds dream and human dreams come true. Not all dreams, but some. Some day there will be on earth, Liberty, Equality and Brotherhood. Some day but not yet. No Christian nation today pretends to follow even afar the ethics of Jesus Christ. But one dream, old and long-pursued was started toward reality forty-two years ago, and today no one in the world denies that socialism is a reality in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. This is reason for world rejoicing that human dreams can come true.

Thinkers have long believed that the evils of capitalism could be cured. But industry supported by private capital ridiculed the idea. They did not deny the evils, but they said that human nature being what it was, would never support a welfare state nor would men work effectively for all instead of striving each for himself. Efforts like the French Commune and many smaller trials failed disastrously; then in 1917 came the Russian Revolution. The world was not content to watch the experiment-making with unbelieving eyes and with no proffer of aid. Oh no! The leading states of the civilized world—Great Britain, France, the United States, Japan and others made every possible effort to compel the proposed experiment to fail. Perhaps the world has forgotten or certainly wants to forget what was done to the struggling socialist state in Russia from 1917 to 1928 and even later. The Soviet Union was attacked not only by armies and navies, but by spies and traitors; by lies, calumnies and suspicion. It came to be the firmly held accusation of the Western world that Russian socialism was a conspiracy against civilization, a crime against religion and culture and a deliberate attempt to turn the clock of human progress backward. The hurt and heartbreak of those awful years will never be adequately recorded. I saw but the dying shadow of it in 1926 when I first visited the Soviet Union.

Today what a change! Not simply a change of world attitude toward the first socialist nation of the modern world, but what actual change in the status and accomplishment of this nation! This great people whom the Western world confidently expected to starve to death, to flounder in anarchy, to commit suicide in civil revolution, or wallow in crime, is not only well-fed and adequately clothed, increasingly housed in comfortable and sanitary homes, cared for in disease and employed in ever-widening industry, but—and this has long been most difficult for the capitalist world divide Germany after World War II; which split the attempted union of world trade unionism started in Paris in 1945; that today keeps masses of African workers out of unions entirely and in the United States herds most Negro workers into segregated unions with limited rights. This trade unionism supports world war and hatred of socialism.

This is the world in which we fight for Peace and Freedom. And in this world we rejoice that a great socialist state has been born, lives and expands in deed and influence and bears in its hands the hopes of mankind.

FURTHER REDUCTION IN SOVIET WORKING DAY

THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the Council of Ministers of the USSR and the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, have adopted a decision to complete the transition of factory and office workers to a reduced working day in the period from the fourth quarter of 1959 to the fourth quarter of 1960. The transition will be effected simultaneously with an adjustment of wages.

The decision envisages the transition of all factory and office workers to a seven-hour working day and those engaged in underground work to a six-hour day.

The decision fixes increased piece rates and a new system of graded rates for workers as well as new salaries for engineering and technical staffs and clerks.

The lowest wage is to be increased at the same time to 400-500 rubles in accordance with the decision of the Twenty-first Congress.

The decision points out that following the workers and employees of the coal industry and the steel industry (and those engaged in underground work) getting a seven-hour working day in 1958-1959, the six-hour day was introduced and new conditons of payment for workers and employees established in the non-ferrous metal industry, the chemistry industry, the cement industry, the manufacture of reinforced concrete articles and structures, the production of salt and ozocerite.

The transition to a shorter working day will begin before the end of this year for factory and office workers in the engineering and metal-working, the oil and gas industries.

The decision emphasizes that the transition to a shorter working day and the simultaneous adjustment of wages—above all, in the principal branches of heavy industry—make an important contribution to the further advance of the socialist economy and the rise in the material and cultural standards of factory and office workers.

DEMOCRACY MUST BE RESTORED TO THE U.S.

A program of reason, right and justice for today

By W. E. B. Du Bois

DAILY LATELY AS I READ the morning news, I find myself asking if age is driving me a bit crazy or if I'm living in a crazy nation. I have lived through much history and read far more, but I can remember no situation which parallels the present. Governments and rulers have always lied. But never with the quick, bland, easy assurance such as our transformation of a spying trip which failed into a weather exploration—and then blaming the Soviet Union for "propaganda." We have only to scan our magazines to see how the United States is being transformed from an unsophisticated people of original Tinkers and Thinkers to a nation of Liars and Buyers.

President Eisenhower continues to astonish me. Yesterday this Delphic oracle came from the golf links: "We never enslaved anyone." Today we learn that Turkey is not our spy base but a "bastion of Freedom," where the NATO of the "Free World" dares not stay long enough to hear the President's welcome, because Prime Minister Menderes is trying to outrun angry students threatening his life.

Right here I draw a breath of relief. Students at last to the rescue, even in the West. I had lost faith in them as during the McCarthy nightmare I spoke at a few institutions and looked into their blank faces. But today young seekers after knowledge live again despite a woeful lack of teachers. Not only in Turkey, which we have purchased, but in Japan where they defy Prime Minister Kishi's plan to tie Nippon to the Pentagon; and in South Korea where they have driven a demagogue out of power.

OF COURSE I AM ESPECIALLY uplifted by the revolt of Negro students in America. With neither leadership nor encouragement from their own people (despite all the declarations of the johnnie-come-latelies frantically scrambling aboard the bandwagon), alone and unaided they put their finger on a vital spot and acted. Our Negro Problem is not simply disfranchisement, lynching, mob-law, court injustice and widespread serfdom with poverty and disease: it is a daily, unending series of petty, senseless insults carried out almost everywhere, and always by civilized people of religion and culture, for no earthly reason except senseless meanness and neglect.

In the South a Negro goes downtown to buy a few necessities, and can't buy a bite to eat; he can't get a drink; he can't go to a movie; sometimes he can't sit in a park; and of course he can't bathe in the ocean, as in Biloxi, in the most ignorant state of the Union, where there are 26 miles of beach. Black students—not agitators, not even radicals, since little economics or social science is taught in Southern schools—just honest, clear-headed youth who one day say: "We buy our school books and paper at Woolworth's; why not buy a sandwich?"

Then the proud, cultured South goes berserk. Boys and girls are arrested, clubbed and jailed. Churches sing, pray and send Billy Graham to Africa. Still students "sit down." Then Big Business moves in. It threatens colored college presidents. Some, like Wright of Fisk, refuse to yield. Some, like Trenholm of Alabama, crawl. Then Big Business squeezes parents and some parents, to save their jobs, plead with their children; but at least at one colored college 4,000 students withdraw while their president skulks. They threaten to put a white president in at Lincoln who will teach Negroes their place. They may try this at Howard. They may starve Fisk. What will result? Will the students fall back into line? I think not. Some white students feel the glorious possibilities of this day; but the nation is silent and dumb.

ARE WE HAPPY AT ALL THIS? No, America is scared to death. Asia has arisen. Africa arises. The Soviet Union marches on. East Europe is triumphant. Cuba is free. Panama and Latin America follow. But the United States is stubborn.

We lie about China and support a man on her borders to attack her whom we ourselves have called a scoundrel. We invest six hundred million dollars in slave labor and stolen gold, diamonds and uranium in South Africa where our Boer allies have 18,000 Negroes in jail and ten million more fated to be hammered into slavery. We woo Adenauer to preserve a Germany which our army, with the help of the leader of the AFL-CIO, fashioned as a threat for a Third World War to conquer the Soviets. We bribe Franco, cajole Italy and, as long as possible, we will hang on to Trujillo. We are intriguing in Viet-Nam and Laos and praying for war between India and China, which fails to occur.

Signs of disaster gather about our heads. We are unable to sell enough abroad to pay for what we buy and have been compelled to spend four billions in the last two years out of our hoard of gold to pay the deficit. Our cost of living rises continuously and unemployment spreads, despite our ingenious efforts to deceive the public. The gamblers of the stock market are sweating in vain to unload on the suckers the inflated values of our monopolized industry. We are soaking the sick with high-priced medicines and hospital fees beyond the reach of the poor. We are bribing our skilled labor with high wages paid out of the hides of exploited Negro and Mexican labor and from the poverty and disease of poor whites.

Our justice is showered with injustice. Our jails seethe with the revolts of the wretched and the innocent and of thousands whose only crime is being black. We murder Chessman for no crime we can prove; we jail Uphaus and Sobell, torture Winston and drive Heikkila to death. Why? The bomb-proof shelters of the editorial offices of the New York Times hear a rumor that our judges often actually pay two years' salary for nomination.

WE ARE DELIBERATELY DISTORTING history—not simply United States history so as to excuse Negro slavery and deify slave owners, to praise the traitors who solemnly swore to support their country and then fought desperately to betray it and preserve Negro slavery; but especially to twist and distort the world wars and the triumph of socialism.

We started with propaganda which out-Hitlered Hitler. Big Business monopolized news-gathering, newspapers, periodicals and publishing. The nation was led to believe that communism was a conspiracy and crime, and socialism its handmaid. We were told that the communist states were failures, their citizens serfs and prisoners, seething with revolt; their women prostitutes and their education only "brain-washing" propaganda. Many wanted to use our atom bomb immediately on Moscow, but when we found the Soviets already had it we accused them of stealing it from us, as they were certainly too dumb to have invented it.

We planned for war. Our State Department and national leaders cooperated with Collier's magazine in 1951. The nation was primed to conquer the Soviet Union in 1960. This is 1960. This was to be the year of conquest. Collier's (of blessed memory) foretold the event in 130 pages, written by Allan Nevins, our "leading" historian; Stuart Chase, our "leading" economist; Edward R. Murrow, our "great" news interpreter; Margaret Chase Smith, our woman Senator; Robert Sherwood and J. B. Priestley. Our Senator wrote of "Russia Reborn" under American soldiers, presumably armed with flaming napalm and disease germs. This victory had to be postponed, but our propaganda continued.

WE CONTINUED TO SNEER at education and progress in the Soviet Union. I once heard Conant of Harvard, formerly High Commissioner of Germany, tell the Harvard Club of New York that Soviet leaders repeatedly refused to tell him what examinations were given high school students for entrance into college. He finally learned (here in America) that "the Communist Party would not allow any examinations!" This proved Soviet education a farce. A few years later came Sputnik and the photographing of the back of the moon. We had to acknowledge the superiority of Soviet education, the progress of her science and the fact that her industrial development might soon equal or even outstrip ours.

Khrushchev dared to visit us and, while Congress went into hiding, he made the finest speech for world peace which has been heard here since Lincoln at Gettysburg. We then photographed Russian fortifications and lied about it. Why? Because Allen Dulles and our military rulers are still determined to smash the Summit conference and plunge the world into war.

Meantime we want to help the world. We remember how American charity has often fed the hungry and healed the sick. Taking every advantage of this memory, Big Business has used it to the hilt. The Marshall Plan was to help war-torn Europe. In reality it helped American business to buy into European industry, beat back socialist labor, bribe skilled labor and pay soldiers. In fact with most of the funds we are arming all foreigners we can bribe or scare to help us fight Communists, and with what's left we are using our public tax funds to give rich American investors private capital, or to bribe native quislings in India and Africa to betray their countries to American industry. Already in New York alone we have four "African" organizations, financed by Big Business, and officered by Negroes supposed to give "information" on Africa. Pious churchmen are furnishing the requisite religious background. For all of this Eisenhower is now demanding four billions of our dollars which ought to be used for social medicine, education and housing.

HOWEVER, MY FRIENDS NOTE, an election is coming up. So what? There is, to be sure, a President soon to be chosen. The expenditure of all candidates for the office in 1956 was said to have been $100,000,000. This year it may be $500,000,000. Only Big Business, well-heeled stock gamblers and the China Lobby can bid. Whether a Democrat or Republican wins, it will be the same gang. You will have no chance to vote for a meaningful third party. You will have no chance to vote for peace or war; for social medicine, housing or decent education. Why?

We know the reason. It is because the United States is no longer a democracy. Most citizens know this well and do not waste time going to the polls. If it were true that we have what we want in this nation, we could sit still and wait on reason. But it is not true. We are ruled by a minority armed with wealth and power. This usurpation we must fight. We must first demand the right to have a third party on the ballot. This the politicians prevent and these politicians must go.

HERE IS A PROGRAM for those who have not lost hope and who yet believe in America. Forget the Presidency. It will make not a jot of difference whether Nixon and Chiang Kai-shek, or Kennedy and Cardinal Spellman, win the office. Concentrate on Senators and Congressmen, legislators and city councilmen and ward heelers.

Insist on a chance to vote for peace, for the total abolition of the color line; for no family income above $25,000 or below $5,000; for free education from kindergarten through college; for housing on a nation-wide scale; for training of all for the work they can do in so far as such work is needed for the best interests of all. Insist on discipline for this work. Allow no laborer to be paid less than his product is worth; and let no employer take what he does not make. Curb corporations by putting most of them under government ownership.

Heal the sick as a privilege, not as a charity. Make private ownership of natural resources a crime. Stop interference with private and personal belief by religious hypocrites. Preserve the utmost freedom for dream of beauty, creative art and joy of living. Call this socialism, communism, reformed capitalism or holy rolling. Call it anything—but get it done!

Perhaps this is insane, but to me it is Reason, Right and Justice. As Bert Williams once said: "I may be crazy, but I ain't no Fool!"

DR. DU BOIS REVIEWS CONGO'S HISTORY

The world must wake soon to bar war in Africa

By W. E. B. Du Bois
Special to the Guardian

FLORENCE, ITALY

CONGO WAS A TRAGIC miscalculation. Little Belgium had inherited El Dorado. Hundreds of millions of dollars poured into this land annually from a great territory 40 times its size. In this empire was one of the world's greatest deposits of copper to carry electric power over sea and land; elephant tusks to furnish piano keys for lovely music, palm oil, fruit, rare woods, fibers and lately uranium for bombs to raise hell.

Nobody knows how vast a horde of wealth Congo has poured into Belgium, Europe and North America in the last century, for this is a secret of individual initiative in the capitalist world of Nordic supremacy. But all men including Pope and Protestant hierarchy and learned colleges know how many cheap laborers were slaves of white Europe to make Belgians clean, comfortable and learned and leaders of civilization. Once the atrocities of the Congo aroused the world and the Belgian folk took Congo out of the private purse of Leopold to rule themselves.

REMEMBRANCE: I remember talking to the first Belgian Socialist premier in the Twenties, and his firm promise to institute reform and stop cutting off the hands of lagging black workers. I remembered the legends of the King of Congo whom the Portuguese met in the 15th century and whose royal son was educated in Lisbon. I had read as a boy Stanley's flamboyant and lying proclamation of the great new Christian Kingdom of Congo which Civilization was about to rear in the Dark Continent, to lead the natives to God.

Centuries passed: The 16th with its great flowering of imperial black Africa south of the Sahara; the 17th, with the duel of Fetish and Moslem, and the Long March of Bantu from Niger to Zambesi; the 18th century and the British trade in slaves from Africa to America; and the 19th century when Europe stole the world and built its culture on the degradation of Asia and Africa.

CENTURY OF WAR: Out of this wretched past was naturally born this century of war and destruction, with the West stubbornly determined to restore its domination of mankind, and with the East —in Europe, Asia and Africa—increasingly set on freedom and independence. Belgium, despite its baptism in war and rapine, because it lay in the crossing paths of greedy empires, made peace with all, and came to understanding with the wheeling buzzards of the West.

If you wanted to make money invest in the Congo enterprises: profitable, respectable private enterprise, paying high and regular dividends, and no questions asked. Moreover the natives were happy; their tribal rule was intact and their chiefs happy so long as the black slaves toiled for their white masters, and the wealth rolled into Europe.

THESE CONGOLESE CELEBRATED ON THE EVE OF THEIR INDEPENDENCE
Since then powerful forces have conspired to keep them in subjection

When in 1921 I held a session of the Pan-African congress in Brussels, and one young Congolese, Panda, ventured to join us in criticism of Belgian rule, the Belgian press raged: "Bolsheviks," spies and revolutionists they called us; the natives were content and the Holy Catholic church was giving them enough education for their good; not too much; not enough to make them unhappy and demanding more than their few brains could use.

BURSTING BUBBLE: Congo had no such unhappy intelligentsia as the British had nursed in West Africa and the French in Senegal. Even if Belgium did not have enough trained Congolese to educate even as physicians, at least Black Congo did not want to vote. So Belgium crowed even as late as the World Exposition of 1958.

And then in 1960 the bubble burst and black Congo demanded not only a share in government but independence. It was inconceivable. It was unbelievable. Even when my wife, Shirley Graham, who read my message to the Sixth Pan-African Congress, meeting as the All-African Conference in Accra in 1958, told me of Lumumba there demanding independence for Congo, I thought he was an unthinking fanatic.

But I pride myself on ability to learn; on seeing what appears before my eyes. Yesterday, I was paying farewell to the President of Ghana, just as he was taking leave of Lumumba, Prime Minister of Congo, who was on his way home from a meeting of the Security Council which had ordered Belgium out of Congo because it dare not do otherwise. After Lumumba flew home in a Russian jet plane, President Nkrumah and I talked for a few moments.

THE BEGINNING: We knew that the trials of Congo had not ended but just begun. The luxury-loving West, which was parading and yachting, gambling and horse-racing, dressing and dancing and keeping darkies out of highly paid unions, was not going to give up Congo millions without a desperate struggle even if it involved world war. Ghana, the Soviet Union and China must furnish capital and technical skill to keep the great wheels of Congo enterprise running; but running not for profit of white skilled labor and the idle rich, but for the starving, sick and ignorant Africans.

From me the President asked but one service: the starting again of the Encyclopedia Africana which I tried desperately to begin back in 1900. We must unite Africa, he said, and know its history and culture. Against all dreams of an independent black Congo stand arrayed today forces of terrible strength: the organized business enterprise of the Western world; incorporated monopoly: with secret concealed, anonymous personalities; ruled by dictators, amenable to no laws of morality whose only object is gain of wealth, at any cost of life, liberty or of human happiness.

This faceless, conscienceless power is today armed to the teeth and spending for force and violence more money than for anything else on earth and hiring all the ability and genius of the world which is for sale, for the murder, rape, destruction and degradation of man, which Big Business wants accomplished; and hiding this from common knowledge by every device available to man.

TRUTH IS WINNING: Ranged therefore against free and independent Congo is the Oppenheimer Gold and Diamond Trust, the Lever Brothers world monopolies under its legion of names; the oil trusts, Standard, Shell and others, the French, Swiss and West German cartels, and that part of the Christian church and Moslem religion which is dependent on the charity of the rich.

But the truth is winning; socialism is spreading, communism is becoming more and more possible to increasing millions:

"Fear not, O little flock the foe,
That madly seeks thine overthrow Fear not its rage and Power!"

Finally down toward Land's End, on the Cape of Evil Omen, are some three million whites in the Union of South Africa, the Rhodesias and Southwest Africa, who are determined to rule 20 or more million blacks as slaves and servants. They say this brazenly and openly in the face of the world and none do anything, save black Africa. And here the next world war will begin unless the world wakes up and wakes soon.

PRO-BOMB LABORITES RIDICULED

Ban-the-bomb rebels win in Britain's trade unions

By Cedric Belfrage

LONDON

WHILE BAN THE BOMB crusaders got a rousing welcome everywhere on a Scotland-to-London march for peace, right-wing union "leaders" invited national ridicule in their efforts to stem the peace tide within organized labor.

Two resolutions on defense policy confronted the annual Trades Union Congress at Douglas, Isle of Man. On a basis of mandates to delegations, the pro-Bomb resolution reflecting the official Labor Party-TUC line had no chance against the anti-Bomb resolution sponsored by the Transport Workers, Britain's largest union. Among delegations instructed to support the TWU resolution was that of the Amalgamated Engineering Union. In a pre-congress huddle, right-wing AEU president William Carron pressured his delegation into a majority of one for also supporting the official resolution. The two resolutions were diametrically opposed, and even newspapers hero-worshipping Carron for his red-baiting vigor deplored this desperate tactic.

BURLESQUE: The farce degenerated into burlesque when the card votes on the two resolutions were taken. (Under this system, each delegation leader holds up a card bearing the number of his union membership in thousands.) The announced result was a majority of 690,000 for the pro-Bomb and only 235,000 for the anti-Bomb resolution. After evening papers had rushed out "SHOCK FOR THE REBELS" headlines, it was discovered that 930,000 anti-Bomb votes had not been counted, and the anti-Bomb majority was in fact nearly double the pro-Bomb majority.

The error was due to the AEU's Carron having—as the teller explained later—"held his card just in front of his chest, not what I call 'up'" when the anti-Bomb vote was taken. The number on Carron's card was 930. It was noted that the anti-Bomb sentiment was so strong that it would have carried the day even without the AEU.

The machine having got out of control due to progressive Frank Cousins' accession to leadership of the once-docile TWU, the right-wing hierarchy have made increasingly clear their intention to defy contrary decisions on defense policy by the TUC and by next month's Labor Party conference. In a desperate plea for other union chiefs to follow Carron's example, Labor Party defense spokesman George Brown has declared that decisions on the Bomb are "emphatically not fundamental to socialism." Yet even to the Tory pro-Bomb Daily Mail the struggle over nuclear defense is "of deep conscience and importance," and the paper is "sickened" by the "threadbare political tricks" with which Labor right-wingers are conducting it in an effort to save party leader Gaitskell.

NEW DEFEAT: A further disaster for Gaitskell, who wants to revise the public-ownership Clause Four of his party's constitution, was a unanimous call by TUC speakers for more public ownership and control of industry. Plenty of Gaitskellites were present, but kept silent in face of the clear majority stand. Once again the press was full of speculations as to how or whether Gaitskell could retain party leadership.

The Express predicted he would "ride roughshod over the rebels" at next month's party conference and refuse to resign even in face of clear defeat on defense policy. Other pundits thought that the "frantic efforts" now being made by the Gaitskellites would result in some "compromise" resolution capable of carrying the conference.

This would, according to the Mail, "combine adherence to NATO at the present time and a promise to make all-round nuclear disarmament the main prop of any future government." The Mail thought that the lack of any strong alternative leader might carry Gaitskell through in this way, but that "there is about as much honor in this 'solution' as in some vicious Victorian family which parades arm-in-arm to Church on Sundays and spends the rest of the week at each other's throats."

THE MARCH: Meanwhile the three-week Ban The Bomb march was moving through northern industrial areas on the second half of the trek to London. The march left Edinburgh 2,000 strong, and the 70-odd "hard core" headed by Canon Stanley Evans of Southwark Cathedral are being joined all along the route by Nuclear Disarmament, Quaker, trade union and other groups. The route is being papered with anti-Bomb leaflets, and rallies are being held in each town. The marchers are sleeping in town halls and schools, and at some places are being given a civic reception.

September's first weekend also saw the campaign to close U.S. bases resumed with fresh vigor, with ten youth organizations participating and demonstrations in London, Manchester, Bristol, Brighton and elsewhere.

Populația de culoare din S. U. A.

Articol scris pentru „Magazin"
de William E. B. Du Bois, cunoscut savant american care ne vizitează țara

Președintele Curții Supreme a S.U.A. într-o declarație din 1861 afirma că din punct de vedere istoric negrii nu au avut niciodată drepturi pe care albii să nu le fi respectat. Și totuși mii de bărbați negri sau mulatri erau vînduți în secolul trecut la licitație în orașele din sudul Statelor Unite. Mulți americani albi se cutremurau acum un secol la gîndul integrării negrilor în sînul națiunii americane. Ei uitau că în 1861 trăiau în S.U.A. două milioane de femei negre care nu puteau refuza dreptul seniorului de a-și poseda supusele. Că acești seniori proprietari de sclavi își exercitau cu conștiinciozitate acest drept o dovedește existența în 1861 a 588.000 mulatri americani. Și mai rău era faptul că de multe ori copiii sclavilor erau vînduți ca servitori de către seniori care puteau dispune în voie de soarta lor. Toate acestea se întîmplau în America secolului XIX, unde constituția recunoștea sclavia ca pe o instituție legală. Au apărut aboliționiștii, care asociați cu radicalii au recunoscut în negri o ființă egală omului. Lincoln, ales președinte, a fost privit nu ca un adversar al sclaviei ci ca un om care s-a opus extinderii ei. El este acela care a afirmat că nu dorește ca sudul sclavagist să întreacă din punct de vedere economic statele din nord. Tot Lincoln a fost acela care se îndoia că negrii vor putea fi vreodată asimilați națiunii americane. Fără îndoială Lincoln detesta sclavia dar nu a fost în nici un caz campionul eliberării negrilor, cum a fost numit. În schimb națiunea americană, în ansamblul ei, s-a opus categoric sclaviei sau a luptat pentru libertatea negrilor.

Cînd a izbucnit războiul de secesiune mulți americani simpli au declarat că acesta va fi de fapt un război între albi purtat de albi, pentru apărarea intereselor albilor. Revendicările seculare ale populației de culoare nu au fost luate în seamă. Mai mult, sclavia a fost apărată ca instituție oficială. Dacă un general din nord întîlnea în drumul său un negru fugit din sud îl înapoia a doua zi stăpînului său sau îl preda unui nou stăpîn. La ce era bun un sclav care slugărise o viață întreagă ca servitor și căuta acum refugiu? Bietului sclav nu-i rămînea decît moartea. S-a scris mult despre entuziasmul yankeilor din nord față de războiul de secesiune dar mai puțin despre motivele care i-au împins să lupte împotriva sudului. În orice caz nu de dragul eliberării negrilor au făcut aceasta, ci din dorința de a supune din punct de vedere economic statele din sud. Muncitorii, emigranții, fermierii și micii slujbași nu aveau nici un interes de a merge să moară în sud. Aveau în schimb multe interese bogătașii, capitaliștii care își răscumpărau serviciul militar plătind bani și înhățau cu forța în armată proletarii chinuiți de nevoi.

Milioanele de negri din nord, din sud, din vest și din est vedeau în război sfîrșitul suferințelor lor și de aceea doreau să meargă pe front. Au cerut arme, dar guvernul american a fost inflexibil: nu ne trebuie soldați de culoare. Lincoln a zîmbit: „dacă le vom pune arme în mîini, spunea el, a doua zi vor trece de partea dușmanului". Așa s-au întîmplat pe atunci lucrurile. În Carolina de sud unde războiul înclina în favoarea sudiștilor armatele nordului aveau nevoie de întăriri pentru a-și menține pozițiile cucerite. Recrutarea pe scară națională eșuase. În general, Hunter a pus atunci tunuri în mîinile sclavilor eliberați, i-a condus cu viteje în luptă și a învins. Congresul fierbea de mînie. Dar Hunter le-a răspuns: „N-am avut încotro, am pus tunuri în mîinile sclavilor pentru a păstra ceea ce am cucerit". Congresul a izbucnit în rîs. Și primul regiment de culoare s-a născut în istoria armatei americane. Carolina fusese doar începutul. Cînd apăreau armatele nordului sclavii își părăseau munca și se înrolau deîndată, cereau a fi trimiși în recunoaștere, înfăptuiau minunate acte de bravură. Ce și-ar fi dorit mai mult Alexandru cel Mare, Cezar, sau Napoleon?

În schimb guvernul federal din acel timp nu înceta să boicoteze lupta de eliberare a populației de culoare. Orice înfrîngere pe front era pusă pe socoteala celor „întunecați la față" care mîncau hrana celor din nord și făceau „spionaj" pentru cei din sud.

În acest timp sudul cunoștea mari dificultăți. Numai era acel puternic sud din punct de vedere economic reprezentat acum de un grup mic de bogătași, proprietari de sclavi și fermieri de mîna a doua. Albii săraci care nu aveau nici casă nici masă erau chemați să lupte împotriva nordului, înrolați cu forța în armată de unde dezertau a doua zi refuzînd să lupte pentru capitaliști.

Conducătorii sudului au fost în cele din urmă înfrînți. Gînditorii, idealiștii și partizanii abolițiomismului au început să ceară legiferarea eliberării negrilor. Cum dezrobirea negrilor fusese invocată ca pretext pentru acest război, Lincoln se văzu nevoit să ia o hotărîre și anume să oblige statele din sud să accepte eliberarea sclavilor. „Proclamația emancipării" din 1863 a făcut mai mult zgomot decît a fost în realitate. „Negrii sînt liberi de acum înainte și pentru totdeauna", glăsuia această proclamație. S-a înregistrat într-adevăr o anumită emancipare a elitei maselor de negri, a acelor negri bogați, a învățătorilor, puțini la număr dar avînd perspective sigure de emancipare... S-a făurit, după moartea lui Lincoln chiar și un cod special pentru pedepsirea celor care fugeau de emancipare. Anumiți congresmeni ca Stevens și Summer se întrebau dacă nu e cazul să se înființeze un departament al negrilor eliberați, sau să se dea fiecărui sclav o bucată de pămînt și un măgar, să se voteze pentru ei legi protecționiste etc. Summer a cerut și acordarea dreptului de vot pentru negrii din sud deoarece, spunea el, fără împlinirea acestui deziderat nu poate fi vorba de democrație în America. Aceste revendicări au rămas însă literă moartă. În sud au năvălit o droaie de capitaliști, de escroci, de speculanți ca Tweed care au jefuit țara sub pretextul emancipării. Au fost și americani onești care au muncit cu sudoarea frunții alături de căpeteniile sclavilor eliberați și au pornit la ridicarea poporului negru și la vindecarea rănilor războiului de acum un secol. Negrii aspirau la un învățămînt liber cu caracter popular, așa înțelegeau ei emanciparea. Niciodată în lume n-a fost un alt popor mai dornic de a se instrui ca poporul negru din Statele Unite. Mulți intelectuali idealiști și socialiști utopici din nordul Statelor Unite au venit în ajutorul lor. Marii fermieri însă alături de capitaliști refuzau să sprijine asemenea acțiuni și au făcut totul pentru a le zădărnici. Un alt exploatator a fost biserica, care a acționat de comun acord cu proprietarii de sclavi și cu capitaliștii. Masa populației de culoare din fostele state sclavagiste era prea ignorantă pentru a se apăra. Lipsită de conducători, supusă la un regim de exterminare din partea albilor această populație a luat drumul pribegiei.

Capitalismul, industria a făcut fără voie mai mult decît îi convenea. Industria l-a transformat pe negru în muncitor. Iar muncitorul negru a început să devină conștient de rolul său în societate. Această conștiință a mers pînă acolo încît în 1905 s-a format cunoscuta Mișcare a negrilor din Statele Unite, cu revendicări politice și economice cunoscută sub numele de „Niagara Movement of Negroes". Această mișcare s-a născut în epoca în care statele din nord și din sud lansează mînă în mînă o nouă ofensivă rasistă, legi împotriva căsătoriei dintre negri și albi, limitează angajarea negrilor în industrie, impune folosirea negrilor numai în anumite sectoare (servicii comunale, servitori, hamali), creează ghetto-uri și rezervații speciale pentru negri, legiferează discriminarea din transporturi și localurile de consum, lipsește de dreptul de vot milioane de negri. În ciuda reacțiunii dezlănțuite, a crimelor și a linșajului public, mișcarea de eliberare a negrilor se întărește astăzi pe baza unei platforme largi. Ea este sprijinită de numeroși lideri albi, umanitariști care cer abolirea legilor cu caracter rasial din S.U.A. Rasiștii cunosc și alte metode: o națiune civilizată nu poate asasina public în stradă un om din cauza culorii pielii sale. Acesta poate fi însă ucis în alt mod: prin intermediul exploatării, a șomajului, a inaniției.

Curtea Supremă a declarat în 1954 ca fiind neconstituționale orice discriminări în învățămînt. Sudul sclavagist a fost furios dar a fost imediat liniștit că această declarație nu va fi întărită de nici o lege. Azi din nou negrii sînt maltratați în stradă. Sînt aruncați jos din autobuz ca în Montgomery, sînt aruncați din facultăți acolo unde unul sau doi negri au pătruns în virtutea legilor existente în S.U.A.

Astăzi lumea privește Statele Unite cu zîmbete ironice. Sîntem noi oare lideri ai unei „lumi libere"? Sîntem noi oare campionii „democrației"? De aceea am organizat afacerea Little Rock? De aceea lipsim milioane de negri de dreptul de vot, alungăm studenții negri din universități, înăbușim în sînge libertatea cuvîntului și peste toate acestea trimitem în numele O.N.U. agenții noștri din F.B.I., și așa zise „detașamente de pacificare" în Africa...?

Bătălia țăranilor francezi

De o lună încoace nu trece zi fără ca agențiile de presă să nu pomenească alte și alte nume de localități din Franța, în legătură cu puternicele mișcări țărănești care au cuprins întreaga țară. Știrile din ultimele zile vorbeau despre orășelul Apt din departamentul Vaucluse — unde 2000 de țărani au organizat o mare adunare după ce în prealabil au barat toate căile de acces spre orășel, cu tractoare, căruțe, camioane și mașini agricole — despre La Gap, în departamentul Alpilor Superiori, unde au participat la o acțiune similară, 1.500 de țărani. La fel s-a întîmplat în departamentele Indre, Herault, Doubs și Var și în orașul Caen al cărui centru a fost ocupat de țărani.

Totul a început în zorii zilei de 9 iunie în orașul breton Morlaix. Pînă ce prefectul Jacques Seron să se desmeticească din somn, subprefectura era ocupată de cei 5000 de țărani veniți din împrejurimi. Ei au barat toate drumurile spre și din oraș, ținîndu-l cîteva ceasuri în mîinile lor, în semn de protest împotriva prăbușirii prețului cartofilor.

Dar nu era vorba numai de cartofi ci de întreaga politică agrară a guvernului care împinge cea mai mare parte a țărănimii, vertiginos spre ruină. Participarea Franței la „piața comună", prezentată țăranilor ca un remediu împotriva necazurilor lor multiple, s-a dovedit pînă la urmă a avea pentru ei un efect de-a dreptul dezastruos. În loc de promisele exporturi avantajoase ale produselor agricole franceze în țările membre ale „pieții comune", Franța a fost invadată de produsele agrare ale acestora, ceea ce provoacă țăranilor cele mai mari dificultăți în desfacerea propriei lor producții. Profitînd de această situație, negustorii angrosiști și alți intermediari și speculanți de produse agrare, care mijlocesc desfacerea acestora pe piața Franței, au redus prețurile de achiziție ale mărfurilor țărănești, fără să scadă însă cu nici o centimă prețurile de vînzare către consumatori.

La sfîrșitul primăverii cînd au apărut primii cartofi, țăranii din Bretania, principalii producători ai acestora, s-au pomenit cu concurența cartofilor importați de peste hotare și ca urmare, cu prăbușirea bruscă a prețurilor de achiziție. Atunci, paharul răbdării umplut pînă la margini, s-a revărsat...

Mișcarea țărănească începută la Morlaix a cuprins în cîteva zile întreaga Bretanie și s-a extins treptat peste toată țara. Dacă în dimineața lui 23 iunie 50 din cele 89 de departamente ale Franței erau cuprinse de clocotul marilor demonstrații de protest azi, numai în cîteva departamente, unde predomină marea proprietate capitalistă, nu se semnalează acțiuni țărănești. Presa burgheză din Franța, care încerca să minimalizeze la început ceea ce denumea ironic „răzmerița cartofilor" din Bretania, vorbește astăzi despre „jacquerie" — răscoală țărănească — făcîndu-se ecoul profundei îngrijorări a cercurilor conducătoare franceze, alarmate de evoluția și mai ales de amploarea, neașteptată pentru ei, a evenimentelor.

În ultimele săptămîni în cadrul luptei țăranilor din Franța au avut loc evenimente, caracterizate, pe drept cuvînt de presă, drept o cotitură în istoria mișcării țărănești franceze. E vorba de acțiuni comune ale muncitorilor cu țăranii răsculați. Prima asemenea manifestație comună s-a desfășurat în marele oraș portuar și industrial Saint Nazaire din nordul Franței, unde 10.000 de muncitori și țărani din satele vecine au organizat un miting și o puternică manifestație, care a durat zece ore și s-a sfîrșit prin defilarea pe străzile orașului, în sunetele Internaționalei. După numai o săptămînă un eveniment similar a avut loc, cu participarea a 15.000 de țărani și muncitori, la Montluçon în centrul țării. În orașul Montpellier, muncitori industriali și alți oameni ai muncii s-au alăturat manifestațiilor țăranilor formînd împreună o coloană lungă de doi kilometri.

Da, alianța de luptă a țărănimii cu clasa muncitoare se încheagă în momentul de față în toată Franța, și odată cu ea se accentuează tot mai mult caracterul politic al mișcării țărănești. Pe lîngă lozincile care rezumă revendicările economice ale țăranilor apar tot mai des inscripții ca: „Prin unitate la victorie!", „Pămîntul să fie dat celor ce-l muncesc!", „Americani cărați-vă acasă!", „Miliardele risipite în războiul din Algeria să fie folosite pentru nevoile poporului!", „Lupta a început". Iar alături de ele pot fi văzute pe zidurile caselor din sate și orașe, pe garduri și pomii de la marginea șoselelor, triunghiuri roșii avînd în mijloc o furcă — simbolul răscoalelor țărănești.

Nu este încă limpede ce a interesat pe cumpărători: cartea sau modul puțin obișnuit de difuzare, fapt este că scriitorul a vîndut aproximativ 3.000 de exemplare, iar editorul său i-a propus scoaterea unei ediții noi.

ЭТАПЫ ИЗУЧЕНИЯ НЕГРОВ В США [1]

В Соединенные Штаты Америки африканских негров завозили начиная с XV столетия, и они вели там жизнь изолированной касты рабов вплоть до XIX в. Возможно, что Африка потеряла в результате торговли рабами около ста миллионов человек. Из их числа не менее 15 миллионов были высажены на американском континенте, причем они были размещены главным образом в Южной и Центральной Америке. После образования Соединенных Штатов первая перепись населения, проведенная в них в 1790 г., насчитывала три четверти миллиона жителей негритянского происхождения, а в начале девятнадцатого столетия их было уже более миллиона. Большинство этих американцев было рабами, и все они жили в кастовых условиях.

Поэтому было бы важно, если бы американские ученые в свое время поняли, что им была предоставлена необычайная возможность изучения людей разных рас на месте, а отсюда расширения основ антропологии и ускорения зарождения социологии. Этого, однако, не случилось главным образом из-за существования в Соединенных Штатах негритянского рабства, приведшего к тому, что белые американцы презирали негров и не считали их достойным объектом научного исследования. Следовательно, со времени первой высадки черных рабов в Северной Америке в 1619 г. и до начала научно-исследовательских работ в этой области в 1898 г. в Америке почти не делалось попыток организовать изучение американцев негритянского происхождения. Имелись только немногие биографические и исторические очерки [2].

[2] Обширная литература о неграх в Соединенных Штатах и о системе рабства, конечно, существует. Данные переписей, там проводившихся, и доклады конгресса содержат большое количество сведений из книг, которые приближаются к широким социологическим обзорам, назовем труды Артура Хелпа (Arthur Help) «Испанское завоевание в Америке», Ульриха Филиппа (Ulrich Phillip) «Рабство американских негров» и П. А. Брюса (P. A. Bruce) «Экономическая история рабства в Вирджинии». Лицам, заинтересованным в полной библиографии, следует обратиться к «Библиографии по вопросу о положении негров в Африке и Америке», составленной Монрое Научное исследование американских негров началось в 1898 г. под моим руководством в университете г. Атланты — учебном заведении для студентов-негров бывшего рабовладельческого штата Джорджия. Для этого я подготовил работу о положении негров в Филадельфии, опубликованную университетом Пенсильвании в 1899 г. Мной был составлен план района, была использована классификация в зависимости от различных условий существования и охвачена история негров в Филадельфии и в Седьмом районе города.

Я решил вести свою работу, ставшую для меня делом жизни, в одном из негритянских учебных заведений на Юге.

По опубликовании статьи я сделал заявление на ассамблее университета и выступил на 42-м заседании Академии политических и социальных наук в Филадельфии 19 ноября 1897 г. Темой моего выступления было «Изучение негритянской проблемы».

Настаивая на необходимости тщательного изучения этой проблемы, я говорил: «Американский негр заслуживает такого изучения во имя великой цели общего развития науки. У современных ученых нет другой такой же возможности наблюдать и изучать историю и развитие большой расы людей. Если они не воспользуются этой возможностью, проделают работу наспех, бессистемно, не отдадут истине должного уважения, потакая настроениям дня, то нанесут удар не только по доброму имени американского народа, но и по научной истине во всем мире; они добровольно ограничат сведения человечества о вселенной...».

Об антропологии я сказал следующее: «Несомненно существует разница между белой и черной расами. Но никто точно не знает, в чем она заключается. Однако именно здесь, в Америке, существует превосходнейшая возможность для изучения этого различия, для исследования воздействия климата и физической среды, а особенно — для определения результатов взаимного влияния этих двух рас, наиболее сильно отличающихся друг от друга. Но и эта возможность до сих пор покоится в тумане невежества».

Для Федерального бюро труда мной было выполнено несколько обследований для изучения негритянских групп, после чего я продолжал работу в университете Атланты; там в течение тринадцати лет, с 1897 по 1910 г., я пытался заложить основы систематической научной разработки проблемы американских негров.

Основным достижением в данном направлении было создание в американском учебном заведении программы по изучению негритянской проблемы, и эта программа постоянно расширялась и углублялась.

Первая конференция, обратившая особое внимание на охрану здоровья негров, была созвана в университете Атланты в 1896 г. Немедленно после этого стали подыскивать подходящего человека для преподавания истории и политических наук, а также для организации таких конференций в дальнейшем. Выбор пал на меня.

Время показало, что многие прогрессивные начинания основывались на наших исследованиях: система детских садов как для белых, так и для черных в г. Атланте; Лига негритянского предпринимательства и многие другие попытки по улучшению здоровья и борьбе с преступностью. Однако мы пришли к тому, что наше начинание все больше и больше, как я и намечал, превращалось в источник информации и базис для дальнейшего изучения, а не в орган по проведению социальных реформ.

На протяжении десятилетия с 1896 по 1905 г. мне удалось закончить следующий цикл исследования:

1896 — Смертность среди негров в городах.
1897 — Социальные и материальные условия существования негров в городах.
1898 — Некоторые попытки негров, направленные на улучшение социальных условий.
1899 — Негры и бизнес.
1900 — Негры и колледжи.
1901 — Негры и общая школа.
1902 — Негры и ремесло.
1903 — Негритянская церковь.
1904 — Заметки о преступности среди негров.
1905 — Избранная библиография на тему «Американский негр».

После этого я подготовил для второго десятилетия и выполнил более широкую программу, из которой успел опубликовать следующие восемь работ:

1906 — Здоровье и внешний вид американского негра.
1907 — Экономическое сотрудничество среди американских негров.
1908 — Семья американского негра.
1909 — Попытки улучшения социального положения американских негров.
1910 — Американские негры, получившие образование в колледжах.
1911 — Общая школа и американские негры.
1912 — Американские негры и ремесло.
1914 — Нравы и обычаи американских негров.

С 1914 г. прервалась моя связь с университетом Атланты на 20 лет. Конец этой деятельности положила мировая война.

В своей работе я усиленно и упорно стремился к осуществлению цикла следующих десяти тем изучения негров США:

1. Население. Распределение и рост.
2. Биология. Здоровье и внешний облик.
3. Социальное устройство. Семья, группа и класс.
4. Культурный уровень. Нравы и обычаи.
5. Образование.
6. Религия и церковь.
7. Преступления.
8. Закон и правительство.
9. Литература и искусство.
10. Резюме и библиография.

Выполнить такой план могла бы лишь большая группа хорошо оплачиваемых специалистов при наличии методов изучения и проверке результатов. Но важнее то, что в политико-экономической стороне программы недостаточно отражалась философия Маркса и Энгельса и к тому же вводить в нее философию Ленина было преждевременно. Это должно было быть исследование экономического развития американских негров как рабов и при современном социально-экономическом их положении в США.

За тринадцать лет мы провели серию исследований. Они были ограниченными, неполными, только отчасти убедительными, но настолько выгодно отличались от всех других попыток в этой области, проводимых в стране, что привлекли к себе очень широкое внимание. Все нами опубликованное за четверть века составило своего рода энциклопедию по негритянской проблеме в Америке, распространилось по библиотекам многих стран и использовалось учеными для изучения расовой проблемы в Америке.

Следует помнить, что в то время университет Атланты был единственным заведением в мире, в котором проводилось систематическое изучение негритянской проблемы и отражались его результаты в форме, доступной для ученых мира.

Еще в 1906 г. я обратился к комиссару труда Соединенных Штатов Нейлу (Neill) с просьбой санкционировать изучение населения Черного Пояса (Black Belt). Объектом изучения я хотел взять округ Лаундес (Lowndes) в бывшем рабовладельческом штате Алабаме (Alabama), где негры составляют подавляющее большинство населения. Предстояло проделать социальное и экономическое исследование со времени существования самых старых сохранившихся документов вплоть до настоящего времени, снабдив исследование данными официальных отчетов и точным подсчетом голосов негритянского населения. Наконец, комиссар Нейл санкционировал это предприятие. При помощи Монрое Уорка из Института Таскиги (Tuskegee), Р. Р. Райта (R. R. Wright) и десятка местных работников я обосновался в школе Кэлхоуна (Calhoun) и приступил к изучению.

Обследование сопровождалось преодолеванием всевозможных затруднений, в том числе и финансовых, преодоленных в конце концов при помощи ссуд, выданных университетом. Упомяну, что некоторых из моих работников кое-где в округе встречали ружейными выстрелами. Но работа была выполнена и отчет о ней был в результате принят правительством, которое выдало 2000 долларов. Наибольшая часть этой суммы пошла на погашение ссуды, которую мне предоставил университет, сделав возможным продолжение данного исследования. Но уже достигнутые результаты им не были опубликованы. Было решено не опубликовывать рукописи, так как в ней «затрагиваются политические вопросы». Я был удивлен и разочарован, но когда через год я снова обратился к ним и спросил, не вернут ли они мне рукопись, мне сообщили, что она уничтожена!

Конечно, с моей стороны было безумием рассчитывать на то, что в начале XX в., во время расцвета колониального империализма и подавления цветного населения, Америка будет поощрять такое научное исследование при негритянском колледже и во главе с учеными-неграми. Моя же уверенность в успехе такого мероприятия была основана на твердом убеждении, что расовые предрассудки основаны на невежестве.

Если говорить об американских научных и литературных кругах, то мы к ним не принадлежали: в ученых обществах и академических группах нас не признавали. Мы оставались лишь неграми, изучающими негров, и в конце концов какое отношение имеют негры к науке и к Америке?

Постепенно и с большим разочарованием я начал уже в 1906 г. осознавать, что мой план изучения негритянской проблемы должен прекратить свое существование, если он не получит какой-либо непредвиденной поддержки.

Ко второму десятилетию XX в. распространенная кастовая система, основанная на принадлежности к той или иной расе, цвету кожи, была открыто узаконена демократической конституцией Соединенных Штатов. Вот почему я в 1910 г. отказался от своего положения в университете Атланты и стал директором Отдела публикаций и научных исследований в только что организованной Национальной ассоциации содействия прогрессу цветного населения, одним из участников которой я был раньше.

Один аспект негритянской проблемы в Америке нашел очень слабое отражение в моей программе: речь идет о взаимоотношении с трудящимися белыми. Негры принадлежали к трудовому народу, они были фермерами, чернорабочими, носильщиками, слугами. В главной массе они принадлежали к неимущим. Однако их не считали неотъемлемой частью американского рабочего класса, и я, изучая их тяжелое положение и их борьбу, все время рассматривал их как особую группу вместо того, чтобы причислить их к общей массе трудящихся. Это произошло не потому, что я не считал негров прежде всего трудящимися, чьи основные интересы были характерны для трудового народа. Ошибка моя заключалась в том, что я полагал, что рабочий класс был разделен на антагонистические группы.

Как-то я пригласил секретаря Федерации труда штата Джорджия выступить с речью на нашей конференции. Он согласился, но слушатели знали, что его федерация не предоставляет неграм равные права. Мы изучили положение негров на южных фабриках. Наша переписка со всеми главными профсоюзными организациями страны была почти безрезультатна: американский рабочий класс был разделен цветным барьером. Поэтому моя работа была не о положении рабочего класса, а о положении небольшой его группы, причем взаимоотношения между отдельными группами составили проблему более важную, чем между рабочими и предпринимателями.

В 1931 г. был задуман новый серьезный план по проведению исследований о положении американского негра. Президент Корпорации Карнеги в Нью-Йорке Фредерик П. Кеппел (Frederick P. Keppel) от имени правления пригласил профессора Стокгольмского университета Гуннара Мирдала (Gunnar Myrdal) возглавить «обширное изучение положения негров в Соединенных Штатах, проводимое объективно и беспристрастно в целях изучения этого социального явления».

Сама идея поставить такое исследование полностью под контроль иностранного ученого, не подверженного про- или антинегритянским предрассудкам, и снабдить его значительными денежными средствами могла привлечь поддержку американских ученых. Исследование началось в 1938 г., а в 1944 г. его результаты уже были опубликованы в двух томах. К несчастью, оно велось в период между двумя мировыми войнами и превратилось, почти неизбежно, в изучение моральных взглядов, вместо того чтобы стать научным исследованием экономических и социальных фактов. Хотя таких фактов было получено много и они были убедительны, но само название работы «Американская дилемма», указывало на недооценку подлинной науки, в особенности трудов Карла Маркса.

Все интересующиеся проблемой негров в Америке должны прочесть этот большой и впечатляющий труд, но рассматривать его как результат изучения взглядов и мнений людей, а не в качестве исследования в области антропологии или социологии. Со мной советовались в начале, середине и конце обследования. Библиографический список показывает, что результаты моей работы в университете Атланты были широко использованы. Но сотрудничество мне предложено не было.

В 1933 г. Джон Хоуп (John Hope) и я основали на Дальнем юге университет, равный или даже превосходящий любое другое подобное учреждение, которое когда-либо существовало здесь, в бывшем оплоте негритянского рабства. Так же, как и во время моей деятельности в университете Атланты, половина моего времени была посвящена обучению аспирантов. Я разработал два или три курса, одним из которых был «Коммунизм». Мы изучали «Коммунистический манифест», и я собрал небольшую хорошую библиотеку по социализму и коммунизму, в то время, возможно, лучшую на Юге. Я не думал о пропаганде. Я никогда не был членом Коммунистической партии. Но я видел рост социализма и верил в возможность коммунизма.

В 1934 г. мы с Хоупом возродили конференции университета Атланты по изучению негритянской проблемы. Ему удалось найти для этого денежные средства. Но преждевременная смерть Джона Хоупа в 1936 г. воспрепятствовала полному осуществлению наших планов. Во-первых, обладая свободным временем, мне хотелось восполнить некоторые пробелы исторических очерков, посвященных истории негритянского народа. Во-вторых, я хотел основать при университете Атланты научный журнал, в котором освещались бы результаты исследования различных рас земного шара. Наконец, мне хотелось возобновить в этом университете изучение негритянской проблемы хотя бы в какой-либо форме.

За период с 1935 по 1951 г. я написал и опубликовал статьи: «Негр в период реконструкции Юга», «Черная раса в истории», а также автобиографический очерк моей концепции расовой проблемы в Америке. Кроме того, я очень стремился создать и «Негритянскую энциклопедию». Еще в 1909 г. я планировал «Африканскую энциклопедию», но мой переезд из Атланты в Нью-Йорк задержал осуществление этого проекта, а мировая война помешала его возобновлению. В 1934 г. мне было поручено быть главным редактором нового проекта Фонда Фелпс-Стокса по подготовке и изданию «Негритянской энциклопедии». Я отдал почти десять лет осуществлению этого плана, заручился сотрудничеством многих ученых — «черных» и «белых» — в Америке, Европе и Африке, однако найти необходимые средства мне не удалось. Возможно, было еще преждевременным рассчитывать на широкую поддержку такого честолюбивого мероприятия, возглавляемого негром и строящегося на основе достижений негритянских ученых. Тем не менее том с предварительными итогами наших усилий был опубликован в 1944 г.

Для осуществления руководства и координации этой работы наиболее подходящими казались следующие три негритянских университета: 1) Говардский, 2) университет Фиска, из негритянских учреждений Юга, обладающий лучшим отделением социальных наук; 3) университет Атланты, где впервые в Америке были сделаны попытки научного исследования негритянской проблемы.

Прежде всего было необходимо искать денежные средства для реализации плана, о котором я и рассказал президенту банков Прэри Вью (Prairi View): это мой бывший ученик, который давно уже подумывал о таком сотрудничестве. Он с энтузиазмом отнесся к предприятию. Я заручился разрешением выступить со своим предложением на ежегодной конференции президентов негритянских колледжей, обладающих земельными участками, в Чикаго в ноябре 1941 г.

Начиная с 1935 г. федеральное правительство ежегодно выделяло 18 000 000 долларов тем южным штатам, где черные и белые колледжи существовали отдельно. Негры, составлявшие здесь более одной пятой населения, получали только около 5% суммы.

Одно время негритянские колледжи настаивали на получении большей доли, но получили ответ, что научные исследования по сельскому хозяйству или по химии ведутся в белых колледжах и что нет необходимости параллельно делать то же в негритянских колледжах. У меня родилась идея, что тщательно разработанная программа расовых исследований в негритянских колледжах может явиться поводом для требований большей доли федеральных расходов. С этой целью в октябре 1941 г. я выступил с речью перед организацией президентов негритянских колледжей, имеющих свои участки земли.

Я предложил этой организации одобрить следующий общий план:

1. Длительное и интенсивное изучение положения негров в каждом из южных штатов каждым из негритянских колледжей, обладающим своим земельным участком.

2. Подготовка к научному выполнению этой работы путем усиления раздела социальных наук в каждом учебном курсе (истории, политических наук, психологии, антропологии, социологии, экономики), а также выделения времени и средств для проведения научных исследований.

3. Составление общей программы тем и методов исследований, созыв ежегодных конференций с присутствием специалистов и представителей других колледжей. Периодические обзоры, пояснения и опубликование итогов деятельности.

Президенты негритянских земельных колледжей отнеслись одобрительно к предложению и 12 июня 1942 г. приняли общий план. Под ним подписались президенты двадцати негритянских земельных колледжей, а со временем и президенты университетов Атланты, Фиска и Говарда. О плане с одобрением отозвались представители Управления военного производства, Американский совет просвещения, Институт научных исследований в области социальных наук штата Северной Каролины, журналы «Школа и общество» и «Журнал высшего образования».

28 октября 1942 г. план был окончательно одобрен на Конференции президентов негритянских колледжей, обладающих своими участками земли.

26-я конференция университета Атланты происходила 19—20 апреля 1943 г. Она превратилась в первую конференцию негритянских земельных колледжей по координированию совместных мероприятий для проведения социальных исследований.

Наша деятельность вызвала много хвалебных отзывов со всех концов страны, и от белых, и от черных. Особенно отмечался новый вид сотрудничества между негритянскими учреждениями, а университет Атланты — как признанный руководитель и центр.

Вдруг в момент триумфа тщательно задуманного и разработанного плана разразилась катастрофа: без малейшего предупреждения меня отстранили от преподавания и от руководства отделением социологии в университете Атланты.

Это повлекло за собой резко отрицательные последствия не только для меня лично, но и для всего дела. До этого именно негр возглавлял исследования и давал пояснения к положению людей его расы в Соединенных Штатах. Начиная же с 1944 г. изучение негритянской проблемы перешло со все усиливающейся быстротой в руки белых из южных штатов. Негритянские социологи и историки продолжали вести научные исследования негров США, но у них не было координированного плана, необходимых средств и заинтересованных лиц из числа директоров учреждений. Кроме того, многие писатели-негры обнаружили, что более выгодным является писать то, что требует бизнес и правительство, а не полную правду. Вплоть до последнего десятилетия 1949—1959 гг. в тысячах книг и докладов единодушно защищался тезис, что гражданская война не была борьбой за сохранение и распространение рабства черных рабов, а святым походом за поддержание высшей цивилизации белых людей и что сегодняшние историки современности могут не обращать внимания на факт существования американских негров и на их деятельность в 20-м веке.

Как бы там ни было, но я совершенно неожиданно в возрасте 75 лет остался без работы, имея меньше, чем пять тысяч долларов сбережений. Был не только убит при рождении великий план, но и была разрушена сама моя жизнь. Я чувствовал, что мир рушится у меня под ногами и в отчаянии повел ответную борьбу. В итоге мне выдали полностью годовое жалованье в виде компенсации за то, что я не был предупрежден о предстоящей отставке. Предложив сначала пенсию в размере 100 долларов в месяц, мне стали выдавать по окончательному решению 1800 долларов ежегодно в течение первых пяти лет и 1200 долларов в последующие годы.

Все же была сделана серьезная попытка продолжать нашу работу, руководство которой перешло в Говардский университет: ее возглавил Е. Франклин Фразиер (Franklin Frazier). В 1945 г. была проведена прекрасная конференция. Но у Фразиера не было денежных средств, и сотрудничество земельных колледжей постепенно прекратилось. Через год-два прекратил существовать весь наш план и больше никогда не был возобновлен.

Мы понесли еще одну потерю при отказе от плана изучения негров США. Была упущена беспрецедентная возможность для проведения экспериментальных исследований в области социологии, для наблюдения и классификации действий человека в масштабах, которые редко или никогда раньше не использовались. Безусловно, исследование привлекло бы приток необходимых средств и получило бы необходимое квалифицированное сотрудничество в США или в нескольких странах. На такой основе могло зародиться настоящее познание социологии негров в США. Но возможность была упущена и от этого лишь пострадало развитие социологии в Америке. И в самом деле, на сегодняшний день в Соединенных Штатах социология не получила широкого признания, почти нет ученых, которые называли бы себя социологами, и лишь немногие учебные заведения присуждают ученую степень в этой области. Когда-то я составил план первых научных исследований по социологии и предложил создать рядом с миром физических законов науку, которая изучала бы «пределы случайного в поступках людей». Тем временем ученые, изучающие действия человека, колебались и выжидали. Психология изучала нервные реакции, физика совместно с химией и при помощи математики достигла колоссальных высот, изменив наше представление о вселенной, а биология открыла новые сферы.

Однако лишь социология была обойдена в Соединенных Штатах и сведена к общественной деятельности.

По-видимому, только социалистическое государство сумеет найти средства для изучения, определения и сведения к закономерностям колоссального разнообразия человеческих мыслей и действий. Это начала делать и осуществляет марксистско-ленинская философия. Мой план мог бы двинуть вперед эту великую деятельность в Соединенных Штатах и быстрее приблизить страну к социализму, вместо того чтобы стать жертвой борьбы за жизнь, порождаемой частным капиталом.

ДЕРМАТОГЛИФИКА НЕКОТОРЫХ СЕВЕРО-ВОСТОЧНЫХ НАРОДНОСТЕЙ СССР (МАНСИ И КОМИ)

Современные манси и коми в антропологическом отношении очень неоднородны (Гремяцкий, 1941; Чебоксаров, 1941 и 1946; Трофимова и Чебоксаров, 1941). Не касаясь вопроса об их происхождении, можно констатировать, что морфологически они представляют собой группы, смешанные из различных европеоидных и монголоидных элементов. Так, среди них широко распространены переходные между европеоидами и монголоидами формы сублапоноидного и уральского типов. Например, сублапоноидный темный брахикефальный тип с низким лицом преобладает среди зюздинских коми. Этот компонент отмечается также у других коми и в мансийских группах.

Близкий к сублапоноидному, но более высоколицый и мезокефальный уральский тип выражен у ивдельских и вагильских манси. В виде примеси он встречается и в некоторых группах коми.

Из светлых европеоидных элементов мезокефальный беломорский и более короткоголовый и низкорослый балтийский типы широко представлены у удорских коми. Более сглаженные особенности этих типов имеются и у других групп коми.

В состав ивдельских и вагильских манси вошли также темные мезокефальные и низколицые европеоидные элементы восточного средиземноморского типа. Эти элементы выражены и у некоторых коми, например у иньвенских.

Имея в виду большую антропологическую неоднородность манси и коми, интересным представляется проследить, соответствуют ли некоторые признаки дерматоглифики распределению антропологических типов.

Как известно, кожный рельеф относится к тем морфологическим признакам в строении тела человека, которые не подвергаются влиянию окружающих условий и не изменяются с возрастом. Многие черты дерматоглифики наследственны, причем они генетически не связаны с другими морфологическими признаками, например с ростом, пигмента-

GHANA EMBARKS ON GREAT INDUSTRIALISATION

STUPENDOUS, incredible and fantastic developments have taken place in Ghana since independence, particularly in the field of industries generally. The prodigious pace of this industrial revolution is seen in the fact that industrial enterprises, state-owned and private-owned, are spreading all over the country in a spectacular and phenominal manner.

by

G. K. Amegbe

Since independence Ghana has taken the way of socialism and consequently its Government, headed by the indomitable Osagyefo Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, has concretised its determined wish to revolutionise the society of the people from the economic angle. Indeed Ghana Government viewed it a necessity to rejuvenate the nation's economic forces as a matter of policy of postive action towards the raising of the living standard of the people.

One of the main objectives of the Government on taking over from the colonialists has been to establish various industries to produce as quickly as possible the commodities which are consumed by the people in unlimited quantities and at cheaper prices. It has also been the lively determination of the Ghana Government to produce many commodities, formerly expensive and very hard to come by, in localities and in circles where they were non-existent

GOVT'S FORESIGHT

In fact, by the ingenuity and foresight of the Government, the position can justifiably be regarded as closing the colonialist regime with the dawn of a brighter economic system; for, during the colonial administration of this country no serious thought was given to the establishment of any worthwhile industrial factories to turn out commodities to boost up the economy of this country, with the result that, detrimentally, all consumable goods were imported from foreign countries. That was precisely why the people's hard earned money drained out of the country to other countries to sustain their national and private economy.

In deciding the question of establishing large scale industries it was considered that they could only survive if they were wholely owned by the State, since it is too true that no industry could exist on a great magnitude unless it is fully or partly created and supported by the State.

The establishment of "la grande industrie" of various kinds has opened a new chapter in the economic history of Ghana. It gives encouraging assurance of the steady viability of Ghana's economy. It is also extremely heartening that for the diverse commodities turned out from the factories which have already been established and dotted at many places in the country, there are the raw materials very much in abundance.

We are heartened by the positive action taken by the Ghana Government by taking over a number of gold mines previously owned and run by private foreign companies; and also by the fact that the Government is taking supreme interest in the diamond industry.

One can hardly pass on to newly established industries without paying glowing and hearty tribute to the cocoa industry which has all through the years been the main-stay of Ghana's economy. If Ghana has survived any financial dilemma it is due to the contribution of the famous cocoa industry. Indeed, the cocoa industry has been mostly responsible for the viability of Ghana's financial position.

COCOA INDUSTRY

It is a happy augury that we have now numerous addition to the cocoa industry and the fine prospects for the industrialisation of Ghana can now be clearly and unmistakably visualised. The flower of industries in the various localities will soon begin to blossom for Ghana to realise her socialist industrialisation so that the slogan "Work and Happiness" can be concretised and perpetuated.

FACTORIES GROW HERE AND THERE

Living up to her determination to industrialise the country, therefore, it became necessary for the establishment in 1959 of the Ghana Brick and Tile Corporation along Weija Road as a first step in producing local materials for building purposes. Although this industry has been faced with great odds with regard to patronage, the operation of which had had to be suspended for some time, it is heartening to note that the Housing Corporation has assured Ghanaians that the Corporation was to employ these products in most cases in building houses. This is a very welcome piece of news.

At Tema also we have in full production paints by the Ghana Paint Corporation. This will help substantially to cut down import capacity of paints for decoration purposes.

FOOD AND FISH

The manufacture of safety matches by the Ghana Match Corporation at Kade is a great asset, as this is also reducing the importation to this country of matches made in foreign countries. From reliable sources it is known that in no distant time, none of this commodity made abroad will find its way into the Ghanaian market.

At Nsawan fruits and vegetables are being canned. The Ghana Cannery Corporation there is also producing alcoholic and soft drinks. We have also, being produced by Nzima Oil Mill Factory at Franza near Esiama, refined edible oil which has enlivened the edible oil activity in the local market. Edible oil is a very essential commodity for consumption in all parts of the world. It's production here in Ghana has a decided benefit to the people. It is an open blessing.

WOOD WORKS

There are also the Crystal Oil Mills Ltd., Accra, the Atebubu Oil Mill Factory, the Tamale Oil Mill Factory, Denu Oil Mill Factory, the Bawku Oil Mill Factory and the Assesewa Oil Mill Factory, all of which turn out edible oils of all kinds.

There is also the Paper Conversion Corporation at Takoradi which produces toilet rolls and cardboard boxes.

Another effort which has greatly arrested the importation to a large extent of commodities is the establishement of the Ghana Distilleries Corporation which produce alcoholic drinks of all kinds, from whisky, gin, brandy, vodka, aromatic schnapps down to wines. This venture, indeed, is smashing importation of all varieties of alcoholic drinks. The establishment of the factory is timely.

Then we have the Ghana Metal Industries Corporation in Accra which manufacture wire nails. It is reliably known that this commodity has already covered the whole of the Ghana market to the happy extent that no nails are any more imported into Ghana. This is a very happy intelligence.

The Ghana Laundries Corporation, with its headquarters at Brewery Road, Accra, and branches at Takoradi and Kumasi is also an asset to the Ghana community.

Another interesting feature in the industrial development of Ghana is the building of surf boats, barges and fishing vessels at Sekondi. This has so revolutionised the fishing industry that more fish find their way to the Cold Stores and the markets in the towns and villages. An addition to this enterprise is the boatyards at Tema also serving the same useful purpose.

Off Brewery Road, Accra, there is a busy factory turning out furniture of all descriptions and of excellent quality which have already enhanced many state and private offices and homes. The State Furniture and Joinery Corporation has a branch on Lake Road, Kumasi, supplying the needs of the people in that Region.

The State Woodworks at the Industrial Estate, Osu, Accra. are also turning out building materials. At Kumasi Jute Bags are being manufactured in real earnest. The establisment of Fibre Bag Manufacturing Corporation is a very necessary addition to the various industrial establishments in the country, for jute bags (Cocoa Bags) have formely cost the country millions of pounds (sterling) to import.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

I'll Sell

DEAR Editor,

As a Party Secretary, I feel it is my duty to see that Party members in the towns and villages in my district and others who can read, buy copies of your newspaper, the People's Vanguard in order that they may understand Party principles and Government policies.

Send me a number of copies for sale, please.

Theophilus Adu,
Kuntanase-Ashanti.

It's Welcome

DEAR Editor,

This is to congratulate Osagyefo the General Secretary and the Central Committee on the launching of a new Party organ which I understand will be devoted to Party organisation and the national reconstruction.

This new paper, The People's Vanguard is welcome and I have no doubt that every Party member will buy a copy to read each day.

Kwame Kusi,
Achirensua/Brong-Ahafo

Read it

DEAR Editor,

I am suggesting that all Party members should be encouraged to read the People's Vanguard which has just been launched by Osagyefo, the General Secretary of the Party.

In this direction, I want to add that all branches and wards throughout the country should place, direct order with the Editor, The People's Vanguard P. O. Box No. 821, Accra.

Joseph Arthur, Sekondi.

VICTORY IS CERTAIN

MESSAGE FROM DR. W. E. B. DU BOIS, FATHER OF PAN-AFRICANISM.

Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois

IT is with joy and warm congratulation that I hail this maiden issue of the PEOPLE'S VANGUARD! ...The power of the written word is mightier than the sword. As organ of the Convention People's Party, the PEOPLE'S VANGUARD will be a decisive weapon in Ghana's struggle towards attaining for all its people, for all Africans, the true independence of Mind and Spirit embodied in the person of our great Leader, Osagyefo Kwame Nkrumah.

A half century ago, I came to understand that Socialism, in its highest and purest form, is the only hope for an unhappy, warring world, in which three-fourths of humanity lived in degradation and bondage that the other one-fourth might squander its time in luxury and idleness. I rejoiced in the victories of Socialism in distant lands. How happy I am now to live under the banner of Socialism as held high by the Convention People's Party.

I rejoiced that Pan-Africanism is no longer merely a cherished dream in the minds of a few visionaries. It is rapidly and surely becoming a reality. How far Africa has moved since 1921 when the Second Pan-African Congress issued its "Manifesto" to the world, demanding that the peoples of Africa have a voice in their own governments, control of their land and its natural resources! Europe and America laughed and scoffed at our words then

They are not laughing today!

Heads up! Persist! Enlighten! Victory is certain. This is the Century of Africa! And the PEOPLE'S VANGUARD may proclaim the death of Colonialism and Imperialism and the birth of Freedom and Dignity.

EASTER.

THE land lay smiling in spring splendor, heavy with verdure, gleaming with ~~glad~~ sunshine. Athwart it fell the ~~dark~~ shadow of a toiling man; he was great of limb and black, thick of countenance and hard-haired. His face was half-hopeless, half-vacant, with only a faint gleam of something dead and awakening ~~deep~~ in his deep-set eyes. His feet were chained, his neck yoked and his body scarred. They ~~that~~ had driven him and ridden, and thrust him threatening through the thick forest were now afraid of him. They feared the reproach of his dumb, low-burning eyes. They feared the half-articulate sounds from his moving lips, and saw with terror the slow, steady growth of his body, that great, black, undying body. So they took council together to kill him—lying to his ears, crucifying his soul, until he, bent and bowed and heavy with his own weakness, fell and lay his mighty length in stupor along the earth. And the earth trembled.

Sweating and deep of breath the pale-faced murderers worked and delved, digging a cavernous grave and walling it with Oppression. Then shame-faced, yet grim, they turned northward. At daybreak they stood upon the hills of God with faces white and good, crying: "Come, O brothers, Northern brothers, the Thing that hindered our love is dead, dead, long dead." The brothers of the North came trooping, oily tongued, unctious and rich. Yet they of the North and South looked not each other in the eye, but slunk along false-smiling.

One timid one said:

"O Brother South—I hear chains."

But the South answered:

"Nay, that is the chiming of Negro school bells."

Yet another, quibbling, found his mouth:

"Did the Thing—die—happy?"

The South choked and muttered:

"Happy—so happy—and praising his—Master, and his Best Friends."

"But, Brother, your hands are bloody," quavered a third.

"The blood of the offering burned at the stake for the culture and supremacy of the White Race."

Then hastily the South said in chorus as if to forestall reply:

"See where we have laid Him," and they pointed to that grave, walled with Oppression.

But suddenly the World was wings and the voice of the Angel of the Resurrection beat like a mighty wind athwart their ears, crying:

"He is not here—He is risen."

Risen above ~~half~~ his ignorance; risen to ~~more than six hundred millions~~ of property; risen to a new literature and the faint glimmering of a new Art; risen to a dawning determination to be free; risen to a newer and greater ideal of Humanity than the world has known. RISEN!

THE RACES CONGRESS

By Our Own Correspondent

I.—What Was the Races Congress?

Several years ago at Eisenach, Germany, Dr. Felix Adler suggested a congress of the races of the world. No attempt was made to follow up this idea for several years; then the Ethical Culture Society permitted one of its best organizers, Gustave Spiller, to devote two years to the organizing of such a congress. It was planned to hold the congress in the summer of 1911. Extraordinary difficulties faced the organizer. He had no funds; he had no special clientele to appeal to, and he was embarking upon what large numbers of practical people thought a fanciful, if not an impossible, attempt. Then, too, other people feared and opposed it for political and social reasons. Nevertheless, Mr. Spiller went to work.

Within two years he succeeded in enlisting the support of no less than fifty countries, over thirty presidents of parliaments, the majority of the members of the Permanent Court of Arbitration and of the delegates to the Second Hague Conference, twelve British governors and eight British premiers, over forty colonial bishops, some hundred and thirty professors of international law, the leading anthropologists and sociologists, the officers and the majority of the council of the Interparliamentary Union, and other distinguished personages. As writers of papers, Mr. Spiller secured representatives from over twenty civilizations, and every paper referring to a particular people was prepared by some one of high standing belonging to that people.

As president of the congress, the Right Honorable Lord Weardale, a well-known figure in the World's Peace movement, was secured. Among the vice-presidents was the Prime Minister of England, Mr. Balfour, leader of the opposition, Viscount Morley of Blackburn, the speaker of the House of Commons, the Archbishop of York, and others. The general committee included some of the greatest names of the world. On Wednesday, July 26, when Lord Weardale opened the first session of the Congress, he looked into the faces of a thousand people representing fifty different races.

II.—The Object of the Congress.

What after all was the object of assembling a congress of this character? To many people it seemed a visionary scheme; what practical outcome could there be? The Executive Committee stated the purpose of the Congress succinctly: "The object of the Congress will be to discuss, in the light of science and the modern conscience, the general relations subsisting between the peoples of the West and those of the East, between so-called white and so-called colored peoples, with a view to encouraging between them a fuller understanding, the most friendly feelings, and a heartier cooperation." Lord Weardale in his introduction to the volume of papers has enlarged upon this idea: "To those who regard the furtherance of international good will and peace as the highest of all human interests, the occasion of the First Universal Races Congress opens a vista of almost boundless promise.

"No impartial student of history can deny that in the case of nearly all recorded wars, whatever the ostensible reasons assigned, the underlying cause of conflict has been the existence of race antipathies—using the word race in its broad and popular acceptation—which particular circumstances, often in themselves of trivial moment, have fanned into flame.

"In the earliest times it took the form of one race attempting to subjugate and indeed enslave another; but even in modern wars, while questions of frontier, the ambitions of rulers, or the rivalries of commercial policies, may have provoked the actual crisis, it will be found, in almost every instance, that the pre-existence of social and racial enmity has in reality determined the breach which particular incidents had merely precipitated.

"As civilization progresses and the western world more fully recognizes its ethical responsibilities, it may be hoped that such influences will become an ever diminishing force; but the modern conscience has to-day, in addition, other and quite new problems to solve in face of the startling and sudden appearance of new factors in the Eastern Hemisphere.

"In less than twenty years we have witnessed the most remarkable awakening of nations long regarded as sunk in such depths of somnolence as to be only interesting to the western world because they presented a wide and prolific field for commercial rivalries, often greedy, cruel, and fraught with bloodshed in their prosecution, but which otherwise were an almost negligible quantity in international concerns.

"How great is the change in the lifetime of a single generation, when, to select two instances alone, we contemplate the most remarkable rise of the power of the Empire of Japan, the precursor, it would seem, of a similar revival of the activities and highly developed qualities of the population of the great Empire of China!

"Nearer and nearer we see approaching the day when the caste population of the East will assert their claim to meet on terms of equality the nations of the West, when the free institutions and the organized forces of the one hemisphere will have their counterbalance in the other, when their mental outlook and their social aims will be in principle identical; when, in short, the color prejudice will have vanished and the so-called white races and the so-called colored races shall no longer merely meet in the glowing periods of missionary exposition, but, in very fact, regard one another as in truth men and brothers.

"Are we ready for this change? Have we duly considered all that it signifies, and have we tutored our minds and shaped our policy with a view of successfully meeting the coming flood? It is in order to discuss this question of such supreme importance that the First Universal Races Congress is being held."

III.—The Program of the Congress.

The program, as laid down, sought first to take up fundamental considerations concerning the meaning of race. Then there followed certain general matters of racial progress like government, political conditions, language, religion and miscegenation. The third session began with the special racial problems in China, Japan, Turkey, Persia, India, Egypt, Haiti, etc. Then the matter of interracial contact was spoken of: first, the economic side, and then the bonds of science, art and technique. The fifth session turned to the question of the social conscience in relation to racial questions, and took up the problems of the Jew, and of the Negro in Africa and America, and also the question of indentured labor and drink. The last two sessions were given up to positive suggestions for permitting interracial friendliness.

The really astounding thing about this program was the amount of agreement and sympathy among papers from widely different sources. Seldom has there been an international congress where there was so much unity in the underlying thought and where the enthusiasm for the central idea was so manifest and so well expressed. Of course in the very multiplicity of the problems, and the large number of speakers, there were manifest disadvantages; practically all the speakers were limited to seven minutes, and yet there must have been at least 150 speakers. Then, too, the speeches were in different languages, including a good deal of broken English. The acoustics of the hall were not good and the heat was intense. Under such conditions it would have been natural to have had a large number of people in bad temper and a great many misunderstandings. This, however, was not so, and every one attending the sessions came away with a distinct feeling of uplift and hope.

IV.—The Men Who Were There.

The personnel of the Congress was marvelous. First, there was the natural difference in color, from the jet black of General Légitime, of Haiti, to the blond Germans and Norwegians. The infiltration of Negro blood was particularly noticeable; the two Egyptian Beys were evidently negroid, the Portuguese was without a doubt a mulatto, and the Persian was dark enough to have trouble in the South. Next came the difference in language: English, French, German and Italian were heard and used continually in speeches, in discussion and in conversation. I remember at one dinner party at the beautiful home of Felix Moscheles there were eight people present and they were talking four languages nearly all the time. After all this came the difference of dress and the many other subtle differences of civilizations; the turban, the fez, the ceremonies of greeting, all gave a peculiar picturesqueness to the assembly.

The personalities which made the most impression upon me were: Mr. Spiller, the creator of the Congress, the indefatigable worker, unselfish and devoted; Dr. Seal, the Indian scholar, tall and brown, with a flowing white beard, full of simple but wholesome enthusiasm; Watanabe, the Japanese parliamentarian, a sweet-tempered scholar; Rubasana, the only Negro member of the Cape Colony Parliament; Hadji Mirza Yahya, the leader of the Persian revolutionists; General Légitime, of Haiti, and his interesting daughter; the Secretary of State of Liberia. Among the most forceful speakers were the Englishmen Robertson and Hobson, and Mrs. Annie Besant. In the audience at various times were many distinguished persons: Prince Kropotkin, of Russia; Schreiner, of South Africa; Finot, of France; the Prince di Cassano; Israel Zangwill, who was listened to with great attention. Wilberforce University sent four popular persons—President Scarborough, Mr. Finch and Chaplain and Mrs. Steward. To all these one must add a large part of learned and philanthropic London, as, for instance, the Ranee of Sarawak, who is the daughter-in-law of Rajah Brooke; Frederic Harrison, Sir Percy Bunting, since deceased; Travers Buxton, and others.

V.—Some of the Papers.

A résumé of several of the more important papers follows:

Dr. Felix von Luschan, Germany.—By what criterion can we distinguish between "savage races" and "civilized races?" Color? Beauty? Cleanliness? Decency? Ability to write? Power of abstract reflection? Science is abandoning these points of view and recognizes the monogenetic origin of humanity. White races and black races, dolichocephalic and brachycephalic—all of them come from the same stock. Circumstances, the environment, have caused some to advance more rapidly than others. When this is recognized we may distinguish three principal varieties: The ancient Indo-European race, the African race and the Asiatic race of the East, diverging from each other in the course of thousands of years, but all of the same stock, and intermarrying in all directions. There has always, and everywhere, been a constant mingling in consequence of invasions, conquest, commercial relations, etc. That is often a condition of progress; England, France and Germany are remarkable for the variety of their racial elements. Nevertheless, the barriers between races tend to persist, although there is an increasing mutual sympathy as the various races come to know each other.

G. Spiller, England.—Many races are, at the present time, treated, or rather maltreated, as inferior races. Are there any sound arguments in favor of this supposed inferiority? The common standard provided by university diplomas shows almost all races, even the majority of those which are regarded as inferior, represented successfully in the universities of Europe and America. Equal in intellectual capacity, these races have proved by their intrepidity, activity and ingeniousness in war, hunting, cultivation of the soil and commerce that they are not inferior to the others in the spirit of initiative. In regard to morality the sacred books of the East and other documents are penetrated by the most profound ethical sentiment; on the practical side, the so-called savages often display more real humanity than civilized people; and as to beauty, it is a question of conventional standards: a well-developed Japanese or Haitian is as handsome as a European. The differences between races are, therefore, mere differences of physical characteristics. It is only the social and historical element that transforms man into a civilized being.

John M. Robertson, England.—All conquering races are agreed, as a rule, in refusing autonomy to the conquered races. This autonomy, however, is the initial condition of an advanced social organism and of intellectual and moral progress. It is only after a long and painful apprenticeship that European nations have attained autonomy. Why not admit that it may be the same with the so-called backward peoples?

Professor Charles S. Myers, England.—The author submits the following propositions: (1) That the mental characters of the majority of the peasant class throughout Europe are essentially the same as those of primitive communities. (2) That such differences between them as exist are the result of differences in environment and in individual variability. (3) That the relation between the organism and its environment (considered in its broadest sense) is the ultimate cause of variation, bodily and mental. (4) That, this being admitted, the possibility of the progressive development of all primitive peoples must be conceded, if only the environment can be appropriately changed.

Professor Lionel W. Lyde, England.—We are in a position to say that primitive man was dark skinned, and that he, as he began to make his way northward, began to bleach, thus creating a semi-primitive yellow type. This yellow man, exposed to conditions of cold and moisture, might become entirely white. The human skin develops pigment to protect itself against a strong sun; and the quantity of pigment in the skin varies with the intensity of the sun. It is therefore the men who live in the hottest and least-shaded parts of the world—that is to say, in the African savana—that we find the blackest skin. The white peoples, on the contrary, are confined to a region where the humidity of the atmosphere forms a screen against the rays of the sun. Finally, between the Negro and the white is the yellow man, who is a product of desiccating grasslands with seasonal extremes of temperature.

Professor Earl Finch, United States.—Race crossing has furnished so high a percentage of the population of the world that the character of the product is of the greatest social importance. Some sociologists hold that the mixture of races has always had, and must have, disastrous consequences; others have a diametrically opposite opinion. The facts support the first of these opinions. The crossing of an indigenous stock with a civilized race often gives rise to a progeny superior in fertility and vitality to the indigenous race itself. When the latter is left to itself it often declines and disappears. The Maoris, Polynesians and Indo-Americans are convincing examples of this. But if the race mixes with Europeans it displays an increased fertility, as has been shown by many experiences, especially in the case of the Pitcairn Islands. If the crossing of races generally produces an inferior population from the moral point of view, it is because prejudice and the withholding of legal and social sanction restricts these unions, formed under unfavorable conditions, to the inferior classes. In the rare cases in which regular unions have been contracted between whites and natives the results have been excellent.

MOHAMMED SOUROUR BEY, Egypt.—An essentially agricultural country on account of its fertility, Egypt has only two industries—the cultivation of rice and of sugar. But its real wealth consists in its cultivation of cotton. The nation has no part either in the making or the execution of laws. The reforms that it claims are: A real share in the government, a reorganization of justice, gratuitous and obligatory education, the creation of agricultural and industrial unions to improve the condition of the fellah, the founding of institutions of public assistance and the putting into force of sanitary measures.

MOHAMMED SOUROUR BEY

GENERAL LEGITIME, Haiti.—In possession of a fertile soil and an ideal climate, the Haitians have, nevertheless, a very imperfect social organization. Although schools have been multiplied in Haiti, and many Haitians have completed their studies with success in Europe, and although some efforts have been made to improve the routes of communication and the productiveness of the country had been greatly increased, its economic activity is so imperfectly organized that the population, devoid of method, direction or capital, is discouraged and emigrates. Enduring, active, plastic, having immense natural wealth in his country, the Haitian is, if his government gives him the opportunity, as capable as any other man of attaining a high degree of prosperity and civilization.

JOHN A. HOBSON, England.—The character of commerce has changed in our time. Industry having increased its production as a result of the invention of machinery, it becomes necessary to get rid of the surplus of manufactured products, and there is a struggle between the various nations to gain possession of the markets. Further, the importance of commercial relations with primitive peoples has passed from importation to exportation. And as persuasion was necessary to induce these peoples to take our products, and as, in order to have new needs, they had to be "civilized," commerce sought to exercise a pacific and civilizing influence. Nevertheless, the wish to secure or reserve to themselves new markets has dragged modern States into a policy of conquest and colonization in an aggressive form. That seems to be a mistake. To establish profitable commercial relations with a people it is useless to take possession of it. Besides the expense of conquest and military occupation, the unfriendliness of the conquered people will give a very poor guarantee of the development of commerce. The most profitable commerce for Europeans is that with countries into which the commodities and arts of Europe have been introduced under conditions of peace and mutual sympathy.

PROFESSOR FELIX ADLER, United States.—It is urgently necessary for us to have a clearer conception of the ideal to be realized in international relations; for if we make incessant and ruinous preparations for a possible war, and find ourselves in a blind alley from which there is no escape, we owe it to a false military ideal—a false ideal of national prestige, material growth, etc. What principle shall we put in its place? The appeal to sentiment and the progress of democracy are not in themselves a safeguard against war. It is not peace itself that we must keep in view, but the object to be secured by peace. The ideal principle of international relations consists in the progressive organization of these relations between peoples and races. This organization involves two postulates: (1) To attain the most extreme

J. TENGO JABAVU
"Native Races of South Africa"

differentiation of types of culture, the maximum of variety and richness in the expression of human faculties. The peace and progress of the world will depend on the formation of a cultivated class of all civilized peoples. (2) This exchange between different types of culture will serve to bring to light the weak points in each, and may lead to their improvement and healing. In accordance with this principle two practical results seem desirable: The first is that civilized nations should treat backward races with more humanity and intelligence, for the benefit of those races, and, in the long run, for the sake of the whole of mankind. The second is that colonial administrators should make a sympathetic study of the customs, manners, law and religion of the peoples to whom they are supposed to bring civilization.

SIR CHARLES BRUCE, England.—The history of civilization passes through three great successive phases: Extermination, servitude and amalgamation. Thus, in the West, the conquering and dominating conception of Athens and of Rome was ruined by the revolt of the northern barbarians; the amalgamation took place under the guidance of Christianity. In the same way the Jews, after the periods of conquest and subjection, tend everywhere to be assimilated to the different peoples. Now, this idea which increasingly controls the relations of the western races to each other, should also control their relations with the peoples of the East. In this, however, the West has a new prejudice—that of color—to overcome. England was one of the first to apply this policy of amalgamation, in India. In regard to the yellow peoples Europe is, after a period of brutality, attaining to a conception of the same kind; the progress of Japan has had a good deal to do with this transformation. As to the blacks, they have long been the instruments of the cupidity, cruelty and luxury of the white; but their intelligence, deliberately neglected for ages, needs only to be awakened.

THE LATE RIGHT HON. SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, Bart., England.—Slavery, which has been officially abolished, tends to revive in disguised forms: "Forced labor" (unpaid, or paid, at less than the normal rate) for public works; porterage in Africa; forced labor in the form of a rubber tax in the Congo basin. We find the same systems in other parts of the world for the purpose of increasing the production of minerals, cocoa and cotton; by imposing labor either on the natives, or on prisoners, or on Chinese or Hindoo immigrants. Public opinion in many countries is protesting against these practices, which seem to be bound up with the system of large concessions. England and France have made praiseworthy efforts to suppress them.

SIR HARRY JOHNSTON, England.—The Negro type is that which is most markedly set off from the white or Caucasian subspecies. Hence, no doubt, a certain repugnance felt in regard to races that are impregnated with Negro blood, such as the Hindoos, Moors and even the Jews. The negroid element is, nevertheless, very widespread; it is found, more or less ancient and more or less attenuated, in southern Italy, southern France, Spain and even Great Britain. The physical difference from the white is merely a question of taste. On the other hand, the Negro has a very lively feeling for music and the plastic arts, a great power of resisting disease, a high fertility and considerable talent. The Negro race has produced men of great ability in all departments.

J. TENGO JABAVU, South Africa.—The Bantu, a race living in the extreme south of Africa, number about six million souls. They were a robust, healthy, virile people, with advanced institutions; they had a high moral level; they were temperate and religious. But they lived a nomadic life and had no written language. What have the whites done for them? Very little. The mining system leaves much to be desired. They have few or no political rights and no organized education. The Christian missions themselves have, in spite of their good intentions, aimed chiefly at attacking and destroying, instead of improving, the organization of these reputed barbarians. The solution would be to instruct these races in their maternal tongue, concentrating at first on a small number who will afterward devote themselves to teaching and guiding the others. There has been some effort made to found a college, but ten thousand pounds are still needed.

DR. MOJOLA AGBEBI, West Africa.—The problem is twofold. The task of Europe is to establish its political dominion and an industrial and commercial development. For the African the problem is to see what effect the contact with the whites will have on his life, modified and attached in its essential features by this contact. European colonization would only gain by a more intimate and sympathetic penetration of these races whose civilization is so different. They venerate ancestors and heroes, cultivate secret societies, practice polygamy (without grossness), as is common in Islam, and show certain superior characteristics even in their witchcraft, human sacrifices and cannibalism.

DR. W. E. B. DUBOIS, United States.—The Negroes number about ten millions in the United States. Most of them descend from former slaves. They live at the present time under a system of theoretical liberty, but it is restricted in practice by certain legal dispositions and by custom. They are well disposed toward family life, in so far as they are enabled to enjoy it, and to education. They have churches of their own. About two hundred thousand of them are farmers, and fifty thousand are engaged in commerce and the liberal professions. Their situation is most distressing in the South, where they suffer civic incapacity, injustice in the courts of law, economic restrictions, discourtesy in public, etc. And 75 per cent. of the Negroes live in the South. One theory proposes that they should emancipate themselves by acquiring wealth, but it would seem that intellectual emancipation should proceed hand in hand with economic independence.

DR. JEAN BAPTISTE DE LACERDA, Brazil.—During the first half of the last century, Negroes, bought in Africa by Portuguese traders, were imported into Brazil to the number of nearly two millions. Their masters, who treated them as cattle, made concubines of the female slaves, and the country was soon full of metis (half-breeds). These were treated with a certain liberality by the Portuguese, received some education, were often emancipated and had a happier time than their black ancestors. From the intellectual point of view they are often superior to their white father and black mother; in regard to physique, they are graceful and vivacious; but they have not a great power of resisting disease, and it is not always possible to put implicit faith in their loyalty and probity. They have, nevertheless, rendered notorious service to Brazil and have produced a large number of capable men. Since the proclamation of the Republic they have taken an important part in the direction of the affairs of State.

PROFESSOR J. S. MACKENZIE, England.—The fundamental importance of moral education in schools is now pretty generally recognized: (1) By the judicious study of international history and literature we may foster sentiments of honesty, justice, humanity and respect for one's self and others. (2) Moral education should lead to an appreciation of the essential likeness of the various races and classes, in spite of their superficial differences. (3) It is qualities of character that form the real basis of superiority in men of nations. (4) Different peoples, different classes, different sexes, and so on, have each a distinctive type of personality, with a distinctive value of its own. (5) The identity and the comprehensive character of the human ideal are evolved in different and many forms.

EDWIN D. MEAD, United States.—The First Universal Races Congress might form the nucleus of a vast international federation. All the members of the Congress ought to form the following resolutions: "Each nation here represented shall organize a national society this year and hold a national congress next year; a second international congress shall be held three years from now." It is desirable that this Congress should be held in the United States in 1914, as it is the date when we shall celebrate the centennial of peace between the United States and Great Britain.

PROFESSOR N. R. D'ALFONSO, Italy.—Speculative psychology teaches that the man, to whatever race he may belong, has always the same psychological possibilities. Subject from childhood to certain conditions of climate, environment and education, he can reach the highest and most complex grades of civilization. It is the action and reaction of the external world on the internal world of the mind that issues in the creation of man. Hence, if there are psychological differences between races they are the outcome of the particular history of various peoples—a history that has entailed a different education. The psychological basis being the same in all men, all, from whatever part of the globe they may come, may evolve in the same way and attain the same psychic results. In the same way racial hostilities and prejudices are not due so much to organic heredity as to tradition and education. It is the place of the Universal Races Congress to recognize and spread this theory and its consequences.

VI.—The Race Problems.

When fifty races look each other in the eye, face to face, there rises a new conception of humanity and its problems. For four days these representatives of the world walked and sat and ate side by side and heard speech after speech. There were few set expository talks. Men did not explain their problems as to some third person—rather they expressed their own inner feeling at this contact of soul. Some objected to this. They said: "There are fine phrases after phrases and endless allusions to human brotherhood, but after all there is little scientific ordered explanation. We find our thoughts and sympathies aroused but unsatisfied."

This was inevitable. To explain means double knowledge: knowledge of the problem, knowledge of the world to whom the problem is being explained. Strangers, therefore, cannot easily reveal themselves to each other and the delegates to the Races Congress were largely strangers.

Yet in the continual meeting of strangers comes gradual illumination and what the formal speeches failed to do, informal intercourse accomplished to a wonderful degree. First, perhaps, the problem of racial and national integrity stepped to the fore: "We built a great wall once," said the keen Chinese representative, "to keep out the world; a wall so vast that it has been said to be the only work of man capable of being seen from the moon; now you are building a wall against us"—but in either case the clear implication was, China stands and must stand as an independent nation. So with the Turks and the Persians there was a certain frank appeal to the fair judgment of men. We are a congeries of races, said the Turks repeatedly, united in political bonds, and thus we typify the future of the world; and the Persians appealed to a great past as earnest for a greater future. Yet it was significant that while they were speaking Austria was moving all her influence to force European interference in Albania, the ex-Shah landed in Persia and the Times was publishing articles to show England's neglected interests in the Persian gulf.

Next to questions of integrity came problems of autonomy among the great subject nations of India and Egypt. How long are these to be held in leading strings? How far can people not "European" govern themselves? How dangerous has been the rise of Japan? The clear unanswerable argument of John Robertson, M.P., was but reason above foaming waters, and one felt the repression of those who talked on these subjects.

The next great question discussed, not so much directly as by implication, was that of religion. What right has one religion to discredit another and force itself on men, especially when it does not pretend to practice what it preaches? This was the repeated implication in conversation and speech. It was a hard thing to answer in face of the tolerance of the Mohammedan and the Buddhist. Perhaps its best answer was the Races Congress itself.

Bet 32.32-33.59

PASTOR MOJOLA AGBEBI
"The West African Problem"

After this the questions came nearer home and the color line appeared. Who and what are these black and brown men? Are they really men? And, in the same breath, is their ability due to white blood or is white blood fatal to them? One could, after all, think one's way through the political integrity of the East and the gradual freedom of India and Egypt, but could black men be free—were they worth freedom? The answer from the United States was sharp and strong and perhaps the most arresting thing in the whole Congress. If America is trying to treat civilized men as uncivilized simply on account of color what effect will this have on the world and on Africa?

Africa was to the Congress as to the world, the land of the Sphinx. It said little that was articulate, but all knew that it was the land of that new forced and exploited labor on which London and the world waxes luxurious, and that this exploitation is spread over Mexico and South America; is it not one with the economic exploitation of women and children and the mass of laborers generally?

The question of the status of women leaped continually to the front. If we speak of China, what of Chinese women? It was the women of India and child marriage that created the keenest interest, and no paper was more eagerly listened to than that which told of the up struggling of the Negro women of the United States.

On the other hand, the labor question was hardly touched in its main modern phases, although a strong, masterly argument was made to show that the economic foundations of imperialism were as weak as those of the slave barons of the South and as wicked.

On the whole the view of the race problems of the world as revealed in the Congress was strongly reassuring; but the reason of this was clear. It was because the men themselves were there. In their absence a terrible indictment against "lazy" Negroes, "dishonest" Chinese and "incompetent" Asiatics could have been framed; but in the face of gentlemen from various human races of all shades and cultures, the fatal exceptions to sweeping rules of fitness continually occurred. The Southerner from the United States was forced to explain that all Negroes were not like this one; the Englishman was forced to show that Indians, fine as they might be personally, had fearful caste hatreds. The wretchedness of the fellaheen had to be balanced against the culture of the Egyptian delegates, and everywhere men found themselves facing old and familiar human problems which but helped to make the essential world humanity plausible.

It seems no exaggeration to say that a few world congresses like this would do more for the unity of mankind and reasonable sympathy between races, would do more for the stopping of war, slavery and oppression than any other single movement.

VII.—The Social Side.

The social side of a congress is usually the most interesting and this was true of the Races Congress. The opening reception was given July 25 at Fishmonger's Hall. There were fully a thousand guests and it was a gorgeous sight. On the day before Mr. and Mrs. Milholland gave an interesting reception. Lord Weardale entertained the writers of papers the following night, and on Thursday there were two receptions; one at the Lyceum Club and one at Claridge's Hotel. On Friday there was an official dinner, and on Monday the Countess of Warwick entertained the Congress at Warwick castle. Beside these official occasions there was an endless succession of luncheons, teas and dinners, all given quite regardless of the color line or racial lines, and in all cases the genuine courtesy of the English hosts was noticeable.

VIII.—Results of the Congress.

The tangible result of the Congress was the forming of an international committee. This international committee has the following nine objects:

(1) To urge the establishing of harmonious relations between the various divisions of mankind is an essential condition precedent to any serious attempt to diminish warfare and extend the practice of arbitration.

(2) To commend to individuals of different races coming into passing or permanent contact with one another conduct which shall be courteous and respectful.

(3) To induce each people to study sympathetically the customs and civilizations of other peoples, since even the lowliest civilizations have much to teach, and since every civilization should be reverenced as having deep historic roots.

(4) To emphasize that difference in civilization does not, as is often supposed, necessarily connote either inferiority or superiority.

(5) To study impartially and on a broad basis the physical and social effects of race blending and the cases which promote or hinder it, to request governments to compile statistics on the subject and to discourage hasty and crude generalizations on the subject.

(6) To point out the irreconcilability of the contention prevalent among the various peoples of the world that their customs, their civilizations and their physiques are superior to those of other peoples, and also to deprecate the loose manner in which the term "race" is popularly employed.

(7) To urge the paramount importance of providing in all lands a universal and efficient system of education—physical, intellectual and moral—as one of the principal means of promoting cordial relations within, and among, all divisions of mankind.

(8) To respect, or to endeavor to assimilate or change, the economic, hygienic, educational and moral standards of immigrants, rather than to regard them as indefensible or fixed.

(9) To collect records of experiments showing the successful uplifting of relatively backward peoples by the application of humane methods, and to urge the application of such methods universally.

It is also charged with the duty of holding future Races Congresses at least once in four years with the following leading object: "To promote cordial relations among all divisions of mankind, without regard to race, color or creed, and, in particular, to encourage a good understanding between East and West."

It is finally asked to establish an international institution whose object shall be to investigate and publish as well as form local organizations throughout the world.

From "A HYMN TO THE PEOPLES" read before the Races Congress

Save us, World Spirit, from our lesser selves!
Grant us that war and hatred cease,
Reveal our souls in every race and hue!
Help us, O Human God, in this Thy Truce
To make Humanity divine!

THE THIRD BATTLE OF BULL RUN.

IT is just south of Manassas where Beauregard had his supplies, and east of the first two battlefields, with their ghastly relics and calm and guardian mountains.

This third battlefield is dotted with buildings green and red. A little flying engine pants continuously with its water burden, and to and fro pass dark graceful girls and sturdy brown-faced boys. There are green lawns and little trees, and westward in a hidden grotto, a grove green golden, echoing with the voices of new graduates long gone. The dull crimson building in the midst—Howland Hall—stands sturdily with a certain quietude, flinging a long, low wing modestly behind it, where sprites and gnomes and fairies dart in and out and to and fro in busy work.

Southward the girls are clustered, northward the boys, and round about are teachers' families often new founded with new and cunning babies, albeit one and the prettiest had fled, suddenly, and left a sorrow underneath the trees. Teachers there are, varicolored, sunny and sad, but quiet all, busy and happy, eager and glad. With them and not above them is the principal with his boy face and his wife who has wings—wings finely frayed with beating at the bars of life—but wings withal, and in her eyes dreams.

But the battle? Ah, yes, the battle, the third and blood-bought battle of this winding brook that whimpers 'twixt the mountains and the sea; the blood of wounded souls lies along the gold green of that campus—the hail of the iron that enters thuds through the thick dark skins. Now and then the bitter stifled wail of the dying breaks the sudden stillness, then the ranks close and the school moves on.

It's costly, this fighting. Costly in blood and men, costly in money, costliest in worry and apprehension. Each year, each month, the Forager goes North:

"A man to see you, sir."

"Who?" snorts Wall Street, wheeling in his chair.

"Colored man—begging, I think, sir."

"Another Nigger school! Give him $5 and send him on."

And the Forager pockets his shame and moves wearily to the West.

"Yes? Well, I'm giving so much to colored people already—what is this school?"

"Manassas Industrial School? Yes. And for colored youth? Yes? I never heard of it. I give to things I hear of—Battle? I thought the war was over; it isn't. How sad. Good-day."

Thus in drippings of the rich and pennies of the poor each year $18,000 is raised to dig the trench and fire the fuse and strengthen the soul in this third struggle at Manassas.

Who is fighting? North and South, black and white, rich and poor? Oh, no—more primal, more stupendous is this struggle of worlds; light and leading and industry against darkness and hate and the Devil-of-things-that-be. And who wins? God wins—or is ever about to win, if only the Forager staggers home with the food to feed the weary watchers in the trenches, the black-sweated fighters in the fields. Pity the Forager, my brothers, and hold up his hands!

Sunset on the battlefield, and the hard breathing of them that rest from their labors; to the West, glory; to the East, the moon; between, shadows of things that were and are to be; around, a rose-grown porch, the patter of little feet, Woman - with - wings, Man - who - is - ever-young, and laughter.

Up from the earth come voices, heavy with sorrow:

"O brother you must bow so low,
"O brother you must bow so low,
"For long is the way to the ever bright world,
"Let the Heaven light shine on me!"

And so on till we sleep; in our ears the soft low panting of the engine catching its breath; in our eyes the everlasting stars.

41-9-279

EASTER.

LIFT up your heads, O ye gates and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.

Who is the King of glory? The Friend strong and faithful; the Friend faithful in little.

The Friend that seeks neither place nor pay; the Friend that does not boast nor blame, but sits beside us patiently; the Friend who in our weakness knows, and in our travail understands; the Friend to whom we need not say our suffering, for he has suffered even as we and with his stripes we are healed.

The Friend who looks into our tired eyes and laughs cheeringly, who grasps our hand warmly and is silent; who says: "Well done, old man," and "Good work, little sister!"

The Friend who is no impossible god or simpering angel, but human like us, hungry as we are and disappointed; who smokes and drinks with us and walks beneath the stars.

The Friend that hath clean hands and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity nor sworn deceitfully.

Yes, and the Friend who, looking back through jeweled tears, has gone down the Way of Shadows to the place that is silent and dark.

Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.

Who is this King of glory? The Faithful Friend—he is the King of glory. Selah!

The Talks.

Through such a gateway I came out to the cities of men and in these I made twenty-eight talks to audiences aggregating 18,000 human souls.

What wonderful and varied audiences they were: there was the vast theatre in Los Angeles where I strained to reach the last dim gallery rows; there was the little group of a hundred or so in Stockton, and the thoughtful half thousand down in San Diego and over in Indianapolis. Most of all, perhaps, I felt the throb of personal appreciation and understanding in St. Louis and Oakland, while the stillness of a deep earnestness, almost tragedy, lay on the audiences in Fort Worth and Atlanta.

At Los Angeles I spoke again and again to audiences that did not seem to tire, while in the wonderful Northwest I met the little group at Portland, the people of Tacoma—so tireless in their thoughtful care—and crowned it all at Seattle, the wonder city that sits gleaming amid its waters with its face to the great North.

In the eighteen cities where I spoke live 500,000 Americans of Negro descent, and I cannot cease marveling at their grit and energy and alertness. They complain at themselves and criticise, but they are pulsing and alive with a new ambition and determinedness which were to me astounding.

The Mid West.

In Indianapolis, St. Louis and Kansas City strong groups of Negroes are uniting to fight segregation, to improve and defend the schools and to open the gate of opportunity for their children. They are not yet united or agreed, but their steps toward union and agreement in the last ten years have been most encouraging. They welcomed a gospel of fight and self-assertion.

Southern California.

Los Angeles was wonderful. The air was scented with orange blossoms and the beautiful homes lay low crouching on the earth as though they loved its scents and flowers. Nowhere in the United States is the Negro so well and beautifully housed, nor the average of efficiency and intelligence in the colored population so high. Here is an aggressive, hopeful group—with some wealth, large industrial opportunity and a buoyant spirit.

Down at San Diego, with its bold and beautiful coast on the great Pacific, is a smaller group, but kindly and thrifty, with pushing leaders.

The Golden Gate.

The shadow of a great fear broods over San Francisco. They have not forgotten the earthquake, and the stranger realizes what it was by the awe in their tones. One misses here the buoyancy and aggressiveness of Southern California and yet the fifty-eight leaders who met me at dinner were a fine group of men, and they expect the colored world to greet them in 1915 at the exposition.

This group stands closer to the progressive whites than many others and has a chance to share in the great movements of uplift.

At Sacramento I did not speak, but a little group made my hours of waiting pleasant—an unassuming group with pleasant manners and warm hearts. I shall not forget them.

[Crisis, July 1913]

41-9-270

The Northwest.

Up then I rushed through a rich, green valley and then through high, full-bosomed hills—through that contrast and astonishment which is California.

Portland is the older Northwest—staid and quiet, with a certain strength and bigness. The audience was small and the people were not sure of my message and purpose; but they themselves were awakening and they showed new homes and enterprises with pardonable pride.

Tacoma will always seem to me like a place of home coming. I have seldom come to a strange city with so intimate an understanding and sense of fellowship. The audience was white and black and sympathetically blended. The mayor came and spoke and ate and an old Harvard schoolmate introduced me. They gave me a loving cup and it did not seem inappropriate, so that I went away thinking not so much of a separate striving group as of a body of good friends with scant color line.

Then, as I have said, the wonderful Western pilgrimage was crowned at Seattle. The magic city of 300,000 lies on its hills above silvery waters, dream-beautiful and all but uncanny in its unexpectedness. The group of men who welcomed me were unusual in vigor and individuality. There was the lawyer who thoughtfully engineered it all; the young doctor with his cheery face; the droll politician with his reminiscences and strong opinions; the merchant from up country and his little daughter whose beautiful face of the long years ago I remembered suddenly amid the cheer of her perfect little home. There was the caterer, and the minister—it was a fine group. I have seldom seen its equal.

For one day I turned my back on the perfect memory of this golden journey and sailed out across the seas and thanked God for this the kindliest race on His green earth, for whom I had the privilege of working and to whom I had the pride of belonging.

Texas.

Then I plunged into Texas. One day the white, drifted snows of Montana and then, in less than a week, the sound of the reaper in the golden grain of the Red River valley!

One shivers at the "Jim Crow" cars of Texas. After the luxury of the West and the public courtesy and hospitality, the dirt and impudence of a land where to travel at all meant twelve to twenty-four hours in the most primitive accommodations, was an awful change. For twenty-four hours on one journey I was able to purchase only two musty ham sandwiches to eat, and I sat up three nights in succession to keep engagements.

But what was lacking in public and white courtesy was more than compensated in private and Negro hospitality and appreciation.

At Dallas was one of the strongest, truest religious leaders I have met. At Austin were growing colleges and an audience gathered from thirty miles around. At Marshall was a group of fine men and women, and it all came to climax at Fort Worth.

"Are you going to Fort Worth?" everybody asked, knowing of the recent riot. I went. I spoke to 400 Negroes and a handful of leading whites, and I spoke the clear, plain truth as I conceive it. It was received without dissent or protest and its reception gave me deepest hope and satisfaction.

Atlanta is another story; so here let me end and, in ending, let me thank those who welcomed me, who paid my fees willingly and promptly, who were eager to listen to the message which I brought, not because it was wholly to their liking, but because it was sincere.

All this by way of preface. In later numbers of The Crisis I shall take up these groups and cities in greater detail and tell of their meaning and promise.

The Horizon

THE WAR.

COMPANY L of the 6th Massachusetts Infantry, a colored company, has been assigned to guard duty at Portsmouth, N. H.

¶ Bishop John Hurst of the A. M. E. Church has already raised $300 for colored French orphans in accordance with the plans of The Colored American Society for the Relief of French War Orphans.

¶ The second construction battalion consisting of Canadian colored men together with a good many American Negroes has arrived in England.

¶ Nine colored men were among the crew of the Portuguese merchant ship, Argo, which was torpedoed and sunk while enroute from New Orleans, La., to London, England. Eight colored people were victims on the City of Memphis, an American ship sunk by submarines. Two Negroes were lost in the sinking of the British ship, Crispin.

¶ Matthew Williams, a colored man, has offered himself and 960 Negroes of Mobile, Ala., to the United States for infantry service; 590 volunteers for an officers reserve training camp have been secured:

Howard University	186
Hampton Institute	150
Virginia Union University	112
Lincoln University	60
Virginia N. & I. Institute	44
Morgan College, Baltimore	38

It is expected that reports from colleges and universities farther South will bring the number up to 1,000; three companies of colored volunteers have been organized in Birmingham, Ala., and a movement is on foot to form a colored regiment; Thomas E. Miller, former president of the State Negro College, has offered to organize 30,000 South Carolina Negroes for active service in the army and navy.

¶ A patriotic parade of some 3,000 colored citizens was held in Columbus, Ohio. Similar parades and patriotic meetings have been held all over the country.

¶ More than 600 Negroes of Chattanooga, Tenn., met and pledged their services to the government; in Augusta, Ga., 800 Negroes held a patriotic mass meeting; 3,000 colored citizens of Houston, Tex., met in the city auditorium as a patriotic demonstration and 12,000 marched in Austin.

¶ Two Red Cross Divisions have been formed in Washington, D. C., among colored women. One is known as the Harriet Tubman Branch, with Dr. Marie Lucas as president, and the other has been formed at Howard University through the efforts of Miss Hallie Queen.

¶ The Governor of South Carolina has appointed a colored commission to have charge of a "more food" campaign.

¶ The four colored regiments in the U. S Army have been recruited to full war strength and no more enlistments are being received.

¶ La Frantz Jones of the colored Howard High School, Wilmington, Del., has been assigned to League Island as assistant wireless operator.

¶ The Maryland League for National Defense offered in March thirteen prizes for the best essays on Universal, Obligatory Military Service. The contest was national, and Mrs. Laura F. Wheatley, a colored student of Morgan College, Baltimore, won the third prize. The judges were the editors of the Baltimore daily papers.

¶ Dr. Ernest Lyon, ex-U. S. Minister to Liberia, addressed a meeting of colored women in the home of Mrs. George E. Frey, in Baltimore, Md., which resulted in the organization of The Women's Patriotic League of Maryland. Mrs. Frey was made president, Mrs. Mason A. Hawkins, vice-president, Mrs. Howard Payne, secretary, and Mrs. Howard Young, treasurer.

INDUSTRY.

THE migration of Negroes from the South to the North, East, and West continues. A careful compilation of records of railway agencies shows that the total movement of colored citizens from Albany, Ga., to northern and western states from June 1, 1916, to March 1, 1917, was approximately 4,500; figures compiled by T. Arnold Hill, of the Chicago Branch of the National League on Urban Conditions Among Negroes, from data of the railroads, show that the Illinois Central transports an average of between sixty-five and seventy a day, and the Chicago & Eastern Illinois between thirty and thirty-five daily; city and state officials say that more than 20,000 have come to Philadelphia, Pa., in the last six months; over 1,000 arrived in Cincinnati, Ohio, April 15, within twenty-four hours; the Colorado and Southern Railroad brought 200 from Texas during the last two weeks; the Erie Railroad imported from Jacksonville, Fla., during the last week in March over 150; 300 left New Orleans, La., March 20, on the Southern Pacific steamer for New York, and 500 more left March 24; over 1,200 have recently migrated from New Orleans to the North, West and East.

Estimates as to the number of Negroes who have migrated from the South to the North, East and West vary. A statement from the railway companies received by the Lexington Conference of the Methodist Church, recently in session in Cincinnati, Ohio, puts the number at 1,000,000 during the past year; William J. Doherty, Deputy Commissioner of Charities, New York, estimates 150,000 since war-time prosperity; J. H. Duckrey of the Pennsylvania Railroad reports over 2,000,000 since January 1 of this year. Joseph E. Mannings, of Birmingham, Ala., estimates 500,000 since December 28, 1916; 150,000 coming to New York alone, about 100,000 to Philadelphia, Pa., and the rest to various communities in the East and North.

¶ Mayor Raymond of Newark, N. J., says that the Negroes have been a most "orderly, fine part of the city of Newark." Ex-Governor Stokes declares that Negroes are "welcome in New Jersey."

¶ James Judson, the colored "Potato King" of Kansas, and James Slocum of Tulsa, Okla., are said to have invested heavily in Chicago real estate for the purpose of furnishing houses for colored immigrants.

¶ As a result of efforts by Dr. George W. Bowles, a colored man who acts as examiner for employers at York, Pa., the factories of that city are now employing many colored girls.

¶ The Remington Arms Company has secured and is seeking more colored labor for its plant at Eddystone, Pa.

¶ The Utah Construction Company, Cheyenne, Wyoming, is calling for 3,000 colored laborers.

¶ The Monitor announces openings for 5,000 colored laborers in and around Omaha, Neb. The wages range from twenty to sixty cents per hour. There is work for farm hands, freight handlers, smelter and packing house laborers.

¶ Colored women are being employed as car washers in the Big Four Railway yards in Cleveland, Ohio.

¶ A number of Negro farmers in the Federal Farm Loan District, composed of Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi, have applied for membership. One organization has refused them and another has delayed action.

¶ Herman Peebles of Raleigh, N. C., won the first prize, a fifty dollar scholarship in the A. & T. College at Greensboro, in the Negro Boys' Farm Clubs Contest for 1916. He produced 104 bushels of corn at a cost of twenty-two cents per bushel. The second prize, a forty dollar scholarship at the same institution, was won by Braxton Brewing who produced 120 bushels of corn at a cost of thirty-eight cents per bushel. The prizes were offered by the A. & T. Alumni Association.

MEETINGS.

OVER 1,000 colored school teachers are expected to attend the convention of the Muskogee County Normal Institute to be held in Muskogee, Okla., at Manual Training School, June 4 to 29. J. T. Smith has been appointed conductor.

¶ A North Carolina Negro Tailors' Convention will be held in Greensboro July 4-6. M. K. Tyson is secretary.

¶ The Mississippi Centennial Exposition which was to have opened next December will be postponed fifteen months on account of the war.

¶ The thirty-sixth annual session of the Louisiana Grand Lodge of the colored Knights of Pythias took place in New Orleans. There was a large attendance.

¶ The annual health conference was held at Baltimore under a committee headed by Mason A. Hawkins, Principal of the Colored High School. Judge R. H. Terrell was the chief speaker.

¶ Five hundred representative Negroes attended a convention at Wewoka, Okla., and a protective league was formed.

THE WELFARE OF NEGRO TROOPS

THE Christian Advocate prints the following significant article:

If America is to have an army of 12,000,000 men, at least 1,000,000 will be Negroes. Already the number of colored soldiers exceeds 100,000, many of whom have rendered such notable service as to receive mention in the official reports not only of American commanders, but of the Germans as well. The racial discriminations which so largely prevail in civil life have reappeared in the camps, resulting in criticism and irritation on the part of the "race-conscious" Negroes who feel that the army should at least live up to the principles of human equality which are inscribed on its banners.

Bishop W. P. Thirkield, of New Orleans, has prepared a report on the Welfare of Negro Troops, which seeks to discover the grounds of irritation, and to suggest remedies for evils whose very existence is a reproach to the United States, and whose continuance menaces the strength of the nation's effort to deliver its united power against the German. The report represents the work of a committee of the General War Time Commission of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ. It presents four subjects to the attention of the War Department.

1. In the combatant regiments of Negroes the morale is high, the relation between white officers and colored men is good, and the effect of military training upon the men is conducive to wholesome results in civil life after the war. In non-combatant units, however, the situation appears to be far from satisfactory. The failure to give military training to service battalions and stevedore regiments has stood in the way of their attaining to the feeling both of self-respect and full loyalty that characterize the combatant units. Further, many of the white officers in the non-combatant units have carried over into the army old traditions and prejudices acquired in connection with managing gangs of Negroes on plantations, turpentine farms or construction of public works, and have not had, therefore, toward the men under them the attitude of sympathetic interest that officers take toward fighting men. The fact that in the majority of cases the non-commissioned officers in the service battalions and stevedore regiments have also been whites, who have taken a condescending attitude toward the Negroes, has intensified a feeling of discontent. The inevitable result has been to make it more difficult to sustain among the colored people as a whole an adequate recognition of our democratic ideals in the war and the largest devotion to our cause.

2. Information has come that in certain draft boards an unfair and discriminating attitude has been taken toward Negroes, resulting in inducting into the army large numbers, who, if white, would have been exempted in accordance with the provisions of the draft law. To what extent such irregularities prevail it is impossible to say without further investigation, but certain it is that thoughtful Negroes are convinced that this is very frequently the case.

3. Although the number of illiterates among the Negro troops is exceedingly large, little provision is made for instruction. A military order requires all non-English speaking people in our army to be taught, but because even the most illiterate Negroes can understand orders of command it has not been deemed necessary to provide for their instruction. Such instruction would, however, be of great value not only in increasing the usefulness of the Negro in civilian life afterward but also in securing a finer morale during the war through his enhanced recognition of our concern for his welfare and his appreciation of our national ideals.

4. In the case of Negro regiments, particularly non-combatant units, little or no systematic provision has been made for organized athletics, and consequently the colored soldiers have been deprived of the valuable training that comes therefrom, and which is generally more needed by colored soldiers than by white.

* * *

The committee offers sympathetic and feasible suggestions:

(1) That a small commission of prominent Negroes proceed overseas to examine and report conditions to the government; (2) that alleged draft board discriminations be investigated and eliminated; (3) that all colored battalions have military training; (4) that white officers for colored units be selected with a view to their sympathetic interest in their men; (5) that new service units have Negro non-commissioned officers; (6) that qualified Negroes be trained for officers in larger numbers; and (7) that directors of athletics be provided for all camps of colored troops.

The War Department has many vast undertakings under its direction, and its brilliant work along many lines is heartily appreciated. It has had few tasks beset with more perplexities than those which relate to the military employment of Negro citizens. These findings of Bishop Thirkield's committee deserve Secretary Baker's most serious consideration. They are not the captious criticisms of political opponents, or the expression of racial self-assertiveness. They are based upon the principles of human equality which lie at the basis of America's participation in the War for Freedom.

RACE SUPERIORITY

THE old question as to which race is superior has been done away with by the present conflict. In its place has crept a new doubt as to the superiority of any race. The Independent says:

One of the issues of the war is race prejudice. The Germans have this trait in so marked a degree that it ought to share the growing unpopularity which now accumulates around things distinctively German, whether good, bad or indifferent. Ever since the Germans took from Frenchmen like Gobineau, Englishmen like Houston Chamberlain, and Slavs like Treitschke, the legend that the world's civilization was the creation of a single race—the Teutonic—they have been unendurable. The bulk of German books on history, politics and sociology for the last few decades have been devoted to the elaboration of this great Teutonic myth. Slavs were barbarians, Latin nations were decadent, Celts were futile, the yellow races were "monkeys," black men were not human, Jews were enemies of the state; only the Teuton was tall, blond, handsome, virile, virtuous, reverent, honorable, practical, idealistic, scientific, thrifty, continent, just, brave, self-respecting, and capable of self-government. The fact that many Frenchmen, Russians and Irishmen had all these qualities and that some Germans had none of them (not even the blondness) did not prevent the Pan-Germans from identifying the imaginary "Teuton" with the German nation.

The moral of this pitiful collapse of German humor and common sense before the mirage of Teutonism should keep us from similar follies. Let our enemies have a monopoly of racial egotism.

* * *

But the war raises the question of race prejudice also in a broader form; not merely the claims of the Teutonic super-race but the claims of the "white race" itself to eternal and inevitable superiority. Germany has no doubt on the matter. Inferior as are the non-Teutonic peoples of Europe in German eyes, they take rank above the "native" races of Asia and Africa to such a degree that slavery or the sword is the just wage of the latter. Note the German fury at the Allies for seeking the aid of Japan and for employing African troops on European battlefields. Remember the day when the Kaiser preached against the "yellow peril" in the spirit of yellow journalism. Read any good book or article on Germany's system of rule in her overseas colonies. It is true that private plantation owners in Belgian and Portuguese Africa, and even in a few parts of French Africa, have been excessively cruel to the native laborers in their employ. But nowhere have the officials of a government been so systematically oppressive as in German Africa. The atrocities in the Belgian Congo were the work of a soulless capitalism. The atrocities in German Southwest Africa were the work of bureaucrats inspired by racial arrogance and measureless contempt of those whom they ruled. If the preacher of race hate from the Mississippi valley or the Pacific Coast were to migrate to the banks of the Elbe, he would not only relieve us of his presence, but would find an appreciative audience and a true "spiritual home." Race prejudice is pro-Germanism.

If the hideous example of racial arrogance afforded by Germany does not suffice to cure us of our prejudices, there is another fact which should make us reflect. Who are the Allies? At least five nations among them—China, Japan, Siam, Liberia and Haiti—have no white population worth mentioning. An absolute majority of the people of the British Empire live in India; "white" men certainly, but also "natives" and non-Europeans. France and its colonies, if taken as a whole, contain nearly as much black as white, and French Indo-China contributes numerous yellow men to swell the total. Italy, Belgium, Portugal, Brazil, Cuba and others of the Allies have many non-white subjects and citizens. The United States, with its ten million Negroes and mixed-bloods, its Indian tribes, its Pacific colonies, cannot claim to be a racial unity. If we sum together all the people who are fighting against Germany, it seems probable that at least three out of four of them are "natives"; that is, people not descended from the races of Europe. Of course, the white race is the most largely represented on the actual battle line, but, since an army is only the delegate of a people, we should learn to think of the war as a league of all the races of mankind against the common foe of all humanity.

THE ANTHONY SUFFRAGE BILL

THE Pittsburgh, Pa., Leader says:

If the country were informed in a joint pledge from every Southern State, county and town that the people down there had forever foresworn against their favorite outdoor pastime of lynching Negroes, the surprise could not be keener than in the vote submitting the question of woman suffrage to the voters of Louisiana by the lower house of the legislature. The astonishment is not diminished by the supplementary assurance that the senate will pass the resolution for referendum by a vote even more decisive than that given in the house.

Of course, this is only the skirmish—the real battle is to be fought at the polls, but the change in view is so radical that once its importance is grasped the mind is prepared for anything. The South, and the extreme South in particular, has been the

VIVE LA FRANCE!

"MINE eyes have seen" and they were filled with tears. The mighty audience filled the Trocadéro, and in the center of the stage stood a black man, lithe, tall and straight; on his breast were orders and he wore the uniform of an officer of the French army. A general of France stepped toward him, touched him on either shoulder with his naked sword and kissed him on both cheeks and said: "In the name of the President of the Republic, I nominate you, Bakhane Diop, chevalier of the Legion of Honor." The great audience arose, roared and cried again when the crimson badge of the Legion was pinned on the Arab who stood to the Negro's left and the Annamite who stood on his right, while round about were black French officers and rank on rank of decorated troops.

It was France—almighty and never-dying France leading the world again. The day was given to honor the black men and yellow men who gave their lives for a country they are proud to call theirs and which is equally proud to claim them. Seven black deputies represent black Frenchmen in the French Parliament. Deputy Diagne, of Senegal, was the first man introduced today by the Minister of Colonies and he sat in the place of honor in the President's box.

The exploits of the black and yellow troops were acclaimed by actors from the Théâtre Française, singers from the opera and orators from the government with play and music, cheers and the great strains of the Marseillaise. France, "le jour de gloire est arrivé," and the honor is yours, Men of Africa! How fine a thing to be a black Frenchman in 1919—imagine such a celebration in America!

IN FRANCE, 1918

TOUL, dim through the deepening dark of early afternoon, I saw its towers gloom dusky towards the murk of heaven. We wound in misty roads and dropped upon the city through the great throats of its walled bastions. There lay France—a strange, unknown, unfamiliar France. The city was dispossessed. Through its streets—its narrow, winding streets, old and low and dark, carven and quaint, — poured thousands upon thousands of strange feet of khaki-clad foreigners, and the echoes threw back awkward syllables that were never French. Here was France beaten to her knees yet fighting as never nation fought before, calling in her death agony across the seas till her help came and with all their strut and careless braggadocio saved the worthiest nation of the world from the wickedest fate ever plotted by Fools.

Tim Brimm was playing by the town-pump. Tim Brimm and the bugles of Harlem blared in the little streets of Maron in far Lorraine. The tiny streets were seas of mud. Dank mist and rain sifted through the cold air above the blue Moselle.

Soldiers—soldiers everywhere—black soldiers, boys of Washington, Alabama, Philadelphia, Mississippi. Wild and sweet and wooing leapt the strains upon the air. French children gazed in wonder—women left their washing. Up in the window stood a black Major, a Captain, a Teacher and I—with tears behind our smiling eyes. Tim Brimm was playing by the town-pump.

The audience was framed in smoke. It rose ghost-like out of memories—bitter memories of the officers near dead of pneumonia whose pain was lighted up by the nurses wanting to know whether they must be "Jim-Crowed" with privates or not. Memories of that great last morning when the thunders of hell called the Ninety-second to its last great drive. Memories of bitter humiliations, determined triumphs, great victories and bugle-calls that sounded from earth to heaven. Like memories framed in the breath of God, my audience peered in upon me—good, brown faces with great, kind, beautiful eyes—black soldiers of America rescuing beloved France—and the words came in praise and benediction there in the "Y," with its little stock of cigarettes and candies and its rusty wood stove.

"Alors," said Madame, "quatres sont morts"—four dead—four tall, strong sons dead for France—sons like the sweet and blue-eyed daughter who was hiding her brave smile in the dusk. It was a tiny stone house whose front window lipped the passing side walk where ever tramped the feet of black soldiers marching home. There was a cavernous wardrobe, a great fireplace invaded by a new and jaunty iron stove. Vast, thick piles of bed rose in yonder corner. Without was the crowded kitchen and up a half-stair was our bedroom that gave upon a tiny court with arched stone staircase and green tree. We were a touching family party held together by a great sorrow and a great joy. How we laughed over the salad that got brandy instead of vinegar—how we ate the great golden pile of fried potatoes and how we poured over the post-card from the Lieutenant of the Senegalese—dear little vale of crushed and risen France, in the day when Negroes went "over the top" at Pont-à-Mousson.

Paris, Paris by purple façade of the opera, the crowd on the Boulevard des Italiens and the great swing of the Champs Elysées. But not the Paris the world knows. Paris with its soul cut to the core—feverish, crowded, nervous, hurried; full of uniforms and mourning bands, with cafés closed at 9:30—no sugar, scarce bread, and tears so interwined with joy that there is scant difference. Paris has been dreaming a nightmare and though she awakes, the grim terror is upon her—it lies on the sandbags covering monuments, on the closed art treasures of the Louvre. Only the flowers are there, always the flowers, the Roses of England and the Lilies of France.

WHEN PRIDE BECOMES A VIRTUE

A WRITER in the Philadelphia, Pa., Bulletin speaks about the German invention and promulgation of the "lie-well-stuck-to." From the time of the Franco-Prussian War up to 1914, Germany had never ceased to belittle France and to glorify herself. So subtle, so pervading, so persistent had been this propaganda that Germany not only succeeded in convincing the outside world, but induced the French insensibly to accept the rôle thus thrust upon them. No one doubts French worth and valor now. The Battle of the Marne, the watchword "They shall not pass" at Verdun has routed every suspicion and misgiving. Even Germany must acknowledge the

THE WINDS OF TIME

by W.E.B.Du BOIS

It was Walt Whitman, singing in the wilderness, a century ago, who said of Europe:

"Pass'd! Pass'd! for us forever pass'd, that once so mighty world, now void, inanimate, phantom world,
Embroider'd, dazzling foreign world, with all its gorgeous legends, myths,
Its kings and castles proud, its priests and warlike lords and courtly dames, Pass'd to its charnel vault, coffined with crown and armor on."

¶ The passing of the legend of Europe was slow indeed, but sure. Surely today the blindest must see it.

¶ Last week I spoke of the legend of Peace. Because in the last quarter of of the 19th Century and the first decade of the 20th, there was peace in Europe, those who worshiped her argued there must be peace in the world. And we whose education was European, echoed that this was the great era of peace. Yet before our blinded eyes, war was continuous and all but universal from 1871 to 1914.

¶ There was similar mental muddle concerning Wealth. My early teaching concerning wealth was clear and logical. One worked for money. One spent sparingly and saved the balance. This property saved and invested in land and home; or laid away in the bank, was to be one's support in sickness, age and misfortune. The poor were the thoughtless, the careless.

Was this picture true? To my boyhood it seemed true. Of course I could not see the whole picture. I saw parts and they seemed signifigant, typical. My grandfather and his two brothers owned little farms on Egremont plain. There they lived as I dimly remember as a small child, in a certain independence and comfort; there was food in plenty if not in great variety: they raised it. Clothes lasted a long time; a new dress or suit, or shoes were events calling for wonderment, almost celebration. No Burghardt accepted charity, at least publicly.

But the children did not stay on the land. Why? Shiftlessness, some said; others said they could not afford to. Afford? Singular! Not "afford " to live? I do not know, for my parents' generation were among them that fled from country to town. There in a town of 5000 people, I grew up and had my view of life and the explanation of that life which was school. My people -- parents, uncles, aunts, cousins, became public and private servants: barbers, ~~witters~~ waiters, laborers, maids; a few with a bit of capital ran drays, became dressmakers or stewards. It was not so clear in such cases to see just what determined income and hours of work. The housing of the clan was poor: not in most cases uncomfortable according to the standards of the town, but contrasting with other homes in two directions. T here were numbers of wretched huts inhabited by the Irish and German factory workers. I did not know why they preferred such homes, but I assumed more or less clearly, that unless they did so choose, they need not live there.

¶ There were a few mansions: large pretentious houses, with wide grounds and lawns and flowers. I remember particularly the estate of John Cone, which we boys passed on the way to the swimming hole. In town I often saw John Cone riding high on his barouche, with horses and shining harnes. My first disillusion in economics was when I was told that he was not John Cone; he was the coachman; John Cone was the funny little fat man crouching in the back. I much preferred the job of the coachman.

¶ Most of the homes of the towns lay cosily between these extremes: small white houses of four to six rooms, with modest front yards and working backyards, full of wood, sheds, sleds and plunder; delectable places to play and useful for household chores. My own homes--for there were three or more in ten years, fell in the lower half of these homes, although the last one of four tiny rooms, was a shade poorer.

¶ Why? What determined the range of these homes and the income of their indwellers? What was wealth, who made it and who shared it? Above all, who determined what, who should have? Singularly enough, as I now see it , very little was said on that subject, in or out of school. Yet we were a free-thinking, free-speaking folk. We talked of time and eternity; we talked of sickness and death; we talked of war and peace. We did not talk of wealth. And so far as I could gather, the reason was that we knew all about it and that therefor there was no need to talk. That was not quite true. I remember hearing my fiery grandmother upbraiding our well-to-do, but stingy neighbor over some transaction, which she alleged was unfair. "I worked for your father, Mr. Culver," "Well, he paid you, didn't he?" Here came the problem of fair wage, for the first."

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

"I have seen the walls of Balclutha
"And they were desolate.
"The fox looked out of the window
"And the wild grass waved about his head.

I remember when a student at Fisk running across this quotation from an almost forgotten poet. I was attracted by it then because of its beauty of expression. I do not remember that I gave much thought to the poverty and desolation, the pain and human suffering that this picture represented and that was common then among mankind and now belts the earth. Faced continually with the problem of poverty we are so used to it, we do not notice it. We take slums for granted. We can hardly conceive of the poverty in Ireland in the middle of the nineteenth century or of India in the middle of the twentieth. Why is this?

My people in the homes I lived in from birth until at seventeen, I left for college, were poor people. I do not think that the income of my immediate family ever exceeded a thousand a year and probably most of the time it was nearer five hundred dollars. Of course in a little town like that living was cheap: rents were low and sometimes the family owned its home; food did not cost much; milk was given away or sold at five cents a quart; vegetables were cheap or gifts; one could always gather greens in the fields in the spring. So that while we were poor we did not suffer from poverty. We were not hungry. We were not well-clothed but on the other hand never ragged. I did not go barefooted even in summer. Moreover, I saw about me a poverty infinitely worse than mine. The potato famine drove peasants out of Ireland beginning in 1848. They must have come to my town early because when I was in school in the seventies there were many hundreds of Irish in town. They were laborers, servants and mill hands. For the most part they were ugly, dirty and ill-kempt. They lived in hovels with their pigs. They seemed to me always brutish, bad tempered and drunk. There were some exceptions of course and in after years the rise of the Irish in that village from poverty to wealth, education and power was a striking thing. But their condition during my boyhood was piteable. This did not arouse in me any particular compassion or surprise. I grew up to believe that poverty among the Irish was a normal thing and I think I assumed on the whole that it was their fault. Why didn't they work harder, spend less on liquor, save money, wash themselves and their surroundings?

The reason that I came to these conclusions arose mainly, I think, because at an early age I became accustomed to earn and save money, curiously small amounts but tremendously important in my philosophy and plans. The chief milliner in the town had her little shop on Main Street heated by one of those splendid new "base burners" as they were called. One poured hard coal into the top of an iron cylinder and it burned as it drifted down; so that once arranged in the morning it lasted throughout the day. My first job was to fill two of these stoves of a morning on my way to high school. My compensation was twenty-five cents a week.

I remember saving most of this until I could have the infinite pleasure of opening my pocketbook and carelessly displaying a dollar bill. After that I earned more by errands, by mowing lawns on contract, by doing chores of various sorts. I must have earned something like a dollar a week during my last years in high school. Out of this economic background arose my philosophy of income and wealth: People were poor who did not work, perhaps of course they could not but most of the time they could but would not. I did not attempt to analyze the reason and basis for the wages which they received - that I rather assumed was automatic and fixed in the order of things.

At seventeen I was given a job to last for a year and prepare me for going away to college. I was offered one dollar a day, six dollars a week. The amount seemed to me almost fabulous. It was wealth toward which I had never before aspired. It confirmed my econmic philosophy: the Russells, owners of the woolen mills were rich because they work and save; the Irish who worked in those mills were poor because they did not work regularly and they never saved. This was my philosophy. It took me nearly fifty years to examine it, correct it and turn upon it the light of experience, reading and reason.

WINDS OF TIMES
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

This matter of earning quite satisfied for the time my economic thought. I looked around my little town with its dark river and guardian hills. I saw many sorts of human beings and they differed in many way but chiefly, as I now see it, in income. Of course the difference was not nearly as great as exists in New York and Chicago. I doubt if anyone in that town late in the nineteenth century had an income of more than ten thousand dollars with one exception which I shall mention later. The Paxton Brothers, this is not the real name, were mill owners and probably the richest men in town. One was fat, one rather lean. With the son of the lean one I was a close pal. We visited and played together. I did not consider that the Paxton's income had any relation whatsoever to the wages of his mill hands. These wages were low, not more than one or two dollars a day and the result was poverty and disease. The Paxtons lived in large and comfortable mansions with grounds. They had carriages and horses but there was no sign of extravagance or senseless luxury.

One the other hand, there was Mr. Black, the druggist. He was the same type as the grocer, the clothier, the meat market man. There income was probably two or three thousand dollars a year. They walked to work, dressed without ostentation and so far as I could see had little recreation. You could find Mr. Black in his store from eight o'clock in the morning until late at night with intervals for lunch and dinner.

As now I rationalize this situation and contrast it with the mill hands, the laborers and the servants, I must have regarded its reason as based on two things: work and inheritance. The merchants and mill owners did a higher type of work and were more efficient at it. The mill hands were stupid, many of them could not read and write. This ought, of course to make a difference in their income.

On the other hand, there was that matter of inheritance. I do not think that I considered it very carefully: how far was a man entitled to be given by his parents wealth which he had no share in earning.? Inheritance is a queer thing.

Pauline Havard sings "What does Man inherit?
The bitter wine of tears?
Pain that flogs the spirit?
Sorrow's poisoned spears?
And yet, we too, are sharers
In the rich bread of dreams;
For dusty, spent wayfarers,
The silver threads of streams;
For a new young moon to glitter -
A fingernail of light!
Though wine of grief is bitter,
We mortals still have Night."

36-6-64

The inheritance of the world's beauty and pain is in a sense inevitable; but how about the inheritance of money and property and above all the inheritance of legal rights to income? That is assuredly another problem and that I did not consider.

The schools of Great Barrington taught a little but not much of economics. Their teaching of physiology, chemistry and physics was pretty good. It laid in my mind a very fair foundation. History and English, ancient languages and mathematics were also well taught, although the history was conventional rather than critical. But when it came to the basic question: what is wealth? How do men secure it? What is income? What determines its size? What is poverty and why? Such fundamental inquiries as this we did not touch. They were things that we took for granted and therein lay a great danger. What was omitted in economic teaching in Massachusetts in the seventies was probably lacking all over the United States if not over most of the habitable globe and it explains much muddled thinking today.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

My first view of modern economic organization came through the entrance of a millionaire into Great Barrington. We had seen rich people before but they were only reputedly rich and came up from New York to spend the summer. They were strangers extraordinarily well-dressed but the town r ther elaborately ignored them using them only for money-making purposes.

But now came a different case: one of the Kellogg girls had married Mark Hopkins of the Pacific Railway. The Kelloggs were ordinary stoggy farmers who had a big meadow right in the midst of the town through which the Housatanic ran. It was one of my favorite playgrounds as a boy. A great uncle of mine had worked for the Kelloggs, a sort of laborer, servant and man of all work. He was a crochety old bachelor. The family averred that he was almost never paid and did not ask for his pay; that the Kelloggs buried him respectably and set up a tombstone in the Mahaiwe Cemetery where his body lies today beside that of my son. Now the town theory, or at any rate the theory of my family, was that out of the withheld wages filched from our labor, Mark Hopkins became rich. This was of course arrogant nonsense; it was a rationalization of the earning and saving complex which we in our simplicity thought was the basis of wealth. But the basis of wealth had changed enormously. Mark Hopkins made his money by government gift, mortgages and plain stealing. The government gave the Pacific Railway, of which he was one of the builders, millions of acres of the richest land in the world for nothing. He and his confreres sold this to farmers at good prices and clapped mortgages on it. The prices paid, the interest on mortgages, the railway charges and other incidentals made a half dozen millionaires. Mark Hopkins was one.

He married Miss Kellogg and considerately died. Miss Kellogg, an elderly, lonesome widow, wandered back to Great Barrington and for one thing started to build a palace. She determined to build it out of our blue-grey granite which formed the mountains which I loved and the caves in which I played Indian, and the peaks which I climbed.

By intricate negotiation, the details of which I never knew, I became at he age of sixteen, the timekeeper of the organization which was to build this house. Here I saw technical industry of modern days, in action for the first time. It was marvelous. I saw stone cutters measuring pieces of rough granite and hammering it into building stones and carven frescoes and lovely pillasters. They shaped doorways, windows, friezes and porticoes. I watched them work. My sympathy was entirely with Norcross Brothers of Worchester who were the contractors hiring our labor. Every Saturday I carried the workers their pay envelopes and here and there an envelope contained summary dismissal of the worker without notice or excuse. Usually I was quite in sympathy with the process - the workers loafed. I remember one Irishman who used to stand with an absorbed intellectual expression looking off into space. I knew he was elaborately loafing but I did not know or think about just what it meant for ten hours a day to pound a piece of steel into a granite rock. He so arranged it that he didn't work ten hours a day. He put in six or seven hours of effective work and did a beautiful job. He wasn't dismissed and now I know why. But then I regarded him as a loafer.

Turning aside from the lovely building and the extraordinary technique that was transforming a mountain tino a palace, let us revert to the question of the Hopkins fortune. It arose of free gift, monopoly and cheating. It was transferred to a woman who had contributed very little to its making and didn't know what to do with it when she got it. The very elegant well-bred and be-spatted English architect who told her what kind of house to build, eventually married her, and when she died he took the fortune in return for a little casual lovemaking. Later having no children himself he adopted a waif and eventually died leaving the fortune to a boy who had had absolutely nothing to do with the making of it. And the fortune consisted not of gold, silver and diamonds, houses and land but of pieces of paper which gave this boy the legal right to demand for his own unlimited use a considerable part of the income which labor in the United States was creating.

Of this whole process we were taught absolutely nothing in the schools. We had no conception of how fortunes were being made, how they were being transferred and how they were being spent, having right before our eyes an example of the misuse of monopoly capital we did not know nearly as much about it as we did of Homer's Iliad and the destruction of Pompei. And what was true in our case, was true over the United States and over the civilized world, and is almost as true today as it was then.

Private Hans Juergensen sings:

My brothers beg for bread.
To give them bread I fight.
Darkness still runs ahead -
Therefore I race for light.

¶ This matter of ignorance of economics; of the meaning of work and wage and the laws and feelings that determine them is so insistent that it is not a matter merely of past recollection but even more so of present importance. Let me skip six decades from the days of my economic training to the present day and take up this ~~matter~~ case of Henry Wallace and Jesse Jones.

Jesse Jones who is one of the kings of American industry with far more power in his hands than the King of England and in some respects more than the President of the United States. Mr. Jones recently with pontifical calm delivered himself of an aphorism which most Americans would pronounce gospel truth. "You can't lose if you buy something for $1 and sell it for $1.25." What I want to impress upon every reader is that you can lose even if you buy something for one cent and sell it for a million; and that the reader who thinks differently is one of those economic illiterates whom I have been scolding.

¶ What does it mean to buy for a price and sell for a profit. We have the feeling that the price of articles is fixed by unchangeable law which closely resembles the law of gravitation; that to this price must be added a profit for the seller or otherwise all industry will collapse, laborers will be unemployed and depression will overwhelm the world. This is flat nonsense.

¶ There are, of course, physical laws which must be followed in the pricing of goods and of services. There must of course be incentive for people to save from their income and render the public some service in the processing, transportation and exhibition of things which they have for sale. But in the space between these two things; that is, the lowest cost for which goods can be made and sold which is really the cost of keeping human beings alive; and the prices which men may, if they can, insist upon as a return for their work; between these two points there is wide and increasing space where human will and desire can determine where the price may settle.

¶ In other words, if the government of the United States gave some capitalist whom Mr. Jones favors $100,000,000 to build an artificial rubber plant, the lowest price for which that rubber can be sold is the cost of the material for building, machinery and rubber making and the cost of the labor. The cost of the labor can be beaten down unless the laborers are unionized and have a vote or somewhere else to work if they lose jobs in the plant. The price of the materials used is limited in the same way. It comes back, therefore, to what laborers will work for or must work for and that God knows can be pretty little.

¶ On the other hand, the price for which this rubber maker can sell his product is, unless the government intervenes, whatever the men who want tires are willing to pay and that just now may be a lot of money.

¶ The question is, therefore, who is going to determine how much leeway, how much profit there is going to be allowed by the low paid labor and high demand for scarce ~~profits~~ goods, especially when the government, meaning the people of the United States, has furnished the bulk of the invested capital? If here is not a place for government intervention, for government planning and control, how in the name of high heaven are we going to have prosperity in this or any other land?

¶ Henry Wallace is the man who promises that in the disposal of the plants, property and other capital which the United States has furnished industry during this war crisis, he is going so far as he can to fix prices for the good of the people of the United States, and not for the profit of Jesse Jones and the millionaires whom he has coddled. Jesse Jones, on the other hand, is determined to run these plants at the expense of the government and for the profit of the men who by grace of Jesse Jones now control them. If this path is followed it will and must lead to disaster.

¶ This is exactly the thing which happened in 1929. In 1929, this country set itself to cash in on the pain, disaster and loss of the first World War. It determined to make the peoples of the world pay for American goods the highest price which America set upon them. They were going to do this regardless of what these goods cost in wages and invested wealth and the whole thing smashed into almost incredible disaster because the world could not pay the prices which America asked and America could not maintain the price level which inflated greed had put upon her invested wealth. The world tumbled and the capitalist fell.

¶ If this had been the first time that this thing had happened, we could call it a mistake but this kind of financial crisis has happened periodically at intervals of twenty years or so during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries and the thoughtful people of the world are getting tired of this nonsense and they see Henry Wallace as a leader who may guide them out of this wilderness.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

The Gospel according to Arna Bontemps says:

"I have sown beside all waters in my day.
I planted deep, within my heart the fear
That wind or fowl would take the grain away.
I planted safe against this stark, lean year."

Consequently I have paid the mortgage on my house. This is in a sense epoch-making in my line of economic thought and I believe it may be just as important in the thoughts of other folk.

Mortgage means the death grip which the lender has on the borrower. In Roman times it was so-called because if a person borrowed money on property the lender took the property, kept it and used it until the loan was paid. If the loan was defaulted it became the lender's property for ever. Then came the live grip, a modification in favor of the borrower: he received the loan but kept and used the property until such time as he could repay the loan with similar penalities if he could not.

This form of borrowing against real property has come down to us and is today spreading. It is used not simply for houses and lands but tools, clothes and even food. It is a kind of borrowing that in many cases borders on gambling and has to be watched by careful persons.

Why should a person borrow money on the house which he has bought? Of course because he has not cash enough to pay the full price. He borrows until he can earn the deficit. But curiously there has come a theory widespread among careless thinkers that a mortgage, especially on houses and lands, is natural and necessary; that it is actually better to carry a mortgage on your house. In truth there is only one case where this is a fact: if you buy a house for $5,000 and put $2,500 down, it may be that you can use the other $2,500 in your little grocery business and earn ten per cent on it while you have to pay only five per cent on the mortgage. This is an excuse for a mortgage on the house, but in most cases you cannot earn on the money which you do not pay, anything at all because you do not have it. In that case it is worse than nonsense to carry a mortgage any longer than is absolutely necessary to earn the money to pay it.

Four times I have bought or tried to buy homes: once I bought a cheap and commodious home which had a mortgage on it. By hard exertion I might have paid that mortgage but both the bank who owned it and the real estate agent who engineered the deal advised against it and I was silly enough to follow their advice. I sold that house, mortgage and all, and tried to buy an apartment house. I planned to occupy an apartment there so that I could see that my tenants were comfortable and got their money's worth. It was another fool's dream. The apartment house was priced far above what it was worth; it needed continual repair and tenants were poor and uncertain. The depression of 1929 caught me flat and I lost $10,000 which was practically all my savings. Then I tried to buy a place in a cooperative apartment and a third time was caught by too high capitalization, poor management and exorbitant interest and rent. I gave up a third time. The fourth time the President of the United States came to my rescue. He established the Federal Housing Authority. He made it possible for me to borrow money at 4½ per cent instead of 6 per cent; to pay off the mortgage gradually instead of in a lump sum; to avoid the payment of bonuses which increase the interest charge. I bought land, built a simple but lovely home according to my own plans and now I do not owe a cent upon it. Go thou and do likewise.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

Louis Ginsberg sings in PM:

"Our time now holds suspended breath;
"In lightning flashes of the war,
"We see on every side how Death
"Makes everything alive much more."

In nothing ought we to feel more alive than in the interpretation of the present plight of industry, of work and wealth and post-war employment. This is our old friend economic illiteracy and the problem that faces us as grownups is: what must one do if in the secondary school and in the high school nothing or worse than nothing was said about economics.

My great hope and faith for adult education has long been centered upon the forum: the lecture followed by a question period. I have been astonished and disappointed that this gate to democracy has not obtained greater vogue and quicker growth in America.

I remember once when the present United States Commissioner of Education was superintendent of schools in Des Moines. I shall always believe that he did there a better job than he has done since. He organized the whole city of Des Moines into regular forums. He came near putting the forum within a few blocks of every citizen so that at least once a week that citizen could hear an expert illucidate and discuss some current matter of interest and afterwards ask him questions about it. It was a brilliant idea and it was tremendously successful. Why did it virtually disappear? Because there are interests and vast interests in the United States who do not want the mass of people to know and discuss.

I have been especially interested in the spread of the forum idea among American Negroes. I have spoken to Negro audiences as well as white in nearly every state in the Union for almost a half century. In practically all cases there have been questions after my talk and I have tried to allow the utmost freedom of inquiry and to answer honestly even if I had to say that I did not know.

This year I have recently been talking in New York, Philadelphia, Buffalo and Cleveland and I plan further discussions in Chicago and Detroit. My audiences have grown in intelligence and power of criticism. I can take a group of a thousand colored people and talk to them for an hour in straight logical exposition without joke or gesture and have them sit eager and tense and then ask searching questions.

Yet this lecture forum idea among us has not grown nearly as fast or widely as it should grow. It has not filled the real demand for it and there has not been concerted effort to increase and broaden this demand. There is still among many the idea that while plumbers and carpenters, house-maids and snow shovelers should be paid and paid well, that lecturers should work for nothing. One knows, of course, the far off reason for this: so many lecturers have been worth nothing. They have had nothing to say and did not know how to say that; they have tried merely to entertain and stir up the crowd. They have left trails of disappointment.

On the other hand, there are men and scores of them who have a message; who could teach the world and yet never try because they are never asked. Here is a field of development and education which we ought to be cultivating continuously and broadly.

WINDS OF TIME

Countee Cullen sings:

"One three centuries removed
From the scenes his fathers loved,
Spicy grove, cinnamon tree,
What is Africa to me?"

Every writer receives a letter once a year and often once a month in portest against the use of the word Negro. Usually some honest soul has convinced himself that the essence of the Negro problem lies in the name. Change the name and lo! the problem disappears.

30-6-71

I have always had great admiration for H. L. Mencken's forthright courage and his scientific keenness. Recently, I regret to say, this latter faith has been shaken by his attempt to explain the attitude of American Negroes toward the word Negro. The explanation is superficial and becomes so because he has leaned on the testimony of one flippant columnist seeking to say something smart.

Let us remember once for all that a name is not necessarily a logical conclusion. Every name as the Century dictionary tells us is "the word or words by which an individual person or thing, or a class of persons or things is designated, and distinguished from others." A name, therefore, is a matter of present understanding and not of historical and logical deduction. If by a certain name the majority of people clearly understand what you mean, that designation stands.

Consequently names have histories. These histories show us how the meaning of a name has changed in the past. For instance when slaves were first brought to America they were brought by the Spanish or sold to the Spanish and they were called blacks (negros). This was simply a physical designation. After several centuries there apreared in the West Indies a group of persons of mixed blood, children of white masters by Negro mistresses born both in and out of legal wedlock. These persons were usually, by both French and Spanish law, free persons. Therefore the word Negro meant slaves while the word colored meant free person.

For many centuries the people of color fought fiercely against any attempt by word or deed to reduce them to slavery. It was this prejudice against the word Negro based upon a real and faithful distinction that put the word into disrepute. In the United States the earlier Negro leaders searching for a suitable designation chose the word African. Hence we had in the latter part of the eighteenth century the rise of African Societies in New York, Rhode Island and Pennsylvania and the formation of the African Methodist Church. But this was clearly a misnomer. American Negroes even of that day, except in very few cases, were not Africans. They were Americans. Therefore by the middle of the nineteenth century and especially after the Civil War, American Negroes were in a real quandary as to what they should call themselves. It was not a question of their being ashamed of their descent or of wanting to coin a new and fantastic designation.

With regard to the word Negro they had two objections: one, that the ancient connotation of the word in America was slave, and the other that in all uses of the name in America it had become an epithet and a mark of opprobium. To escape, therefore, this public and bitter use of the word Negro uncapitalized and "nigger", an attempt was made by colored writers in the latter half of the nineteenth century to substitute some new name like Afro-American or Aframerican or circumlocutions like American of African descent." The difficulty here lay in the fact that you cannot arbitrarily change a name. "Friends" were called Quakers in derision. They have never been able to escape the term and have ceased to try. The same was true with Puritans and similar nicknames.

A growing group of writers late in the nineteenth century determined to rescue the word Negro from its opprobium. They determined to use it, demand its capitalization and by sheer weight of will to make it the name of a great people. The history of this effort calls for careful study and documentation. Dunbar, Chesnutt, Whitman, James Weldon Johnson and many others joined in this continued pressure. Gradually the walls yielded to our trumpet blowing. I remember the fight which I had with the United States

Census of 1890 to make them capitalize Negro in my contribution to their publication.[5] I remember when periodicals like the Atlantic Monthly, New York Times, the Atlanta Constitution, slowly yielded to capitalization. The books on typography began to yield to capitalization. The word Negro today is no longer an epithet. It no longer means slaves or despised people. It has become the proper designation not only of thirteen million Americans descended from white, black and brown people, but of something between 150 and 200 million of other people in Africa, South America, the Caribbean area and Asia, who stand for a series of cultures and an history of struggle and opposition and only incidentally for the color of their skins.

WINDS OF TIME

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

On my recent lecture trip to the West a porter handed me two copies of "The Negro Traveler". This is a new magazine sponsored by porters, trainmen, cooks and dining car waiters. It is aimed at such persons and at the colored traveling public in general. The two numbers which I saw were well printed, well illustrated and of great interest. It shows one phase in the development of our economic position. Up from our work as household servants we have developed occupations which are becoming professions. By organized union methods we have achieved a higher wage and security of service and limitation of hours. We have entered into industry from an unusual angle, parallel in modern days, to what happened to Europeans in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

This brings me back again to my economic education and the relation between industry, wage earning and saving. I think on the whole the most puzzling thing in my early thought of work and income was the bank. Physically the banks of my little town were fascinating. I remember once having the chance to examine the waste paper of the Mahaiwe National Bank. Such hordes of beautifully lined paper and blank books and memoranda as I gathered! I loved the looks of the inside of the bank, the gleaming brass, the nice little windows, the moghogany desks. But just what a bank was for and what it did, I could not get clear in my mind. Now I know that there are in this country of ours not less than 100 million people who are just as ignorant now about banks as I was then.

Banks deal in that kind of wealth which is most easily exchangeable and are, therefore, in position to take first advantage of every change in the demands of the consumers for goods and services. This most exchangeable wealth is usually but not always money; real money, that is, gold and silver or promises to pay money printed on paper. This kind of wealth is not consumable. It satisfies no need except the need of exchanging one kind of goods for another; or one kind of work for good; or one kind of goods for work.

There was a time in the nineteenth century when exchange for wealth was the chief way of making wealth quickly. This is becoming less true today. Tomorrow the measure of civilization will be not quick exchange of wealth but permanence and reliability and predictability of demand. In that day the bank will become less a symbol of prosperity than it is today. Today a bank deals in money and credit; it finances new business; it procures new capital for old businesses; it protects money which you do not use; uses it successfully itself and give you a part, a very small part, of what that money has earned. It may be a center of worldwide gambling; it may be a conservative way of saving money and protecting property. Just because it is a bank is no proof that it is either useful or trustworthy. It must be watched; it must be judged.

When, therefore, the American Bankers Association comes forward to advise the world concerning trade and industry after this war, we have a perfect right to be suspicious. The American Bankers Association is thinking solely of profit and benefit to banks, and benefit to banks is not always benefit to people who work and Save.

There was a period when American Negroes went into banking and looked upon that as a good deal more promising profession than working for railroads or preparing food or rendering various sorts of personal services. They came to this conclusion naturally because bankers made more money than servants, lived better and were more respected. We are in the midst of an era of change and we are working slowly, very slowly, toward the time when personal service is going to outrank gambling in any form and when banks by law and public opinion will be compelled to stop gambling. They will then be institutions to serve society and not merely to make bankers rich.

I attended last week a meeting of representatives of one hundred and six organizations called together by the Secretary of the Treasury to discuss the Bretton Woods proposals.

We had dinner at the Willard and as I said to an official of the State Department: here we are reaping the logical results of refusing to teach economics to people of the United States, young and old. How can the Treasury Department dream that in a few weeks a nation that knows little of [redacted] elementary economics can comprehend the plan for the economic restoration of the world which was discussed by the United Nations at Bretton Woods.

What happened at this meeting was characteristic. The Secretary of the Treasury himself welcomed us and then two assistant-secretaries of State took us in charge. We were told that the economic dislocation caused by war made efforts to restore trade and finance upon the proper basis imperative.

Then unconsciously narrowing the meaning of currency, trade and economics to matters and movements which do not include the emotions, feelings, wishes and desires of human beings, we became suddenly and curiously technical and found ourselves discussing rates of exchange, policies of investment, the stabilization of currencies, the raising of capital private and public for restoring war losses and securing post war profits.

I was uneasy and out of my depth. I refuse to envisage economics ~~and~~ as higher mathematics, or the investment of capital as the equivalent of economic progress. I insist on the contrary that the human will cannot be plotted by calculus but is subject to incalculable causal change and that the profits of investment are entirely subordinate to the income of workers, their conditions of work, their forms of enjoyment and the voice which they are given in the conduct of industry, - that these things are basic to democracy.

I therefore took occasion to interrupt the discussion of financial science, the attitude of the American Bankers Association and the gold standard to ask this question: "There is in the Bretton Woods proposals so far as I can gather no reference to colonies or colonial conditions. Yet colonies are economic rather than solely political problems. Seven hundred and fifty millions of people, a third of mankind, live in colonies. Cheap colonial labor and materials are basic to post-war industry and finance. Was this matter mentioned in any form at Bretton Woods?"

The answer which Assistant-Secretary Davis, author of the Bretton Woods proposals, gave was "No". The matter of colonies as well as other economic problems like that of Cartels was not touched upon at Bretton Woods. The Bretton Woods agreements propose first a fund of $8 billion to stabilize currency and rates of exchange since we have no international money; and another fund of $8 billion to be loaned to countries for reconstruction, the loans being guaranteed by the United Nations; and the thought being that private capital under such guarantees will furnish as much or more capital for investment.

The United Nations would furnish these funds each in proportion to its resources. The American Bankers Association objects; it wants to raise and control the funds for loaning money and to garner the results of the profit.

Here you have the old dichotomy: is the restoration of the world after this war a matter of private profit or public welfare? Is the safe investment of capital more important than wages, health, and education for the masses of the people both in colonies and in civilized states?

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

The myth of the superiority of white European civilization is being absolutely destroyed by this war. I think first of the destruction. I saw the great towers of the cathedral of Cologne first in the fall of 1892. I walked in its vast and solemn aisles with a Dutch lady and her three daughters. I saw the great rose window and heard the role of organ music. Nothing th t I had ever heard or seen before equalled this sense of vast beauty. It took half of a thousand years to build this. It has been destroyed in less than a thousand hours. The shell is there. The cathedral is gone.

So too, the University of Bonn. I can see it yet spread placidly in the springtime. It had a certain aire of withdrawal and forgetfulness; living out and beyond a turbulent world and considering its yesterdays, not from a desire of withdrawal but from a deep sense of the fact that most men who made this world are dead and most thoughts, plans and ideals with which we live, belong to a world which no longer lives and yet continues and guides our lives. This is the reason that we dwell in the past and make it our subject of study.

The Rhine from Cologne to Bonn and from Bonn to Coblenz is the Rhine of romance and history and legend. The great statue of the Watch on the Rhine Rises where the Moselle flows into it at Ehrenereistein. Yonder lie the Drachenfels, the ancient castles begin to rise and on to the south are the rocks of the Lorelei. Few places in the world have lovelier scenes or more beautiful memories. War is covering them with blood.

In 1936, I sat last in Dresden and looked down toward its cluster of museums where I had just seen the Sistine Madonna and beyond in Breslau had talked of the world with a famous anthropologist married to a lady from Brazil and uneasy because of the whole outlook of the world.

That same year I saw Tokio, a vast and beautiful and intricate city swarming with human beings living in its tiny homes. I went with Kagawa down to his cooperative restaurant and saw him feeds thousands satisfactorily at a few cents a meal. I sat in club and theatre. I spoke at the university and saw geisha girls dance. All this is ashes or near ashes.

This has been brought about by people who have preened themselves on being leaders of civilization, disciples of the Prince of Peace, devoting themselves to keeping lesser breeds from fighting and disorder, distributing leisure to the world's workers that they might think and dance and enjoy life. Whence has come all this sordid and disastrous miscalculation? This destruction of wealth that runs today in figures so fantastic that no ordinary man can conceive of it; and besides this death, cripples, disease and hopelessness. This is the sort of thing into which European civilization has led us. It must never lead the world again. It never will.

The underlying cause is a fundamental disbelief in the equality of human beings, a disbelief that in the past has led and misled others into a march of superiorities. Read what Egypt wrote concerning the abject worthlessness of all men except Egyptians. Consider what the Persian Empire thought of the shopkeepers of Greece. Listen to the boasting of Roman citizenship that dragged all the world awry, made men deny their birth, their religion, their past in order to make their destiny one with the Roman world state. Think of the attitude of the great rulers of China in their heydey toward all the world outside the celestial kingdom. Then going far beyond all this, consider what for five hundred years the modern world has been taught concerning European civilization, of its incomparable superiority of anything that Egypt, China, Greece or Rome ever conceived, of the genius and mentality of its leaders, of the fact that the only history worth reading or writing was the history of Europe and that the majority of human beings were of no account only as they catered to the happiness and security of Europe. This is the kind of insanity which was bound sooner or later to disrupt and overthrow civilization.

THE WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

As I said to a member of the Bretton Woods Conference, "the difficulty of selling this idea of International Bank and Loan Fund to the people of the United States is that the great mass of intelligent people of this country know nothing of economics because they never have been taught."

The only way of teaching the elements of economic life today is through consumers cooperation; through the Rochdale plan of gathering groups of people for organizing group buying, distribution and manufacture; and putting in the hands of each person of this group the democratic right of deciding all questions of procedure and an equal share of returns regardless of money spent.

This does away with profit and the profit motive; and if civilization is going to restore itself and succeed, private ~~business~~ profit must go. There must be income for work, reward for exertion and sacrifice; but not profit due to gambling with necessities or monopoly of capital or privilege of position.

That this is coming in the United States is shown by the fact that such cooperative organizations are doing a business of nearly a billion dollars a year today and that this business has increased thirty-three per cent during the last twelve months.

Cooperative business today is engaged in the refining of oil, in coal mining, in real estate, wholesale manufacturing and retail merchandizing. ~~They~~ It operates one hundred and twelve mills, factories and refineries, and hundreds of agencies and stores.

The opponents of cooperative business are against these group enterprizes because they say that they are opposed to "private enterprise." This is true and ought to be true. Private enterprise, which is simply the unbridled permission of every gambler and monopolist to take advantage of the poverty and need of the poor, will either be opposed by decent planning and organization or modern civilization will be ruined. Cooperative enterprise is as old as the world: the idea goes back to the history of Greece and Rome; it helped found the Christian church and it is or pretends to be present in all modern mutual organizations, friendly societies and groups united for common economic good.

They aid today over two and a half million of families but affect less than two per cent of normal consumers incomes under $25,000. They ought to affect ninety per cent and more. I know of no line of study, thought or effort that promises more for the development of Negroes in America and of disadvantaged groups than consumers cooperation.

In Europe where the modern cooperative movement began a hundred years ago and spread through England, Germany and Scandanavia, the whole organization has virtually been smashed by war; but it will return, either as overall planning patterned after Russian communism; or as group planning patterned after Denmark and Sweeden. This is the meaning of the Leftist movement throughout Europe. It is opposed by the American Bankers Association by men like Eric Johnson and W. L. White, by all of those vulture forces which look upon the end of this war as the harvest time for profit and exploitation on a world scale. The same insane dream drove the world to hell after the first World War. The anxiety to stop the war was not a demand for peace but for profit; a demand for selling things for more than they are worth to people who had nothing left to live on. This wild dream on a still larger scale will drive the world insane after this war unless we have learned something in the last generation.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

I remember distinctly when I first became aware of the problem of Poland. Of course I had heard of the partition of Poland in my history books but that had meant little to me.

When I was a student in Berlin one of my fellows was a Pole, Stanislau Ritter von Estreicher. I visited him in his home in Crakow and drank for the first time Polish schnapps which nearly choked me.

36-6-77

He told me of the desperate effort which the Poles had been making for years to regain their freedom; of the way in which they were denied the use of their own language; of the difficulty of learning their history in the schools; of the many indignities put upon them by the Germans.

At the same time there was another side to the story which gradually came to my knowledge. I knew that there were few masses of peasant people who were more imposed upon and exploited than the peasants of Poland at the hands of the great landlord. I knew too that the Jews in Poland had suffered more than even the Jews of Russia from cruelty, murder, and personal insult.

In the United States, I am today aware that of the foreign-born people here few if any, have despised Negroes more than the Poles. It was a Polish priest who stirred up the riot in Detroit in the case of the Sojourner Truth housing unit. There were the Poles in Hamtrack, Michigan who led agitation against Negroes and in one case drove them out of their church after they had once previously set it afire.

The Polish question, therefore makes for us one of those complicated problems which we are called to face within the frame of our own racial problems. There is no need that we should assume that Poles are uncommon folk, - unusually cruel, unreasonably lacking in human sympathy. On the contrary, we have here an all too natural situation. The Poles who came to the United States had been the victims of oppression and miserable poverty. In the United States they have had, in many respects, a much better chance than we Negroes have ever had. They have, on the whole prospered. Now when they think of Poland they think of themselves, not as the poor and the oppressed, but as one with the great landlords, the educated aristocracy who have made the name of Poland famous in art and science. Consequently they take sides not only against the oppressed in this country but even against the oppressed in their own land. They do not remember their fathers as poor peasants. They picture themselves in the future as rich landlords and aristocratic upper classes.

It is a misfortune of America that this sort of curious transformation in attitude and thought has taken place in the case of many of our immigrant people: with the Irish, for instance, one miserably poor and half-starved, living in hovels with their pigs and chickens, finding refuge here in the United States, where they have in the course of a few generations become among the rich and prosperous Americans. For years they were bitter enemies of Negroes, fighting them for their jobs as laborers and scavengers. They killed them in Philadelphia and Cincinnati. They hanged Negroes to the lamp posts of New York in protest against being drafted in a Civil War to set slaves free.

On the other hand Russia is right to deny Poles the rule over Russians beyond the Curzon Line. Poland must learn to rule itself before it is given any right to rule alien peoples.

The Germans were never as bitter against Negroes as Poles and Irish, but nevertheless, they could hardly be counted our friends. They viewed us as suspicious strangers. Some of the German leaders who fought slavery but many refused to take sides.

In fact I came up in a day and a state, where I looked upon foreigners and immigrants as the natural enemies not only of my people, but of all true Americans. This of course was a foolish and short-sighted judgment. It was forgetting that one of the penalties of poverty and ignorance is to fight other people as poor, as ignorant as oneself. It has only been recently and in our day that the descendents of Negroes and the foreign-born in America have begun to know each other through the labor movement and especially through the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

The Winds of Time

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

36-6-78

There is manifest among us today a curious economic paradox which not all thinkers can see clearly. We have for the first time in modern history practically full employment in the United States with high wage. This means that the members of the laboring classes are getting away from menial service just as much as possible. They do not want to do work which is under social stigma and which in itself is difficult, dirty, and uninspiring. The laboring class then is filled with a new independence and at the same time harrassed by a great fear. How long is this employment and high wage going to last? What is going to happen when it begins to disappear? How far are they going to be thrown back into the want and misery of the days of unemployment?

On the other hand, both the people who are receiving higher wage and those who are the regular employers and are receiving today, in many cases, tremendous profit, are baffled and frustrated by the high prices and by the lack of the ability to buy things which they want. Ordinarily those with the large income want service, the very best kind of service, trained service, and service which is in accord with traditional subservience. They do not get it.Today conductors on the trolley cars are impudent and brusque; servants in the house are independent and impudent. So far as the laborers themselves are concerned they cannot buy the things that they have always envisioned: a new car; plenty of rich food; travel; and excursions. That brings us to the very forefront of our thinking the question as to whether we want large numbers of people to be fully employed and well-paid.

There are numbers of persons today in the United States who are more or less consciously asking themselves, "Do we want after all, this so-called democracy? Can we carry on civilization, that is, the kind of civilization which we like, if any large proportion of the population has a certain economic independence toward work and can refuse the kinds of employment which they do not like? Is it not neccessary for the happiness and civilization of the people in the world who count, that there should be a large number of poor and servile people driven with poverty and want?" Under those circumstances we can own that detached house with grounds and flowers and plenty of help to take care of it. We can have, if we are rich, the large estate with an army of trained maids, with butlers and valets. We can realize the kind of fate which is so common in the popular English novel where the lady at her ease rings for all sorts of service - where she drives, travels, reads, and entertains; and all of the work, all of the difficulties are taken care of by people whom she pays a sum which is small enough to be afforded from her income.

Manifestly, if the great mass of the laboring people are employed at good wages, they will not want to do that kind of work and they certainly will not do it at the low income which they have been offered before. Consequently, one would find, I do not doubt, on inquiry that a considerable number of people today are questioning the fact as to whether we really want employment and high wage. Suppose, gentle reader, that you examine your own reaction: do you want liberty, equality, and fraternity: Remember that one of the first protests put into verse in early English literature said,

"When Adam delved and Eve span
Who then was the gentleman?"

Winds of Time

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

How shall we read the riddle posed by our article of last week with regard to menial service? The real reason for the attitude of servants and laborers toward their work lies in the minds of the employers and not in the minds of the workers. Just as long as the average person in the world regards it as socially degrading to cook, to clean house, to wait on table, wash clothes, empty garbage, dig in the earth, and lift burdens; just so long as this kind of work is regarded as degrading, the people who do it and who are compelled to do it will bitterly resent the necessity which compels them to do this work.

36-6-85

Such workers, particularly if they have training, intelligence, and ambition, will feel at enmity with the world; they will tend to do the work carelessly or resentfully; they will pout and slow up on the job. On the other hand, it is equally clear that these kinds of work are not in themselves degrading, but are of high social value. There are few sorts of work in the world of more importance than the preparation and serving of food; than the sanitation which depends upon cleanliness; than the moving of articles so that they will be in the right place at the right time; the cleaning of clothes; the lifting and carrying of burdens. These are life and necessary life; but you cannot make people realize this if you stigmatize this kind of work with social degradation.

Work that is necessary and worth doing must be held in the correspondingly high regard by the public. Young people must be trained to do ~~them~~ it in the best and most efficient way. The people who do ~~them~~ it must be paid adequately and must be secure in tenure. The hours and the conditions of the labor must be standardized according to civilized usage. The work must carry with it no inevitable mark of inferiority, like addressing without courtesy titles of "Miss" and "Mrs"; or some other customs which mark the person as different and lower in rank.

We can see some of the changes in the social estimation in which common labor and personal service have been held beginning to appear. We have chefs in hotels and in restaurants who are well-paid and respected. We have organized house cleaning, with trained and adequately treated personel. Organized laundry work has come with appropiate machinery; there is rational disposal of garbage; digging and lifting by engineers with machines is common. Usually, however, when these changes take place in the technique of these necessary services a few people are elevated, trained, and put at the head with good pay, while most of the others become factory hands, ill-paid and insecure, and less satisfied with their work than when it was personal service. On the other hand those left in personal service either become flunkies, paid by gratuities and tips or sink to casual workers partially dependent on charity. In both cases their self-respect disappears.

It is on these conditions that the attack must be made in order to counteract the low regard for certain kinds of human labor. The essential work of the world must be done. No necessary work is menial in essence or should be so regarded. There must be training for all sorts of necessary work; but not only that, there must be in all cases adequate pay and social respect. What we are seeing, therefore, today is a forecast of the things which we must face if we are going to realize democracy in the world, democracy not only in politics, but in work, in income, in distribution of the world's goods.

The reform does not come about simply by saying parrot-like that house-service is "respectable" when we know it is not respected; it is not effected by raising wages on lowly jobs and still regarding these jobs as undignified. The raising of wages must be followed by security, by training, and above all by fundamental change in the attitude of the world towards certain categories of work and toward common labor and menial service.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

After considerable agitation and negotiation the American Negro has won not indeed a seat at the peace table in San Francisco but official recognition as a consultant of the American delegation. This is considerable. The consultants have been appointed for forty-two labor, business, professional, religious and other organizations. These consultants will have no direct power; they may or may not be called into consultation; but at any rate it has been established that among the vast and varied interests of this nation in commerce, trade, law, labor, war veterans, farmers, women, Jews, Catholics, Protestants, education and various other general interests, the interest of thirteen million American Negroes must at least be recognized.

This is more than has ever happened before to American Negroes since the Civil War. It came to pas through temperate but insistent agitation on the part of the Negro press and organizations like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

In addition to this there are certain over-all organizations fighting for the Dumbarton Oaks and Bretton Woods plans. The most important of these is perhaps the American Association for the United Nations which is a union of a dozen or more national peace organizations. This federation has appointed a core committee of thirteen and one member of this committee is an American Negro.

We must also remember that directly represented at the peace table will be Liberia, Ethiopia, Haiti and the Dominican Republic. Finally, there will be numbers of interested observers from the Council on African Affairs, the West Indies National Council and probably from some of the great church organizations and especially reporters representing the Negro press.

From all these persons one thing will most certainly be accomplished: whatever is discussed and decided, the situation of the Negro race in Africa, in the West Indies and in America cannot and will not be neglected. It will become part and parcel of the whole problem of colonies; and the problem of colonies either in San Francisco or soon after will become the central problem of world democracy and world peace.

At a small colonial conference held recently in New York the one central agreement was that the colonial system must go; and that plans for transition of colonials from subordination to empires to autonomy must be put on foot. I am not sure how soon the world is going to realize this. Opposition to the plan is of course centered in the British Empire and there it is strong. On the other hand, there are elements in England who sympathize with this program and believe in the danger of colonialism.

Of course the central problem behind all change is economic. Mere political freedom means nothing if people cannot earn a living and support with their income the education of their children and the protection of their health. This economic program is fundamental and the great hope of the world that its basic importance will not be ignored is the growing strength of Russia. Russia has based its growth upon the Marxian proposition that economic development is basic to all human progress. There is no gainsaying this foundation of truth.

The difficulty with all of the small and so-called independent countries is that imperial commerce is so organized today as to make their self-support impossible. Not only are the colonies wretchedly poor, ignorant and diseased but the little nations resemble them. The mass of the people of the Balkans are poverty stricken. The central problem of Ethiopia, Haiti and Liberia is the tremendous difficulty of earning decent returns for their work and materials. If after this war tariffs walls are maintained and rebuilt; if trade is manipulated in favor of the great empires; if the currencies are at the mercy of vast banking monopolies; then we cannot attack povery. We will have no money for education. We will have continued disease, primarily in colonies and small countries but also as a corollary among the depressed classes of the leading countries of the world.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

I presume that what we should be thankful for is that Franklin D. Roosevelt did not die while Garner was vice-President. That would have been too awful to contemplate. What fills us with regret is that Henry Wallace was not continued as vice-President. What faces us is the fact of President Truman.

Franklin Roosevelt did three things: one the New Deal. Two, his emphasis of race relations and three, the war.

Of these three the New Deal was of the greatest importance. For the first time a political party in the United States took upon itself as a distinct duty to plan the increase of wage income at the expense of profits. Of course this attack upon profit has been going on in English-speaking countries ever since English enfranchisement in the early nineteenth century. But never before in America has the head of the state and a leader of a great party stated it as a clear aim; that wages must be increased and security of work and income guaranteed the laborer by open and determined effort to cut down the amount of wealth and income which has been going to capitalists and employers.

It is this phase of Roosevelt's career which made him one of the best hated men in America. There were certain kinds of business men and commercial organizations which never forgave this aspect of the New Deal. Indeed so strong and bitter was the opposition that in his third and fourth terms President Roosevelt retreated from his more advanced stand for economic reform but he nevertheless accomplished the curbing of credit organizations, the federal recognition of union labor and a complete reorganization of the Supreme Court which led it to give wide recognition to his fundamental philosophy.

With the regard to the race problem, Mr. Roosevelt not only followed the attitude of his predecessors toward the recognition of Jews and their problems but did it at a time when anti-Semitism was spreading in the world. Going beyond this he gave the American Negro a kind of recognition in political life which the Negro had never before received. Instead of appointing machine politicians to certain designated positions in his gift, he appointed a series of unusually well-trained advisers. To be sure men like Weaver and Hastie had little power beyond advice but they were men whose advice was of so high a calibre, it had to be listened to.

36-6-89

Beyond this Roosevelt took three steps: he extended international and customary courtesy toward the heads of three Negro states: Ethiopia, Liberia and Haiti. This had never happened before so openly and definitely. In addition to this he spoke out on the conditions in the South and frankly called the South our Number One economic problem.

Finally, he went almost beyond his authority to establish the FEPC as a record-breaking precedent, emphasizing the fact that the basis of the race problem in the South is poverty based on unemployment and low wage.

The third work of President Roosevelt was to put the United States in the second World War in alliance with Russia. This was a tremendous step. Without it Hitler would have conquered Europe and Japan would have conquered China. Europe under Hitler would have been a center of race hate and new slavery and the splendid economic planning of Germany would have been used to depress the workers of the world rather than solve our economic problems of the distribution of wealth. Japan would have spread in Asia an Asiatic version of capitalist domination. Hitler and Japan could not be overcome without the aid of Russia and in order to aid Russia, Roosevelt had virtually to recognize communism as at least a respectable and efficient form of government. This in itself was epoch-making.

The heir to this policy is President Truman. He started political life as a machine politician. He did not have the opportunity of liberal education and he was born in a former slave state. All this is against him but he deserves charity and sympathy for his tremendous task. He may do far better than his antecedents indicate.

It has just come to my attention that there is an African National Congress in South Africa and that it held an important meeting in December, 1943. This illustrates how little we know of activities in Africa and how hard it is to get news. No mention so far as I know was made of this meeting by cable or newspaper press. I first heard of it through a pamphlet which came by mail to Anson Phelps-Stokes and which he has kindly loaned me. It is entitled "Africans' Claims in South Africa" and is the second pamphlet of the Congress series.

It contains findings unanimously adopted at the Annual Conference of the African National Congress at Bloemfontein December 16, 1943. It says that the Prime Minister will represent the interests of the Union of South Africa at the Peace Conference but "We want the Government and the people of South Africa to know the full aspirations of the African peoples so that their point of view will also be presented at the Peace Conference. We want the Government of the United Nations to know and act in the light of our own interpretation of the 'Atlantic Charter' to which they are signatories. This is our way of conveying to them our undisputed claim to full citizenship. We desire them to realise once and for all that a just and permanent peace will be possible only if the claims of all classes, colours and races for sharing and for full participation in the educational, political and economic activities are granted and recognised. "

This declaration is signed by A. B. Xuma, President-General of the African National Congress and also by 27 members of the Committee.

Physicians, lawyers, teachers, civil servants, merchants, clergymen and editors. Dr. Xuma himself received the degree in Science and Medicine in the United States, and degrees in Surgery at Edinburgh and Glasgow and in Public Health in London.

30-6-43

The statement declares:

"Already according to press reports there seems to be differences of opinion as to the applicability of the 'Atlantic Charter' as between the President of the United States of America and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. It would appear that President F. D. Roosevelt wanted the Atlantic Charter to apply to the whole world while the Prime Minister, Mr. Winston Churchill, understood it to be intended for the white people in the occupied countries in Europe.

"In South Africa, Africans have no freedom of movement, no freedom of choice of employment, no right of choice of residence and no right of freedom to purchase land or fixed property from anyone and anywhere. Under the guise of segregation, they are subjected to serious educational, political and economic disabilities and discriminations which are the chief causes of their apparent slow progress.

"We urge that if fascism and fascist tendencies are to be uprooted from the face of the earth, andto open the way for peace, prosperity and racial good-will, the 'Atlantic Charter' must apply to the whole British Empire, the United States of America and to all the nations of the world and their subject peoples. And we urge that South Africa as a prelude to her participation at the Peace Conference in the final destruction of Nazism and Fascism in Europe, must grant the just claims of her non-European peoples to freedom, democracy and human decency,"

My dear Sir:

I could lecture in Salt Lake City Friday, May 25, unless there are unusual occurrences here which will keep me later than that. I do not think there will be.

I am writing directly to Dr. Horsfall and telling him of your proposal.

Very sincerely yours,

The political developments at the San Francisco Conference are of great and increasing interest. Three nations are in the fore front: Russia , Great Britain and the United States. Two nations are in the background: France and China. Yesterday on a critical vote France, China and Russia, in effect, lined up against Great Britain and the United States. I say, in effect, because what happened was France and China did not vote on the admission of Argentina to the United Nations, while Great Britain and the United States voted for it, and Russia against it. The significance of the vote however, lay in the fact that two great nations which were not colonial powers, were balanced against one colonial power and the United States, which is only incidentally a colonial power and not devoted to that way of life.

Of course, China does not yet count much but her possibilities are enormous. France is a colonial power, but a colonial power which according to present plans and to past promises, is leading toward real incorporation of colonials into the French state. Thus, we have forecast a future balance of power in the world which is set against colonialism.

On the other hand in this conference, the influence of Great Britain is tremendous and her collaboration with the United States to perfect. Stettinius and Eden are working hand in hand, which means at least the attempt to restore and maintain British colonialism with the help of the United States. There are, however, possible rifts in this alliance. South America is following closely the leadership of the United States but not toward colonialism. Formerly her industrial alliance with Great Britain was momentous but that has been partially broken. Industrial alliance with the United States will probably supersede it. In that case, however, the influence of America cannot long stand against colonial peoples. As China grows in power her influence will be against colonialism. And France cannot in the future be the same kindof colonial power that she has been in the past.

It was interesting yesterday to hear Molotov say frankly: "We all know that India is not an independent country but we all understand there is going to be a time when the voice of independent India is heard."

That is the reason that probably a clear pronouncement on colonialism will scarcely be reached at San Francisco; but nevertheless world opinion against colonialism will probably be given a strong push ahead. There are forces in the American delegation that would like to take a firm position concerning India, mandates and perhaps with regard to Africa. They may not become articulate and their accomplishment now may be small, but it will count for the future.

On the other hand there is a growing and powerful movement in San Francisco toward a Bill of Human Rights as part of the United Nations Charter. Another straw in the wind is the fact that the Balkan states, Czechoslovakia, Yogoslavia and Greece recently lined up with Russia against Great Britain and America and Belgium and New Zealand lurked in the background. There is hope in this for the future when democratic processes are going to apply to the 750 million dark people who today live in colonies.

I remember with great interest the Congress at Versailles which was the predecessor of the San Francisco Conference. At the Congress of Versailles the attendance of the public was limited even more than at San Francisco because, France was still under martial law. Indeed for a time President Wilson was not disposed to let the American Press be represented. At the last moment he relented before public opinion and sent a press boat with correspondents on which, by great good fortune, and to the displeasure of many Americans, I got passage.

Landing in Paris in December, 1918, I found mud and poverty and all the difficulties of a war-torn country which had lost a generation of its men. No other country suffered like France in the first World War.

My first effort was to see if I could not get the question of color and colonies before the Conference, as the prime cause of the war, and as the best peace insurance for the future. Immediately I met difficulties. But I went to members of the American Delegation. I was told frankly that under the circumstances no Pan-African Congress could be held and that there was no way to bring pressure. My Harvard schoolmate, Walter Lippman, was among those who emphasized this fact. So far as America was concerned I was stopped in my tracks.

Then I turned to France. I got introduced to Blaise Diagne, the tall black deputy from Senegal, who had just brought to France more than 100 thousand black Africans to help save the world. Diagne was interested. He said: "I will put the matter before Clemenceau, the Prime Minister." There was delay. Weeks went by; but at last Diagne called me in. "Clemenceau says 'yes'! Hold your Congress. Don't say anything about it but go ahead!' "

Having gotten my Congress, the question then came of getting someone to attend it. I wrote to England. The English Government refused visas even to white friends like John Harris, Secretary of the Aborigines Protection Society. I cabled to America. The Secretary of State informed inquirers that no Pan-African Congress would be held and refused visas. In fact, after scouring around the available world it looked for a while as though I was going to have a Congress without Congressmen.

But after all there were Negroes in Paris. There were some American soldiers. There were a number of workers in the YMCA and YWCA. There was a considerable number of French colonials. And so, by hook and crook, we got together in the Grand Hotel, near the Opera, a meeting of 20 or 30 persons, including representatives from the French colonial ministry; and we held our Congress.

What we did there had no effect upon the Congress of Versailles. I doubt if most of the delegates even heard of it. I talked with Colonel House, Wilson's particular friend, and he was sympathetic with much that I said; but in the end considerations of colonies and of colored peoples played practically no part in the Congress of Versailles, except as pawns to satisfy the greed of colonial powers.

This is one reason why there is a San Francisco Conference; why there followed the most devestating war humanity has ever known; and why the chief problem before San Francisco ought to be the future of the colonial system, and of colonial peoples.

The Bay Area around San Francisco is one of the most beautiful places of human habitation in the world. In a sense it reminds one of that great sweep around Naples as it used to be, with the fires and smoke of Vesuvius in the background. The geography is like the marvellous beautiful island of Skye in Northern Scotland, but there are few people at Skye. Perhaps, Tokyo and Yokahama have something similar, or did have before the terrible 29's.

I was talking with friends from the University of California last night and they spoke of the degrees conferred on Halifax, Eden, Soong and Smuts. It seems that a degree was also offered Molotov but he would not have it. He is said to have remarked that he could not receive such a degree because it belonged to a scientist or scholar and he was neither. If all men refused degrees that they did not deserve the number granted would be much smaller than at present. There is a certain lack of dignity in the way in which higher degrees are handed about in our day by great universities. There is something very like advertising in the process.

I do not know what the citations said in this case, but if I had been asked to write them I would have said something like this to Lord Halifax and Mr. Eden: "For keeping your mouths close shut on the matter of colonies and making it impossible for the world organization to take a single step forward." To General Smuts: For keeping Negroes in their places," and to Mr. Soong: "For saying nothing." In response they say Mr. Soong talked rather long, so long in fact that the reception which Mrs. Sproul prepared for the delegates went begging. They hurriedly rushed away, almost stepping on the students who mobbed them.

I do not think the occasion reflected that credit upon California and the world that it might have under other circumstances.

I can remember many cases of conferring degrees. Naturally, my strongest memory is when I got my Bachelor of Arts at Harvard. The Harvard ceremony is dignified and impressive, and was especially so under Charles William Eliot. Eliot sat in the center enthroned with heavy silk robe and beside him sat the Governor of Massachusetts and his staff in full uniform, reflecting the time when Harvard was a state institution. There were, as I remember, four commencement speakers, of which I was one, and with the characteristic impudence of my youth I had chosen the subject "Jefferson Davis". As I look back now the subject and the speaker must have been a matter of intense curiosity to that audience. At any rate I remember vividly that I had an exceedingly good time.

Fifty years later I received a doctorate in Human Letters at Wilberforce where the air, too, was electric. I talked "turkey" to an institution where I did my first teaching and for whose future development I have always had the liveliest hopes and the keenest disappointments. It was not a welcome speech. Several bishops did not shake hands with me and the State Board of Trustees forgot the traditional invitation to dinner. Nevertheless, again, rightly or wrongly, I felt the satisfaction of a job well done.

There are those who decry academic honors, and as I have intimated they have often been abused. In many countries scholarship is recognized with and without degrees. There have been professors at Cambridge and Oxford who have never taken a college degree. On the other hand, among our own institutions today there is stupid insistence upon degrees. A man with a doctorate, no matter how ignorant he may be, can always get the best of jobs. A man without a college degree is for many positions, practically never considered. Of course, obviously what must be done is to give degrees more sparingly and with more careful judgment of work actually accomplished. But always on work done, the things known, the knowledge digested, is the final criterion.

California is in many respects a curious and unpredictable land. It is a section where what one would call the lower middle class is dominant: people with small incomes, but incomes sufficient for pleasant living under normal circumstances, and in a land whose climate is as kind as this, and whose land is as fertile. But the income does not provide for savings. The schooling of the population is of elementary and high school grade which means that the mass of adults are a prey to "isms" and nostrums; nowhere in the United States, possibly, are there so many religions and cults.

This springs from a basic sincerity and curiosity but it has its dangers. There is all over California a fear of God, a suspicion against wealth and a hatred of poverty. The shoe pinches when competition over jobs comes to the fore. That was the basis of the prejudice against Chinese in the early days; it shows itself today in prejudice against Japanese, against "Oakies" and "Arkies"; and during this war time, against Negroes.

Despite this, the state is curiously cosmopolitan. In San Francisco the color line is noticed but infrequently. In Los Angeles it is more in evidence, but has none of the impudence of Atlanta or Birmingham.

The scenery of California is nothing less than magnificent. I went down from the Golden Gate to the City of the Angels on the Southern Pacific. There were fields of vegetables and more fields. Tunnels and sharp peaks, valleys, igneous rocks, missions and cattle; bits of the 18th century intruded upon the 20th. We swept around the vast and almost double horse-shoe curve, a little like Pennsylvania's but different as California is different. There came dark spiked peaks and rounded rolling peaks, green valleys, and Thallata! the sea, the old and everlasting sea!.

We passed vineyards and orange groves, roses and white cottages nestling low; heavy-laden trucks, eucalyptus trees; the dunes sank golden against dark green with white flashes of curling surf. Dry, forbidding wastes lay beside the way for a while and then came the stretch of calm and blue Pacific. We rise aloft and look down upon white unbounded waters with swell of billows and wreath of foam and purple bands of seaweed. The beauty of this sun-drenched sea is unearthly; a light house looms far and still further, Asia.

Central Avenue is still a center of colored Los Angeles; but South Harvard Boulevard is the most astounding of the new developments. It can be compared to upper Manhattan of colored New York; to certain parts of West Philadelphia; and to DuBois Avenue and surrounding developments in Richmond. But on the whole it is more beautiful and more completely a modern residential district of the well-to-do than any of these others.

I have seldom enjoyed more a little stay in quiet and flowers. How natural and American it is that this fine result of thrift and taste has not escaped the grit of restrictive covenants!.

We must increasingly turn our thought and organized resistance against these restrictive covenants. They are a determined effort on the part of organized prejudice to confine Negroes to slums, to steal their savings and indirectly to increase crime and ignorance. Thousands of them are being negotiated every year. People who never dreamed of race hate are being approached by plausible agitators who say, mysteriously: "How would you like to have a nigger buy the home next door? You've got to guard against it! Your property values will be ruined. Your savings will be lost." And so a covenant is signed and the Negro who wants to buy and live in a decent home finds himself paying for useless lawsuits. The technique applies often to Jews, Orientals, and Mexicans - and even to native Americans who can be herded in groups.

The final pattern at San Francisco looks to me like this: All questions directly effecting individual freedom are today matters of national action. When, therefore, the UNCIO declared itself in favor of human rights, without race discrimination the declaration had no practical significance since it was contradicted in the next paragraph by the assertion that the world organization could not interfere in domestic affairs.

Beyond this, the whole question of colonies was not only kept out of discussion by the foregoing declaration but the whole problem was clouded by an unreal discussion of trusteeships. Trusteeships would have to do with strategic areas and World War One mandates. The real milk of the cocoanut in the discussion at San Francisco was the matter of strategic areas, which boiled down to its bones meant that the United States proposes in her own right to police the Pacific bases with her right wing on Australia and using the Union of South Africa to protect her rear. In this way she proposes to keep the Asiatic peoples in their places. Great Britain is perfectly willing to permit this since it will strengthen the legality of her hold upon Hong Kong, Singapore and Borneo.

Moreover so far as mandates are concerned the conclusions of San Francisco permit the peace conference, if it wishes, to hand over the mandates established after the first World War to the mandatory powers as integral parts of their colonial territory. Thus, the United States with her territories and quasi-colonies in the Pacific under the guise of strategic areas, becomes one of the three colonial powers - Great Britain, France and the United States. It would have been possible, had the United States so willed it, that this nation with China and Russia could have had decisive voice in ruling the future world with three nations which did not depend upon the exploitation of colonies for their future development. That is, three nations whose prosperity was not going to be built upon illiteracy, cheap labor, disease and crime. This, the United States under the lead of Stettinius and Stassen refused to do. And since she now takes her place with the colonial powers and with increased colonialism, she faces the task of not only holding Asia in subjection, of helping in the continued suppression of India and Africa; but also in facing Russia with at least two great powers definitely and bitterly opposed to the Russian economic program.

There can be no doubt that organized business in the United States and Great Britain, and to some extent in France, not only fear communism, but are willing to organize to fight it. This is the meaning of the continual pinpricks at Russia at San Francisco! The petty dispute over the presiding officials at the conference; the lugging in of Poland, Austria and Trieste to divert and inflame public opinion; and the almost universal charge of American newspapers and magazines that Russia is petty, obstructionist, and dangerous to "free" enterprise. On the other hand, the one statesman at San Francisco who stood up for human rights and the emancipation of colonies was Molotov. His words have scarcely been reproduced.

Here, then, I seem to see outlined a third World War based on the suppression of Asia and the strangling of Russia. Perhaps I am wrong. God knows I hope I am.

I have just been talking to Dr. Emanuel Abraham, Director General of the Ministry of Education in the Kingdom of Ethopia. He was one of the seven delegates from Ethopia to the U N I C O. The delegation includes the Prime Minister, the vice Minister of Foreign Affairs, vice Minister of Justice, the Minister to the United States and his Secretary, Minister of Finance and Dr. Abraham. It seems on the whole a delegation of intelligence and insight.

Dr. Abraham and I talked about the relations of Ethopia with the Negroes in the United States; about education and the difficult period through which Ethopia is now passing; of the nations destroyed in the World War. Few lands have suffered more, both in physical destruction and spiritual upheaval than this ancient and notable country. Dr. Abraham stressed the fact that Ethopia will restore its schools gradually and that they hope to begin by 1946 to send students to England and America for study. He pointed out that French was no longer the leading foreign language of Ethopia but rather English, and therefore they were sending their young men and women for training in English-speaking countries.

The restoration of the schools is hindered by the need of teachers. He pointed out that Ethopia had tried to get American Negro teachers and other trained people but so far without conspicuous success. He reminded me of Dr. Bayen whom I knew; the young Ethopian trained in America and married to an American Negro woman, who did so much to spread the knowledge of Etnopia in America and the American Negro in Ethopia and then prematurely died. He pointed out that American Negroes who came to them were disappointed at the pioneer work which had to be done. I could see immediately what he meant. American Negroes are not pioneers. They have no idea of the tremendous task of opening up and restoring a country and setting it upon its feet. Their acquaintance with pioneer work had usually been in the Southern United States where the hand of death and cast repression have been such that the most enthusiastic pioneer had little chance of ultimate success. We have seen both brief and long continued work in certain southern communities. Sometimes successful as it is at Tuskegee; sometimes tragic failure as at a dozen forgotten places.

36-6-132

But Negroes must learn pioneering and learn it in the West Indies and South America and more especially in Africa. Few places in Africa present such possibilities as Ethopia. Its magnificent and startling terrain; its natural resources; its brave unconquered people, and the ideals of its future. It has been said that the nation which owns this little bit of Africa can control the continent, and this is still true. But it means hard work, cold and hunger, absence of modern city facilities; but all this not amid a hostile set of slave drivers as in our South, but in the midst of a great people who someday with proper leadership are going to make a new name in the world equal to that of their forebears 3,000 years ago when they led the world.

There have been some intimation in the Negro press that the Ethopian delegation was not cordial and did not want any connection with American Negroes, I do not believe this is true but the impression can easily arise through differences of habit and language. The educated Ethopians have not been brought up in American free and easy back-slapping and first-name-calling methods. They follow rather the French and European attitude. They thus may appear a bit formal and restrained. They have naturally some difficulties with the European languages both in understanding and expression. It is possible therefore that they resented the methods of American photographers, and for that they can't be blamed. The impudence of these artists at San Francisco in the midst of the most formal proceedings of the U N I C O was often disgusting. On the other hand in my knowledge of covering annumber of years, I have found nothing but courtesy, desire of understanding, and especially a willingness to cooperate with American Negroes. Naturally, like the Liberians and Haitians, they do not regard American Negroes the last word in civilization or manners. And they resent receiving unrequested advice from people who know nothing about their country, and often, care less.

W.E.B. DuBois

I have just returned from the celebration of the 55th Anniversary of my graduation from the Harvard University. Of the more than 300 members of that class 100 are still living and 25 sat down to our dinner. It was a peculiar experience as all these anniversary occasions have been. There was between us a certain close bond of personal knowledge extending over half a century in which we can see the ravages of time and trouble on our faces. Physically, the men on the whole looked healthy - none of them were fat. Only two were at all overweight.

But perhaps the most striking experience was the development of ideas, or rather the way in which I came closely in touch with the conservatism and even reaction which my class represents in America.

For instance, there was the matter of a scholarship named after our dead class secretary. The present secretary complained because the college wished to award the scholarship on the basis of high marks obtained. He, and I think the majority of the class, were distinctly in favor of a hereditary right to the scholarship, confining it to the family of the deceased, or descendants of our class.

Then there was Russia - I perhaps started the subject by speaking on the San Francisco Conference. It was concluded by a man who talked as though the Russians were dangerous and wild beasts, who however at present must be placated and pacified. No one said a word about the challenge which the Russian economic philosophy was offering to the world. Nobody contemplated any possible change of attitude in the American and British world.

Three songs were sung by the man who was formerly our leading songster. They echoed the late 19th century. It was first an Irish song, analogous to the darky stories with which Southerners always regale themselves; the Irish hero dressed gorgeously in a pink tie is knocked in the fight at "the Odd Fellows Hall." Then there was "Danny Deaver", picturing the stern and exact justice of English imperialism; and finally Mandalay. The class poet shouted out, "You know we have got it back again!" I wondered over that "we"! Did it mean the people of Burma or those of India? - Of course not - he meant the Anglomaniacs.

All was the feebly unconscious opinions of my friends - not enemies, of many who on the whole had a certain sympathy with my life work and who congratulated me on my new book, and looked forward to other meetings. And yet possibly few of them realised as I did the tremendous gap between our ideas; the way in which they still believe in a dying world and yet believe in it sincerely and with no understanding of those who believe that the economic organization of mankind is going through a definite revolution and that imperialism is dying - if not dead.

I was glad of this opportunity; and as a last memory I recall the remark of one of my classmates who is a Hampton Trustee: "We have got to have a white president at Hampton" he said, "there is so much white people can teach colored people." I did not remark, as perhaps Ishould have, "And there is so much that colored people can teach white people!" He would not have understood in the slightest degree what I meant; and yet he is really a good and sincere fellow.

Since leaving San Francisco I have traveled through nineteen states and made nine speeches chiefly on the San Francisco conference. This means that since the middle of April I have seen a large part of the United States leaving out the extreme northwest and southwest, northeast and southeast. On the whole my reactions have been favorable. Most of all because the colored people that I have seen and met seem alive to current conditions and also because comparing conditions over wide stretches of time I can see undoubted advancement. In nearly all cases the present situation of Negroes is aggravated by migration. This is an old difficulty and not a matter of race. Just as long as a country has backwaters of depression, of poverty and discrimination, the first result of intelligence and initiative is a movement away from these unfortunate centers.

The second result is the more or less sudden impact of a mass of unlettered and inexperienced people who have suffered misfortune and discrimination and who are blindly seeking better conditions. This means that the average social level of the invaded group is lowered by the invaders. In the nineteenth century this happened continually among the white people in the cities, when the Germans poured into the West and the Irish poured into the East, when fugitive Negroes poured into the middle states and into southern Ohio, Illinois and Indiana. It happened again after the first World war among both colored people and whites as poor whites and Negroes poured into the industrial opportunities offered by the North. It is happening today. On the West Coast in California, Oregon and Washington masses of new Negroes have come, as into Colorado and, of course, into Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit and Buffalo.

It always seems a tough break for a group of colored people who are achieving independence and intelligence suddenly to be called upon to face the social problem of ignorance and poverty which is not of their making. But it has been done and this time it seems to me that it is being done with much more intelligence and sacrifice than ever before.

I spoke in Denver to a number of organizations representing interracial efforts. They were for the most part white people of sympathy and intelligence. They asked searching questions. I spoke to the Department of Sociology in the University of Chicago to students of training and research and got similar reactions. Great mass meetings like that at the Pilgrim Baptist Church in Chicago were as responsive and intelligent as similar gatherings in San Francisco, Oakland and Los Angeles.

Then I changed the tempo and spoke at three schools: at commencement exercises of a branch of Virginia State College in Norfolk, at Virginia Union in Richmond. I like the way in which they listened to an unemotional and strictly logical development of my theme. In Atlanta and Montgomery I spoke to citizens and summer school students representing the far-south. White Atlanta had just received a blow between the eyes in the revelation of its color discrimination in education. White Alabama was groping in the old segregation pattern but more conscious than ever before of being on the defensive. The race problem in these states is critical and alive with uncertain solutions for the future but it is not the same race problem that I knew thirty or twenty years ago or even ten years ago. The advance of the American Negro is unquestionable. To illustrate this I have received the following letter from a white correspondent at a white university in Virginia:

> "When race questions are discussed here at college, I am lost in a sea of racial hatred and condemned for being 'radical'. Too radical - I have been told - to ever become a successful lawyer in the South. . . . Unfortunately, I am able to find no basis for optimism in regard to a more liberal attitude on the part of Southerners. As a Georgia, I hate to admit this and would like to have your opinion. Do you believe that there are many Southerners today who Accept the Negro and will help him gain the political, economic, and social rights that should be his?"

I append my answer: " . . . I believe there are many Southerners today "who accept the Negro and will help him gain the political, economic, and social rights that should be his" but I am sure that they still form a small minority of the intelligent and powerful South which is today in control and I know that if they stand by their convictions they are going to suffer for it. I do not consider John Temple Grave II nor Virginius Dabney nor Ralph McGill - these men are professional liberals but they are not willing to stand up for principles. Until the South gets and keeps at home a group willing to suffer for the right, it will never become a great section."

The resignation of Lester Walton, United States Minister to Liberia was probably forced and unavoidable. The tendency is for all colored groups unwittingly to follow the judgment of he white press concerning other colored groups. Thus it happens that educated West Africans have usually a certain contempt for American Negroes. Colored West Indians pity us and other colored groups in Asia and South America usually count us of small concern. This attitude, of course, changes as contact between these groups increase but it must change faster in the future.

Thus American Negroes have a long nurtured habit of criticizing Liberia and echoing more or less completely every nasty thing that has been said about Liberia in the last one hundred years and plenty has been said. There is no doubt that Liberia is not an ideal country; neither is Haiti, neither is China; neither is Burma. The reason for this is their poverty in the face of ruthless pressure on the part of imperial powers. These countries need all their strength for inner reform, education and upbuilding. But for a century and more their strength has not been sufficient to ward off every kind of attack, psychical and physical, which the civilized world has made upon them. Liberia today is in a difficult position but if she has a chance to fight her way through if she can count upon the sympathy of decent people. The United States Government represented on the one hand by investors in Firestone rubber and on the other hand by the navy is putting pressure upon Liberia which will, if they are not careful, reduce her either completely to colonial status or to the status of the un-free peoples of the world who are enslaved by foreign investors.

It has been the object of the Firestone Corporation to build up a white caste of colonial rulers who have their own housing, their own society and their own rates of wages. This is an imitation of English and Belgian colonial practice. But in Liberia its full realization has been stopped by the fact that the United States Minister representing the political power of American Negroes on the spot, has understood, in the case of Lester Walton, exactly what was taking place and has stood like a rock against race segregation and white rule in Liberia. This has been a bitter pill for Firestone and the navy. Roosevelt kept Walton in his job. Truman has let him go. Now comes the question as to what kind of a man is going to re-place Walton and how this man is going to see the sinister forces that are trying to throttle and colonize Liberia.

It is no answer to this threat to bandy about the old charge of exploitation of the natives by a Liberian élite. If everything alleged in these charges were true they would not be one-tenth as bad as the kind of exploitation against natives that is being carried on by whites all over Africa and all over Asia and in much of South America. That the attitude of ruling Liberia toward the peasantry is not ideal, there is no doubt and no one realizes this more than leading Liberians themselves. But there is no time for the social re-organization of a country when it is under fire and pressure by white slave drivers and this is exactly the position of Liberia. We need to watch the appointment and conduct of the new Liberian Minister with great care.

One of the most interesting and significant happenings in the line of interracial countesy between color groups was the celebration in New York of the one hundreth anniversay of the birth of Antonio Maceo. The Cuban Government went to the expense of printing in Spanish and English a beautiful memorial pamphlet and sent representatives to speak at the great meeting at Town Hall. Not nearly enough notice of this epoch-making event has been taken. It was a gesture of amity and appreciation from democratic Cuba to thirteen million American Negroes as well as to those of their compatriots who realize the significance of Spanish America.

The President of the United States made an astonishing statement July 20, 1945. He said, in Berlin, and at a time when England and Russia were in conference with him, the following words:

> "Let us not forget that we are fighting for peace and for the welfare of mankind. We are not fighting for conquest. There is not one piece of territory or one thing of a monetary nature that we want out of this war."

The curious query comes: did President Truman mean this, or did he fail to realize exactly what he was saying? We have reason to think that he meant it because he spoke tersely, and with deliberation, following a written manuscript.

We have equal reason to think he did not mean it because more time was taken up at San Francisco in arranging for United States ownership of Pacific islands than with any other single subject. We dominate now the Hawaiian Islands, Midway, Wake, Guam, the Marianas and the Marshall Islands. We have recently seized Okinawa and Iwo Jima. We fought for long months to dominate Guadacanal and others of the Solomon Islands. We have, of course, the Phillipines and we may seize Formosa.

In other words, we have outposts ranging over thousands of miles which can be turned into fortresses to dominate the Pacific Ocean, and enable us to point our guns toward the heart of Asia and the domination of the yellow race. The Charter adopted at San Francisco made definite and direct provision for our holding this territory, or a large part of it, without submitting to any international control, mandate or trustee system. The Senate sent a committee to San Francisco to see that this was done and to hold over the conference the threat of refusing to confirm the Charter unless it was done. It is well known that the Navy and also the Army, are determined in this way to make the United States the policeman of Asia.

There was practically no opposition to this from any nation of those assembled at San Francisco. The British were evidently all too glad to have the United States make this claim. Backing our claim they could reaffirm their right to numerous islands in the Pacific and to the fortresses of Hong Kong and Singapore; and above all, to the economic imperialism which domination of these and other points of vantage would restore to Great Britain. France, eager for the restoration of Indo-China was silent. Australia was delighted. South America said nothing, having had her mouth closed by yielding of the United States in the matter of Argentina.

All this, President Truman knows, and yet he says frankly and openly in a statement that we have no right yet to discredit: "There is not one piece of territory... that we want out of this war."

The time is coming, and it is not far away, when somebody has got to explain just where the United States stands in the matter of colonial imperialism. If the President means what he said in Berlin, he is in for a fight with reaction and Big Business that will make F. D. R. turn happily in his grave.

Let no American Negro doubt but that the overwhelming triumph of the Labor Party in Great Britain is a triumph for the progress of democracy everywhere. The object of the British Labor Party is Socialism. By Socialism we mean the intervention of the state into industry so as to control and, in part, to own capital and to plan and direct the industrial process in order that the object of industry will be not private profit but public welfare.

Socialism, in this sense, has been the object of all forward-looking statesmen and philanthropists for 150 years. It is still their object. They differ widely in the methods by which they think Socialism can be obtained. Communism believes that it can only be made certain by violent revolutions. The British Labor Party believes that it can gradually be brought to successful realization by democratic methods; by using the vote which they have so long misused and even neglected. They fought a battle of ballots this time on clear issues. The Labor Party believes in nationalizing coal and electricity; state ownership of the Bank of England; increased government security and government control over employment, housing and farming. The Conservatives under Churchill accepted the challenge and fought for what is often called "private initiative", and "keeping the government out of business". They would not go, of course, as far in this irrational program as the dominant powers of the United States have gone. The overwhelming triumph of the Labor Party means that in one of the greatest countries of the world the gradual realization of Socialism is going to be attempted.

This leaves only one reactionary country among the great powers. China, of course, under Chiang Kai-shek is only partially progressive. Russia heads the procession, now joined by England. Our America is the one great world power which is fighting for anarchy in industry and private monopoly and privilege for the benefit of the rich.

The whole trend of Europe is towards Socialism, but we must not preen ourselves too much upon this fact. The same was just as true after the first World War; but the collapse of industry, the great depression, not only halted this development but threw us back into the absolutism of Hitler and Mussolini. Today the world is pressing forward again; but it cannot forget that in the basic organization of industry lies the chance for real advance. So far the war in America, just as in the first World War, has made for vast accumulations of wealth and power in the hands of privileged persons; and stirred by this example we are trying again to return to "normalcy" and to make further fortunes out of the misfortunes of the mass of people. Here we are courting the worst of disasters.

We must remember that not only in England but in France, in Czechoslovakia, in the Balkan States and in Italy, we have this movement toward Socialism. It must come in the United States, if this country is going to continue to be a land of opportunity. It is not easy to think straight under these circumstances. One can be misled by the conviction that in violence alone lies salvation. Or on the other hand, with just as great tragedy, we can lazily conclude that if we do nothing and sit and look on, our salvation will come automatically. Neither attitude is sensible nor is indicated by the known facts. We have got to work hard for a new organization of industry and a new distribution of wealth. In no other way can real freedom come to the American people.

Every American Negro has been unhappy over the war with Japan because it is a war between nations of different colors, between Europe and Asia. And because we cannot help but believe that the fundamental impulse back of this war was, on the one hand, the century-old determination of Europe to dominate the yellow peoples for the benefit of the white; and on the other hand, the resentment of Asiatics at being considered and treated as inferior to Europeans.

This we see as the basic pattern; but it would not by any means excuse in our minds the unwise and ill-considered attack upon the United States at Pearl Harbor. That very act gave us pause. Many Negroes, many times, and in many places; have looked on revolt and war as the necessary and sole solution of race friction. The experience of Japan has proven two things: that domination of one people by other and selfish races, bad as it is, is no whit better than domination within a race by elements whose aims and ideals are anti-social.

So far as Japan was fighting against color caste, and striving against the domination of Asia by Europeans, she was absolutely right. But so far as she tried to substitute for European, an Asiatic caste system under a "superior" Japanese race; and for the domination and exploitation of the peasants of Asia by Japanese trusts and industrialists, she was offering Asia no acceptable exchange for Western exploitation.

Uneasy, therefore, as we have been about war between the United States and Japan, and about our having as colored people to fight colored people possibly only for the benefit of white people, we have this to remember and sustain us: we are facing the beginning of the end of European domination in Asia. The ideas which Japan started and did not carry through, are notdead, but growing. The utter smashing of the terrible Japanese machine by American technique is not an exhibition of race superiority of white over yellow: it is the overthrow of an economy and social tyrrany which had gripped a fine and progressive people by the throat, and which deserved to be overthrown.

Now comes the question, after the overthrow of the dominant powers in Japan, what have we to offer in its place? Here again we are puzzled and discouraged. It is outrageous to have at the head of our fighting forces a man like Halsay whose bitter contempt of colored people can hardly be restrained. He is not fighting a system - he is fighting and hating a colored race. How far does he represent America? Is there an America which can find itself in this struggle and demand for an emancipated Japanese people, freedom and equality, self-government and development, without slavery and without the contempt of white folk?

26-6-137

The recent declaration by the Allies of the terms offered Japan are reassuring. They are, complete disarmament; the deprivation of recent conquests; the installation of democratic methods in Japan's government; destruction of her war-making industry, but access to outside raw materials. Until a new order of peace and justice is established the Allies will occupy designated points in Japanese territory.

This last requirement is unfortunate and perhaps unnecessary. Whenever white troops are put in control in a colored country the results are notorious. It is to be hoped that this part of the Allied program will be sternly limited in space and time.

I have been trying ever since I returned from San Francisco to arrange for a Fifth Pan-African Congress. As yet I have had no success. The chief difficulty, however, is the matter of transportation. A few delegates from America could probably get the consent of the State Department and War Department to go to Europe, but with the stream of soldiers returning from the war in Europe, or enroute from Europe to the war in Asia, it is doubtful if we could get transportation back in any reasonable time.

But back of this difficulty, however, lies a more important one, and that is the question as to whether we American Negroes should help to organize a Pan-African Congress and what such a movement would have in view. I want, in several articles, to argue this matter, and first of all to recall certain efforts in the past.

In defense of this Congress I wrote a quarter of a century ago in the New York Age, in reply to criticisms:

> "The First Pan-African Congress, held while Paris was still under martial law and in face of the open opposition of many of the leading countries of the world, was attended by fifty-seven delegates, of whom sixteen were from the United States of America, thirteen from the French West Indies, fourteen from Africa and seven from Haiti. This Congress was unofficially recognized by many of the colonial powers. The French Colonial Office had an under secretary in constant attendance, as had also the American Peace Commission. Among the speakers were the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the French Chamber of Deputies; M. Van Overbergh of the Belgian Peace Commission; M. Freire d'Andrade, former Portugese Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Madame Jules Siegfried, President of the French National Association for the Rights of Women. Colonel Edward House of the American Peace Commission received the resolutions and petition adopted by the Congress and conferred in person with the secretary. The French Prime Minister, Georges Clemenceau, received the petition and conferred with the president of the Congress.

36-6-139

"Among the members were three colored members of the French Parliament; the President of Liberia and two senators; the ex-Mayor of Battersee, London; and Dr. George Jackson, for many years United States Counsul at La Rochelle, France. Professor Paul Otlet of Belgium known as the father of the League of Nations and Rene Claparede, a well-known Swiss philanthropist, were both interested in the Congress, and present in Paris, but could not stay until the actual session."

"..... How far the Negroes of Africa and of the world can be of service to Africa and themselves is a question, but certainly the first step toward finding out what they can do is for their men of light and leading to come together for mutual knowledge and conference. To throw up our hands in despair, to say that because Africa is partitioned among European powers, the West Indies held in economic serfdom, we must not even sit down and talk about them in a rational manner is an extraordinary dictum."

In this time of reconversion and readjustment may I suggest five points of guidance and orientation:

1. READING. In order to keep abreast with a rapidly changing and developing world it is necessary to adopt or readjust our habits of systematic reading. We should read (A) a local daily: not a reactionary sheet which deals in lies like the leading daily in Chicago; but something like the New York Times, the Louisville Courier-Journal, the Boston Christian Monitor. Avoid the Hearst press and the tabloids, except of course PM. (B) a Negro weekly; not the most sensational, but the most accurate with wide news coverage. (C) a national weekly, like the Nation, the New Republic, the New Masses; avoid the Reader's Digest like the measles; Time and News Week have predigested opinions for the weak-minded. Life is for those who like pictures and cannot read; Collier's is so-so; the woman's journals, hog-wash; the Saturday Evening Post is the Saturday Evening Post. (D) a monthly; they are few and mostly dull and bad. But they are inevitable. (E) Finally, books. If you are going to be educated and intelligent you must read books. Newspapers are necessary for news (and don't let gossipy, inaccurate and deliberately biased radio displace them). But newspapers, weeklies, magazines, all [illegible] echo books and at second hand. First-hand knowledge is collected and preserved in books. Book reviews guide but they are but samples and often poor samples of the real stuff. Radio commentators are of all sorts, mostly cheap and superficial. Conceive of an honest man deliberately mixing his news with an hair tonic, like Gabriel Heater! Books to be read properly must be owned: mulled at leisure, marked, dog-eared made intimate, personal. Free libraries have ruined our reading habits. If you have not read a book in the last year you are an ignorant person and your loud talk will deceive no one.

2. EDUCATION. Take in hand now and anew your own education and that of your children. Cut down the enormous and costly time spent at bridge, and give up one night a week to education pure and simple: mathematics, so as to stop feeling like a fool every time the conversation goes above ten; electricity so that radio, radar, atomic energy, begin to mean something real; history and the social sciences, so as to stop talking nonsense about what "never" took place; about what "human nature" can do about "races", "wars", ancient "worlds", "foreign nations; when in fact you have never read one reliable, authoratative treatise on any one of these subjects. Think of what the world has learned of chemistry, physics, psychology, health and a thousand things since that one little volume which you read twenty years ago and even then only half-understood. The education of Children is a serious study and not a way of getting them taken care of outside the home. The whole philosophy of the education of children and youth is being today overhauled root and branch. It is no longer an over-simplified matter of jim-crow schools, of industrial and higher training, of educating for a job or for culture. It is the infinitely vaster problem of how average humanity can be made intelligently informed and good enough so as to save civilization from suicide and make life worth living. What are you doing and thinking about it, beside buying the boy shoes and the girl books?

3. HOMES. WE NEED homes: not boxes, boarding-houses, lodging and places for receiving visitors; but organized and functioning centers of human culture, so planned and conducted as to be units of national life and developing civilization. This means marriage, children, clothes, furniture, play, meals, sleep, love and sacrifice and loyalty. Such things come from thought, work, devotion, reverence and ability. They are not the neglected weeds of cabarets, jitterbugging and drunkenness.

4. JOBS. These five, but the greatest of these is jobs; not jobs simply for the income they bring; not jobs for "busy work" so as to stop strikes and bolster profits; but jobs to permit and compel human beings to do their best as to ~~to~~ supply in the best way the highest and greatest needs of mankind. Such jobs call for long preparation: the planned and continuous supply of capital at the lowest cost; the skilled preparing of each job for each man, so that it will be efficient, safe, interesting, adequately paid life work. Preparing the man for the job; so he can do it well; so that he will love his work for the work's sake and accomplishment; so that he will be strong and well to do it. We do not want "free enterprise"; we want worthwhile endeavor for men who will find spiritual freedom in work.

Here then are five fundamental jobs for the day of reconversion from war to peace - from murder to life.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

Now that the Second World War has ended what have we Americans of Negro descent lost and gained? We may record five groups of losses:

1. War itself is always a loss which bears harvest among the segregated and the oppressed leaving a legacy of death and destruction which is almost incalculable.
2. We have suffered the tremendous disadvantage of a "jim crow" army and of segregation in army circles which will form and have formed a basis of similar segregation in civil life. This segregation is not simply separation of human beings in their ordinary life; in order to make segregation effective it has been found necessary to suppress ability and deny opportunity.
3. The defeat and humiliation of Japan marks the tragedy of the greatest colored nation which has risen to leadership in modern times. No matter how we explain and assess the damage, the result of thinking along the lines of race and color will affect human relations for many years and will excuse contempt and injustice toward colored skin. It will set back the time of the emancipation of the majority of people in the world.
4. If the military regimentation of living will retard civilization, it means the training of men through long and costly years for murder and destruction and then afterwards to use these same men and the same methods for cultural uplift. The whole proposal is impossible. It retards human culture; it places authority, obedience and submission in the place of freedom and ideals.
5. And finally, we have seen in this war, to our amazement and distress a marriage between science and destruction, a marriage such as we had never dreamed of before. We have always thought of science as the emancipator. We see it now as the enslaver of mankind.

We turn from this sad picture to six gains which have come out of war, not necessarily because of it, but in most cases despite the organized destruction:

1. The world of culture has been compelled to make a re-statement of democracy at a time in our development when we were beginning to distrust and ignore democracy. We have been compelled to come back to the basic idea that the government and direction of human beings must in the long run rest upon the wishes and the will of those who are governed and guided.

2. We have been compelled to admit Asia into the picture of future political and and democratic power. We can no longer regard Europe as the sole center of the world. The development of human beings in the future is going to depend largely upon what happens in Asia.

3. We have been compelled to admit China as a great power. When China was first attacked it was because of attack by Europe. When the attack continued it was through the acquiescence of Europe and America, and when finally against the will of the white world we were dragged into the great center of Asiatic war, we took up and exposed the cause of Chinese freedom and independence because we knew well that the Japanese cry of "Asia for the Asiatics" would be turned against us unless we helped China maintain her independence.

4. We have been compelled to recognize Russia as an equal country in spite of the fact that her economic organization is directly and categorically opposed to the profit making industrial organization of the Western world. And moreover because of the prominence given Russia today in this war, her backing of China and alliance with China means that China will not be at the sole direction of Western Europe. The dream of Europe as the profiteer of China and the controller of her destiny through its effort fall before the menace of Russia.

5. More specifically there can be no doubt but what India and the Dutch Netherlands and French Indo-China are going to in our day achieve something approaching autonomy in government.

6. And last there is upheaval in Pan Africa: among the people in Africa itself, north west and south; but also and just as significantly among the people of African descent in the Caribbean area, in South and Central America and in the United States of America. Here in the United States there has come because of the war an enlightenment among us, evidencing the power of united effort and determination to fight for freedom together with increasing knowledge of methods by which the fight may be carried on. And out of this has come a recognition of the importance of alliance in this fight, of alliance with all organizations of good will and more especially with the organizations of labor.

It cannot be said that, balancing these losses and gains, that the war has been either a vast success or a terrible failure. It can be said that civilization after this war has a chance to go forward and no group of civilized people have better opportunity to forward the advance of human culture than American Negroes.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

Speaking as I did last week of Pan Africa, let me remind my readers that this word was born in the twentieth century. You will not find it mentioned in dictionaries before 1900 and it did not come into general currency until about 1920. The reason for this is not difficult to see. In the last year of the nineteenth century a young West Indian barrister, Sylvester Williams, called a Pan African Conference in London. It was the first modern use of the world. The conference was small but interesting and composed chiefly of West Indians with a few American Negroes. The late Bishop Alexander Walters was elected permanent chairman and I was the secretary for America but no further effort took place for a generation. At the time of the Armistice after the First World War, I was instrumental in assemblying in Paris what was called the First Pan African Congress. It was composed of American Negroes, French Negroes, and West Indians with a few Africans. It planted the idea and helped establish the Mandates Commission.

Two years later in 1921 there assembled in London, Paris and Brussels in successive what may be regarded as the first real Pan African Congress. It was called the Second Pan African Congress. It had over one hundred and twelve paid members and one thousand or more interested auditors. Africa, itself, the United States and the West Indies were strongly represented and a permanent organization again attempt. This permanent organization centered in Paris went astray in attempting commercial enterprise and the Third Pan African Congress in 1923 merely marked time. Its meeting in London was small but that in Lisbon large and impressive.

From Lisbon I went to make my first visit to Africa. Between 1925 and 1927, we tried again to re-vivify the Pan African idea but we could do little more because of economic conditions and because of the distraction of the strong and growing Garvey Movement. There were likeness between Pan Africa and Garvey's idea but while Garvey tended toward commercial and political power, we were trying to stress cultural and economic development.

In 1927, we did assemble an important Pan African Congress, the fourth, in New York. But that was the last before the depression. We were not able to call other conferences as we had planned in the West Indies and in North Africa. Again for a generation the idea died but in 1944 and 1945 there has been revived the idea in an interesting and hopeful manner. While I and others were seeking to call a Pan African Congress from America, African labor delegates meeting in Great Britain united in such a call. As a result of this there will meet October fifteenth in London a Fifth Pan African Congress. It will be composed mainly of representatives from British Africa but back of it is still the idea of all Africa: French, Belgian and Portugues and of independent Africa: Ethiopia and Liberia.

It is hope that out of this London meeting there will be growing a real Pan African movement, a movement centered in the African continent and among native Africans, a movement which will seek and secure the cooperation of all people the world over of African descent, and of the friends of the oppressed everywhere. This can and will become, if properly guided, the real movement for the final emancipation of Africa and the introduction of the black world into the world of modern culture.

Recently, I have written in this column about the various Pan African Congresses which have been held between 1900 and 1927. Of all these, however, one and one alone deserves to be remembered as a real Congress, representing as never before the peoples of Africa and of African descent; and that was the second Pan African Congress held in Paris, London and Brussells in 1921. It met in London August 28th and 29th, in Brussells August 31st, September 1st and 2nd, and in Paris September 5th and 6th. One Hundred thirteen accredited delegates were present from 26 different groups; and there were at least one thousand visitors. From Africa itself came 41 delegates representing the Belgian Congo, Sierre Leone, Abyssinia, Angola, Morrocco, Madagascar, Nigeria, East Africa, Liberia, French Senegal and the Gold Coast; from the United States there were 35 delegates; from the West Indies 7 delegates and from Europe 27. In addition, there were three from India.

The London meetings were held in Central Hall opposite Westminister Abbey, August 28 and 29. They were preceeded by two preliminary conferences: one with the International Department of the English Labor Party, where the question of the relation of white and colored labor was discussed; the other was held with the Aborigines Protection Society. Sir Sidney Olivier presided and a dozen or more members of their governing body were present. The general relation of white philanthropy and the educated Negro leaders was the principal subject of discussion here.

There were four regular sessions of the London Conference attended by audiences varying from one hundred to three hundred persons. A series of resolutions were unanimously adopted. After an interval of one day the Congress reassembled at the Palais Mondial, Brussells, Belgium, where sessions were held August 31 and September 2nd and 3rd. These sessions were presided over by Blaise Diagne, French Deputy from Senegal and president of the Congress. Among those in attendance were two generals, two representatives from the Belgium Colonial Office, a large number of students from the International University, numbers of Congo natives and representatives of the Portuguese and French Colonies in addition to the group of thirty-five American delegates. A special visit was made to the Congo museum and an illustrated lecture on Abyssinia was given. The Congress was entertained socially at the Hotel de Ville and at the home of General Sorelas. The London resolutions were discussed but postponed for adoption at the Paris meeting on account of much excited opposition in Belgium to our bold demands.

After another interval of one day the Congress reassembled for its final session in Paris, September 5 and 6th. Here the French colonies were more largely represented than the former congresses. Four sessions were held. Much time was taken in threshing out the French version of the resolutions which were finally agreed to and adopted unanimously in practically the same form as adopted in London. There was much debate and discussion as to the relation of France to the Negro and as to the future of Africa. The Congress went in a body to the Arc de Triomphe and deposited a wreath upon the grave of the Unknown Soldier.

I have made a miracle, I have done the impossible, for today all things are possible.

Do you remember when music in the air was a fairy tale of imagination? Today we turn a button and the Ninth Symphony rolls down upon our ears! Do you recall when the voice heard round the world, even in the strong throat of William Jennings Bryan lost him the presidency because it could be heard less than a mile? Today we talk to China. Once we declared Mass was Energy but alchemy foolishness. Today at Hiroshima we transmute the world.

It was but yesterday when flying was for birds and angels, yet today I flew the Atlantic. What was superman for Lindbergh, I did as a passing chore.

It was not a large plane, nor impressive. We taxied a mile churning up the Sound to mist. We rose above the jagged cream cliffs of Manhattan. Gaily we sailed over sprawling New England and the brown bits that were Boston. Then shooting above the clouds, for hours we rode on a carpet-like filmy cotton fleece. We dropped on a cold Newfoundland town and I drank apricot brandy. We climbed to twenty thousand feet and streaked on long low level flight. Night fell in the afternoon. The Aurora Borealis flared in the North, back of the Great Bear. On the right hung a half moon.

Most of the time we rode steadily on even keel with the low thrill of the engine; but at times the ship realised itself, shook, swayed, trembled and dipped, to prove that it yet owned its own soul and was not wholly thrall to machine. Darkness and fog envoloped us, but on and on and ever on we flew. I fell into troubled sleep; but suddenly, the sun came up like thunder and we dropped on the Green Island and the River Shannon. We dined in London.

Nothing is impossible. One of these mornings we will breakfast in New York, lunch on the moon, and after dinner shake hands with God.

Surely this new ease and swiftness of travel makes a meeting of the Sixth Pan African Congress in Liberia in 1947, a simple and feasable matter. There need be no difficulty of time or transport. Only the human soul now lags behind Possibility: can Liberia venture to face the imperial powers with a vast world demonstration of the might and unity of the black race and its final challenge to colonialism?

At the Pan African Congress sitting in Manchester the West Indians had their day to complain of treatment and conditions. There were representatives of many of the islands, from Jamaica to British Guiana but no spokesman for Cuba, Haiti and the French islands.

Attention of the Congress was called to the fact that there were three million people in the West Indies compoed of Negroes, East Indians, Chinese and other races.

36-6-114

The history of the West Indies is the history of the empire "of sugar by sugar for sugar". Other crops are important but sugar is still dominant. George Padmore pointed out that the West Indies were so prosperous in the eighteenth century that France swopped Canada for Guadeloupe and Great Britain was willing to give up the North American colonies in order to hold the richer West Indies.

Delegates then went on to tell of local conditions, it was in part, a replica of the African tale of low wages, wretched housing, poor health conditions and political repression. No literature which the British Governor does not want the British people to read can be admitted. The local press is sternly gagged.

Taxation falls on the poor in Jamaica. Before the war seventy-five per cent of tax income came from indirect imports laid upon poor consumers. The great landholders were lightly taxed.

In most of the islands the land is monopolized, few peasants own land in Trinidad and when the Governor tells them to go back to the land, he is pushing them toward semi-slavery.

In all the colonies while the price of living is practically double, during the war wages have risen seldom more than fifty per cent. Education is usually confined to the well-to-do, especially in secondary schools. It was this condition that brought the West Indian Revolution of 1937. Butler led a strike in Trinidad with riots, Bustamente led the strikers in Jamaica and Payne in Barbados. They were punished with imprisonment but in the end changes came, the rights and suffering of the workers had to be recognized in some respects.

The political constitution of Jamaica was liberalized and today they are beginning a vital experiment in democratic government. In other islands more persons were admitted to the ballot. Trade Unions have grown and strengthened and the color line in many of the islands between the blacks and mulattoes has begun to disappear. Nevertheless, the people are still suffering from poverty and ill health. They are demanding federation of the various British islands in order to cut down expenses and increase cooperative social services.

One delegate referred to the two "M. G's" - Marcus Garvey and Mahatma Gandhi. It was interesting to have the widow of Marcus Garvey present making a moving plea for the black women of Jamaica. Jamaica has a rate of illegitimacy over seventy per cent but Mrs. Garvey laid this to poverty, the low legal age of consent and the custom of apprenticing girls to employers.

I visited yesterday H. G. Wells. I have known him many years. Once he attended a session of the Pan African Congress in London; once he called on me in my office at 69 Fifth Avenue, New York. In 1936, Ruth Fisher of the Library of Congress and I lunched with him and his secretary at his Regent Park residence in London and he invited me down to his country home.

H. G. Wells has always been interested in human beings; he has been a life-long socialist, and keenly sensitive not simply to the suffering of the working masses of England, but to the analogous degradation of the suppressed peoples and "lower" races. It was Wells who called race prejudice, the worst evil of modern civilization. He is best know to the public by his scientific romances, as illustrated by his story of the invasion of Earth by the inhabitants of Mars. It was a realistic recital of this that shot Orson Wells into national notoriety, when people thought that his radio script was reality. H. G. Wells has been a great student of biology, especially the human species, and has used his knowledge and art in this line for the uplift of man.

And so on this visit to London, I made my pilgrimage to this great artist and champion of man. His secretary wrote that he would be glad to see me, but that he was a sick man and my visit must be short. For years he has been suffering from diabetes and has done much lately to use his wealth for the free distribution to the poor of the new means of alleviating this disease.

I rode from my temporary office near Euston Street where Mr. Rogers of the colored Red Cross club has kindly placed his hospitality at my service up to Regent Park, the largest in London, where once wealth and fashion centered under George IV. Here in Hanover Terrace, where I well remembered coming before, was the modest row of yellow homes where Mr. Wells still lived. They were scarred by war, and nearby whole mansions were in ruins. I was taken up to Mr. Wells room; a small den, filled to the ceiling with books. He was sitting in an arm chair, close to a small open log fire. He looked sick, old and shrunken; but he arose and greeted me. The maid brought in tea and left us alone while I served. He took hot milk and buttered toast, while I took tea, toast and biscuits. We sat and talked leisurely; he looked over the Evening Standard; and we sat silent at times. In word and silence we saw the world: the extraordinary developments of the day when both our lives had been culminating. He expressed his dismay and apprehension and too his clinging hope; he had faith that the Labor Party would hold together and get on with its job. He asked about American Negroes. I did not stay long. He thanked me for coming. I went out and the nurse came in. The end of man is always sad. But the shadow which hovers about a great genius is ultimate tragedy.

I have just had a talk with Harold Laski. When, in 1923, I was searching for headliners to speak at the third Pan African Congress in London, Laski and the then Sir Sidney Olivier helped me out of a rather deep hole. Laski, especially, made a very excellent speech. He was then lecturer at the University of London and had formerly taught at both Harvard and Yale. I met him and his wife afterwards in his home. Harold Laski has recently been thrown into world prominance by Winston Churchill's inconsiderate attack upon him in the late elections. Laski is a devoute socialist and he stated his position clearly: he wants not simply "gradualness" but a Socialist State. He said this as Chairman of the triumphant Socialist Party and Churchill made the mistake of thinking that he could successfully use this to beat Labour. He failed.

Laski is a slim, youngish-looking man, with slightly greying hair, intense and energetic. I waited for him in his room at the London School of Economics, a small, bare, poorly-lighted and poorly-heated place. He hurried in with apologies and explained that he had been applying at the American Embassy for permission to travel to the United States and had been finger-printed!

We talked first about the recent expulsion of a student from one of the new hostels for African students established in London. There has been some difficulty about these hostels, because the students, instead of being becomingly docile and appreciative, have been belligerent and radical. During the war one hostel was closed because the students insisted on listening to Lord Haw Haw. Laski said that the case of this student, who had been unjustly removed by the Warden, had kept him awake all night and that he was going to see that the Colonial Office re-instated the boy and made the Warden apoligise.

This, of course, brought us to the "problem". Laski said frankly that he felt this kind of oppression because he was a Jew. Then we turned to America, and he asked if the Myrdal study was still regarded as authoritative. I told him that it certainly was, but I also remarked that it was not exactly popular, especially in those quarters where it had been hoped to get a statement from a foreign scholar stressing the ultimate impossibility of Negro equality.

Then Laski brought up the case of the young Jamaican Negro, Lewis, who had been appointed lecturer in the London School of Economics and would, if he stayed, eventually become the first Negro professor in an English university. Lewis, he said, was a brilliant scholar, and even the conservative Colonial Secret ry had had to consent to his appointment. We then discussed the Colonial Office, composed, as Lewis had said when he was working there, of two parties: one who wanted nothing done; the other which wanted to do something but did not believe they could. Laski quoted Jeremy Bentham as saying that in such matters time was never ripe and never would be. We talked about the program of the Labour Party and he expressed his satisfaction that his service as chairman would be over in May. Then he had to hurry to his classes. My half hour was an interesting glimpse from within of the British problems of colour and class.

Lately in London I faced twenty-two newspaper men and women and talked of Africa and the peoples of African descent. We met just off Charing Cross, not far from Trafalgar Square. The writers represented Europe, Asia and Africa. There was the Faily Mail and other London papers; the Tass agency of the Soviet Union, Reuters, the Indian Press and the press of West Africa. Sylvia Pankhurst was there and Robert Broadhurst who helped me in the Second Pan African Congress.

I talked of my various early approaches to the solution of the Negro problem, leading to the Atlanta Studies and the NAACP. Then I sketched the Pan African Congresses and dwelt on the Fifth just finished in Manchester.

They asked questions: What would be the next step? How would we try to implement our speeches and resolutions? What form would the permanent organization take? And (this from India) did I think it possible for the colored peoples of the world to gain their freedom without fighting the whites?

I replied that the first reliance of the Pan African movement was upon wide publicity on the exact nature of the grievances of colonies and groups of oppressed peoples. I pointed out how American Negroes used to be slandered and their complaints cavalierly dismissed, until we gathered such a body of unanswerable fact that the nation began to realize our condition and what it meant. I reminded them that, to cable companies, Africa today was not "news"; and how difficult it is to have its just complaints aired or understood. I instanced the indefensible exploitation of the West African cocoa farmers which was reported to our Congress and which the Colonial Secretary of the new Labor Government refused a hearing. I outlined our plans for national groups of students and correspondents who by interchange of data would keep our various groups acquainted with conditions over Pan Africa. The representative of the South African press asked if we contemplated establishing cable companies, and when I said no, he wondered if our distribution of news would be effective; a woman asked if the news thus gathered would not tend to be propaganda and biased rather than fact. It certainly would, I answered, but now the propaganda was all anti-Negro; our reports would at least restore the balance and in the long run the truth would emerge. To the Indian I answered: fifty years ago I would have agreed that only force and force to the uttermost would bring the white world to its senses and free the world of color. Since I had lived through two of the most awful wars in human history; and looking at the results, I doubted if force in itself could settle anything. It was doubtful if in two World Wars, which had suffered most, the victors or the vanquished. After all only the chastened human spirit could bring freedom and democracy to the world.

The contrasts of this Christmas-Tide are alarming. In England my hostess came to me of a Sunday morning with one egg in a cup and beaming gave it to me for breakfast. Perhaps it wasn't the only egg in the house but there were three robust children and her husband and herself and I know perfectly well there weren't enough eggs to go around. I come back to America and find Tiffany advertising lovely cocktail watches for $3,225. Then I know that between these extreme out from either end stretch tragedy, luxury and pain in unending vista.

We, colored people in the United States, are torn so completely by contradictory emotions and reactions that we do not know whether to laugh or scream. The number of happenings which record triumph and crossing of the color line have been in the last year extraordinary. Never before in modern civilization have so many men of Negro descent worn the insignia of military and naval officers; never before has Negro art and literature been able to record so many solid accomplishments; never in American history has it been so impossible to survey any field of accomplishment and leave out the work of the Negro race in political position, among the trades unions, the accumulation of wealth, in the number of students in college. We have forged forward not only in the United States but in the West Indies and in West and South Africa.

But when with joyful faces we turn from this, we turn to a world still persisting in the discrimination which we know all too well: the war has not ended and it is continuing with the great democracies fighting to suppress self-rule among colord people directly or indirectly. The specious gifts of self-government in Jamaica as well as in Nigeria are elaborate and subtle lies. The color line not only exists in our armed forces, it is going to be projected into the draft after this war and continue to be indefinitely the pattern of American life. President Truman has not only refused to fight for a permanent FEPC, he has deliberately sabotaged what little we had accomplished toward it. In Washington the South is in the saddle by the grace of the Republican North and the new Republican platform foredasts in the middlewest has no single crumb of comfort for Negroes. Unemployment is on the horizon. Unless something miraculous happens it is bound to increase, and unemployment means unemployment for Negroes first of all. The ghost of this disaster sits upon the horizon. Moreover, with all our accomplishment and organization there is no real accomplishment toward inner organization within this group destined and calculated to use democratic methods for economic and social salvation. We are still pleading against discrimination; we still hesitate at self-help.

Wherefore, our Christmas trees must burn brightly and then dim and die, our joy must be edged with endless sorrow and apprehension. Our holiday time must be, as for years and decades it has been, a time of apprehension and fear.

Men do not cease work because all is well. Before the shadow or wrath of defeat they do not stop fighting. Grim men and determined men begin at that time really to organize and assess their forces. As compared with 1845, the day of triumph of Negro slavery; and 1745, when England was making the slavetrade the first step toward triumphant capitalism; as compared with those days, this is a morning when the sunlight is streaming from the East and I mean the East: China and India and Indonesia.

Nothing gives one greater courage than looking forward in the past; that is, carefully examining the present and then comparing it with what actually happened in years gone by. Today, for instance, what could be more exciting than to think of the situation of the American Negro at Christmas time 1845? This was the year in which Frederick Douglass published his autobiography, that thin little book of one hundred and twenty-five pages, which Wendell Phillips read with amazement and begged Douglass not to publish; because he knew that if this book came out Douglass was in danger of being returned to slavery. But Douglass published it and then escaped to England to become one of the great reasons why the British Empire did not eventually recognize the Confederacy and enable it to become a great slave-holding country.

It was in 1845 that the conspiracy to dismember Mexico and bring Texas into the Union culminated. Thousands of slaves had been smuggled into Texas. It was calculated that Texas would make four states and with this additional representation in Congress, the South could hold the Union as a slave compact. It was difficult, of course, to goad Mexico into war, but President Polk knew how to do it. He declared early in 1846 "that a state of war already existed because of Mexico's actions". Word was given for the Pacific fleet to seize California. The United States demanded more than one half of Mexico and the whole West was now safe for slavery. The North which for ten years had been listening to the abolitionists with distaste now began to see the light. Meetings were called; some proposed that Canada be annexed to the United States so as to balance the insurgent South. Congress appropriated money for war and the South was jubilant.

Suppose someone at Christmas 1845, had stood up and prophesized, and said that the three million American Negroes of 1845 would be fourteen million in 1945; in the meantime they would have so reenforced the revolt of the abolitionists that the nation had to listen; that they had furnished two hundred thousand soldiers in the Civil War who turned the tide in favor of the North; that from an illiteracy which was over ninety per cent they had come to a place where certainly two-thirds, if not three-fourths, could read and write; that they had tens of thousands of college graduates with diplomas from every institution in the land; that they were not only able to stand up and talk and fight for themselves but impartial scientific study conducted by experts from abroad admitted that their integration into the citizenry of the United States was a matter of ethical right and not of biological scission. If he had made such a prophecy, and if intuitively the world had known the prophecy was true, perhaps the Civil War would not have been necessary to make it come true. In the same way today looking forward from a basis of fact, we have a right to assume that in 2045 there will be no second class citizens composed of the descendants of Negro slaves in the United States.

This will not mean, or at least let us hope that it will not mean, that dark faces will have disappeared. As a sheer matter of taste, dark skins are worthy of preservation. But beyond that and beyond loose talk about race and blood there are certain cultural values which may be preserved for the next century. Everything that prejudice and social tension has brought out in the human soul and made a part of world experience may be preserved if we take the best of its results. There will remain then, I trust in 2045 a fine Negro American culture, a group effort in art and literature, in education and social cooperation, rich enough to teach the third millenium the beginning of a real and universal civilization, to lead such movement not in all but in many essential directions; and to make men proud that they share the cultural heritage which gave birth to such movement.

THE PARADOX OF ENGLAND

I think most people who read English history are a bit mystified at its contradictions. On the one hand modern history writes England down as the nation that abolished slavery and for a hundred years or more led a world crusade against human bondage. On the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the British Empire was the chief instrument for establishing slavery in ~~the United States~~ America and making it a great modern institution which became the foundation of capitalistic enterprise in the nineteenth century.

How does one reconcile these contradictions? It is not easy because so little careful study has been given the subject by those willing to face the facts. British and American historians want to write the history of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries without emphasizing slavery or the Negro. They treat these subjects, if they touch them at all, as large incidental, slurring over the slavetrade and emphasizing the philanthropy of emancipation. This is not only historically wrong but it spoils the picture; it makes it impossible to realize what the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries did to Africa.

Wealth in the shape of gold and silver poured into Spain in the sixteenth century and enriched and in a sense ruined the nobility. It was used chiefly for increasing consumption, luxury and conspicuous expenditure. But this wealth attracted the British in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries because England was then a comparatively poor country becoming property conscious. The British became gradually a strong naval power; they were the traders of the sea. By force, piracy and bare-faced theft they preyed upon Spanish wealth. Then as the Latin American colonies began to demand labor for the sugar plantations, England in the eighteenth century became the world's slavetrader. She developed the trade in human flesh between Africa and America to an extent never dreamed of before and never equalled since. She not only filled the Spanish and Portuguese demands for slaves but she literally forced black slaves on her own colonies.

Then came a change in the British organization of life. During the last half of the eighteenth century India began to pour a stream of wealth into England and this wealth went not so much to the former aristocracy as to the new merchants and the new merchants were religious and ethical people as compared with the England of Charles II. They saved and invested their money and believed in life, liberty and property. They had a chance for investment because tobacco, sugar and eventually cotton became great commodities in trade. The new capitalism was built upon this saving and investment arising from slavery and new crops in wide demand.

When to this was added the new inventions of the era of the Industrial Revolution full-fledged capitalism was developed in modern Europe. This meant that it was possible to make more money, larger profit on colonial development rather than on plantation development. The slave trade and slavery in America ceased to pay as much as colonial exploitation in Asia and Africa. Those who could transfer, read their investments; those who could not were ruined. The abolition of the slave trade was really an attempt to boost the price of labor in order to keep hold of the investment in sugar plantations. It failed because of the Napoleonic wars as well as for other reasons; so that colonial empire became the field for nineteenth century and twentieth century capitalism and the plantation slave economy of the West Indies fell in ruins.

British emancipation was, therefore, a transfer of capital to more profitable fields aided by philanthropy but not caused by philanthropy.

The death of Countee Cullen at the early age of forty-two is an irreparable loss to American Negro literature. He had a precious and individual gift of expression. He was a master of language and his life with its sorrow and bitter disappointment gave a certain fine fullness of experience which he began to develop as a school boy. His career was never completed. In a sense it was halted in mid-flight and becomes at once inspiration and warning to the American Negro group. First inspiration: the group needs expression. Its development toward self-revelation may become one of the greatest gifts of any group of people to modern civilization. The burning experience through which it has come is unique and precious. No one else can give voice and body to it but Negroes. It is sheer nonsense to put before Negro writers the ideal of being just writers and not Negroes. There is no such possibility. Englishmen are not just writers and not Englishmen. Englishmen are English from birth to death and in that fact lies most of the value of their contribution. The ideal of pure art divorced from actual life is nothing but an ideal and of questionable value in any day or time. Least of all is it of value today when the whirling tragedy, bitterness, blood and sweat of our intricate and puzzling life on this earth calls and even shrieks for that knowledge of each other's soul which only the soul itself in its own individual experience can furnish.

The opportunity then for literary expression upon which American Negroes have so often turned their backs is their opportunity and not their handicap. That Countee Cullen was born with the twentieth century as a black boy to live in Harlem was a priceless experience. It had no counterpart in Athens of the second century before Christ or in Rome of the fifth century after. Not even the crooked developments of the Middle Ages presented the same facets of suffering and inspiration and certainly nothing before in American history was like this tremendous development in Harlem.

Yet, as I have said, Cullen's career was not finished. It did not culminate. It laid fine, beautiful foundation but the shape of the building never emerged. In part this may have been the result of his troubled life but we American Negroes ourselves are partly to blame. We did not give him the encouragement that might have led him to make literature a career instead of an avocation. We were laggard and stingy in our praise even of his finest flights which moved us in spite of ourselves. We sat back with the assumed omniscience of critics and tried to tell a master what he should say and how he should say it. Even when he sings such perfect words as these:

36-7-123

"Inscrutable His ways are, and immune
To catechism by a mind too strewn
With petty cares to slightly understand
What awful brain compels His awful hand.
Yet do I marvel at this curious thing:
To make a poet black, and bid him sing!"

I do not know just what we can do to cure ourselves of carlessness toward the most precious things we have created in America: our poets and painters, our men who have sought knowledge and not wealth; but certainly we must do something. That we starved Richard Brown; that we crucified C. H. Turner; that we lost Henry Tanner is a terrible price to pay for carelessness and neglect. What we need is not flowers upon a bier or belated appreciation, but a sort of united determined effort to make such requiem as this unnecessary and untrue:

"These straining eyes, clairvoyant then,
Shall probe beneath the calloused husk
That hides the better selves of men.
And as my day throbs into dusk,
This heart the world has made to bleed,
While all its red stream deathward flows,
Shall comprehend just why the seed
Must agonize to be the rose."

This is the day when every intelligent Negro should take a firm stand and have a clear outlook toward the strike situation. There is still among us, especially among the educated classes, a current of opposition to strikes and even to trade unions. This has come down to us from the day when every prosperous American expected to be a millionaire and looked upon every poor worker as essentially shiftless and unprogressive. We ought by this time to see clearly that all people cannot be rich; that the ideal of civilization is not waste and luxury but simple living on an income sufficient for health, security and enjoyment of the reasonable gifts of life.

Today with the help of science there is no reason why the majority and the vast majority of human beings should not be able to accomplish this in return for an amount of work and effort well within the ability of all normal men.

Yet what we see is in most of the world a poverty among the masses so terrible as to be almost inconceivable. Even in a country like the United States, rich in resources and abounding in human ability, the majority of the working families are not receiving today an income which allows them to live in health and decency and to rear and educate a family. The reason for this is that a large proportion of the income, material and spiritual, which the workers of America make go to a small part of the population which does not need it and does not use it. There has been no successful refutation of the statement by Lundberg in America's 60 Families "that fewer than twenty per cent of the people possess nearly everything while eighty per cent own practically nothing."

From time to time the workingmen of the United States who do the hardest toil and get the least for it have rebelled against this situation. Their instrument of rebellion has been the strike. At first the strikers were held up to the nation as criminals and were beaten and jailed by the police. They formed protective unions. The unions were partially outlawed and suffered from the fact that they did not include all the workers. One group especially, the Negroes, were widely excluded. They were brought in as strike breakers, accepting, as they had to, low wages and they broke strike after strike particularly the great steel and stockyard strikes of 1919 to 1922.

Today, however, they start anew with strong unions and intelligent demands. The Negroes are included in nearly all the unions except the machinists and the railway unions. They ask for a share in the tremendous profits of the war which went to the steel makers, the automobile makers and the electrical cooperations. The corporations have replied through General Motors with an astonishing argument and that is: that if capitalists work together for production and the capitalists make a fortune while the laborers hardly keep alive, the question of higher wages for the laborer has nothing to do with the swollen profits of the capitalists. This is an astonishing and cynical argument.

Every American Negro ought to stand back of the strikers, give them their support and sympathy and recognize that if we are going to have peace on earth, democracy and a decent standard of living, the reactionary leaders of organized industry have got to be beaten in this series of strikes.

One of the great services that Tuskegee Institute is giving the world is its care for Negro children suffering from infantile paralysis. During the year 1944 there were nineteen thousand new cases of this terrible disease in the United States. How many of these victims were Negroes we do not know but it is safe to assume that nearly two thousand must have been. Some of these found beds in regular hospitals but most of those in the South had no hospitalization except at Tuskegee. Tuskegee treated thirty of these children in 1941, fifty-seven in 1942, forty-eight in 1943 and thirty-six in 1944 or one hundred and seventy-one in all.

Tuskegee Center is on a smaller scale the same kind of institution as the Georgia Spring Foundation ninety miles away. The two are the only ones in the country devoted to the one disease of poliomyelitis. The National Foundation founded by Franklin Delano Roosevelt made its first grant to Tuskegee only a year after its incorporation. Tuskegee was chosen because of its average low humidity, its mild winters and temperate climate. There is no other complete hospital for the care of Negro crippled children in the area from Nashville to New Orleans and from Atlanta to Jacksonville. The center was dedicated January 15, 1941 and the first patient, a nine year old boy from Thomasville, Georgia was admitted February 19. Dr. John W. Chenault is at the head of the center assisted by seven nurses and a physical therapist. Dr. Patterson of Tuskegee has said "The unit was not built with the idea of reaching all Negro patients, but to be a center for training doctors, nurses and physical therapists and for studying unusual cases. It is taking some patients, and will take more. But the greatest good will come through the kind of cases successfully treated and the enriching experience afforded Negro doctors, among whom there are at present dangerously few orthopedic surgeons."

The center is housed near the graveyard where Booker T. Washington and George Washington Carver are buried and is a part of the John A. Andrews Memorial Hospital. Patients have come to this center not only from Alabama but as far north as New York and as far west as Oklahoma. More than half are from Alabama and Georgia. A two weeks institute on the care of infantile paralysis was held in June in which the teaching staff of Georgia Warm Springs Foundation participated and there were in attendance six doctors, sixteen public health nurses and six institutional nurses and ten private nurses. A part of the training of student nurses in the regular Institute nursing school is spent in this center. Already plans for enlarging the center have been made. The present building is three stories, fire proof brick, with a sound proof lobby. Entering are the doctor's office to the right and the secretary's to the left and beyond six rooms, three on each side, dedicated to three purposes: first the plaster room where the castes are made; then the head nurse's office, then a recreation room which is a school room with books, pictures and curtains donated by the Phi Delta Kappa Sorrority. On the other side are the laboratory, nurses lounge and the brace shops where appliances are fitted. In the basement reached by electric elevator are the gymnasium, baths and machines for massage. At one end is the green tile treatment pool with a capacity of twenty thousand gallons maintained at a temperature of 92°. On the top floor are six rooms with hospital beds. Each day while under treatment the children go to school and each day at meals they chant the old grace which Fisk University has used for seventy-five years

"God is Grace, and God is good
And we thank Thee for this food
Bow our heads, must all be fed
Give us, Lord, our daily bread."

I am celebrating Negro History Week this year by an attempt to re-write the history of the Negro race. For something over a hundred years there has been a determined attempt to segregate the history of Africa and Africans from the history of the world. One would think that Africa and its peoples could be entirely cut out of universal history without disturbing to any extent the flow of the development of men. There is nothing more untrue than this assumption and nothing that leads to greater mis-direction of thought within and without the Negro world. I am, therefore, writing a book called "The World and Africa" which will be published this year and which will tell the history of Africa as a part of the history of the world and interpret the history of the world as depending to a large and important degree upon developments in Africa.

One has but to mention events in African history to make it perfectly clear that this thesis is true. For five thousand years before Christ the history of Africa was the history of the world. So true was it that world history centered in the Valley of the Nile; that both Greece and Rome sat at the feet of Egypt to learn human culture. When in western Asia the great empires began to expand, they were held in check by Africa and their triumph depended upon their domination of Africa. The glory that was Greece found its final culmination when the Greek empire established Alexandria with the greatest library of the world. The duel between Europe and Africa which we know as the Punic Wars was a turning point in world history. We are less familiar with the empire of the Monomatapa and the way in which its trade reached to India and China and sent a black and curly haired Budha from the Indian Ocean to the Pacific. The Crusades found black men ruling in Egypt and the consequent renaissance came to Europe through Africa. The Negro empires in North Africa in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries equalled in civilization the culture of England and Germany.

The transformation of the world which we know as the Industrial Revolution started with the upheaval of black slaves in America, culminated first in the French Revolution and finally in the revolution which through the slave trade made England mistress of the seas. Modern capitalism is the child of African labor. The striving for African colonies, their materials and cheap labor caused the first World War, and the second World War was caused by the strife within countries to see what group could dominate the wealth which the colonies of Asia and Africa were still pouring into Europe.

The future of the world and the future of democracy depends upon Africa and Asia more than on any other part of the world. The twentieth century spells the end of European domination of the world through the manipulation of the Color Line.

This is the line of thought which I am contributing to Negro History week in 1946.

Carnegie Hall stands out in my memory and experience. Once before the First World War, the then radical Stephen S. Wise, had me come from Atlanta to this Hall which his congregation filled and speak on the Negro problem. It was a brave stand to furnish a forum for such a problem in those days. How many waves of bitterness have passed over our heads since that time. I saw Stephen Wise last in San Francisco fighting for Jewish freedom.

It was at Carnegie Hall during the first world War that I introduced to his last audience Theodore Roosevelt. I have seen in this hall audiences listening to Roland Hayes and refusing to leave until he gave encore after encore, until the last and infinitely beautiful strain of that prayer to Manon held thousands breathless. I have seen Marian Anderson staged like a fold of velvet upon that platform before audiences that quivered.

Yet in many ways what I saw at Carnegie Hall last night was unique and prophetic. It was a plea for a race but that race was the Jews in the rendition of Granick's Warsaw Ghetto set to music by Morgenstern. But this concert was not merely a plea for race tolerance. It was a great deal more than this. It was the American Youth Orchestra composed of musicians without reference to race and color. A black girl with a violin sat in front far to the left. Dark men played brass and wind instruments but above all guiding this whole orchestra of hundreds of instruments was a young handsome black man, Dean Dixon, who seemed to hold their thoughts and hearts in absolute control. One could see what the race-hating South was losing in trying to develop art and excluding a third of its population and by far the most talented third. One laughs at Virginia with its state theater for whites only.

There was a splendid baritone voice interpreting Khrennikov's music from "Much Ado About Nothing" and above all there was the Rachmaninoff concerto with a Scandinavian woman at the piano who looked like Brunhilda. All this was more than racial. It was human and universal. It was an appeal to mankind none the less beautiful because of its throb of sorrow. To all this was added a "Danse Calinda" written by a Negro sailor who had jim-crowed his way through war for democracy.

If any one could conceive a more paradoxical contribution to the happiness of mankind, I cannot conceive what it would be.

It has often been said that art is the clear, straight path to democracy and while I have continually doubted this I have wanted this to be true. Certainly as I look back upon our path in this land I can see nothing that has guided us more consistently toward freedom and accomplishment than our literature and music, our sculpture and painting, our drama. Our political efforts despite our triumphs have failed us; our economic emancipation has hardly more than begun; our physical revolt died a-borning. But our art forms have not only made America, they are an integral part of the Twentieth Century.

It would be interesting to have Mr. Atlee, Mr. Stalin and Mr. Truman talk with us and each other frankly at a Town Hall Meeting about democracy. I should not care to have them discuss it theoretically. I know now what each would say. But I should like to hear from them what they consider that their respective countries have contributed to democracy in the post war period.

Mr. Atlee could say, but I think he would not, that his contribution had consisted in keeping tight hold of India, helping the Dutch re-conquer Indonesia and holding back the EAM of Greece so as to allow the Anglo-Saxon King George to re-gain his lost throne. Also incidentally he might mention oil in Iran overflowing into Palestine and likely to drown the Jews, and little armies in China, Burma, Syria and other parts of the world. All this he could mention but I do not think he would. He would probably confine himself to stressing the nationalization of the Bank of England and the British coal mines. This would be something but it would not be much.

Mr. Truman might bring to our attention the fact that the United States Senate not only could not decide about race discrimination in employment in the United States but even was not allowed to vote upon it; that under the leadership of two disreputable politicians hailing from the poorest and most ignorant and most fascist-minded state in the Union and casting only a handful of purchased votes, the Senate of the United States was not allowed even to consider the FEPC; that the full employment bill was hamstrung; that the power of the House of Representatives has been used to pass a bill designed to stop the man who is not receiving decent wages from quitting his job. Mr. Truman might mention these things but I presume he would not. I presume he would talk about private initiative, the American way of life and our splendid record in the World War and how we are to make the world behave itself by secretly manufacturing atom bombs. Here again I would not be impressed.

On the other hand I am pressed, and tremendously impressed, with what Mr. Stalin said the other day. I am not interested in theoretical arguments for and against Communism but I do like to have a man stand up and talk straight. Mr. Stalin said and I believe he was stating the exact truth that the late war "arose in reality as the inevitable result of the development of the world economic and political forces on the basis of monopoly capitalism." He showed that Czarist Russia produced four million tons of steel and twenty-nine million tons of coal in 1913; that Bolshevik Russia in 1940 made eighteen million tons of steel and one hundred and sixty-six million tons of coal. Then he said that he proposed within the next five years that Russia should produce sixty million tons of steel and five hundred million tons of coal. Now this is something tremendous and it is especially impressive when you remember that despite the greatest war effort that any nation has made, Russia has kept her schools going while in the United States a city like St. Louis admits that one-half the children in her elementary schools are not learning to read and write and this means two-thirds of the colored children. It also means that what is true of St. Louis is practically true of the whole country.

We can add this to what Mr. Stalin said: that while here in the United States millions of workers, black and white, are declaring with frantic insistence that they are not getting enough to eat and that the employers have during the war made more profits than they can spend. While we have, during this wild and awful war, stood together in battle we have moved farther apart in group hatred based on color, creed and nationality.

It seems to me that what the people of America and England have got to take to heart is this: no matter what they profess in democracy or human uplift, it is what they do that counts. Stalin declares that the peoples of Russia today form one united community "Living in one common collective, they fought together for the strengthening of the might of our country. Together they found and shed their blood at the fronts for the sake of the freedom and greatness of our motherland." Can England and America say as much? If they can not, it is not Communism that we need fear, it is ourselves.

The first meeting of the United Nations Organization was not as successful as many of us hoped and not the failure that some feared. On the great movements which would make for peace and democracy, the UNO stalled and contradicted itself. Russia alone stood for the withdrawal of British troops from interference with the government of Greece; for the defense of independence in Indonesia; and for the withdrawal of British and French troops from the Middle East. Also Russia was the only voice to speak up plainly and clearly for the colonies and immediate trusteeships. The United States under the leadership of Stettinius simply scurred around and said "me too" to everything that Britain proposed.

Vishinsky's logic was unanswerable. He said to England: either Greece has the government which she wants, in which case she does not need your troops; or she has a government which she does not want, in which case your troops have no business there forcing it on her. The only answer which the blustering bully, who today represents the British Foreign Office, had to offer was an ill-mannered "liar". The accusation of deliberate interference by Great Britain in Indonesia to deprive them of freedom and democracy was just as unanswerable and unanswered.

The situation in the Middle East both among Jews and Pan Arabs was left in the air where it started; and in the case of colonies there was not only the usual British impasse on most colonial questions, but in addition to that the United States is determined to hog the whole Pacific and police Asia in order to guard American and British investments which they fondly hope China will furnish in the future.

Nor is this the worst of it: in spite of the fight which Russia, almost alone, made for freedom and democracy, the so-called free press of America succeeded, as usual, in utterly distorting the picture; in painting Russia as obstructionist; white-washing the British Empire and adding a few gratuitous lies about compulsory migration of Germans and interference with the present Papal Consistory.

To cap the climax instead of getting down on his knees and apologizing to Russia, as Stettinius ought to in order to atone in some slight way for the blunder at San Francisco, the Argentine was not mentioned except in general complaint because it is doing today exactly what it has been doing since 1939. The guilt of Argentina was known at San Francisco. Molotov begged the nations there not to rush in accepting Aregentina as a member. Stettinius led the nations in jamming the acceptance through and the American press led the chorus which charged Russia again with obstruction. Today the world sees the needless blunder which it made then and is stupidly seeking a way out without war.

When I was in Harvard College near the end of the nineteenth century, Frank Taussig, the great American economist, was still giving his course on "The Wages Fund". This was the Ricardian doctrine already under severe criticism; but having for him and others a certain dialetical interest, he laid its elements before us: from the income due to industry the cost of the material used must first be subtracted and then the profit due to capital. Unless capital got this profit there would be no capital; there would no incentive to save; no incentive to refrain from immediate consumption. After these two costs were subtracted what was left was called "The Wages Fund". It was small, predetermined and could not be increased because of the two first demands made upon income. Consequently the Ricardians of the late nineteenth century could prove without shadow of doubt the useless ness of labor unions and the futility of strikes. The wages fund was fixed and within its limits men must live and reproduce the species. The more children, the larger the families, the less the income. On this irrefutable fact the Malthusian theory was built and emphasized.

Is it not clear today that we are silently reverting to a new statement of this doctrine? Did not Reuther put his hand upon the present difficulty in the beginning of the automobile strike? He demanded higher wages at the expense of lower profit. He virtually denied that profits were fixed and that the amount of capital depended upon high profit. He knew, as we all know, that the owners of capital cannot consume it; they cannot eat more than three meals a day; extravagant homes, yachts and retinues of servants ~~do not~~ still keep capital lying idle in vast quantities and willing to take low profit and even none at all. This labor unions maintains that profit in the war period had been abnormal even fantastic; that they could be greatly reduced and wages increased without increasing the price of products.

The truth of this assertion is not easily adduced because we have no public record of profits. Wages are known; profits are secret. The owners of property can be concealed. It is for this reason that we have such difficulty equitably to assess taxes according to ability to pay. We can always soak the poor but we do not know exactly who the rich are or how much wealth they have. In our blundering to find out, we may do grave injustice to many persons; but of the injustice to the poor there can be no question. Many persons like the editors of the New York Times and commentators like Raymond Gramm Swing simply accept the dictum without question: that profits are normally low so that a transfer of profits to wages is impossible without higher prices to the consumer.

On the other hand, may it not be perfectly true that not only profits are high but too high for healthy industry. We must include here under profits many sources of income which are concealed, which are put down under high salaries and bonuses to managers, under reserve funds and especially under rent. It can easily be true, and there is little doubt but that it is true, that as compared with the wages paid the worker, the income given middle men and entrepreneurs, investors and managers and particularly owners of property is so large that it makes wages correspondingly low and that consequently the wage earner is unable to buy the consumers goods which industry is pouring out. Nothing illustrates this more than the automobile industry. There is a vast demand for small, cheap durable and efficient cars. Considering the size of the country, the need for travel, the obsolescence of the present cars, new good cars could literally be sold by the million. But who is going to buy them? The great demand is not for luxury limosines but for cars within the budget limit of the workingman. If now the profit upon the making of the cars is going to be so large and the rents for homes so high and the payment for skilled management so fantastic that wages must be kept low that homes cannot be built and owned, that sufficient good food cannot be purchased, what money is going to be left to buy an automobile? Manifestly imbalance, something that the nineteenth century could not conceive of; something that has already played hell with the industrial organization of the twentieth century and bids fair to invite a collapse within the next generation as disastrous as that in the thirties.

It is not only possible, it is reasonable that a reduction of rents and profits accompanied by an increase in the wages of labor would result in an increase in production because of increased demand for goods and services. The savings arising from inventions and the techniques of mass production instead of going as they do today almost entirely to capital and property could go largely, if not mainly, to labor and result in a higher standard of living.

The speech of Winston Churchill was one of the most discouraging occurrences of modern times. Here is a statesman who has been on the wrong side of practically every great social question in our day: a determined imperialist, an opponent of woman suffrage, against the striving for independent free states and bitterly against Russia. The organization called the British Empire, of which he is one of the worst and most determined representatives, has been one of the chief causes of two world wars which have nearly overthrown civilization.

At a time when it is possible by re-organizing the outlook of Great Britain toward democracy and race tolerance this man proposes to the United States that we should help to restore that empire, help to insure its investments, help to perpetuate its hold upon colonial peoples. Bevin, Mr. Churchill's stooge, has declared that the British Empire ought to persist because it represents free peoples. Mr. Churchill made a plea for free peoples in his speech. And yet the free peoples in the British Empire consist of fifty million Britishers, nine million in Canada, seven million in Australia, one and a half million in New Zealand and two million in South Africa. These seventy-eight million people are ruling over four hundred million colored people who have no voice in their government and are used for the support and luxury of the whites. If this is what it means to be free, God save freedom.

The American people are now asked to bolster and restore this empire which for one hundred and fifty years has treated America with every kind of contempt except when it wanted something. I trust that the result of this outrageous appeal made with the assent, nod and smile of the President of the United States, will bring the Middlewest to its senses, will disrupt the unholy alliance between the farmers and big business and show the farmer that big busine s is perfectly willing to throw the world again into war and destruction if the resulting profit is large enough. That, on the other hand, Great Britain has nothing for the American farmer and laborer except to repudiate imperialism, to free her colonies and honestly to embrace democracy. The present labor government is pledged to socialism, the same socialism which is the basis of the Soviet Union and it envisages the ownership of the mass of industrial capital by the state and planned economic life.

We shall see whether Churchill's pronouncements are accepted by the Atlee government just as his program of foreign affairs has been swallowed hook, line and sinker. If it is, and if in addition to this, the American people, or any considerable part of them, are beguiled by this siren song of British aristocracy then we must know that there is no hope for modern civilization; that it is going to plunge itself into war after war; it is going to kill off its youth, sterilize its literature and art and go down to hell to the beat of drums and display of military pageantry.

WINDS OF TIMES
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

There are certain patterns about race riots which the public forgets. There is always wide publicity about actual occurrences like at Columbia, Tennessee and more or less successful attempt to punish at least some of the perpetrators. But of the events, and especially the economic events, preceding and following the riots there is apt to be little knowledge and less action.

I know this part of Tennessee fairly well. As a student at Fisk I was less than fifty miles from Columbia and I taught a country school near Lebanon not seventy-five miles away. This is a part of the upper South which is becoming industrialized and the patterns follows certain well-known outlines: poor white population eager for decent paying work, a smaller Negro population equally eager. There would be none or few labor unions. The whites would secure the better paid work in local factories; the Negroes would get jobs at less pay and their lower pay would threaten the wage standards of whites. There would be little intercourse, understanding and much less friendship between these two classes. The merchant class would prey upon both and the capitalists own the factories, the surrounding farms and the rental housing. The political power of the Negro would be very small because unorganized and the officials would all be white serving and catering to a white constituency. There would be a nucleus of colored people with some education, a number of them owning their homes; a small number running businesses and a few professional men. It is to the interest of the owners of capital both to encourage and discourage race friction: to encourage economic rivalry so as to keep down wages and keep out labor unions; to discourage any outbreak that would destroy capital or drive away workers.

Then comes the riot nearly always comparatively trivial and vague in its causes. Whatever punishment may be secured after long effort is not very important because the actual perpetrators are those who have allowed racial friction to grow. They are the editors of local newspapers, the preachers in white churches who have kept still, the employers of labor who have said nothing and yet encouraged race f eling. During the riot there is not only the flare-up but always the systematic disarming of the Negroes, the jailing and perhaps killing of numbers of innocent people and then the setting of the armed police belonging to the city, county or state upon the Negro community to loot and hurt and shoot the Negroes. The looting is apt to be systematic. Many of the poor whites take this opportunity to steal from the Negroes whose economic prosperity they have envied and to ruin Negro business.

After the riot comes however the much more important social events. For a gen ration or longer Columbia is going to be known to every Negro in this part of the South as the pl ce where a riot and lyching occurred. They are going to avoid it. Those colored people who are able, some quickly and some slowly, will migrate from Columbia. They will go first to Nashville. If they have a little property they will sell it or give it away. The lower strata of loafers and ne'er-do-wells will probably stay. They will be offered high wages to induce them to w ork because the better workers will leave. Those who do migrate and have lost their property are the real victims of the riot. For them there ought to be a rehabilitation fund: they ought to receive reimbursement for their lost homes and above all they should be given economic opportunity. The Negro community where they go should regard them quietly as first line fighters, veterans returned from the front to find well-paid work and welcome.

Usually of course nothing of this sort occurs. From the earning of a decent living with a little home and social and church surroundings, they suddenly find themselves poor, in a strange moisy and hostile environment, with little chance to work and no place to live. Some of them inevitably sink into idleness and crime; some become sick and insane. They are a burden upon Chicago, upon Detroit, upon Indianapolis. Their children in school are retarded or indifferent. They swell the burden of the Negro community which is striving desperately to rise. They receive little sympathy.

Here is where real social work and uplift ought to come. A community like this which has gone mad and committed a terrible social crime ought to be a subject of continued study and the victims reimbursed to the first and second generation and given opportunity to live again. Why would not something of this sort be the peculiar chance of the Negro church?

America was built on Africa. From being a mere stopping place between Europe and Asia or a chance treasure house of gold, America became through African labor the center of the sugar empire and the cotton kingdom and an integral part of the world industry and trade which caused the Industrial Revolution and the reign of capitalism. Through the nineteenth century America on its black labor grew in wealth and importance. It became the greatest experiment in modern democracy embracing eventually not simply the white but the black worker and today not only is the Negro an important part of American labor and Negro art integral to the art of the United States, but beyond this the trade of America is built in large degree upon the products raised by Africans and their children the world over.

What now is America? It is a great working nation, vast, marvelously organized and rich. We grow and mine materials; we process and manufacture it; we trade it, we transport it, we buy and sell it. Bound up with this not only is there the planning of this work but the hard digging, lifting and cleaning and the services of parents and friends, professional men and servants. With all this we produce goods and homes, buildings and roads, light and heat, tools and machines and all manner of transport from railways and automobiles to airplanes.

But of course the basic question here is for whom all this work is done? How are the goods and services divided? Here we realize that all the facts are not known in America just as they are partially unknown in other parts of the world. The distribution of wealth and human service is a more or less closely guarded secret. We have some general ideas which are disconcerting: we know that the lowest and hardest work and the work least honored is despite its necessity the lowest paid. We know that men do not get rich according to ability or according to the degree in which they serve the the public. There is something, of course, of recognition of talent but it is not sufficient to keep down dissatisfaction, and the demand of the twentieth century in America just as the demand of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in Europe is that the distribution of wealth be more logical and ethical.

Men have tried to think that the distribution of goods and services was a matter of natural law. We know better than that today; we know that especially in America planning does go on on wide scale and that it is personal and based on will and not on democratic methods. Great groups have power to plan industry and division of wealth: groups carrying on organized industry like General Motors and General electric and the British Unilevers; these groups own machines and material and inventions which enable them to reap large profit by marevelous and striking organization. Imports and exports depend upon the decisions of captains of industry. Monopoly of natural resources play a tremendous part and the ownership of land. The economic rent that comes with time and growth of population, the shores of the ocean, the places suited for business and pleasure, all are controlled and distributed by men. We know that the control of credit, the foreseeing of need for materials and machines and the supplying of it by those who can use it most profitably is in itself a field of tremendous planning and prophecy. We know that the government must come in and help this planning and make it efficient, not only by carrying mail and transporting goods, but by settling disputes and administering government and policing the land.

What now are the results of this planning and why do these results make Americans dissatisfied? We still have poverty; not nearly as much as many other parts of the world, but on the other hand most Americans do not receive an income large enough to allow them to live in health and decency. This leads not only to envy but to cheating and stealing, to the kind of struggles which begin as race riots and end as organized strikes. It leads to widespread gambling so that horse racing is one of our greatest businesses. It leads to the postponing of marriage and the limiting of children.

This poverty makes for ignorance; not simply illiteracy which is still serious among us, but for inexperience, the neglect of the lessons of history, selfish prejudices and conventions. Poverty leads to disease; it lets us spend more for war than for the perfectly possible extirpation of tuberculosis and lessening of cancer and for the physical welfare of children. Poverty, ignorance and disease are back of most of our crime and to this is added a curious lack of ethical guidance. The church tends to teach dogma rather than emphasis on right and wrong and the funny strips exalt and sneer at suffering.

In addition to all this comes the reign of luxury, conspicuous expenditure; the use of diamonds and furs, great estates and servants while round about is sickness, starvation, insanity. We grow used to a luxury and display that we know is built upon wealth and work taken from suffering mankind. We demand profit for investment even at the expense of public welfare. The great business organizations of the United States drove a hard bargain in blood to increase their profits during the last war; America invests in colonies, British, Dutch and French; and colonies are slums used for profit on cheap labor. We continually set before us the successful rich man as more typical of what America means than the student or the philanthropist.

It is this kind of thing which makes for our continued slavery. We demand Freedom, but thousands upon thousands are toiling discontentedly at work which they hate when more careful and thoughtful planning could make work much more agreeable and more efficiently distributed. We curb thought and discussion because we are afraid that those who are powerful and comfortable under present conditions may be disturbed in their present control of the world. We distort news and prostitute the newspapers to the ownership of those who use them for profit. Science is becoming increasingly not the work of free universities but the property of organizations for private profit and directed to their objects. Education both in school and out is encouraging that economic illiteracy which keeps the mass of American people from knowing and inquirying just how the work of the world is done. To the support of all this comes the theatre and the movies and other forms of art, serving the idea that private profit rather than social welfare is the end and aim of man.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

Is there any wonder that the result is widespread fear? We are afraid of unemployment and loss of work; we are suspicious of other men, other races and other nations, not because we are the poorest and most wretched but because here in America we have tasted the possibility of comfort and happiness. Perhaps all this is best shown by certain paradoxes in our daily life, thought and action. We Americans boast and strut when we have every cause to be meek and humble. We seek happiness and escape through drunkenness and night clubs. We couple our religion with hate, saying "God so loved the world" and boasting how much we hate our enemies; we turn the other cheek to make bombs. We want peace and make war. We want Truth and curb research. We want wealth and condone legal stealing.

We Americans have invented an apt phrase to enrich the English language. So what! It expresses a singular complex. A great statesman comes from Britain and tells us that he wants a world of free states and democracy and admits at the same time that among the vast majority of the British Empire there is no freedom and no democracy. So what? We see standing before the United Nations at San Francisco a prime minister asking for a recognition of humanity and in the same voice telling the world that anyone who regards the natives of South Africa as human in the same sense as white folk is "mad, quite mad". We have a Secretary of State arraigning Russia for lack of democracy while he represents South Carolina where the majority of the people have never had a chance to vote. So what?

But perhaps our greatest contradiction and paradox comes in our attitude toward servants. We know that personal services between mother and child, friend and relative, is the highest form of human effort but we treat that same personal service when it is done for pay as the lowest form of work, paid least and subject to personal insult. The subtle and complete contradiction here involved is our most frightful paradox.

What can we do about all this? It is not a matter of law, it is a matter of the human heart. We know what must be done: industry must be carried on not for private profit but for public welfare; we must progressively approach the time when no person shall have cake while any person has no bread. We must increase production and income by the use of the great natural powers which science has placed in our hands: electricity which is being kept from the masses by organized effort in the Valley of the Missouri and in the Valley of the St. Lawrence just as once monopoly fought in vain in the Valley of the Tennessee and still fights at Boulder Dam. We know that automobiles could be built to last ten years at little greater cost than those which last two years, if the object was transportation and not gain. We must have schools that teach truth despite what some are afraid to know. We must use the radio for real information and not for quack advertising and the cinema for instruction as well as entertainment. We must have a press that is free and not monopolized by business. We must have socialized medicine following the great example being set today by Britain and go beyond it as we ought to.

I have just been attending a conference which marks the new day at Lincoln University under the Negro President, Horace Mann Bond. Lincoln University has always been a strong factor in Negro education and has graduated some splendid and influential men. But in the few remarks which I made as consultant I said "I must say frankly that I have never liked Lincoln University nor the Presbyterian Church." I then explained that my dislike was based upon the fact that this dogmatic and often reactionary church had for years refused to put a colored man on the faculty of Lincoln University and in this attitude they were supported by a considerable number of Lincoln graduates. Such splendid men as Francis and Archibald Grimke, who would have been ornaments to any faculty, fought in vain and against their own fellow alumni to make the faculty of Lincoln University bi-racial. Francis Grimke wrote to Dean Johnson of Lincoln in 1916: "Do you realize the fact that it is the only university in the United States for colored people that has never had a Negro among its professors or on its Trustee Board?"

But that is water under the bridge. Today there are Negro professors and a Negro president and this conference reached a high water mark in frank and suggestive debate. Of course the great problem, and the reason that a Negro has been made president is the matter of finance. It will be astonishing information to most people to realize that today the Presbyterian Church contributes less than one per cent of the income of Lincoln University and has not at any time during the twentieth century given as much as ~~twenty~~ ten per cent. Here then is one of the oldest institutions for Negro education in the United States that has got to raise two hundred thousand dollars a year in order to do its work well. ~~Fifteen~~ Twenty per cent of this comes from its small endowment and ~~fifteen~~ twenty per cent from the State of Pennsylvania. The students pay in the astonishing total of ~~sixty~~ thirty per cent leaving ~~fifty~~ thirty per cent to be raised by gifts.

I told the conference that what must happen in the case of Lincoln, Fisk, Talladega and Dillard is that these private institutions must either become state institutions or must organize the alumni so as to put the support of the institution mainly on the alumni. Lincoln, for instance, if she wishes to avoid further state control and refuse to ask for further church help, which is already nearly nothing, and increase scholarship funds for students, must raise among her alumni an hundred thousand dollars a year. Can this be done? Can these other private institutions do the same? At first the answer would seem to be emphatically no, and that the only refuge is state control. I believe that state control in the future is inevitable for nearly all higher institutions white and black but I have been turning over in my mind the pos ibility of a small number of Negro colleges supported by their alumni, without dependence upon the state, and without begging boards and millionaires for contributions. The method of getting money from the rich is deadening. It fills the trustee board with men who have no personal interest in the institution, do not visit it, do not know its problems and have had the position thrust upon them because of the hope that they may give or secure funds for the college. This is unfair and humiliating to both sides. The practice should stop.

On the other hand can a body of three thousand alumni, such as Lincoln has today, raise an hundred thousand dollars a year? The answer is that they can if they are convinced that it is necessary. They probably spend at least an hundred thousand dollars a year on hats; they spend perhaps twice as much on luxuries that could be spared. If they had to face the alternative of either giving up some of their luxuries or not having their children properly educated, they could raise money enough to support these institutions. But it would have to be a hard effort and a deep conviction on the part of graduates that this is necessary.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

Lester T. Walton has retired as United States Minister to Liberia after serving from 1935 to 1945, eleven years, a longer period than any other American Minister has ever held this office. This is a record which ought to be known. Mr. Walton left with the complete confidence of the Government of Liberia and of the Firestone interests. On his resignation he received the highest decoration of Liberia the ~~golden~~ grand cordon of the Order of African Redemption, and in addition the warm commendation of the United States Department of State.

During his term he negotiated eight treaties and agreements concerning air power, the health mission of which John West is head, and the new port to be built by the United States Navy which for the first time in history will give an independent African nation a port where ships may call and anchor. This does not mean that conditions in Liberia are satisfactory but it does mean that there has been built up through Mr. Walton's efforts a condition of cordial relations between this government and the Liberian and a chance for economic progress.

It is one of the acute tragedies of the situation that the understanding between Liberia and American Negroes has never been as cordial as it should be. The causes are clear: American Negroes have always assumed that they had certain rights in Liberia, that in a sense they owned it and that their advice should always be taken and their criticism heeded. On the other hand, the Liberians have had a desperately hard row to hoe. They have had to fight the Africans themselves for their original foothold because they were foreigners. They have had continuous struggle with the English and the French who were determined to annex the country and from America they have had at first an attitude of disdain and lack of interest and finally the pressure of economic and military interference.

The great defense upon which Liberia today depends and has depended is the political power of the American Negro. But that political power ought to be backed by intelligent comprehension of Liberian history, difficulties and present condition. We Negroes in America have the common American fault of thinking if we visit a country for fifteen minutes or fifteen months we know all about it. No casual visit to West Africa can make any man, however intelligent, expert on its social conditions. So that when a Negro like Mr. Walton has had actual experience for eleven years being in that time intimately connected with the government and people of the country it is reassuring to have him vouched for the integrity of the leaders of Liberia and the possibility of its successful development.

Nothing would help the cause of American Negroes more than the increasing prosperity of Liberia, Haiti and Ethiopia. We could receive no greater blow to our aspirations than that these countries or any one of them should fail or retrograde. Yet Liberia is in the midst of an economic and social battle which could result in her defeat unless she has intelligent help. The small nations of the world no matter what their race and color who are struggling today against the great empires are at tremendous disadvantage. The battle for the laboring man centers there quite as much as it does in the trade unions of England and America.

There should be a movement, and I trust Mr. Walton will head it, to interpret Liberia and its problems intelligently to the American public and especially to American Negroes.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

The Pacific Coast is full of religious and semi-religious groups and organizations. They represent for the most part people without university training or scientific background but on the other hand those who are honest and earnest in their religious convictions. Sometimes this makes large numbers of peoply fly off to organizations like Aimee McPherson's Temple and to do what to most of us seems strange and unpleasant things. In other cases they embrace movements like the Ku Klux Klan and various efforts at economic reform without a backing of sound knowledge.

On the other hand, I noted in my recent visit a movement which has no parallel so far as I know in other parts of the United States and that is an attempt at interracial churches; at actually welcoming into a Christian church representatives of various races of people and carrying on the services and activities with reference to the well-being of these people. One finds, of course, here and there in the United States a few colored members in white congregations and now and then a white person in a colored congregation. Usually segregation according to race and color is more thoroughly carried out in the Christian church in America than in any other social institution. This, of course, is a queer commentary upon our religion.

In San Francisco and in Los Angeles there are interracial churches. In San Francisco, Howard Thurman is co-pastor of a church which holds meetings of a high order of intelligence and is well attended. Easter morning I went to the Church of Christian Fellowship of Los Angeles. It was holding temporary meetings in one of those magnificent houses built in the last generation by a millionaire. The chief pastor is an American Negro, Harold M. Kingsley, well-known as pastor of the Congregational Church of the Good Shepherd in Chicago for twenty years or more. The assistant pastor is G. Raymond Booth, a white man and a Quaker; and the other assistant, Reverend Royden Susu-Mago, a Japanese. The audience consisted of white and colored persons representing so far as I could see well-to-do and intelligent people. There was no evidence of that fringe of enthusiasts who go into movements of this sort without well-balanced reflexion. The services were in accord with normal American religious customs; the matter of immortality was skirted about tactfully rather than met philosophically. But it was an interesting and sincere ceremony and the wonder of it is that this sort of thing is so rare in the United States.

How does it happen that in a religion which above all other boasts of its catholicity, of the equality of rich and poor and of the one humanity united in Jesus Christ, - how does it happen that this creed in America is almost never practiced? The whites give long distant treatment to the colored folk through missions and movements. The colored people gather in their own churches with their own organizations and look upon white religion as a sort of distant foreign land. This means, of course, that whatever religion tries to do as such in the United States it is split by the color line and one sees the results in all sorts of ways. Even where in larger bodies like the Federation of Churches white and colored members are present, they come in representing for the most part different racial organizations and not one integral thought or ethical concept. I doubt if the pioneer work in interracial churches on the west coast is going to have much influence upon the east and the Christian church in general. I rather feel that the color line which has been so successfully broken down in the labor movement and in various movements for social uplift is going to yield last in religion and this is the strongest attack upon religion that could be made and is being made by the church itself and not by outsiders.

THE WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

When I returned from England last November, I was filled with a strange pity for a thousand babies whom I left there facing distress. They were the illegimate children of Negro soldiers quartered in England during the Second World War. I do not blame the soldiers because the disruption of normal sex relations during war is always a discreditable thing and it was engineered in the last war with unusual calousness and disregard of consequences. I did not blame the women of England nor gloat over them. Their lives were torn apart; their men send away and their incomes uncertain. I did ~~not~~ blame the American Army which for the most part made every effort to keep these unions from being legimate ~~and thus~~ for fear of bring ing white wives to colored America.

But all this was beside the point and unprofitable moralizing. The real thing was the children. They were facing an extraordinary destiny: their ~~Negro~~ illegal birth was stamped plainly upon their foreheads and what sort of lives were before them. England cares for her orphans but there would be all sorts of difficulties with these strangers. They could not easily be farmed out to normal families; they could not easily be trained for the usual walks of life and yet they were innocent, beautiful tragic victims of a torn world.

I talked with an official of the General Education Board as we returned and he suggested: is this not an opportunity for Negro philanthropy in the United States? I brought the problem before a group of people, white and colored, intelligent, liberal but they were silent or even laughed. I sensed among the colored ones a certain feeling of vengance accomplished upon white womanhood in retaliation for what colored women had suffered. I saw among the whites no adequate realization of what the problems of these colored children were going to be. On the other hand several colored persons from various part of the United States have written me asking of the possibility of the adopting one of these children but I had no answer until the other day a letter came to me from a Jamaican girl whom I met in London. She wrote to appeal in behalf of these children and said:

"You will no doubt remember me as the Jamaica girl who attended the Pan African Congress and promised in my little talk to do something for the coloured babies. . . . I call them 'orphans of the storm' because I think that is really what they are. A Committee has been formed over here, and I am on it together with George Padmore and Leary Constantine. I feel that we will have done a good job if out of the Pan African Congress comes this really good thing, the responsibility for the welfare of the coloured babies. I know that the American coloured people are most generous and that they will be very willing to help once they realise the position, I am certain too that the British people will help but as this is a matter of joint responsibility and our men have been guilty in some cases of affairs with married women, we must do something about it. Some of the husbands will forgive their erring wives once the offending coloured infant is removed from the midst of the family circle. . . . It is a problem which I think can be met easily as there are only a thousand babies I believe here who need help, the only thing is whatever we do must have some degree of permanency as the children wont be self supporting at least until they are sixteen, so permanent committees will have to be formed pledging the help for at least another sixteen years. . . . When they grow older possibly it would be a good idea if we could get them sent to the colonies, where there is not much prejudice like Jamaica for instance. This of course is looking ahead, but one has to in cases like this. We propose to have a home for them, and where practicable we will have coloured help to look after them. Then they have to be fed and arrangements made for medical attention, and clothing and food. My idea is that some permanent committee of distinguished Negroes on that side could be formed, just as is done for the white orphans here under the foster parents plan. I have visited these colonies as they are called and they are run to perfection."

The name and address of this young woman is: Alma LaBadie, c/o Headquarters Transport Command, Teddington Bushey Park, Middelsex, United Kingdom.

I hope she will receive letters from readers of the Defender.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

While the sympathies of American Negroes are with organized labor to a far greater extent then ever before, there is still a certain lack of understanding. What we are seeing just now is a method by which the laboring class from time to time has raised its standard of living. There are always long periods when labor lives in huts and hovels, earns scarcely enough to buy food, a d yet is content and makes little protest. They have adopted a fatal resignation to circumstances which they do not believe can be changed. Then comes change either of their own initiative or, as is more apt to happen, from the outside. The laboring class for a time lives better and then trouble begins when men seek to force them back into their old patience and docility.

This is what happened during the last World War. Numbers of people were satisfied in earning ten to fifteen dollars a week and had no thought that more was possible. Suddenly there was an unprecedented demand for labor, high wages were paid and even though this included long hours, millions were elated to receive twenty, thirty and forty dollars a week. Then at the end of the war came the attempt to push them back to their old wage and they refused. They had tasted certain higher standards of living; they refused to assent to less.

There comes then the basic question as to whether their demand for higher wages is proper, and secondly, whether it can be met. There can be no doubt as to its propriety. Every decent man with a family should today receive at least $2,400 a year. This has been abundantly proven and it has also been proven that the majority of people, even in the rich and prosperous United States, receive no such income. But men answer: the reason they do not receive it is because industry cannot afford to pay it. Right There comes the real battle of the age. It is assumed and fiercely maintained that higher wages cannot be taken out of profits; that the cost of higher wages can only be unloaded since laborers are consumers on the consumer which in the end will reduce these very wages. If this was the first time that this argument had appeared we might be satisfied with it. But in the heyday of the nineteenth century this doctrine appeared as the Ricardian Iron Law of Wages: no matter what philanthropists might want, wages simply could not be increased without ruining all industry. What are the facts in the matter? Let us turn to the railways because we have been lately intensely interested in the railway strike.

Let me quote a few figures about profit on railways from the perfectly respectable Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences. Lewis Corley brings the following facts to light. In the period following the Civil War great fortunes were made from railways and yet the legimate costs of building the railways were paid by government contributions of $700 million and 155 million acres of public lands which the railways got free. As a result Cornelius Vanderbuilt by speculating in railways and watering the stock made $100 million and one of his sons made $200 million. A gang of promoters and politicians made $40 million by false construction costs out of the Union Pacific Railway. Jay Gould made $72 million without any constructive work. The fortunes of Hill and Harriman were piled up by manipulation of railway consolidations between 1895 and 1905. Andrew Carnegie before the forming of the steel trust would have been delighted to have received $200 million for his interests. When the trust was formed he received $447 million for the same interests.

This is only a small part of the story. Profits in industry and especially in railways have been so enormous that part of them could easily have been paid the workers without raising fares or rates and still leave the capitalists more than well-off.

There is, of course, one aspect of the strike of the railway workers that interests Negroes: they have been successfully fighting a vicious combine but at the same time they, themselves, have drawn an equally vicious color-line. Many of us would think that at this time when they have been crudely slapped in the face by the President of the United States the day would be ripe for us to demand that they yield to Negro workers something of the same justice they demand for themselves. Logically this is true but I presume that our wisest strategy today would be to support the demand of railway workers in every way and to refuse to side against them with their exploiters; but at the same time at every opportunity, and we should make opportunities, we ought to tell these strikers that justice begins at home; and the engineers and conductors, the trainmen and the seventeen other railway organizations should at the very first opportunity, and of their own initiative, strike the color-line from their constitutions.

Summer schools are inventions of the devil designed to destroy what few brains mankind has left. Teaching used to be in many ways an enviable job: you worked nine months for near nothing and then you loafed and laughed and planned for three months on your savings. If there were no savings you might even get an advance from next year's salary. But at any rate life for the teacher used to become organized on the basis of nine months in hell and three in heaven and on the whole this was a rather pleasant arrangement.

But, of course, the devil got on to it. He was spending his summer in Mississippi where he could cool off and noticed an hilarious group of teachers starting on their vacation. "What is all this?" said he. Then somebody explained. "My God!" yelled Beelzebub - "Here are people enjoying their jobs! What the hell! Stop it. So it stop ed. That remarked the devil, is a hell of a note and I am going to take it up with the school authorities. He had, you could well imagine, channels of contact with these persons. He whispered to them and they saw the light. They spoke to the superintendent and the foundations and other ultimate sources of authority, and then they called on the college presidents and said, "Your plant is being idle and deteriorating during three months of the year!" The presidents being under the impression that they were referring to the students and their education started to show that students needed some escape from school. But no! the authorities had reference to the buildings and books and tools and were not prepared to listen to any argument that the bricks would not soften or the books show undue wear if they were left alone for a period. So they came to the idea that if nine months school was good, twelve months school was that much better.

I remember when in 1933, I thought of returning to teaching one of the allurements was the summer vacation when I would put aside regular work and do anything or nothing. I had dreams of dolce far niente, but President Hope approached me at the end of the second semester and said, "I have no one to teach sociology this summer school and the students will be pouring in. Won't you help me out?" I kindly did so. Then at the next end of the year I found him expecting the same thing; so I said, "Hope, let us reason together. I came down not chiefly but certainly in part to enjoy a summer vacation. Now if it is absolutely necessary that I should teach in the summer I will do so on the condition that I have a whole semester off during the year with pay." We struck a bargain. Once I got a semester off. Other times I simply did not teach summer school.

The argument was and is, and it was started by the devil, that a number of people are madly anxious to get the degree of master of arts and incidentally this was necessary for keeping their job and therefore summer schools must become regular institutions. Of course I do not believe in this nor does any one else. If any one needs to study more in order to do a better job of teaching, then they need to study more and to send them to school when they are too tired to stand up after a grueling year's work may mean that they will study less rather than more. But however this may be with regard to the effect of the summer school on students on the faculty, it is absolutely and undeniably fatal. They are tired after a year's work and as the thing has been manipulated today with no adequate increase in pay, no adequate provision for lessened load in general, an overworked teacher becomes absolutely swamped with a horde of careless people divided into those who are present because they don't want to be, those who come because they wanted to and do not propose to do any work and don't, and those who have no cheaper way to spend the summer.

I would not say that nothing worthwhile was ever done in summer school but I would say from my experience that the amount that is accomplished either in teaching or learning is not worth ruining the tempers and softening the brains of those engaged in this questionable work. All of it stems from a mistaken idea that you can get something for nothing; that all you have to do to educate a person is to extend the time that he spends upon it; that education is a matter of courses and credits and hanging about. When, of course, it is a matter of development and understanding and real and devoted study. Mental labor must be limited. It must be alternated with physical exercise. The trouble with the world is it attempts to realize an absolute dichotomy between muscle and brain and then to increase the efficiency of both simply by addition. God knows the teachers in our schools need to be educated; they need to spend more time in study than they ever have. The way to accomplish this is to relieve them of their duties, pay them a decent wage and send them off for a year at school. To think we can accomplish the same thing by crucifying them and their manacled teachers for the summer months is an hideous mistake. I have seldom been guilty of aiding or abetting and I promise in future not to countenance it in any way.

THE WINDS OF TIME

THE COST OF DEATH

My friend Thomas Bell is dead at the unreasonable age of sixty. I have known him intimately for thirty years. He has been among my few close friends and his family has been almost as dear to me as my own. He was a tall and well-built man, white and sandy-haired, with a face that reflectdd his innate frankness, honesty and kindliness. Life to him was to him essentially straightforward and simple. Not that for a moment he ignored its wrong and evil; but just as clearly he saw just what was the essential trouble and how it could be met and how he himself could help meet it. The world's muddle did not make him angry nor hopeless; rather it spurred him to unceasing effort on his own part, and here and now, to make things better, as he knew they could be better. In this way he died, scalpel in hand, standing and working in a public clinic with the thermometer at ninety, and the suffering about him. He was a Great Physician.

THE COST OF COLOR

The problem of Thomas Bell was a curious inversion of the color line, often remarked upon, endlessly studied, but nearly always misinterpreted. Of his ancestors, perhaps one of his great-grand-fathers was an African Negro. Far from resenting this fact, least of all bemoaning it, and never capitalizing upon it, Thomas Bell recognized it as a normal and perfectly justifiable bit of history. It was not a matter for denial or concealment. Nor on the other hand was it any reason for him to ignore or refuse to fight American prejudice against color. Such a fight of course compelled him to seem to go out of his logical path and repeatedly to bring up a matter or a situation which apparently did not personally concern him:" What has Bell to grouch about?" complained a white fellow-physician; "Nobody objects to his presence on on the hospital staff" But they did object to the presence of competent practicianers who happened to be brown. This was unfair and silly and Dr. Bell insisted on pointing this out. It was not a personal peeve, it was justice and justice was his job. He did not go out of his way to force the color issue, but he never under any circumstances avoided it when it appeared in his plain path of life. His colored fellow-physicians time and again blamed him for bringing up the color question, while they sat back comfortably silent, but ready to cash in on opportunity after Bell had borne the brunt of battle and incurred the dislike of his white fellows for it.

THE BATTLE

Dr. Bell never hesitated. In the days of starvation, when the task of securing in New York recognition for a Tennessee medical degree seemed hopeless, he consistently and calmly stood to his guns and every victory won was not simply for himself but for Negro blood in America. He never avoided the problem; he always took his unwavering stand and slowly, surely he won, not simply because his contention was just, but because he was a good physician and men had to respect his unwavering convictions.

Slowly, inevitably he rose to prominence, not wide but firm despite his colored and white patients, his white and colored friends. He was repeatedly selected for high and responsible position in the hospitals, in the community, in the hard and thankless tasks of social reform.. He could always be counted on despite the strain on his weak heart, and he never exacted the reward of acclaim and advertisement much less sought it. His honors were always thrust upon him and usually embarrased him.

A young man yesterday stood in the news store where I stopped exuding wisdom: "Its all a frame-up, a racket" he said. In his fifteen years of adult life, all that he had seen of life was self-advertisement and graft. He never had known a Dr. Bell. He did not believe such men existed. Life to him was drinking, back-slapping, pushing, getting and keeping. He had never known family life like that of the four Bells -- father, mother, the two dear girls. They worked and played together; they disagreed and contended and came back to the nest and loved life.

This is the life of a man. This is the America we crave and often fail to see because it is so near us.

NEEDLE TRADES

William Kassim writes in the July 6, issue of the Nation a letter from Maywood, Illinois which is timely and important. It brings up again the question of earning a living for the mass of Negroes living in the South. I have for the last ten years stressed the immediate need of this problem. I believe it is fundamental for gaining political rights and social privileges. I do not for a moment underestimate the right to vote and the right to be treated as a man but I maintain that until a man can earn a decent living he cannot fight effectively for his fundamental rights. A hungry man is helpless.

Mr. Kassim says, "The colored share-croppers are being gradually displaced by the mechanical cotton-pickers." The needle-work trades need new workers to replace the older group of immigrants who were the principle source of the industries labor pool. "It is my impression that the needle-work trade could logically absorb the marginal share-cropper, giving him a much better standard of living and possibility giving the South a new industry." Thereupon he proposes that an industrial leader like the late Sidney Hillman and a committee of colored vocational leaders should plan a program including immediate and long range training for setting up needle-work industries among the Southern Negroes. The training would include employer - union sponsored apprentice courses in cities, and state vocational school training. Thus a graduate could immediately upon graduating step into a job.

Something of this sort must be done, not only in the South, but also in the whole country. Negroes must begin to get places in manufacturing industry.

INDUSTRIAL SETTLEMENTS

It will not do for them simply to find places in industries already established; that is important. But beyond that they could establish their own industries. They could establish such industries and apply to them the ideas that lie back of consumers cooperation. They must not be traditional American investments for private profit. They must be social settlements. They could solve the problem of mechanical power - that problem which herded the European workers in the factories in the early ~~19th~~ nineteenth century and began the worst aspect of modern industrialism. By taking advantage of the TVA and the other great developments of power throughout the United States which are bound to come, the home industry could be established in the country districts, where each home would have its garden and raise the food which it needs. It could establish communities where education, art and industry could go hand in hand.

There need be no permanent color-line although it goes without saying that when colored groups first establish such communties they would long be left to themselves; but if they were successful, and there is no reason why they should not be, segregation would not continue. People will always seek good companions, industrious centers, good wages and decent home conditions then they are offered and the color-line will not last.

We, American Negroes lack the pioneer spirit for obvious reasons. We are herded by ourselves into cities; we are sticking close to every thing that the white American does.

UNITED NATIONS

We need from time to time to follow the development of the United Nations especially with regard to the question of color and colonies. So far a combination of the United States and Great Britain has tried to dominate the world organization. Usually this is stated as a case of "opposition" on the part of Russia; but of course the opposition is just as much on the part of Great Britain and the United States. It happens just now that these two countries have a majority of the Great Powers and they feel that they can keep this majority and dictate the policies of the United Nations in the future. Consequently they have changed from their attitude on the veto power which they had at the time of the San Francisco Conference. Now apparently they are willing to settle the world questions by majority vote. The difficulty is going to be that just as soon as they lose command of the majority, or fear they are going to, they may suddenly and even violently again change their attitude.

SOCIALISM

What is of importance then is not their present power, but the future development of the world. The world is moving definitely toward socialism. Attempts are being made to indicate that this socialism. is not communism. That is quite true. Communism is an extreme form of socialism. But what men must remember, is that Communism is Socialism and differs from it only in the time and method of accomplishing the full power of the socialistic state. The socialistic state is growing in the world; it is dominating the home policies of England; it fully dominates Czechoslavakia and a large part of all the Balkans; it is strong in Italy and France.

CAPITALISM

The only place where capitalism is holding out against socialism is in the United States of America and in certain parts of South America. This means that the ideas dominant in the United States are not dominant in the world. And the United States holds its power today because of its immense wealth and natural resources. Through those resources it is holding the whip hand over China; it is seeking to rule the Pacific and trying to increase its hold upon South America.

It is a grave question however, as to whether this policy is going to continue to be successful even here in the United States. No matter how much the National Association of Manufacturers may talk about "private initative", "individual enterprise" and the "American way of life", there is growing opposition to the anarchy of business, the tremendous concentration of power in the hands of monopolists, and the denial of democracy because of the power of concentrated wealth. This fight in the United States is going to increase rather than decrease. Strikes and labor troubles are but surface indications of the deep dissatisfaction and distress in this country, and of the bewilderment with which the honest and thinking people of the United States are viewing our attitude toward world affairs.

COLONIES

With regard to colonies, the United Nations have done almost nothing. They have waited upon the greatest colonial empire in the world, Great Britain, to see what is going to be done concerning India. In India, Great Britain has managed to keep this vast country divided, by insisting that ~~eighty~~ 70 million Mohammendans shall have the same political power in the provisional government as ~~three~~ Two hundred million Hindu majority We have left the African colonies of Italy in Great Britains hands. We have done nothing in South Africa. Burma has gained from Britain only what she won herself in war. Indonesia has had no UN help.

Winds of Time

by

W.E.B. Du Bois

I remember my friend George Mitchell, the young Virginian, who made the first effort at the modern Philadelphia bar for recognition of the Negro lawyer. He told me that coming up to Washington as a boy whenever the news butcher passed through the car with his wares, Mitchell always bought something. He said that he thought he had to; that this was part of his right to ride.

There is the same attitude today among a large number of consumers; they complacently assume that it is their duty to buy the things they are offered in the stores at the price which the storekeeper asks. They have apparently no idea that as consumers they have any voice in the matter or that any organization on their part could affect either the prices or the kind of goods offered for sale.

And yet of course, the whole industrial process begins with the consumer not with the producer. It is the consumer that has the need for goods; and beginning with his wants should come the effort of the producer to satisfy them. But no; in our American state, the producer is all powerful; the producer determines what it is that he is going to offer, and what price he is going to put upon it. What he offers is not dictated by the need of the buyer but by the amount of the profit which the producer thinks he can make. Consequently one of the greatest powers of the modern world and particularly of modern government: the power to say whether the stores shall be filled with expensive furs or curious hats or bread or sandwiches; that power is not usually under any sort of democratic control. Most people indeed have no idea what or who it is that decides, what the contents of the stores shall be and what the prices of those contents shall be.

Today, however, the consumer is beginning to become conscious of himself and of his power. After all he is the buyer. The producer cannot exist; cannot carry out his work unless people buy his goods. If, however, you are going to have on one side organized powerful production and on the other side, a mass of unorganized and unintelligent buyers, the producer can rule the economic world which is precisely what he is doing today. But is it necessary to allow that; is it good for the producer as well as the consumer?

Ac-7-100

We all know what happens to the producer. He produces goods which he cannot sell; the goods are dumped upon the market and he fails in his business or has to change the kind of work that he is doing. If this happens on a large enough and wide enough scale, we have one of the periodic crises which has cursed the world for several hundred years, - ever since capitalistic production came into being. It is therefore clear that opposite the organization for production there should come the consumer organization. People who buy goods and especially working people who buy in small amounts ought systematically to pool their knowledge: what they buy; what they pay for it, how the transaction is carried on, what would suit them better. Not only that, there should be a pooling of funds. There is a great deal of waste in the separation and lack of concerted action among buyers. Money is wasted upon rent for prominent and showy locations, instead of others which would serve equally well as depots for the display of goods. There is waste in the hours during which the retail stores stay open; it is not necessary that a store should stay open from early morning to late at night. The consumers could be so organized so as to concentrate their buying and experience. Especially is it necessary that those who buy should be assured as to what they are buying, as to what adulterations are used; as to validity of weight; as to the condition of the goods. All of this could be easily found out if the buyers would consult together and gather knowledge which is easily obtainable. What is of greatest importance is the pooling of funds.

During the recent meeting of the great powers in Paris, Mr. James F. Byrnes our militant Secretary of State, spoke plainly to the representative of Bulgaria. He "stressed the great importance attached by the United States for the maintenance of civil rights for all the population, adding that the United States could not understand or approve any system of government where the Opposition is permitted to have no press, where political arrests are continually taking place and where there is no possibility for the people freely to express their will in elections."

In current dialect "ain't that somethin'". It reminds me of an editorial which I wrote in the Crisis, twenty-seven years ago, in October, 1919. May I quote those words:

"You have, perhaps, noticed our double-page advertisement in the Congressional Record, due to the kindness of our good friend James Francis Byrnes, of South Carolina. Congressman Byrnes is from the Second District and a confrere of the late Congressman James W. Ragsdale, who died suddenly during the Washington riots.

"The Congressional Districts of these two gentlemen have about 400,000 inhabitants and probably 80,000 of these are males of voting age, the majority being Negroes. Mr. Byrnes was elected to Congress by a vote of 7,681 ballots out of a total of 7,801 ballots cast.

"In the Second District of New York it took, the same year, 46,141 votes to make an election and 24,064 of these to elect a Congressman; but all this is not necessary in South Carolina.

"Yet Mr. Byrnes, representing without any legal authority the supressed votes of 12,000 white men and 20,000 blacks, stands in Congress and talks just as loud - indeed, considerably louder - than Mr. Caldwell of New York.

"Mr. Byrnes is alarmed, and so are we. He is alarmed over us and we over him. He accuses The Crisis and other Negro journals of causing not only the Washington and Chicago riots, but the whole unrest and dissatisfaction in the Negro race. We accuse Mr. Byrnes, and his kind, of being primarily the ones who not only precipitated the riots in Washington, Chicago, Atlanta, Houston, Longview and East St. Louis, but also of encouraging for fifty years the lynching of 4,000 Negroes, the disfranchisement of a million and a half voters, the enforced ignorance of three million human beings and the theft of hundreds of millions of dollars in wages, but particularly the theft of the highest privilege of a freeman - our vote and our self-respect."

36-7-103

What was written a quarter of a century ago is still true today. Neither South Carolina nor Mr. Byrnes can represent democracy before the world. Least of all have they any right to point the finger of criticism at Russia. Let us not forget that Monroe, Georgia, where the recent lynchings took place, is half way between Atlanta and the South Carolina line and in the same cultural orbit. Here was a white planter, Harrison, who had secured the services of a field hand by going his bail, a species of crime-servitude common this part of the South. Harrison knows the neighbors who perpetrated this crime and is keeping his mouth shut in self-defense and in loyalty to the sort of democracy which our Secretary of State represents.

AUSTRALIA

Let no American Negro get excited at the noise which Dr. Herbert C. Evatt, Minister for External Affairs of Australia, is making at the Paris Conference. Mr. Evatt represents some six million white people in Australia, who are holding a continent very nearly the size of the United States and who call themselves a nation. This nation and this continent are being held as the outpost of the British Empire to prevent the expansion of brown and black people from China, India, and the South Seas into Australia. Australia is planned to be a bulwark of the white race for the domination of Asia.

Consequently Mr. Evatt while talking in the name of the small nations, really speaks in the interest of the great white empires. It is an unfortunate situation. We need the voice of the Little People to offset the power of the Big Four. But that voice should be unhampered and clear and for definite objects. If it stood for the self-determination and independence of the smaller groups of men, then, it would stand preeminently for the colonies. But nobody in Paris as yet is raising his voice in defense of colonial peoples, least of all, is Australia. Australia as a matter of logic has to stand with the Union of South Africa; the Union of South Africa is, as one most continually repeats, the most outrageous case of human oppression which the earth knows today, outside the Southern south in the United States.

THE RHODESIAS AND KENYA

To these two countries Australia and South Africa which have achieved independence, must be added three other countries desperately striving for independence, Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia and Kenya. These countries propose to speak for Africa and by that they mean that the small minority of investors, farmers, miners, white skilled workers in these countries, are going to demand not only the domination of millions of black workers, but also to have in their hands the political power which should belong to these black workers. Thus Africa is to have a white mouthpiece and all three of these countries are in the orbit of the British Empire.

It will be well, therefore, to watch Mr. Evatt and listen carefully to his words and efforts, and every now and then to ask and demand clear answers. Beyond that when General Smuts of South Africa arrives there will even be a greater need for this watchfulness and interrogation.

36-7-80

PAN AFRICA

Unfortunately there is no international organization which has the legal right to attend to this necessary work of defending the colonial peoples of the world and particularly of Africa. For that reason I have sent out a letter to a dozen or more organizations and a few individuals asking if they would be willing to unite in a demand upon the United Nations Assembly, which meets in New York late in September, to give to some committee representing the peoples of Africa, the right at least to sit in the Assembly and listen to its work and perhaps even to take part in debate.

Winds of Time

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

Few people have talked more about vacation and paid less attention to my own advice than I; but I am going to do better in the future. As I start off on a two weeks trip to Maine, I am minded to preach to my fellow citizens. The object of a vacation is recreation: the attempt to expend less energy than one takes in in order to restore a balance after our usual habit of working too hard and being continously tired. Such re-creation of vital force can be brought about by change and rest. The change must be real; if a person has been living in the city with its noise, hurry and bad air; then vacation would be a trip to the country with wide open spaces, fresh air, and a chance especially to rest one's eyes and ears. Persons in the country should of course go to the city and see what modern life has done in art, in information, in building. The brain-worker should stop and read and listen. If you have been playing cards all night, all winter it will be well to take at least a month off, and not play cards. If you have been drinking whiskey, try wine; and when you come back from vacation, stick to it. Sedentary workers should of course get rid of fat; not by prescription and crucifixtion but by laying off bread, potatoes, butter and sugar.

I think that no one needs a vacation more than housewives. Most husbands do not realize this. We all remember the story of the man who took his wife and three babies down to the station and said, "Now dear go to Atlantic City for two weeks and enjoy yourself!" The housewife should have time off and real rest. The children should go to camp; not any camp but a good camp. Professional men especially should sleep. Sleep is a habit which may be cultivated or ruined. It is absolutely essential to longevity and happiness. Most peoples are criminally careless about it. It would be well if some lawyers and doctors could go off in the summer and sleep a month. The problem of vacation for teachers is difficult; the teacher has a curious combination of hard physical and mental work. The physical work is indoors with bad air and other unhealthy surroundings; the mental work is conventional, repetitious and uninspired. For this reason, the teacher is apt to choose both physical and mental work for their vacation. But as a matter of fact, they are really tired from both. They need mental relaxation and inspiration but not continued use of eye and ear to the point of exhaustion. They need physical exercise, but outdoors not indoors and above all, they need rest.

All of this of course is twice told and yet we cannot think of it too much. The thing that distresses me is the plight of men and women in the prime of life losing their hold upon living, principally because of the failure of physical health. We cannot say too often that a man at forty is either a fool or a physician; either he knows his body and its power and is taking care of it, or he is simply inviting an early death or that which is worse than death, lack of capacity to do full work. It is symptomatic of our present attitude toward labor that vacations are being considered more often as part of their wage. I shall never forget my visit while in Russia to some of the great palaces of the Czars. I remember Tsarkoe Selo where the rulers of Russia used to live in splendor. The great palaces are now given over to laborers for their vacation and I can see no finer compensation for senseless extravagance in the past.

AFRICAN CULTURE

If I were Master of Liberia, I would arrange a Centennial of my country in this wise: fifty miles in the interior, at the edge of the great plateau, I would lay out a great map of Africa on the scale of a foot to a mile, occupying roughly a square mile of space. On a smaller scale I would indicate all its main physical features - mountains, plateaus, forests and deserts, with real water for lakes and rivers. Laying this garden out true to the points of the compass, I would put three buildings upon it: on the northeast, along the Nile, a Temple of Phylae, small, yellow and crimson, perhaps fifty feet square. In this "House of African Culture", I would put maps, plans, charts and statues, illustrating the history and cultural development of Africa for seven thousand years. I would quite modestly use Du Bois' World and Africa, which Viking Press will publish this fall, as the basis of this exhibit.

On the southern tip of the continent, I would build a modern hotel: two stories, with fifty rooms, ten of them en-suite, and all with toilets and baths; I would have patios, verandahs, public and private dining rooms, electricity and running water. I would call it "Joseph J. Roberts House" after the President of Liberia, who declared in 1847 its independence.

HOUSE OF LIBERIA

On the west coast, approximately where Liberia is now situated, I would erect the "House of Liberia". Here in a building fifty to seventy-five feet square, modelled after the ancient palace of of the Kings of Benin, I would put an exhibit of Liberia, illustrating its History; its Inhabitants; its Geography and Geology; its present Resources; its Government, Education, Churches and Social activities. I would illustrate all this by careful charts, maps, models, photographs, and groups of living persons. I would exclude all commercial advertising and blah-blah. I would see to it that the Firestone people did not buy out space to deceive the world into believing the preposterous lie that Liberia was their creation. I would even put the United States Government and the missionaries in their proper and subordinate places in the history of this brave and desperately striving land; and let the world know what Elijah Johnson and Arthur Barclay and a dozen others did for mankind in building a free land in Africa up from the dregs of human slavery out of which white folk made themselves rich and powerful and impudent. I would tell Black America, that while they were willing to be whipped slaves and White Folks' "Niggers" (as too many of them still are) Liberia's fathers went out into a hostile jeering world, and fought black men and white to build a free land for black folk on the oldest culture the world knows.

FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS

I would not waste money on all this: I would make a centennial and exhibit for not a cent over $50,000, and I would do it simply and completely. Over all, I would spread like a blanket the music of Africa: the roll of ancient drums, the wierd chant of forest and jungle; the sorrow songs of Afro-America, the dance and cadence of the Caribbean. I would do a job so simple and complete, that never again would Europe dare to call a commercial exhibit of profit-making gadgets, a "World's Fair".

But I am not Master of Liberia.

Old Man Paradox certainly gets my goat. Most people don't recognize him. They only see a certain blur on the faces of friends, but fail to descry that pale, thin blank countenance that is Paradox itself. I seldom corner him and tell him just what I think of him, but a chance came last night. Believe me I - but wait.

We were quite a gang: a high federal official, two colonels from the army; a navy lieutenant, a postmaster, and two ~~councillors~~ counselors-at-law; a member of the Academy of Surgeons and of the Institute of Arts and Letters; heads of the Y.M.C.A., and a crowd of similar folk. We were in the dining-boat room, beside the shining lake, just after the miracle of sunset; with crackers, cheese and ale before us; with bass, white perch and a two and an half pound pickerel in the fish box.

The Colonel opened: he told us that in the First World War we had seven hundred officers and in this, seven thousand. We had more than our quota of soldiers in the regular army today, but too few officers - 150 out of 25,000; he urged more to apply.

Then I heard a faint swish at the door. I knew Old Man Paradox was there, although I couldn't see him. No one else noticed. Someone said:

"As an American, I am willing to defend my country".

Another answered: "Of course, but I don't like Segregation and Discrimination"

All agreed. We munched and drank.

Then Old Man Paradox got to work. I saw him glide dimly back of the Colonel. The Colonel's face hardened; he straightened and his voice grew belligerent: "As an American" he grated "I'll fight and die for my country, no matter what they do to me or how they treat me!"

Old Man Paradox flew to the Merchant-Marine, a lieutenant, with Junior Grade, gold sleeve stripe on his sleeve. "I'm damned if I will again", he hollered. I and three brothers, were in the war and kicked around like dogs. Why in the hell should I fight for a country that treats me worse than the enemy they're fighting!"

I knew the battle was on, as I had heard it for fifty years. I began to stalk Old Man Paradox, but he was too quick for me. He leapt from ear to ear and face to face:

"If we didn't call ourselves Negroes, we'd be Americans."

"A hell of a lot of difference it would make what we call ourselves, we're still niggers."

26-1-93

"We've made the greatest progress any people ever made in a generation."

"So what? They still lynch us and rape our women and rear our children in ignorance and crime."

"We should never accept segregation. We should fight and die first".

"We should make our segregated world the best possible, including the church you attend, the schools where you were educated, and this camp where you're shooting off your mouths."

Just then I caught Old Man Paradox by the arm and twisted it until he squealed. The men thought it was a rat. It was. He squirmed and fought until he got on my back with both his thin arms locked about my neck. I knew I was in for it. He hissed now in my right ear, now in my left:

Do!
Don't

I will
I won't

I can
I can't

I must
I mustn't

I'm a man
I'm a nigger

Hope Despair

Try Kill

But just here, I got Old Man Paradox by the neck. I squeezed until he shrieked. The men thought it was the loons calling from the lake. But I knew. I sat on his face, gouged my thumbs in his eyes and tied his hands and legs into double hard knots. Then distinctly (but under my breath), I began to cuss:

"You God-damned, lousy, son-of- "

Winds of Time

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

I am alarmed at the increase of gambling in the nation in general, among Negroes in particular. Especially there is the danger of youth growing up without realization of the real tragedy of games of chance. All life is risk; from the pangs of birth to the shadow of death: sowing and harvest; food and digestion; work and accident; joy and disease - all life is risk. But human beings seem not to be satisfied with that risk which is necessary, but seek to add artificial risk, and then spoil even that by cheating.

If it is the thrill of living that men want, the world is full of it: travel, exploration; the plumbing of the seas, flying in the air; the long, hard and relentless logic of thought; the knowing of men, the guiding of children. But ignoring or disparaging all this, men seek today:

card games, chance games like the "Numbers", horse-racing,
stock-buying and selling,
real-estate and insurance,
"business".

All these become games of chance from which men seek gain: first, by betting; second, by "rigging" the market; and finally by cheating and stealing deliberately. The "numbers" is the filthiest method of stealing from the poor and ignorant ever invented. Its inventors, and those who carry it on today, richly deserve jail. In too many cases, especially among Negroes, they are honored leaders, to our shame.

Cards may be played for skill and for chance. Bridge is largely skill; poker is chance. It is when betting and cheating are added, that cards lead to hell. Horse-racing may be a noble sport and thrilling to witness; but today it is supported by betting; and involves cheating by owners, jockeys, trainers, "touts", and "racing-form" swindlers. It is today the most dangerous form of public dissipation, and is growing.

The "stock-market" is ostensibly a most respectable, even aristocratic calling; yet it is the method by which millions of hard-earned savings are stolen from the toilers and given to powerful monopolists and swindlers, posing as Captains of Industry. Attempted regulation has merely curbed the most bare-faced and unscrupulous; it has not changed the system.

Many will gasp to see real estate and insurance named among gambling devices. Not all such businesses are, but the amount of cheating, and stealing and organized deception inherent today in buying and selling land, homes and business sites is not only criminal, but is fastening on the young the idea that all business is and must be mainly gambling; and that land and its resources should be monopolized for private gain; that sickness and death can legitmately be used to make men rich instead of primarily to relieve suffering and distress!

Business, that is, raising food and materials, processing them, transporting and distributing them - involve necessary risk; climate and quake, accident and change, all make the filling of human wants a matter of risk and uncertainty. But this can be minimized and much eliminated by thought and plan. Instead, today every ingenuity is used in hundreds of cases and over widespread areas, to increase chance, conceal facts, monopolize opportunities, and make business a game of gambling. Hence comes failures, crises, poverty, hatred, ignorance and war.

Avoid artifical, unfair games of chance as you would the devil. Don't bet, Work. Face the real and unavoidable risks of life, like men and not like thieves.

Henry George Wells, who lies dead in London, was one of the few of the world's Great, whom I felt justified in calling Friend. It is a cherished memory that only last November, I sat in the home where he succumbed to diabetes and whispered with him as he sat "busy dying".

I met him first, I think, at the Races Congress in London, 1911, - that perhaps greatest meeting of racial groups the world has ever seen. Then in 1919 and 1921, he gladly helped me with the Pan African Congresses, speaking at the 1921 meeting; having me lunch at his club and inviting me down to his country home. He entertained me and Ruth Fisher at lunch in his Regent Park home in 1936. He was at his best then; keen, humorous, cynical and yet kindly. He had both knowledge and sympathy with the American Negro, and to me his greatest word was that blast against race prejudice, as the most evil thing in the world - "the very worst!"

Several times when he came to America, he sought me out, calling once at my office at 69 Fifth Avenue. I did not succeed in getting him to Atlanta University, as he was tied up with lecture contracts.

Popularly, Wells is known by his phantastic novels and essays interpreting science to the half-educated. It was an adaptation of one of these in a radio script that scared the unwashed of New Jersey and put Orson Wells on the map, to the greater glory of God.

But Wells primarily was a Socialist; a scientist, pupil of the great Huxley, who saw that the planning of life, and especially of work and wealth is the only answer to the problems of poverty, nationalism and war. War particularly distressed and angered Wells by its inherent stupidity. One of his last prophecies was the self-destruction of the present species of human beings for sheer, dumb blundering, in the face of miracles of science.

Wells was not content with vague generalities. He talked turkey. He called Hitler a "clumsy lout"; Mussolini, "vain and rhetorical" and Stalin, "honest, strong and human". He dubbed Winston Churchill a-would-be Hitler. Only yesterday, he was the only Englishman or American who dared to say that if George of England received bribes from Mussolini, he ought to be dethroned.

36-7-74

All have read at least some of Wells' work, like The War of the Worlds, Tono-Bungay and Marriage. Of all his books, I like best and least his History of the World. I keep it on my shelves near at hand, and every intelligent man should know it and refer to it. It would be antidote to current coventional history. Yet it does not do justice to the Blace Race. It does not to be sure omit and traduce it, but it writes world history and largely leaves the Negro out. For this I do not altogether blame Wells himself. His History was cooperative, in which he selected from chosen collaborators, facts and views which seemed to him true. Where in modern history would he find any writer suggesting the Negroid characteristics of Egypt or the world role of black Ethiopia? Despite all this, it is a great book and Wells was a great man.

He was a gardener's son; he was self-educated through scholarships; he knew toil and disappointment. He dared public opinion. He suffered pain and incurable disease. He was crucified. He did not die but arose from the dead and sits today at the right hand of God.

WINDS OF TIME
by
W. E. B. Du Bois

Once upon a time in Kansas, free settlers from the North and slaveowners from the South clashed. A constitution was adopted at LeCompton which permitted and protected slavery. When the state came to vote on the subject, they found on the ballot that they could vote "for the LeCompton constitution, with slavery" or "for the LeCompton constitution without slavery". And they realized that no matter which way they voted they were voting for slavery.

36-7-75

We have something of the same situation facing us in the United States this fall. The real questions before us fall into six catagories: 1. The question of labor unions; 2. the question of imperialistic rule of colonial regions; 3. the problem of whether we are going to favor Great Britain or Russia; 4. the problem of the "rotten boroughs" of the South, which give a small minority of the nation control of legislation; 5. the problem of state rights for lynching; and 6. the problem of job discrimination.

Yet when we come to the polls next November, and later when we elect a new President, we are not going to have the chance to vote clearly on any one of these subjects. Neither the Democrats or the Republicans have any clear policy with regard to any of these six matters. But both of them agree on one thing and that is private greed. It is the predominant policy in America today that every individual should have the right to make private income by any means that he can, within wide and liberal interpretation of the law. He can receive gifts for which he has made no adequate return, as in the case of the sponsors of the Maritime Monopoly which reaped billions in unwarranted profits, and salved public opinion with diamond bracelets; fantastic salaries and bonuses have been paid; men like Representative May of Kentucky have secured favor and influence by direction of legislation. In fine bribery, graft and theft is rampant.

There is no real public protest against this. We know the people who are doing the essential hard work of the world are scarcely earning enough for decent living while on the other hand, by gambling, bribery, gifts and favors, we have an growing group in this country to whom it makes no difference whether butter costs fifty cents a pound or two dollars; Whether automobiles sell for a thousand dollars or for five. They have plenty of money made during the fantastic war years and still making.

Not only then will we have no opportunity to vote on the main six social questions, we will have absolutely no chance to vote concerning the universal greed. And yet what is it that this greed is doing today? It is hiring all the workmen that it can for the lowest wage which will keep them from striking and ~~making the goods~~ let it make goods in universal demand so that they can sell them at high famine prices. They are going to find out that these goods cannot be bought unless people are earning enough to buy them. By and by those goods piled up and unsold will put people out of their jobs because manufacturing will slow down or stop; and then we will have another of the regular series of crisis which is the history of the nineteenth and twentieth century.

Against this program the Democratic process as applied in the United States is at present absolutely helpless. Notwithstanding this we have in Europe today, making speeches and waving his hands, a Secretary of State who represents disfranchisement, fraud and lynching in South Carolina. He tells the German and the Russian people of the advantages of democracy as typified by the United States; he knows and they know that in the United States is the majority of people cannot today say clearly what they want; that they will not be able to say it in the next congressional and presidential elections.

How long are people of even average intelligence going to allow themselves to be put into this impossible position? And how far do we think that we are fooling anybody? Are we really under the impression that the people of Europe and Asia think that democracy in the United States is something which is going to save the world?

PLANNING

There is little disposition among American Negroes to strike out boldly in thought or action toward new or unusual lines for solving the problem of their place in the modern world. To most of us it seems enough if we "keep up with the Joneses", who are average Americans and do what they do. We distrust our ability to do more than this. But suppose that Americans get on the wrong track, as all folk sometimes do; and suppose that we see things from a different point of view just because we have been so terribly disadvantaged in this land? Take for instance this matter of "individual initiative" and "free enterprise": to a New England white boy of the middle class; to a vigorous young white Westerner, whether of German, Scandinavian, or Irish descent, these phrases make sense; they have seen men start at scratch and become executives, millionaires, senators, presidents. They can easily forget or never know of the vast numbers even of them who have become underpaid laborers, crippled drudges, paupers, bums, beggars and criminals.

We Negroes cannot ignore these, because we know that only by exception and bull-necked luck does even the gifted Negro get a fair chance in America today. We get by and up, now and then, but our enterprise in not free to act and our initiative is heavily handicapped.

What can we do to free our own ability and make it easier for the average colored boy to succeed? Manifestly such action must be social; it must be planned by the group; it must strike out in new and untried ways. It will not be enough to imitate America, especially just at the time when the old American ways are breaking down and social planning is unpopular. No, we must think and plan for ourselves, with faith and independence.

ECONOMIC PLANNING

Especially must we try economic pioneering; we must branch out the new ways of doing things and helping ourselves. The first matter is this question of group production and then comes the distribution of these goods and services among the people who consume them, without the intervention of the middle-man. That is industrial democracy; the carrying out of the consumers cooperatives can lead us into a knowledge of what political democracy really is. We long tried to envisage a modern democracy as mainly political; it is not. So far as it succeeds and where it succeeds, it is and must be economic. We must take out first steps in independent cooperation with the world along such paths.

EDUCATION

The other day Mr. Justice Frankfurter told an audience that education would solve our problems. How true this is and how familiar. What could be more logical: what's wrong with the world but the stupidity and ignorance of men; we have just come through two wars that have near destroyed civilization. Yet we are not only talking of a third war, but preparing for it at top speed. Cannot every intelligent man see that no matter what the world wants, it cannot get it by mass murder? Have not men said this for many thousand years? Does not every library carry proof of this on its shelves? Of course; but who reads? Some people can read but many of these only look at the pictures and scan the headlines; and the headlines contradict or misstate the news. Why do the people refuse to read carefully and think? Why is the world so ignorant and uninformed? Have we not free schools and universal education?

FAILURE OF SCHOOLS

The answer is, we have not, at least in any such degree as we think and say. For years, for decades, we in America have boasted of our educational system. We are said to be extremely intelligent because we have schools, we have libraries, we have public lectures, we have adult education. We Negroes have joined in this chorus: we are in school by the million; we have college graduates by the ten thousands, etc. Yet when the test comes, an amazing number of us cannot read and write decently, cannot count, cannot think straight. A Negro officer who was in the late war teaching recruits, told me that thirty percent of the young Negroes could not read and write. These were men just reaching their prime and presumably exposed to the best of our current education. I know from my own experience that the number of college Negro youth who know enough arithmetic and algebra to reason clearly and accurately, is appallingly small. What is wrong? Have we no brains? Nonsense; we have brains but too few or no schools and too few teachers in them, who have time or space to teach or are paid enough to live while teaching.

OPPORTUNITY FOR EDUCATION

I have not figures and cannot get them; but from wide and long observation I firmly believe that the majority of Negro children in the United States, from 6-18, do not have the opportunity to learn to read and write. We know this is true in the country districts of Mississippi, Louisiana and a half dozen other southern states. But even in the towns and cities of the South, the Negro schools are so crowded and ill-equipped that no thorough teaching is possible. Look at the revelations in rich Atlanta as to conditions in her Negro schools. Nor does it end there. Turn to the North, to the great cities where there is no race segregation in schools and vast sums are expended: many of the colored children there got their elementary training in the South, which means they got little or very poor instruction in reading, writing and arithmetic. Even Northern-born and trained children, find in the average Northern public school, neither the time, space nor individual training so absolutely indispensible to real education. Those living in slums with crime and gambling, ~~they~~ learn more deviltry on the way to school than the school can cope with. Their harassed overworked and underpaid parents cannot give them home surroundings to inspire them. They suffer from this when they enter college, and lack for the most part the supplement of training and guidance, which must complete the training of the school, if the school is to succeed.

STUPIDITY

What is true of Negroes is true in varying degree of whites; some classes of whites are receiving education, but under such conditions that make them regard their intelligence as exceptional and their education designed for a picked class — the same aristocratic poison that has ruined civilization again and again; other classes of whites get fair training, but are taught to regard it chiefly as a means for making money and not for building character or developing a nation; the lower classes ~~are while~~ of whites are as handicapped in education as we are and they help increase the ignorance of our day and hinder us. Americans are not an educated people. Education is not solving our problems; and it will not because it is not being tried in any degree commensurate with the need. We spend millions on education and billions on war. So we have War and continue to be stupid.

W.E.B. Du Bois

I have just received from England "The Voice of Labor" edited by George Padmore. It is an extract from the speeches and reports of the colonial delegates to the World Trade Unions Conference held in Paris, 1945. As the editor says "It was significant for the fact that for the first time in the history of international labour, coloured Colonial workers--the most oppressed and exploited section of the world proletariat--were given the opportunity of voicing their grievances and of expressing their hopes and aspirations" ... He further calls attention to the fact that nearly all the colored delegates to this conference had suffered long terms of imprisonment for their Trade Union activities. Wallace-Johnson for instance, of Sierra Leone had been released from a five and half years imprisonment and exile in West Africa just a few weeks before his arrival in London.

36-7-62

The delegates presented a charter of labor for the colonies asking for: one, the abolition of color bar; two, the abolition of forced labor, child labor and all forms of slavery; three, the abolition of pass law legislation; four, equal pay for equal work; five, abolition of race restrictions against the admission of African and colored laborers into existing white trade unions; and six, legislation for colonial trades unions which should be abreast of that existing in Europe and America.

It was pointed out that progressive African papers regularly have been suppressed and that under present legislation an editor in Nigeria, British West Africa could be fined twelve hundred dollars or sentenced for three years imprisonment or both without trial! In discussing the peace settlement it was proposed that the discussion stop after American, British, Russian and French delegates had spoken. This was challenged and as a result delegates representing Arabs, the people of Jamaica, and West Africa and the Jews had a chance to state their grievances.

When a message was proposed to send a telegram of greeting to President Roosevelt, Marshall Stalin, and Prime Minister Churchill, this was amended by the colonial so as to ask definitely for the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live. In the final declaration two significant paragraphs were inserted "This World Conference rejoices in the declared purpose of the Allied Governments to give effect to the principles of the Atlantic Charter, by recognising and defending the right of all peoples to choose the form of Government under which they will live."... "In the view of this World Conference, it is likewise necessary to bring to an end the system of colonies, dependencies and subject countries as spheres of economic exploitation, and to facilitate immediately the development of free Trade Unions in those countries. In the coming Peace, the foundations must be laid with all possible speed, and in accordance with Article 3 of the Atlantic Charter, of a world order in which non-self-governing communities and nations can attain the status of free nations that will enable them to govern themselves and to develop their own institutions of free citizenship." ... Beyond this there came the [redacted] effort by colored delegates to amend the declaration that it would declar in favor of setting by the colonial powers, of a definite time limit within which the colonies would attain nationhood. This however was lost.

Facts such as these are of great interest to the Negroes throughout the world and this report ought to have wide circulation. It can be ordered through the Chicago Defender [redacted].

PRODUCTIVE SCHOLARSHIP

I want to bring to the attention of my readers a specimen of productive scholarship such as we seldom see. I refer to a book called "A History of Free-Masonry among Negroes in America", by Harry E. Davis of Cleveland.

Usually we think of scholarly work only in connection with universities or by men devoted to letters. But we must remember that this is only because tradition, libraries and surroundings help the scholar usually in schools or in literary circle . Even in such case the work is often hurried, conventional and pedantic because the "scholar is looking on his work as a means not as the end. The real scholar is searching for truth because he really wants to know and he holds himself rigorously to his self-imposed task by the hard rules of honesty, industry and commonsense."

His subject is one long discussed. The existence of an order of Negro masons which is not recognied by the white masons of America.

THE NEGRO MASONS

Much of the past discussion on this subject has been more or less emotional or with only partial collection of facts. Here comes an author who is a busy lawyer; who has held high position in the legislature and the civil service of Ohio. He devotes years to a careful study of the situation. Together with some worthy predecessors in the field he collects an astonishing body of facts. These facts have already been so influential that there is already a movement among the white masons to recognize the legitimacy of the blak lodges is as plainly proven as that of the white lodges.

PROOF

But it is not enough merely to say this. It is a matter of careful digging into documents; testimony of all sorts, books, comparison of dates and indeed all of that careful scholarship which is the basis of modern science. And there can be no doubt of the complete job which Harry Davis has done. Not that it satisfies him he knows as every scientific writer must know that with the best will, with long time and careful research, only part of a story is revealed. There is more, much more, which ought to be dug out. But he has fortunately taken the step of publishing for the world what he has accomplished. It is the bounden duty of every one interested in Negro organizations in the United States to read this book.

SEGREGATION

This does not mean that they should read the book simply because they are interested in Negro secret societies but because it is a way of studying a method of fighting segregation. When the black man is set aside and not allowed to cooperate with his white fellows in any work he can take two attitudes: he can refuse to do anything at all or he can organize his own group and do the work which has to be done. It may be done poorly; he may have to use aneducated and inexperienced men but if the work is of importance, it must be done no matter how it is done. If however, he goes further than this and like the Negro masons not only does the job but does a good job; sets up organizations who are performing their function just as well as the white organizations are; Then in the long run something is going to break. If the white men are just, and numbers of them are, they are going to come to the time when they say, "this segregation by race is nonsense and got to be forgotten." and this is exactly what is beginning to happen among white masons. I do not mean to say that the final steps have been taken but the first step has and this shows the first proof of a wiping out of a segregation where people use their brains instead of their fists; who say a separate lodge, a separate school, a separate church based simply on facial characteristics is wrong but nevertheless we have got to have organizations, we have got to have churches, we have got to have education, and segregation or no segregation we are going to have the sort of lodge, school and church of which we can not only be proud but the whole world will join us. In the long run the world will come to us, even after they have in the beginning, kept us out.

MANNERS

I am worried because of the all too evident lack of manners among the young American Negroes. Partly of course this is imitation. This nation has never had good manners because manners are a matter of the education of the young; of the contact of the child with people of breeding and consideration. Founded, as our nation was by broken members of poorly educated people; by what in the main constituted the lower classes of all mankind, even the case of Negroes, it is natural that we should as a nation have before us no adequate example of what breeding and manners are.

Today particularly after the spiritual devastation of war, we have come to despise manners as broth and unimportant by-product of social living. They are much more than this; they are the basis of social living. I never walk along the street and find the crossways obstructed by people placidly standing in the way of a hundred different folk who want to move, without realizing how lack of social education has affected these people. It is impossible for people to live in groups without careful and thoughtful manners; those which they have themselves had achieved through thought and experience, and that far greater body which have been handed down more or less unconsciously from their fathers and their fathers' fathers.

AFRICAN COURTESY

The Negro especially in Africa is a person of the finest manners. You can see that even today after the rude and murderous way in which the culture of Africa has been uprooted by the whites. There was even more of it in the past. All of the great travellers have mentioned the ceremonious courtesies, the careful thoughtfulness of the Africans in their social life. Like all cultural heritages it was undoubtedly became conventional and overdone, one used to wonder for instance in Japan, at the time it took for ordinary people to bow to each other two or three times; at the careful ceremony in the greeting of parents and superiors.

But in the long run all this, within reason is not wasted; and today the way the young white and even more the young Negroes flout the ordinary patterns of courtesy, makes one blood run colder if not cold.

HOODLUMS

A walk at night along the streets of the Southside in Chicago, of Lenox and Seventh Avenue in New York, of Decator Street in Atlanta, and of similar Negro thoroughfares throughout United States is not simply an adventure, it is a dangerous adventure. Often one is actually in danger of life and limb from heedless and uncouth hoodlums. One stops upon the street to greet even children with care: they may spit in your faces. Our demeanor upon the street cars and in trains makes a Negro ashamed. And there are certain schools in many parts of the nation where teachers go in daily fear and the parents are helpless. We are not all hoodlums and we need not pretend that we are.

This is a new development among American Negroes. The upper class Negroes of fifty years ago were well-bred gentlemen and ladies. Twenty-five years ago, school children learned to obey and that meant not simply dog-like following; it meant some regard to what the world has learned about decency.

A MAJOR PROBLEM

But today that has been unlearned or thrown away and it makes a major problem for our people in the world. As the United Nations comes to make its capital here, one of our tasks is to show them that Americans of Negro descent can be gentlemen and ladies.

It is not a mark of inferiorty to be courteous to the old; to ask pardon bumping into a pedestrian; to give a tired white woman a seat; to help a burdened black mother; to be good-natured, kindly, considerate and self-sacrificing. It is not a mark of superiority to yell and push; to show off in public; to be rude because others are rude; to voer-paint your face and wave your legs because white folks do. It still remains worth while to be dignified decent and well-bred.

Thirty-five years ago, I attended in New York City, a national convention which resulted in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which was incorporated the next year. It was a momentous and epoch-making occasion, but no more so than the convention which I just attended in Columbia, South Carolina of the Southern Negro Youth Congress. When we met in 1909 in New York, it took courage to talk straight even in a Northern state. If such a meeting had been held at that time in the capitol of South Carolina, it would have meant a riot. But in 1935, it was a deed of rare courage for one thousand young Negroes to look the ghost of John C. Calhoun straight in the face and say, in the very faces of the children' children of those who began the War to Preserve Slavery:

MANIFESTO OF THE SOUTHERN YOUTH LEGISLATURE

"We meet in solemn session, militant, courageous Negro Youth of the South. Youth which must and will be served. Youth dedicated to the struggle for freedom. Youth determined to achieve that freedom in its lifetime.

"We have as our program of action

(1) to make ourselves a full-fledged voting generation.

(2) to see that the poll-tax and all barriers to votes are removed.

(3) to realize the enactment of an F.E.P.C. law guaranteeing the right to work at all jobs.

(4) to fight for a federal anti-lynching legislation and genuine civil liberties.

(5) to insist upon adequate and equal housing, health and educationa facilities.

(6) to put an end to 'White Supremacy' customs and practices which violate our human dignity and rights.

"We meet to pledge ourselves to this program, to determine the course of action which must be taken, to fight for the full realization of these our hopes and asperations -- as citizens of the United States."

THE FIRING LINE

This was said, not safe in New York or Chicago; not by cautious, elderly and well-to-do "Leaders", with one eye on their jobs and the other on their new cars; but by young Negroes, with guts, who were not ashamed to be"Negroes" and to take their stand on the firing-line of race-relations in this land. They did not duck and quibble; they were not fighting vaguely for all people everywhere, but for black folk, right here in the South today. And I said to them, looking into their young, clear, eager faces:

"The future of the American Negro is in the South. Here three hundred and twenty-six years ago, they began to enter what is now the United States of America; here they have made their greatest contribution to American culture; and here they have suffered the damnation of slavery and the frustration of reconstruction and the lynching of emancipation. I trust then that an organization like yours is going to regard the South as the firing line of a great crusade. Here is the magnificient climate; here is the fruitful earth under the beauty of the Southern sun; and here is anywhere on earth, is the need of the thinker, the worker and the dreamer. This is the firing line not simply for the emancipation of the American Negro but for the emancipation of the African Negro and the Negroes of the West Indies; for the emancipation of the colored races; and for the emancipation of the white slaves of modern capitalistic monopoly."

A BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE

It was a great honor, which I deeply appreciated, to receive from these young people a crimson volume of recognition of some things I have attempted and done, and have this book signed with many hundreds of their signatures, and tokens of their belief. Nothing I have experienced in past years has touched me so deeply.

In my message to the Southern Negro Youth Congress last month, I made certain assertions which I want others to listen to. I said:

There are enormous opportunities here for a new nation, a new Economy, a new culture in a South really new and not a mere renewal of an old South of slavery, monopoly and race hate. There is a chance for a new cooperative agriculture on renewed land owned by the State with capital furnished by the State, mechanized and coordinated with city life. There is chance for strong, virile Trade Unions without race discriminations with high wage, closed shop and decent conditions of work, to beat back and hold in check the swarm of landlords, monopolists and profiteers who are today sucking the blood out of this land. There is chance for co-operative industry, built on the cheap power of T.V.A. and its future extensions. There is opportunity to organize and mechanize domestic service with decent hours, and high wage and dignified training.

There is a vast field for consumers cooperation, building business on public service and not on private profit as the main-spring of industry. There is chance for a broad, sunny, health home life, shorn of the fear of mobs and liquor, and rescued from lying, stealing polititions, who build their deviltry on race prejudice.

Here in this South is the gateway to the colored millions of the West Indies, Central and South America. Here is the straight path to Africa, the Indies, China and the South Seas. Here is the Path to the Greater, Freer truer World. It would be shame and cowardice to surrender this glorious land and its opportunities for civilization and humanity to the thugs and lynchers, the mobs and profiteers, the monopolists and gamblers who today choke its soul and steal its resources. The oil and sulphur: the coal and iron; the cotton and corn; the lumber and cattle belong to you the workers, black and white, and not to the thieves who hold them and use them to enslave you. They can be rescued and restored to the people if you have the guts to strive for the real right to vote, the right to real education, the right to happiness and health and the total abolition of the father of these scourges of mankind, POVERTY.

"'Behold the beautiful land which the Lord thy God hath given thee.' Behold the land, the rich and resourceful land, from which for a hundred years its best elements have been running away, its youth and hope, black and white, scurrying North because they are afraid of each other, and dare not face a future of equal, independent, upstanding human beings, in a real and not a sham democracy..."

An important experiment in the publication of a daily newspaper has failed or partially failed in New York. A paper, widely known for its independence, its readable size and its accuracy, started some years ago to publish a daily without depending upon advertising, and asking its readers to pay the cost. The price was not high, only five cents a copy.

Of course everyone understands that there can be no free, independent press so long as the press depends mainly upon advertising. If this dependence is small, the influence of the advertiser upon the editorial policy and upon the suppression of news may be correspondently small. But if , as is the case with the great daily newspapers, and especially the magazines of wide circulation, the advertising income is so large that the income from readers is of no real account, then everyone can see that the policy of the periodical will be limited by the advertiser.

It may well be that the advertiser will not be interested one way or the other in many things that are published; but in certain vital matters income, wage, conditions of work, adulteration and checking expenditures, private and public they will be tremendously interested, and the policy of the paper will veer accordingly.

This New York newspaper tried its experiment for some five years. Of course, these were unfortunate abnormal war years. In only one year did it succeed in balancing its income and expenditure; in other years there was a deficit which was met by a philanthropist. Finally the philanthropist decided that he could no longer meet the deficit; and the paper now is going to receive advertising.

It affirms naturally that the advertising will be of a "high grade" and used mainly to meet a comparatively small deficit. Nevertheless a great principle has failed and until the time comes in the United States when readers are willing to pay for the full cost of publishing the news, for the full cost of furnishing literature in periodicals, and books; until that time comes, it is idiotic to think that we are going to have free press; to think that the newspapers are going to tell the whole truth without bias or to think that the picture newspaper are going to present a fair and complete picture of what the world is doing. ¶ Here, of course, is the place for the greatest single reform that could occur to make this a world of reason and decency. Our own knowledge of what is going on is continually poisoned at the source. There are some communities like New York, London, and Paris, where a competitive press is able to put the news before the public if the public has time to read all. But if most readers of the United States are given their information from one biased source; if news is distorted and suppressed because Big Business wants it so, then there is no use of talking reform because the basic requirement for reform, knowledge of the truth, is missing. ¶ Something of the same thing happens with weekly and monthly press. There is a small independent weekly press but its circulation is ridiculous in size as compared with the population of the United States. On the other hand there are monthlies with circulations going up into the millions; but look at them to see what they mean: one has to prowl through page after page of advertisement; it is almost impossible to tell when the advertisements end and the information begins, or which is advertisement and which information. The income from advertisers in these periodicals reaches fanastic figures; which means that the periodical has one main object: to keep the advertisers satisfied by a guarranteed circulation and therefore the readers must be pleased, not necessarily informed, but entertained. Fabulous sums are spent on pictures, on fiction, on clever and artistic writing of all sorts; but there is no probability of such a periodical carefully, strenuously and continually seeking for its readers a complete and real picture of what is happening

CHRISTMAS

The Association for the Abolition of Christmas has not yet been established but I am waiting to become a charter member. Of course I love Christmass trees and Christmas carols; but what makes me furious, is the habit of people buying useless and silly presents, and distributing them among folk who do not want them. If there is something of use and value that you want to give a friend, why wait until Christmas? Or if you have waited until Christmas, there is one kind of gift that will be appreciated, that is, books. Books have not yet shared the terrible rise in prices. They are still to be had at reasonable cost.

ROBESON

First of all, buy and read and give Shirley Graham's "Paul Robeson, Citizen of the World". You will find it at all good book stores for it is selling widely. Of course, you know of Shirley Graham. She burst on the world a few years ago in that opera "Tom Tom", sponsored by the city of Cleveland. She wrote the words and music and arranged ~~and conducted~~ the opera. Ernst Lert of the Metropolitan Opera conducted. It was an extraordinary accomplishment.

Then when the federal theatre project was on, she went to Chicago and took charge of the tottering Negro theatre. She put it on its feet, stealed the "Swing Mikado" which had a long run in Chicago and a frank imitation a longer run in New York. Then Miss Graham turned to writing books for children: first that clever life of Carver, and then this book on Paul Robeson; and in a few weeks the world will hear of another extraordinary biography which she has written.

CHILDREN

I recommend Paul Robeson especially for colored children.

We have a great deal of defeatist literature among us; our books and newspapers are full of stories of discrimination and complaint. We ought therefore to have in our homes something which tells of encouragement and triumph. And this is what the life of Paul Robeson does. It is extraordinary how this black boy of New Jersey has walked upward from triumph to triumph. Carl Van Doren writes the preface and says "I shall never forget the first time I heard Paul Robeson sing 'Water Boy', at a party in New York... This was not merely a throat singing. It was a great body living a song. Was it only my fancy that I heard a race remembering? They had come down through time gathering power until they flooded America. The best American music had sprung from them." No where has Robeson's march of accomplishment been recorded as in Shirley Graham's book.

TWO MORE BOOKS

But the writing of the Graham family does not end here; there is a brother Lorenz who has just had published two books almost simultaneously. Lorenz, one of the five Graham children, spent several years in West Africa and brings to us: "Tales of Momolu" with striking illustrations by Letterio Calapai. These tales are for children and will make a lovely Christmas present for young ones of eight and up. Beside this Mr. Graham has published a series of folk tales "How God Fix Jonah". These are told in verse in the peculiar idion of the West African native which is forcible and expressive. My preface says: "This is the stuff of which literature is made; and in the lore of the world, the literature of Africa has its place although it is often forgotten."

Therefore buy and give books and help take the muss out of Christmas.

Winds of Time

By W. E. B. Du Bois

I remember rather vividly the thrill of apprehension that went through the mass of American Negroes when Grover Cleveland was elected president in 1885. I had just entered the sophomore class at Fisk University and was seeing the South for the first time. Here came a president who represented the first triumph of the pro-slavery Democract party since 1856; and Negroes hardly knew what to expect.

Cleveland lost in 1889 but was elected in 1893. He was a New York man and although he tried hard to be friendly with the South, he was at the same time eminently fair toward Negroes. Nevertheless in the election of 1889, 1893, and 1897 Negroes were not voting on the pressing questions of the day; they were voting on the matter of their fundamental human rights. Disfranchised in the South they could not to any great extent take much part in the Populist movement. They did not see Free Silver as any part of their problem, and they were estranged from the growing labor movement by the attitude of most of the unions toward Negro membership.

Nevertheless I remember being among a small group of Negroes who approached William Jennings Bryant. He was pleasant to us but he avoided then and afterwards, the Negro problem. The economic problem which was underneath the race problem and intertwined with it, did not changed our attitude toward him.

We were very pleased when McKinley was elected. Yet the presidency was bought for McKinley by the contributions of the rich and he represented reaction and the rule of wealth. He deliberately and unnecessarily put us into war with Spain.

The country was saved by Theodore Roosevelt. The first Roosevelt was a hero among Negroes. He appointed Negro officials in the South and stood by them, but finally he was unfair to Negro soldiers. During his presidency Booker Washington became the mouthpiece of the Negro and for that reason the revolt among younger Negroes began and in 1906 the Niagara Movement was founded, which 1910 became the N.A.A.C.P. Taft in his Negro attitude went over to the South bag and baggage and it was for that reason that Negroes led by the late Bishop Walters supported Wilson in his first election. This support was not large numerically but it had a large psychological effect. For the first time Negroes listened to leaders who advocated the election of a democract. The result was disastprous for the South got squarely in the saddle.

In the election of 1912 the Negroes thought they saw a chance in the third party led by Roosevelt. I wrote a plank for the progressive party at its Chicago meeting. It was carried there by Joel Spingarn and was supported by Jane Addams and others; but it was defeated and Theodore Roosevelt tried to break the Solid South by having a Louisiana politician named as his running mate. The result was the election of Woodrow Wilson for a second term and soon came the first World War.

36-7-55

The discrimination and turmoil of the war turned Negro voters from the Democratic Party and we hoped to gain with Harding not simply a friend but a blood brother. He helped us in Haiti but that was about all. Coolidge was even cooler to us than to most worthy objects. Hoover was an enemy of the black man. Then came Franklin D. Roosevelt and with his second election for the first time a majority of Negroes supported the Democratic Party.

2 December 1946

Winds of Time

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

The reign of Roosevelt has had extraordinary repercussions within the Negro race. To some people, and especially critics of the Negro, it has been charged the large Negro following which Franklin D. Roosevelt sedured was based on his relief program; that practically he bought the Negro race by giving them bread. This is an exaggeration and yet even in so far as it is true, it is no discredit to the American Negro. The basic difficulty of the Negro during and since the slavery has been his abject poverty. Any social program that improves and increases his income or increase his opportunity to secure income should and does appeal to him. He suffered most in the terrible depression of the thirties and he was attracted most by a social program which gave him food and clothes when he needed them.

But this was not the full extent of the impact of Roosevelt's ideas upon the Negro. Roosevelt and his New Deal was a partially successful attempt to organize industry and to build a floor for wages. The Negro both politican and layman began to have a new idea as to what politics could accomplish. They began to realize that business was not and ought not to be out of politics. That one of the duties of government was to see that poverty was reduced and through the reduction of poverty to attack disease and ignorance.

He realized that a man can get for his vote not simply the largess of the ward politican but laws which will make schools for his children; which will give him hospitalization; which will give him protection in old age and above all give all a chance to work at decent wages.

This new synthesis of political activity and social uplift was hammered into the mind of the American Negro by Franklin D. Roosevelt. It was a great and significant forward step.

Under Truman this program has become as nothing and Negroes must realize it. Without any stable ideals; without any real fight he gave up the control of prices and left us to almost unlimited inflation. He has joined the movement to stop strikes mistaking the phenomenon for the cause. It is not labor unrest that we must attack; it is the basic cause of that unrest, low wages and high prices.

Now as we face the election of 1948, we like other Americans are going to find ourselves in the unfortunate position of not being able to choose as we want to choose, between the advocate of social uplift by government action, and the advocate of anarchy in business with the devil taking the hindmost. While we will have no such choice on the presidential ticket we can approach a choice of that sort in the election of members of Congress. We must therefore concentrate our attention more upon the local than upon the national candidate; that is the lesson of 1946.

A YOUTH CREED

I recommend the following creed for Negro youth:

First, we recognize the basic difficulties of our group in America: P.I.D. that is Poverty, Ignorance, and Disease; we want to fight these handicaps with all our strength: Poverty is the first, because it is the fundamental cause of the others; ignorance prevents our ability to function in a democracy; and disease is premature death of ability, happiness and life itself.

Secondly, and consequently, we want the chance to work at tasks for which we are fitted, which will employ our ability and gift to the utmost and which will return us not wealth and display, but sufficient for a decent modern life.

EDUCATION

Thirdly, we want education for ourselves and our folk; adquate, expertly taught, and continuing through the elementary grades through high school and as far beyond that as proven gift and desert show is clearly for human welfare, no matter what the race, sex, or religion of the recipient. This education is a public duty and should be at public expense. It should continue beyond school years, and in the form of adult education for all.

36-7-50

Fourthly, we want immediate, continuous and scientific effort to fight disease, regardless of poverty or race and without limitation of necessary expenditure. No cure can be half as expenseive as disease. We need physicians, nurses, hospitals and medical research for every citizen.

AGE AND YOUTH

We do not regard the separation of an organization into adult and youth departments as fundamental or even useful, unless its one possible advantage is strictly adhered to: namely, that fully grown and developed persons have the experience of life and the accumulated wisdom that all need; at the same time bitter experience may makesthem timid, hesitating and ready to compromise with Truth and Right. Unbowed youth has courage, strength, enthusiasm and the vision to see stars through clouds, even though their boundless faith may often mistake the distance of those stars.

36-7-51

We assert that the object of life is happiness and that the only fair limitation on my pursuit of happiness is interference in any real way with your happiness. Then and only then does sacrifice become duty. We demand then facilities for pleasure and enjoyment, by public appropriation and private initiative. We demand marriage by careful plan, children limited by thoughtful foresight, and in all life equality of sexes.

The courageous action of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in unfrocking two bishops in a specially convened General Conference, merits the attention and the applause of the American Negro world and indeed of all men.

The A.M.E. Church is probably the most powerful Negro organization on earth. And when we add to that the fact that it has existed now for over one hundred and fifty years, its influence and accomplishment can be appreciated. In spite of the fact that it was organized among unlettered slaves and freedmen, and that during the first hundred years of its life, the majority of its members could not read or write, it has nevertheless maintained its organization and defended, amid all sorts of difficulties, its religious and spiritual ideals. Above all, it has achieved a popular democracy unparalelled in any other Negro organization.

To be sure great power is concentrated in the hands of the bishops and to some extent their arbitrary will can be enforced but back of the bishpps has stood the power of the local preachers; and back of the preachers, the power of the membership which is real, and is continually brought to bear upon the policies of the churchs. Today as we have seen it has compelled the unfrocking of two bishops.

My first work as a young teacher at the age of twenty-six was in the leading educational institution of this church. Then and since then, I have often criticised this church and its methods, but I have never failed to hold its struggles and accomplishments in the deepest respect, and for many of its great leaders like Payne and Lee I have felt veneration. Particularly have I seen in this institution a social center of astonishing efficiency where the poor and ostracised met in human sympathy, mutual charity and encouragement, to fight the battle of life. I have therefore watched with apprehension certain recent developments. At the General Conference a few years ago, there came a candidate for the bishopric from a great city with several thousand dollars in his pocket, openly designed to bribe the members of the Conference and buy his way into high office. We may criticize these delegates, Lay and Clerical, for the way in which they have succumbed in recent years to contribution by candidates toward their "expenses". But we cannot forget the miserable and irregular pittance upon which large numbers of them must live.

In the case of which I have spoken the bribery reached a climax and was a national scandal. The Church knew it and was aghast; but how it could bring the power of the hierachy and especially the public opinion of the membership, to bear upon this situation, was a difficult problem.

Finally however, as other irregularities and usurpations of power arose, the church girded up its loins. It resolved to clean house and to stop certain outrageous infractions of its moral code and its spiritual authority. This was finally expressed in a special meeting of the General Conference where a thousand delegates voted almost unanimously to unfrock two bishops. They did not in this action clear all of the unfortunate elements out of the church body, but they did attack two and they gave firm notice to other that this Church was going to express its authority and it was going to stand for decent leadership.

The Negro people of the United States have reason to be proud of this exhibition of unity and democratic power.

Not long ago I attended at the Hotel Astor the sixth annual dinner of the Nobel Anniversary Committee, commemorating the fifthieth year of the death of the Swede who invented dynamite. Alfred Nobel left his great wealth mainly to establish a prize fund for advancement in physical sciences, discoveries in chemistry, and in physiology and medicine; for ideal literary work, and for the person who did most or labored best for the cause of peace.

These Nobel prizes are awarded once every five years. This year the peace prize was divided between Emily Balch, who did so much for freeing Haiti, and then was dismissed from Wellsley because of her radicalism; and John R. Mott, the Y.M.C.A. leader. The chairman of the dinner, Pearl S. Buck who has done so much to make us understand China and herself received a Nobel prize in 1938. The guests were banked in two rows. Sixteen speakers and distinguished persons at the first table; fourteen guests of honor at the raised table behind them.

Many distinguished persons were there: Benjamin Cohen, Assistant Secretary General of the United Nations, Fanny Hurst the novelist, Lin Utang the Chinese author, Jo Davidson the sculptor, the Norwegian Ambassador and the Danish Consul General. A nephew of Alfred Nobel was among the speakers and strong words were said for peace.

One word seemed to be lacking and I was glad when the chairman asked me to say the final word. This is what I said:

"We have heard tonight an interesting summary of the vital interest in world peace which is shared by radio and cinema, science and the press, statesmen and teacher, woman and soldier, and students of society. Will you for one minute let me add a last word: the black folk of the world have small recognized place in any of these nine categories. Yet at the triumphant end of this program, may I remind you that these two hundred millions of men and other millions of their fathers, through slavery and degradation from 1441 to 1863 and decades thereafter, gave the modern world the foundation of its wealth and power. Victims of war in the midst of a century's crusade for peace, they still stand as the greatest single temptation to further war.

"There can be no certain peace in this world so long as cheap labor in Africa can furnish diamonds and gold, oil and cocoa, copper and a hundred other materials over which Europe and America stand ever willing to fight. The emancipation of the black masses of the world is one guarantee of a firm foundation for world peace."

Every Negro organization in the United States ought to send an official note of thanks to Madame Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, member of the Indian delegation of the United Nations, who may be addressed at the Department of External Affairs, New Delhi, India.

Madame Pandit is a sister of Jawaharlal Nehru, great leader of India freedom. But she should be known to all persons of African descent, as the leader of the successful assault upon the color line in the United Nations Assembly. Her repeated and impassioned attacks upon that Great Hypocrite, Jan Smuts, were successful in putting through the Assembly, by two-thirds vote, a declaration against the color line in South Africa as applied to Indians.

But Mrs. Pandit did not confine her attack upon this most backward of so-called civilized nations, to the Indian problem. She repeatedly spoke of the situation of the Natives and the disabilities under which they labor. We should thank her wholeheartedly for her unselfish and courageous attitude. The directors of the N.A.A.C.P. have ordered such a resolution sent to her.

Many American Negroes will ask how it happened that the Negroes of the world had to be defended by an Indian, while the rest of the colored world was apparently silent, with the notable exception of General Romulo of the Philippines. The answer is clear. Negroes in the United States could have no voice in the United Nations except through the American delegates. The spokesmen of that delegation, John Foster Dulles, representing particularly the Christian Church, was throughout the debate, silent or reactionary, and no pressure put upon him was availing.

In the case of Liberia, Haiti and Ethiopia, the situation was difficult. Dr. Cassels, of Liberia, made one widely commended speech but it was cast in general terms. A Haitian delegate spoke well, But in both these cases, the hands of the countries were tied; Liberia is part of American imperialism, through the investment of the Firestone Company, and through the naval and airplane bases in her territory. While still nominally independent, she is in no position to oppose or challenge American policy outside her own affairs, so long as her home economy and defense are tied to America.

The development of Haiti, in the same way, like that of the whole West Indian region, is subordinated to American policy and naval might. Haiti can only export the best of her valuable products to the United States with permission and such permission to export depends upon the American attitude toward Haiti. She still owes the United States nearly ten million dollars. She does not feel free then to incur unnecessary enemity.

In the same way Ethiopia is tied to the British orbit. It was Britain who finally helped free Ethiopia from Italy; but Britain still has troops in Ethiopia, is holding one of her richest provinces, and is spparently opposing her access to the sea, in the ancient Ethiopian province of Eritrea. Ethiopia is in no position to challenge British imperialism outside her own territories.

Of course we all could wish that despite these obvious reasons, these three countries had joined clearly and courageously with Madame Pandit and General Romulo in the defense of the darker peoples, especially in Africa. But our strongest line of action is political pressure on our delegation to the United Nations. At any rate, our thanks are due to Madame Pandit and should be sent immediately in the most gracious terms.

The death of the wife of one of my dearest friends and illness in my own family leads me to reflect upon the heavy burden which lies upon the women of the Negro middle-class. Relatively they work harder and bear a more intensive burden than persons of most any other group. The poorest of our women, black and white, have a hard time: difficult labor and small return; but after their work is done, they are through; they have no burden of responsibility for their group, for the surrounding world. They do no have the feeling that the burden of proof covering their whole race rests upon their shoulders.

When however, a Negro belongs to the professional classes, like teachers, lawyers or physicians; or to the mercantile class: as small retailers; or employees in the white collar class, he usually marries a young woman who has been brought up in a sheltered life; who has had a fair and perhaps good education and is interested in the world about; but usually she is not by training a housekeeper as her mother and more particularly, her grandmother was. She takes on, however, the burden of housekeeping because she must. The family income is seldom large enough to pay the high wage which domestic servant today demands and certainly deserves.

This means however that the young wife of a professional Negro or white collar worker has extraordinary burden put upon her. She must carry on a household; cook and serve the meals; and in addition to that, take care of one or two children. The hazards of housekeeping are tremendous simply in the matter of accidents. The hard physical labor is exhausting. The result is that the woman at the end of a day is tired almost to death, but her work is not done. She must keep up appearances. She must have a neat and pleasant home. She must be ready, at least now and then, to welcome guests and cater to them. She must put up an appearance which will make her husband proud of her and ready to taken her out, now and then, and in a sense put her on exhibition. Even though she may be so tired that she can scarcely stand.

In addition to this, she may even try to keep up her intellectural interests: to read papers and books, to attend lectures; to remember in some degree that she is an educated woman.

Large numbers of women simply fall by the wayside; they either neglect their homes or their children, or much more readily they neglect their intellectual life. They may become slovenly so that the husband complains of his home and of his wife's appearance. All of this may strain if it does not disrupt the household. At any rate, it means that at forty if the woman remains a housekeeper, she begins to grow old; she is continually tired; she becomes early a prey to disease. She dies long before her time or if she does not die loses her comeliness and her interest in life.

Something of course must be done about this. In numbers of cases the wife gets a job and the home becomes a lodging. If this does not happen, the housework must be lessened, this is the reason that instead of having single homes like the former generation, we are crowding into apartments and flats because it lessens the work. This is the reason that we are eating in restuarants. No one who is not used to cooking a good meal knows what it takes out of a person. It is tremendous relief to go and sit down and be waited on even if the food is only fair. But more in this line must be done. Husbands must share housework, if they want a home. Some do, but shamefacedly. Community kitchens cooperative service, and of course, already baking and washing have largely gone out of the home and ought to entirely. ~~Here is a matter that deserves attention and conference;~~

There is distinct encouragement for the American Negro and American democracy in the Bilbo case. Whether he is eventually denied his seat in the United States Senate or not, these things are clear: first, the Republican party feels compelled to make bid for the Negro vote; secondly, the well-known denial of democracy in the southern South has been publicized to an unusual extent; third, it was made clear that (the) influence of money upon elections in the United States is wide-spread and effective and the Senate was careful not to have the matter explored very far.

The situation that now confronts us, is whether the bid of Republicans and Democrats for the Negro vote is high enough. What we ought to demand of either or both parties is the enforcement of democratic methods in the South. We ought to impress upon the people of the United States that this is not merely a Negro question: it is a question of effective democracy.

There can be no third party movement in the United States until the Southern oligarchy and rotten borough system is put out of business. I have been hammering at this truth since 1924 when I published a map and figures in the Crisis to show how the South was dominating the nation and making democratic methods impossible. It is exceedingly interesting to find in a recent editorial in the New York Times, the exact argument which I used twenty-one years ago, to show the present situation which has persisted for three quarters of a century.

For sixteen years now the Republican party has been kept out of power because of the political domination which the disfranchisement of both white and black voters in the South has given to a handful of Southerners who have not only used the political power of the disfranchised but also influenced legislation through their chairmanships of the most important committees in Senate and House.

Something ought to be done and done now. And yet no steps are apparently being taken. The reason is that, as Mr. Taft craftily indicated in his recent southern trip, the financial investment of the North in the South gives the Republican party still the hope that this southern political power can eventually come into their hands without facing the Negro problem. We should make it clear that this is not only impossible, but improbable; and that we know exactly what is taking place.

On the other hand, so far as the Democrats are concerned, Mr. Truman's message was good; but we know from bitter experience that Mr. Truman does not stand back of his own words and his own convictions. We must, therefore, work upon the liberal wing of the Democratic party and impress upon them the fact that the reactionary remnant of their party in the South has got to be displaced and they can eventually depend upon Negro votes to do this.

Anti-lynching and poll-tax legislation is important but we can expect little from them until our political power is increased; and on the other hand, beneath and beyond political power, is a chance to make a living; a chance to get an income which will make us independent of the coercion of monopoly.

Winds of Time

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

There has begun again in the United States a period of witch-hunting and Red-baiting which is simply an effort to distract the thought of the people of the United States from the main issues which confront them and the world.

At this crisis in world history, there are certain matters of primary importance, which ought to be considered and acted upon. They are, to list them in three categories: first, poverty, and the distribution of wealth, and the relation of private property, monopoly and privilege to this set of problems. Secondly, education and democracy and the ethical problems of carrying out popular government. Third, the role of the state and private enterprise in the planning of industry.

There are, as we all know, powerful and influential groups of people who do no want these subjects even discussed; they do not believe that poverty can be abolished or that it ought to be abolished. They are satisfied with the present distribution of wealth; they do not think that industry can be carried on without the predominant motive of private profit; and they are willing to condone monopoly and privilege in order to keep the status quo.

This is a serious situation. The poverty of the mass of people in the world is the main cause of crime, disease and ignorance. It must be abolished or the world cannot go forward to civilization. The road toward the abolition of poverty is intelligent public discussion among men of education and character. This is being impeded today by every devise of power and propaganda. Again the number of people who do not believe in democracy today is far larger than folk assume. They emphasize the stupidity of the majority of men, and at the same time, make little effort to see that they are educated. The success of Russia in practically wiping out illiteracy in a generation has not encouraged the world nearly as much as it has alarmed the enemies of democratic government. Here again there must be wide and careful discussion of our methods of education, of the amount of money that must be appropriate to further education, and the safeguards which can be built up and enforced to make the democratic methods workable.

Thirdly, there is every effort being made today to render it impossible for people even to discuss planned economy. We talk as though private unregulated enterprise is the only natural method of industrial organization and that the state must be reduced to the smallest possible role. This is in contradiction of the best thought of the world and to the increasing practice of the world.

To stop intelligent discussion of poverty, education, democracy and the role of the state in industry, we are being diverted toward a concerted attack upon socialism in England, Communism in Russia, and state planning anywhere. Every liberal movement and the main trade union movements are taking up most of their time and putting most of their emphasis upon fighting Communism.

Why? Because the Communist has a plan for abolishing poverty, for educating the masses and for state control of industry. It is idiotic for reasonable human beings to attack any set of arguments or any political system in so far as that thought and system is aimed toward accomplishing exactly what every thoughtful human being wants today. As Nehru, of India recently said: "With most of the objects of Communism I am in complete accord." If there are other objects which are not desirable or defensible; if some people do not like Russia and Russian methods; that has nothing to do with trying to find a way of attacking the mistakes of private enterprise.

Stop witch-hunting and Red-baiting by postive effort to attack poverty, ignorance and private monopoly.

The proposed budget submitted to the Congress by the President of the United States was an extraordinarily interesting document. We find that according to his proposal, over half of the fantastic sum of money which must be araised by public taxation will go for preparation for war or as the result of recent wars. This is the price which we are going to pay for organized murder during the next two or three generations.

The other side of this picture is this. For social welfare, health and security, only 4% of our national income will go. For agricultural and agricultural resources only 3½%. For education and research only 2½%.

We complain in modern countries and especially in the United States that democracy does not work. We know that education in itself will not make a country democratic; but we also know that the first step toward implementing democracy, is to have an intelligent class of voters. We cannot have intelligent voters unless we spend money for education. Private income is not sufficient and should not be used for education. Education is a public duty which should be carried on by public taxation and should compulsory and free to the people. Despite this we are starving our teachers; we are not providing schools or facilities for our children to anywhere to the extent to which these things are needed. We spend twice as much for liquor as for education. And the reason we are not doing this is because we raise for federal usage alone forty-five billion dollars in taxes and God knows how much by local taxation, and yet are devoting less than 2% of the federal income for education.

This is the reason that democracy fails; this is the reason that instead of appealing to the sense of right, inherent in normally educated human beings we are resorting to bribery in elections; to undue influence in political office; to intimidation and beating, in order to carry on what we call democratic government.

Instead of so arranging our expenditures that we take out necessary and harmful sum that organized war demands, we should first take out money for security, education, health and science. Then we could build a nation to which everybody would be proud to belong.

I went out of the business of prophecy at the time of the First World War; but today somehow I am tempted to try again. There seems to be little doubt but what money is going to be used in large quantities in the presidential election of 1948.

The Republican party and its supporters like the powerful industrial combines are going to put into this election just as much money as is needed to carry it. Those of us therefore who are interested in the future of this land and of American Negroes, will begin to notice pretty soon that certain newspapers, periodicals and vehicles of opinion will be seeing new light and will be especially impressed by Republican arguments: arguments written down on paper and arguments even more powerful which are not written down. There will also be a number of bold wheel-horses, "leaders of their people", who will become increasingly eloquent in the matter of the Negro voting Republican in 1948.

I should be the last to say that a change of political belief from the leftist parties to the right was necessarily an indication of bribery or undue influence; but I would call it to the attention of my readers that when such changes occur, the reasons for them must be plain and convincing. If for instance the Republican party does changes its stripes in this next election; if it stands for a Fair Employment Practice Commission; if it works against the poll-tax; if it really unseats Bilbo and attacks the forces of Bilbosim and of his fellow traveller, Rankin; if it does not attempt to destroy or cripple trade unions; if it passes a anti-lynching bill; if it does all of these things or any reasonable part of them, then the American Negro has a right to say that his allegiance should be changed from the fallen democracy of Roosevelt to the new Republican party for it will indeed be new.

On the other hand, if under reactionaries like Taft and Bricker; or opportunists like Dewey; the Republican party gives lip service to the Negro, and proceeds to do in the future exactly what it has done in the past, then we who look on, will be convinced that if our leaders and newspapers change their position, it will not be because of rational argument

Or looking toward the Democrats, there is no question but what the Democratic party under Roosevelt did more for the American Negro than any party in the last twenty-five years. The fact that it accomplished these things, in spite of a southern reaction and prejudice is all to its credit. It is quite possible that a saving liberal wings of the Democrats will still hold their reactionaries in check and will proceed along the program of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. In that case there will be no call for change of political allegiance among American Negroes. But if, as unfortunately seems likely today, the Democratic party is going to be divided into two parts: one composed of Southern reactionaries and the other composed of Northern Progressives chiefly interested in fighting Communism and only luke-warm to the rights of Negroes, labor and other minorities; then again we might turn our allegiance to the unsatisfactory Republicans or to some third party. But remember, that the basis of our political thought in the campaign of 1948 should be political action and not the amount of money which certain persons and organizations are on the brink of spending. One thing we should bring to their attention: it may be that the carefully laid plans of Republicans and Democrats may run into a depression which will knock their conspiracies sky high. If you do not believe that, ask Mr. Hoover.

Winds of Time

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

The organization known as the Progressive Citizens of America has laid down a platform which, as it seems to me, is of prime importance to American Negroes. It warns that an era of danger and promise has begun. That war has been "hideous and costly"; that economic depression has been "hideous and costly"; that the repression of men's freedom has been "needless and criminal".

But this organization believes that we can make a fight for life and win it, although it admits that the struggle will be bitter.

It takes a stand against the new isolationism which views the world not as a brotherhood of people but as "an economic pie to be divided among cartels." This is international anarchy. The organization seeks therefore unity among progressives and wishes to begin with state and community committees. It know that the Republican party is not a liberal party; and while under Roosevelt the Democratic party served a progressive cause, it knows that it has now abandoned this program and these opinions. for "Jim-Crowism" and sheer greed.

It calls for, therefore, for action: one, a stand for the rights of labor against injunctions or change in the Wagner National Labor Relations Acts for repeal of the Smith-Connally Act, and defeat of all measures designed to curtail the rights and its economic security. It stands for help to agriculture, that is, of the family-owned and operated farm; it stands for business enterprise free from monopoly control and free to provide a higher standard of living for all people. It wants strict enforcement of anti-trust legislation; it calls for adequate educational opportunities for all Americans; federal aid to education and the abolition of unequal and segregrated facilities for Negroes and other groups. It wants help for health and better homes. It wants civil and political rights. A federal Civil Rights Act; a federal anti-lynching bill; elimination of the so-called "Committee on un-American Activities"; and the enfranchisement of the residents of the District of Columbia. It wants Theodore Bilbo kept out of the Senate and abolition of the poll-tax; it calls for the fulfillment of our obligations to veterans and for opposition to militarism and imperialism, action against Spain and Argentina and the admission of refugees to the United States.

It insists upon reciprocal trade agreements, the lowering of tariff walls, loans to devastated nations and international relief. It wants unification of China without outside pressure; the stoppage of the manufacture of atomic bombs; the elimination of the stock piles of those bombs and the just and lasting peace.

To my mind this is an excellent program and I endorse it fully. And yet it is most discouraging to find a parallel movement or progressives placing its first emphasis upon fighting communism, and classing Russian Communism which saved civilization from Hitler as one with Fascism.

27 February 1947

Winds of Time

by

W.E.B. Du Bois

I am a pacifist. I mean by that I am one of those persons who strongly opposes war. I will not say that I think war is never justifiable. When Poland was attacked by Hitler I suppose there was nothing else to do but to try to fight back. I am fairly certain that Touissant and Christopher of Haiti were right in fighting against France, Spain and England. And yet I believe that in nine cases out of ten even defensive warfare is not only ineffective but definitely wrong; and the sign of a great new leadership which Asia is assuming over the whole civilized world is shown in the extraordinary steps which India is taken toward freedom and democracy, without war. Not without disorder and even murder; but not with organized war.

Alone among the great states of the world, India is slowly but surely accomplishing her freedom without war. She is following the pacifism of Gandhi and the restraint of Nehru; and she has already succeeded to an astonishing extent. If and when she does succeed; it will be tremendous proof that war is unnecessary even in extreme cases of self-defense.

On the other hand there is growing up in the United States a distinct and mischievous propaganda in favor of war and against pacifism. It was once the honorable duty of an American to place himself among the pacifists of the world. Today it is almost shameful. Today not only our religion, but out science and our politics, are being based upon militarism. We are on the verge of legalising universal conscription and training of all youth as soldiers and sailors. We have a general guiding our foreign relations, generals and admirals ruling our conquered territories and military men in our chief embassies.

It is to the shame of the United States that this has happened. It is a retrogression in human progress and denial of the principles of the Prince of Peace. American Negroes especially should not be tempted by this universal propaganda. War is wrong and futile.

35-1-243

What then are the intelligent to do and the men of good-will in order to fight against militarism? The fight may be difficult and for a time almost in vain. Imagine today the grip which the Army and Navy have upon truth-seeking in the great universities of the United States. Imagine the State Department being headed by a general; and our whole policy toward Europe and the defeated nations of the world being carried out by military men. Conceive the kind of education which a military man receives today, when the leadership today should be anti-military, pro-pacifist, and based on the great thought of peace on earth, good will toward men. It shows the contradiction of our current philosophy to realize that we have taken over the false doctrine that those who seek peace should be prepared for war. We who know that Peace is Civilization and War, barbarism, should inveigh against War. Show its cost and cruelty; its tragedy and futility. We should let the flag stand for Peace not war and convince men that Victory is always defeat if it is bought by murder.

Winds of Time

W. E. B. Du Bois

Certain recent happenings remind us how tremendously the world has turned to gambling in these post-war years and this fact impels me to revert to this subject. Without doubt today gambling is the greatest industy on earth and the meaning of this is sinister. It means that turning from Faith and Science, we have to an extraordinary degree dedicated ourselves to Chance. We believe in luck and good fortune. We lack correspondingly faith in human effort and good will. Our only effective restraint on gambling today is effort to see that the gambling is as we say, fair: that is that human effort does not come in to determine results.

Recent happenings illustrate all this: in New York City a broker was called up for jury duty and was asked if he could judge a gambling charge fairly; "Oh, yes" he said, "You see, I am a gambler myself." The firm that employed him was outraged at this answer and dismissed him. But what he said was perfectly true. The Stock Market is mainly a vast and complicated and gambling operation. The persons who run it, for the most part invest in stocks, not because they want to have part in the organization of industry but because they want to make money on changes in price.

Or again recently a young man was arrested in New York for trying to "fix" a football game. The accusation made a tremendous sensation; it was on the front pages of the newspapers; it was discussed all over town and throughout the nation. Yet what was the fact? The fact was that the offense of this young man was in trying to interfere in gambling.

What we call "Sport" today both amateur and professional, is not mainly a matter of exercise and healthful competition. It is a carefully organized business for the sake of the betting which takes place on the results. Colleges have long recognized this but they have been able to do little about it. Our gambling instinct is too ingrained in what we call our civilization. The main counteracting effort to see that those who seek to "queer" the gambling game are punished. But in other efforts, like policy and the numbers little is really done because they victimize poor and impotent people.

Whatever is the result, whatever the effort may be, we face the situation where to any increasing degree human life and industrial income depend upon chance and less and less upon organized effort. This is perhaps the most dangerous thing that could happen to a civilization. It means loss of faith in what human beings can do; it mean of course absolute loss of faith in any power above us guiding us for good.

Perhaps we adults of this generation are so caught in the gambling organization that we can do little for ourselves but we certainly can do something for our children. It should be the business of every honest parent to warn children against games of chance; against betting on their high school team, against betting on cards and billiards; against playing slot machines. If you want your child to be a honest worker with faith in the efficiency of human effort, for God's sake guard him against gambling.

Winds of Time

By W.E.B. Du Bois

MY FRIEND

My friend was sleek and well-dressed. He was pleased with himself and I was glad to see him after some years.

"Well", I asked, "How's the world using you?"

"I've had rotten luck" he answered, grinning. "Do you know, I came to New York last Summer and lost $1500 at poker!"

35-1-242

I sat up. I'm no prude nor spoil-sport. I am quite aware of living in a world of folk who gamble, drink, and raise merry hell in various ways. I would not choose a world of New England Puritans nor yet the days of the second Charles for an ideal existance. But one seldom gets indulgence and excess expressed in figures. Now to me $1500 is a very considerable sum of money. From 1897 to 1910, thirteen years, my whole year's salary was only $1200, after I had earned three degrees at Harvard and sat at the feet of the world's masters at the Friedrich-Wilhelm's University in Berlin. On this salary, I raised and supported a family, kept out of debt and summered with the family in Boston, Ann Arbor and at the St. Louis world fair. I freely admit that money could buy more then than now; but,-

FIFTEEN HUNDRED

"Fifteen hundred dollars", I gasped. "Why, in 1936, I went round the world on little more than that. I saw London and Paris; I saw Berlin and Moscow; I walked in Peiping, Shanghai and Tokio. I rode the Lakes of Hanghow, swept over the Pacific and felt the molten gold of Hawaii-- and you at your salary, lost --"

He stirred a bit uneasily but explained to me, as to a child, certain vast changes in the world, of which, I was apparently quite unaware, and consequently, hardly fit to procede without guidance.

"You see," he said, "People don't play bridge any more, they play poker, one must gamble. We used to begin Saturday night and play right through until Monday morning. There were usually --" And he named a fair strip of the Harlem Social Register -- friends, acquaintances, officials,---

"Listen" I interrupted, patiently, "You mean to tell me that -- er-- well, X, Y, and Z, actually used to take thirty-six hours of good, solid, pulsing life, to flip some small pieces of paste-board on six square feet of oil-cloth, for the privilege of tossing away more money than ten million American Negroes ever see in a year in return for four thousand hours of hard work?"

35-1-249

"But" he explained, "somebody won you see; and I made the mistake of keeping on playing when I was having a streak of Bad Luck."

BAD LUCK

"My dear fellow," I returned, "That wasn't bad luck; it was just utter lack of brains; of course somebody won; somebody always wins among idiots. But the point that puzzles me, is how you ever expected to win even with a succession of straight flushes. You were bound to lose your health, your habit of sleep which guards your sanity, your balance of the values of life. You --

But he brushed me aside. "Listen", he said, "Don't preach! I tell you what I'm going to do hereafter: instead of taking one or two hundred dollars into the game, I'm only going to take $25. If I lose that, I'll stop for the night and wait until the next session."

"I've got a better idea," I retorted. "Take fifteen cents to the next seance. Take your seat with your back to that fourteenth story window where you play and open the window. Take no heed of the protests against fresh air -- they'll need it. Play until you lose that fifteen cents, it won't take long. Then step quickly back to the window and drop out head-first. Be sure to make it head-first, and drop as near the building as possible so as to avoid too much mess."

A JOURNEY

I have been travelling again in the South, zigzagging some 2255 miles from New York to Louisiana. Every year or two I visit the South: first because I like it; secondly, because to talk of the Negro Problem and not know the South is stupid. Many colored people avoid the South, or have never seen it. They simply cannot endure its insult and suppression. I deeply sympathize with such persons. I never cross Mason and Dixon's line without the same feeling as that when one plunges into a cold bath. But the physician who dislikes blood and pain should never have studied medicine; and the Negro without the courage to face the South and its problems has no right to discuss the future of the Negro.

THE BEAUTY OF THE SOUTH

Moreover the South is nd all discrimination, ignorance and murder. First of all there is its climate: the flood of clear sunshine, the warm rain, the trees and flowers. There is the food: have you ever by any chance tasted chicken fried creole, Of course you know biscuits and corn-bread, gumbo and black-eyed peas. Not all the food is good; the coffee is usually atrocious and no one there can cook white potatoes. Winter in the real South is not a season -- it is an interlude. The world is built for warmth, out-doors, light clothing and song. The colored folk, outside the impossible fringe, are warm-hearted, eager, and always persistently going somewhere; on, oh, up, forward; and they want your help and advice; news, news, what of the Night?

WHITE FOLK

Southern whites I always studiously avoid; not that I "hate" them -- some whom I know, I like very much. But in the South one never knows whether a particular white is a gentleman or a jackass, in his attitude toward Negroes. I therefore carefully avoid them; and it is remarkable how completely one can do this: in most stores you meet them and since you have money they are usually polite and sometimes obsequious. But you seldom need to visit stores on a trip. It is in public relations you need to steel yourself for grim endurance. Often this is unnecessary: the ticket agent may be decent or even polite; the policeman may be courteous, although usually not. The point is to expect insult and then in many cases be surprised pleasantly.

JIM-CROW

The worst thing about a southern trip for a Negro is the "Jim-Crow" railway and street-car, and the separate waiting rooms and public facilities. There is no fast rule for guidance. On this trip of over two thousand miles, I have ridden only 150 miles in a separate coach. I am not sure that in this case I might not have gotten a pullman seat; but the coach was clean, not crowded, with the same reclining seats as in the white coach. Of course this avoidance of "Jim-Crow" travel called for trouble and money. My Pullman ticket was usually secured by a local friend, but always by a colored man and for a colored passenger. When a college president who uses a certain railroad for a thousand students each year asks for a pullman ticket, he usually gets it. Without such local intervention, applicant at the city ticket office often yields unhesitating compliance, when a similar request at the depot would meet brusque refusal. On side lines, in small towns and country districts submission to separation is inevitable, except -- and this is a big exception -- your friends have automobiles, and they usually have. In this way you can and should avoid street-cars and busses, where the chance of insult is great.

35-1-251

RAIL-WAY STATIONS

Railways stations afford, even in most large Southern cities, miserable ac accommodations. The Terminal station in Atlanta has a dirty, dark room for Negroes; in Durham and Raleigh, the colored rooms are clean and large; but the eating facilities are bad. Jacksonville has needlessly disgusting facilities: no decent restaurant; a booth marked "Information--for Colored only"; telegrams--"for colored only". The point here is that the colored man avoids use of the station as much as possible. Often I have passed through a city, stopped and resumed my journey without seeing the "colored" waiting room. The return of the auto is a god-send for Negro travellers; 225 miles of my trip have been made in the autos of kind friends.

A LIBRARY

It was in Raleigh, North Carolina. The library was in a room formerly a store front with big show windows, extending back in long, square space, perhaps twenty-five by a hundred feet. I sat toward the rear and watched a little black girl at a large table. On it was a dictionary. It was full half the size of the tot; but she was busily thumbing its pages. Now and then she would pause, and gravely scan something on a page. Perhaps it was one of the small illustrations; perhaps it was a word. But what pleased me infinitely, was that no one disturbed her, no one asked her what she was doing nor why; she was a privileged user of the Richard B. Harrison Public Library, just as privileged, just as important as the serious adult reader sitting over there, and equally served by the assistant librarian at the desk.

35-1-246

THE LIBRARIAN

I had known of this little library for several years; twice I had visited it briefly. But this time it loomed somehow in importance. I met the librarian at a conference in Atlanta in 1940. She talked of her library as though it was a living entity of vast importance. At my first sight of it, I saw that it was not just a place to store books, but a mart to display them attractively and alluringly. The books too were new and recent and not, as in the Negro library at Atlanta, largely the cast-off leavings of the white library. The Librarian believed in her Library passionately. She might have lived in her attractive home 23 miles away and kept house for her husband and little son. But the husband was wise, and realized her vision. So for a pittance she has worked ten years and more to build in a Southern city, a place where black folk can be led to the world's literature; and made to like it and even yearn for more.

THE STATE

This was not the end of this woman's vision; she wanted to plant libraries for black folk in the state--in the South. The day before I made this visit, she had driven alone to World's End: to low, drear Elizabeth City, out by the sad and sullen sea, carrying books and words and inspiration, to make poor, ignorant colored people want libraries and start them and keep them. It was a hard, weary drive, done by car to escape the dirt and insult of the Jim-Crow car; and homing in the darkness so as to gather an audience for my brief talk next day.

All this has to be wheedled out of a stingy white State. What do "niggers" want of libraries? Why does this woman persist so tirelessly? She could easily get a better paying job -- indeed hardly a worse-paying one, would be offered her. She nags and persists. "Of course" say the white folks, uneasily, "we want to do, but you know how the South is! We can't ask public moneys for ~~Negroes~~ nigras. We ought to build a library building for this branch, which is easily the best in the city. We ought to carry on a real library campaign in the State for all folk, but -- well, you know!" We do. These people have neither vision nor guts. They are content to preen themselves on being better than South Carolina or Mississippi -- as though that was anything to boast of.

35-1-247

THE VISION

Still Mollie Huston Lee works on, holds "we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better" and puts her life into unflinching determination to build libraries for Negroes in North Carolina. We read of this sort of thing in novels. We get it smugly tossed into our faces in Sunday Schools and sermons. We are given to understand that young Negroes today are working to uplift their race! But where do we see them doing it? Who's sacrificing anything for anybody -- black or white? And when we burst out into paeans of praise for success, whom do we worship save money-grubbers, gamblers, or well-dressed fools?

Yet they are down there, struggling in the depths; as beautiful and well-dressed; as literate and articulate as the ruck of the multitude; but in addition, strong, brave, clear-sighted and untiring.

MORE JIM-CROW

The chief difficulty of race separation is the South is its uncertainty. A Negro goes South prepared to obey the law. But what is the Law? It changes in administration from place to place and from time to time. I have seen it in the last twenty-five years become less rigorous and often is completely ignored. In Louisiana especially, it cuts curious capers. For instance arriving in New Orleans three hours late on a comfortable Louisville and Nashville sleeper, I determined, in a moment of weakness, to take a Greyhound bus, -- may God forgive me! I entered, walked to the back and took the last reclining chair toward the window. The back cross-seat was filled with Negroes. The bus filled until there was only the one empty seat beside me. A white woman entered, but hesitated. Several Negroes entered and stood. The driver came back and asked me politely "Are you in the right seat," I answered "Yes". He returned to his seat and the woman sat down beside me. I did not bite her. Later she moved to the front. The Negroes continued to stand. Then a white man moved over and sat beside me, leaving two vacant seats; two colored girls moved into this seat and let down in front of them, a notice which had been concealed somewhere, saying "For Negroes". Then I awoke: the driver had asked me, as brown and curley as I am, if I was colored, and in my innocence I said in effect "I am white". Which taught me that in Louisiana you may often be what you say you are, regardless of color or race.

35-1-252

THE GREAT COLLEGES

But forgetting all this irritating but often laughable mess, the astonishing thing about the post-war South are the new Negro colleges; I do not refer to the better known private schools like Fisk, Atlanta, Talledega, and others. But to the great and little known State schools: West Virginia State, with its vast campus and 1200 college students. I can remember when it had two buildings and no library. North Carolina College at Durham, I knew when it was literally a hole in the ground. It has a thousand college students, large brick dormitories, gymnasium and library, laboratories and a splendid auditorium. Florida State was given in the last 12 months over three million dollars for a set of new buildings and more than three hundred thousand dollars for annual maintenance. Southern University at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, spends a larger annual appropriation than Howard or Fisk or Atlanta and has 1800 college students.

These are the things I go South to see.

CHARLESTON

The great Southern cities are more than the conventional places mentioned in geographies and guide-books. Within the city which calls itself "white", is a second city of darker people; with a history more poignant, more fatal for the future than the other. I come back to Charleston repeatedly as to an old friend. I know something of its history and traditions -- of the cultural patterns of the Charlestonians of Negro descent. I know both St. Marks and St. Michaels, and the proud old families of free Negroes who can lie dead and yet talk like Congressman Tom Miller

"Not that I liked the white people less, but the Negroes needed me more"

His grandfather signed the Constitution of the United States for the State of South Carolina, while his grandson became Negro leader of the Negroes. The fighting spirit still survives: still Avery Institute survives as a high school; Susie Dart has establish her library and library service for the state; the Custom House is still run by a Negro, although he is rated as Deputy-Collector and not as Collector like Crum. And I sat by a wholesale fish market established in 1876 and run by the grandchildren of its founder.

I stood on the Battery and looked on Fort Sumter, which freed a nation, and on Fort Wayne lying low beside it where they buried Shaw "under his niggers".

Winds of Time
by
W.E.B. Du Bois

President Truman's plea to arm Greece against Russia, is to my mind the most stupid and dangerous proposal ever made by the leader of a great modern nation. I am willing to continue to be taxed at the present excessive rate indefinitely, to feed the starving people of Europe. But I am not willing to spend a single cent to promote civil war in Greece, for the benefit of British Imperialism, or for the profit of the American oil millionaires. The charge that this step is to fight Communism and that Communism threatens civilization is false.

Of the basic things for which Communism fights, the majority are as Nehru has said exactly what every intelligent, broad-minded and unselfish thinker of the last century has demanded. They are

1. The abolition of Poverty
2. The wiping out of illiteracy
3. The carrying on of industry primarily for the benefit of consumers and not for private profit
4. Social control through the State of the great gifts of nature, instead of allowing them to be monopolized by private interests
5. The total abolition of unemployment.

"Yes", answer many persons, "we too want these things, but we can't get them!" Some declare, "the Poor will be always with you"; others say that "poverty may disappear but that it will take a thousand years". In addition to this, a tremendous propaganda is carried on in our monopolized press and news services, and by our bribed and bought columnists and broadcasters and even by paid college professors to prove that every attempt of the State to conduct industry is a miserable and dangerous failure; and this in the face of our postal service, our parcel posts, our Federal Banks and postal savings; our irrigation and flood control; our relief measures and fight against unemployment.

But this is not all: we now see an attempt to prove that any thought or effort to abolish poverty or break monopoly, or make unemployment impossible or permit the State to conduct industry, is not only futile but part of a nasty criminal conspiracy: an "Attack on Civilization!" Not only do we fight introduction of such measures in America we are furious if any other country attempts them.

The same thing happened in the Abolition movement. Just as soon as a number of honest persons began to fight human slavery, than the bought press and the respectable leaders of society began to howl: the Abolitionists were liars and hypocrites; they wanted to arouse black beasts to murder white women and children; they believed in free love and miscegenation; they were atheists and enemies of religion. (If you doubt this, read Shirley Graham's magnificently written and fascinating story of Frederick Douglass "There was once a slave") Immediately all the respectable people rushed to deny any sympathy with these anarchists; rushed to prove that all slaves were contented and all free Negroes, lazy beasts. The Church abjured Abolition and proceeded to "Preach Christ Crucified". Abolitionists were denied places of power, driven out of good society, and Negroes were seized and sold into slavery without trial or jury.

So today: the leading minds of the world have advocated some form of Socialism for a century. Finally in the twentieth century when "Free enterprise" has well-nigh ruined civilization, Russia proposes a remedy and tries it on herself. You do not like it? Very well; then You try something better than a second and a third world war.

What does America now propose to abolish poverty and save the world from Communism? Nothing but four hundred million dollars to start another war.

If you don't like Communism, don't follow it; if Communists or Republicans or Presbyterians break our laws, punishment them; but punish them for law-breaking but not for thinking. Do not try to stop men from wanting a better world. And don't in God's name, get it into your fool head, that a man is necessarily a scoundrel, just because he sympathizes with Russia's effort for a new world, whether she fails or not.

All right, Mr. Rich White Man, you like this world. Improvements? Yes, but on the whole, you regard it as the best possible world. You like your luxurious home with all its gdgets; your servants want too much pay, but they are trained and deft; your neighborhood is the most aristocratic, provided you can keep out the Jews;the city services-- sewage, garbage collection, water, gas, electricity-- all are satisfactory; they better be or some one will lose their job. Your income is not bad: ten thousand, twenty-five thousand will get you by -- with food, clothes, luxuries, night-clubs, two new cars, a chauffeur, Palm Beach, orchester sears. Yes, you like this world and no Damn Communist is going to change it if you see him first.

It is a world which you built , Mr. Rich Man and have ruled absolutely for two centuries. Recently it has cracked and sagged about your ears. But that is but temporary. Prosperity -- your Prosperity is just around the corner. You'll soon have things in hand again: cheap labor, unions smashed or at least curbed; servants cheap and cringing; Socialists in jail; Russian Communists-- God-damned Russian Communists, dead and in Hell.

No, Russians and Communists and Socialists and Niggers didnot cause this recent collapse of Civilization; you were in control-- complete control when two World Wars, a World depression, armies of insane, cripples and starved offended your fastidious taste. But you are going to chamge all that. You are preparing for bigger and better wars; you are making atomic bombs by the hundreds; you've got the biggest navy on earth and you'll have the biggest army as soon as you can sneak the legislation through Congress. Ask Taft. a stupid

You are going to have Democracy, by God, no matter what it costs: $400,000,000 worth of Democracy in Poland and Greece and Turkey; but not one cent's worth in Mississippi and Georgia. That's the ticket; let the Great Truman tell 'em! Down with Stalin. Up with Bilbo and Rankin. $400,000,000 for new wars and not one cent for education. Didn't the dirty Russians wipe out illiteracy in 30 years? Isn't that just like their underhanded duplicity? We've been pretending to educate Negroes for seventy-five years and a third of them still cant read and write. That's the way to keep the world in control.What's the need of reading anyway? What the rich want is better cooks; better and cheaper plumbers, carpenters like those of the good old days, when good mechanics worked ten hours a day for ten cents an hour.

Freedom, that's what we want; if this pauper wants towork for a scab's wge so as to bring other workers down to his starvation level and increase the income of the rich -- let him be free to do it; out with the closed shop. Let the closed shop only apply to banking, oil-refining, aluminninum pans(?), railroads, telephones, and other things which the rich we rightly control because they've got the guns, the police, the jails and the Press. Thank God, for our Free Press: free to lie, free to misrepresent, free to suppress the truth, free to kick the stupid world into war any time "we" want it.

Look at Russia? Has she got a Free Press? No, Sir! Her press is gagged with the silly idea of abolishing Poverty, curbing the rich-- curbing Me! Imagine that? Why in this free land, I can do anything I damn well please. I can buy a President. I'm going to in 1948. Watch me. Who am I? Why Iam a free white American with an income in five figures; if I'm not that, what the hell am I doing on earth anyhow?

WINDS OF TIME

by
W. E. B. Du Bois

ROOSEVELT

The late President Roosevelt wrote April 18, 1925 from Warm Springs, Georgia as follows: "I suppose some of my Republican friends would call me a Socialist for asserting that the owner of land owes it to the community, and to that state, and to the nation, to use that land in the best possible way for humanity. It is fine talk and very soothing to think of the individual as complete master in his own home, at perfect liberty to do any old thing he wants with his own property. A man has the legal right to go to his bank, draw out his balance in paper money, go home and put it in the stove. If he does it, however, he is apt to land in the lunatic asylum. We have not yet reached the common-sense age which will, in like manner, send the farmer who burns off his wood lot to the home for incurables."

35-1-200

This is the line of thinking which every man with common sense has got to follow and this, too, in spite of the hue and cry and actual violence which assails anyone today who dares to oppose common American methods of business.

During the nineteenth century, we said that a man's property was his own; that he could run his business as he pleased and that the profits made from his business belonged to him; and that he had the right to spend that income in any way he wished.

Change

There are a good many people today who think that that is still gospel truth. They are wrong. They were wrong if they believed it in the nineteenth century because even then there were plenty of wise men who insisted that property is an invention of the state for the good of the individual; that the individual has the right to use it only as the community permits him; that with modern methods of work no one man alone does anything. Every piece of property, every piece of material that is grown or article that is manufactured is the result not simply of one man's work or thought or sacrifice, but of the combined efforts of large numbers of men, some of whom are already dead.

We have come, therefore, into a era where all over the world Socialism is prevailing; where the great mass of thinking people have come to realize that the control of work, property, profits and the income for the good of all the inhabitants of the state is a primary truth which no one can forget.

DISASTER

The disaster that has overtaken the world today is because we have tried to forget this; is because we have said that private initiative in business should be uncontrolled; that the government has no place in business; that "freedom" means freedom to use whatever a person has seized as his property, no matter what means he used to get it or what the basis of his claim to that property is. This has led to fantastic results. Who made the oil which is the center of the greatest monopoly in the United States? Who manufactured the coal which lies at the basis of American prosperity? Who grew the trees which we are wasting and devouring with senseless appetite? What right has the great telephone monopoly to exploit endlessly the genius of Alexander Graham Bell?

John Howard

Topping even Jackie Robinson in baseball, is John Howard of New York, the first Negro college graduate of Princeton University. A century ago there were one or two Negroes who got degrees from the Princeton Theological Seminary, but no Negro was ever graduated from the college.

35-1-264

I remember in course of an investigation which I made into the graduates of northern colleges in December, 1900, receiving the following reply from Princeton University:

"The question of the admission of Negro students to Princeton University has never assumed the aspect of a practical problem with us. We have never had any colored students here, though there is nothing in the University statutes to prevent their admission. It is possible, however, in view of our proximity to the South and the large number of southern students here, that Negro students would find Princeton less comfortable than some other institutions. But I may be wrong in this, as the trial has never been made. There is, as I say, nothing in the laws of the college to prevent their admission."

Princeton

The years later in 1910 I repeated my query and received an answer which was more terse: "Princeton University has never had graduates of Negro descent". Later in the forties, the question of Negroes in Princeton came to me again by the way of a private letter from a friend who had gone to live in the village of Princeton. He was a white man of prominence, and evidently there was talk at the time concerning the admission of Negroes. It was, of course, a bit awkward to have a great institution of learning with Einstein and Aydelotte, where a person could not be admitted because of the color of ~~their~~ his face.

Then nothing more was heard until recently there came the news ~~that~~ of one or two freshmen of Negro descent being admitted to the college department of Princeton and now John Howard, a veteran of World War II, assigned to Princeton by the Navy as B-12 student, is getting his Bachelor's degree. Thus a saga ends.

In the days before the Civil War, Princeton was a mecca for Southern students. They shied away from Harvard, not because Harvard had so many colored students, but because of the New England atmosphere both there and at Yale. But at Princeton in New Jersey they were supreme.

35-1-265

The Civil War dealt it a crushing blow because it was practically a Southern university. Then for twenty years from 1868-88 came President James McCosh and from then on it developed under Patton and Woodrow Wilson, to be one of the leading American universities.

Northern universities

At first not only were Negroes practically refused admission to most American universities but there was astonishment when the abolitionists after the Civil War wanted colleges for Negroes in order to train teachers. When these colleges proved successful, Americans were astonished that Negroes went from southern colleges to northern institutions either as under-graduates or as graduate students. They are about to attack this now by instituting low-grade graduate departments in Negro colleges. But the result of this is going to be that these graduate departments gradually will become as good or better than the graduate schools of the white southern colleges and still Negroes will pour into Northern institutions. It is in their blood.

A SCIENTIST

In 1939, I published in the American Scholar an article on "The Negro scientist", criticising the color line in science and giving names and dates. A recent occurence brings me to repeat a part of that message:

35-1-266

In 1938, I was on a dining car when a little brown boy and his mother stopped at my table. She said that she wanted him to meet a man who had known his grandfather. This little boy in an intelligence test in Cincinnati, had scored an I.Q. of 170, one of the highest in the city. His grandfather was Charles H. Turner.

Turner married a daughter of a well-known colored Troy family of Ohio and Darwin Turner was their son. Darwin Turner, Jr., a grandson was the little boy whom I met. I recall his grandfather, because Charles Turner represented to me a tragedy in science. He was a born student; his face brown, with close-curled hair, excessively shy and ill-dressed.

CHARLES TURNER

He graduated from the University of Cincinnati in 1891 and became assistant in the department of biology. There he began his study of insects. His chief was called to the new University of Chicago, when it was organized in 1892, and invited Turner to be his assistant. Then the chief suddenly died. No one at Cincinnati or Chicago wanted a colored assistant.

Turner became teacher in a small Methodist school, Clark University in South Atlanta, where I met and knew him. He received inadequate pay, a heavy teaching load, no laboratories and few books, and poorly trained college students. Nevertheless between 1908-1933, he published nine studies of insect behavior which brought him notice and attention among scientists both in America and in Europe.

He then went to the Sumner High School in Saint Louis. There he died of overwork, without any chance further to pursue his great scientific work.

A YOUNG GRADUATE

I forgot about him until I met this grandson, and then forgot again until recently when the Negro papers hailed the fact that Darwin Turner of Cincinnati at the age of fifteen had been made a member of Phi Beta Kappa at the University of Cincinnati and graduated with highest honors. Perhaps this illustrates the aphorism that "a day unto the Lord is as a thousand years and a thousand years as yesterday". Here is the fourth generation of an Ohio family; the father was a pharmacist, the mother a school-teacher. One uncle was a member of the Niagara Movement and helped the fight in days past.

35-1-267

GENIUS AND ABILITY

Of course the story is not closed. Graduation from college even with a brillant record does not settle anything. But it does show what presistence can accomplish and what ability the American Negro is losing, just because there are so many more poor people among us than rich. There must be among the poor larger numbers of children of talent and even genius than among the well-to-do but they are lost. They are either unrecognized or the teacher who finds them in school passes them by. What is the use? Think how much it would cost to educate a child of that sort. His parents can do nothing for him, why should we try?

PHILANTHROPY

I remember one time that we had at Atlanta University a phenomenal soprano voice. When a northern philanthropist asked me what he could do for the Negro race, I asked him to educate that voice. He took it under consideration and consulted friends. I know what they told him; that was before Marian Anderson ar Dorothy Mayner. The result was he thought that he would better help carpenters and cooks. That magnificient voice was lost. This kind of thing has been repeated time after time, we ought to have among us an organization which instead of parading around our cities in red uniforms, would go through the colored schools of the United States and pick out children who deserve higher education.

LYING TO REMEMBER

I used to know Bishop Henry M. Turner and liked his bluff and hearty ways. There is a legend that when a perfect stranger would greet the Bishop with "Do you remember me, Bishop?" the Bishop would growl "Of course I remember you -- what's your name?" He was so convincing that the man would rush home crying, "Bishop remembered me!" One had to admire such convincing histrionics but it has always been useless for me to attempt to imitate. That awful New England penchant for blurting out the truth, especially when it was unpalatable, always rushes to my tongue and in a perfect agony of apprehension I find myself time after time looking blankly into some eager face and saying miserably but honestly "No, I do not remember you!" And then I stand and take my punishment, which believe me is usually ruthless.

35-1-261

AFTER 45 YEARS

I went a-lecturing not long since to a medium sized city. Once nearly a half-century ago I had lived there; but for decades my visits there have been short and rare and many good friends are there whom I have not met to know in long years. I was sitting quietly in the lecture room passing that purgatorial fifteen minutes which precedes a lecture. To add to my discomfort it was raining cats and dogs outside, just as the audience was due to arrive; and to put the final capstone on, all the electric lights in that part of the city chose this minute to go out. At this moment in dim candle-light when I was feeling exactly like a very wet rag -- lo!. IT came again; a pleasant voice said liltingly: "How do you do, Dr. Du Bois, do you know me?" I felt myself shrinking inside with apprehension. I knew what I ought to say to keep the peace. But if I lied nobly and said "Yes, of course", then what in God's name should I say next? For honestly the woman looked like no one I had ever seen on this earth or better she looked exactly like a thousand other women. I might have stalled, I suppose with "Why, er-- you look familiar" etc., etc. But I did nothing of the sort. I just couldn't. I knew I was putting my foot straight into it, but I heard myself saying as usual with all that damned bluntness: "No, I don't", which was God's truth.

CHEERFUL PERSISTANCE

Any human being with bowels of mercy would have sensed my evident embarassment, flown to my rescue in sympathizing pity, and said gayly "Why I'm Mary Smith" or "Sarah Jones", and I am sure I would have answered with vast relief "O YES!", unless, heaven help, I had forgotten all Smiths and Joneses, and felt compelled to say so. Not even that possible escape was vouchsafed me. The lady was firm and raised her voice to the great interest of all auditors who were quite unengaged at the moment; "Look at me" she said "Of course you know me". Wooden without, I literally squirmed inside. I would have surrendered my poor purse to have said triumphantly "Clementine!" or something equally convincing. But at the moment and under the circumstances I doubt if I would have recognized my own grandmother and I heard myself murmuring, "I'm sorry, but-- "But you are not looking -- look at me --" Then I began to lose my none too even temper:"Don't be silly" I snapped and she yelled back "Why I am" etc., etc. "But, Good Lord" I gasped I haven't seen you in forty years!" "You have too, you saw me five years ago" she retorted witheringly and flew. Of course it would turn out that I had known this woman of seventy while she was in her twenties; had greatly admired her family which had rendered unforgettable service to my people. Why should she think I would deliberately ignore this to stage a cheap stunt of false forgetting? Time had taken toll of her as of me; but my name was on the programme.

AN HUMBLE PRAYER

Why, why, in heaven's name, when you meet a man who in the last three months has travelled ten thousand miles and greeted at least an equal number of people; and has been doing something like that for a half century, can't you have the sheer mercy to say "I'm John Frog from Hell" and I will be so desperately thankful that even if I again forget your name, I'll never forget you kindness, nor your native city.

WILBERFORCE COLLEGE

A report of the Board of Examiners of the North Central Association of Colleges on the condition of Wilberforce University is illuminating. It points out that there are two governing boards of Wilberforce University: the college of liberal arts controlled by the trustees of Wilberforce University and the college of education and industrial arts controlled by a State of Ohio board of trustees.

Of the first board the report says that because of the short term of Board members, the lack of overlapping of membership, the lack of occupational spread in membership (twenty out of twenty-two are ministers), the fact that at least one board member is on the salaried staff and another receives regular pay for "entertainment", and the lack of clearcut allocation of power and responsibility by the board to the President of the University, the institution ranks close to zero under the heading of "General Control".

WILBERFORCE STATE

The second board consist of nine trustees, six appointed by the Governor and three chosen by the University Board of Trustees. This Board rates decidedly higher than the Board of Trustees of Wilberforce. However, since the institution must be scored as a unit it was placed in the lowest ten per cent of colleges and universities in the North Central Association.

BOTH BOARDS

The Examiners complained of the overlapping of function in the two boards, of by-passing the power of the president in the appointing of certain offices and of general confusion in control. They especially condemn the waste of money involved in the maintenance of two separate and distinct business departments, with different fiscal years and different systems of auditing. The examiners estimate that "the annual waste is more than the salary of the President of the University and that of a highly capable superintendent of buildings and grounds."

SUPPORT

Leaving aside student fees it appears that the A.M.E. Church is contributing less than one-eighth of the total amount available for current expenses of the University. The other seven-eighths and more comes from funds furnished by the State of Ohio. The expenditure of 56.4 per cent of current funds for administration and plant operation and maintenance raises serious questions. The allocation of only 44.6 per cent of all educational and general expenditures to instructional purposes represents far too little emphasis on the main purpose of a University.

35-1-270

THE FUTURE

Wilberforce as a result of this report has lost her accredition as a college. A bill before the legislature of Ohio is aimed to correct some of these difficulties. It gives the Governor the right to appoint eight of the nine members of the State Trustees. It refuses professorships or positions in the college to relatives of trustees by blood or marriage and gives to this board exclusive authority or control over the operation of the state college. It makes the president elective by this board, the chief executive officer of the college and fixes his compensation together with the right of removal.

DOWN SOUTH

I have been South again. This time to Arkansas speaking at the Dunbar Junior College in Little Rock and at the State Normal and Mechanical College at Pine Bluff. I am impressed always with the ~~eager~~ number of eager children in our schools; with the crowding of the schools; with the necessity of more funds and more individual attention. But perhaps more than ever before I seem to have felt in this visit the internal striving and upheaval of the South among both black and white. It is so easy to prejudge the whole thing and come to swift, and therefore inaccurate, conclusions. There are so many things happening: the release of those twenty-eight lynchers in South Carolina and the escape of an intended victim and arrest of the kidnappers in North Carolina. One sees the two sides, ~~of that~~. Never before have we had so elaborate and determined attempt to punish lynchers. A judge who really tried to do justice and then the very fact of the acquittal showed the lagging civilization of the South. Twelve men "good and true" knew that they were releasing murderers.

LITTLE ROCK

To turn back to Little Rock where I recently was. There is the story of the teachers fighting for equal wage. They got it eventually after long fighting. But they got it because one man, a principal, after he had testified carefully and temperately was so incensed at the continued insistence of the school officials that the Negro teachers were not as good and as well-prepared as the white teachers, that he asked to go back on the stand. And they say that he told those white members of the Board of Education facts which they have never forgotten. What happened? The wages were equalized, but he lost his job. He is teaching now on meagre salary in the North.

Or in the case of policemen: they tried as in so many Southern cities to keep Negroes off the police force until a large number of black soldiers came to the city. The army compelled Little Rock to appoint eight Negro policemen. They have kept them since but with singular Southern prejudice, these members of the police force are not members of the regular police civil service.

35-1-272

EDUCATION

I rode with a young man who is assistant superintendent of schools in Arkansas in charge of colored schools. He sees the difficulties of the country school. It was his white superior officer who pointed out that in notorious Crittenden County, white children received over a hundred dollars a year for the expenses of their schooling and the Negro children, forming the majority of children in the county, received a average of six dollars. But this young superintendent instead of ignoring the fact, told the people of Crittenden to their faces what was happening, and what must be done. It hasn't been done yet, but the facts are no longer hidden.

Especially was I aroused by stories of handicapped children. Here was a boy totally deaf; here was a bright girl with spinal injury; [redacted] others were retarded children. There is no place in Arkansas to send such handicapped children. They can only be put in public schools, to be a burden upon the teachers and a difficulty for their fellows; and yet the school carries them and does what it can. The state has as yet done nothing.

All this is complicated and contradictory and uncivilized and yet the forces of civilization are trying. They do know the things that ought to be done; they do try to do something about it.

CZECHOSLOVAKIA

I have just been in Washington where a prominent government official talked to representatives of important public opinion in the United States concerning Czechoslovakia. He said among other things that this state could easily restore its economy if it would begin again to manufacture crystal glass, fine te tiles and high class shoes. It has the skills for producing these things. But he said, instead of doing this, they were in the orbit of Russian influence and are producing ordinary glass tumblers for eastern Europe.

A woman asked rather timidly,"but the Russians can pay for the glass, can't they?" "Oh yes," said the official, "but the Czechs could make a great deal more money if they manufactured for the luxury demand of western Europe and America." No one else said anything and the subject was dropped.

ECONOMIC ILLITERACY

I cannot conceive a more vivid example of either economic illiteracy or deliberate misleading of public opinion. What this official really said was: "It makes no difference to the world what kind of work is done or what human needs are satisfied, so long as the work is profitable to somebody." It is this myth that is ruining the economic structure of the world. It makes all the difference on earth what men work for and whose wants are satisfied. That the starving and sick Negroes of Africa should work for diamonds and gold to decorate the ears and limbs of the idle rich and furnish luxury articles for those who imitate them, spells ~~the~~ damnation to the black race in the modern world. If those millions of men were working to satisfy their own basic needs, for food and shelter and education; if the people of Czechoslovakia work not to deck the tables and backs and feet of well-to-do, but to supply the basic needs of the poverty-stricken Balkan countries, that would spell the difference between human progress and human degradation.

MASS PRODUCTION

One of the great things which America has discovered in economic organization is Mass production. That is, production on a large scale to satisfy the needs of the majority of people. Because of the number of articles produced, they can be made cheaper by new processes of manufacture; new application of natural forces. And because of the wide market for the product, they can be sold at small profit per unit to almost limitless number of men. It was the ruin of eighteenth century France that she produced exquisite articles for the aristocracy and the rich, and almost nothing for the peasantry.

35-274

In the case of America, the only hindrance to complete and lasting prosperity is payment of sufficient wages to the people who wish them and want to buy goods. This will come with a re-distribution of economic power. It is this thing that eastern Europe is trying to do; and Czechoslovakia is turning her economy from luxury goods to goods which the masses need. It is one of the finest outcomes of the war; yet here is official Washington guiding public opinion to believe that Czechoslovakia and the world is going to lose because she does not return to her luxury manufacture and luxury trade.

WHY WEALTH

What most people do not understand is why it is that some people apparently have so much money that they can easily supply their own necessities and then have enough left to supply themselves with luxuries, with ornaments, with whimiscal gew-gaws. While other people and indeed most people have to work their fingers to the bone in order to get necessary food; pay the rent; buy clothes that cover their nakedness and give their children the beginnings of education. The world has long assumed that this difference in power between the rich and the poor measures the difference in service to the public good; difference in accomplishment; in ability and in desert. And we have only to look around us to see that this wretchedly untrue.

The real difficulty comes in that the distribution of the result of the work of the world, is carried out today by chance, power and legal fiction, and not by rational thought and real desert. Herein lies the basis and beginning of all true reform.

Intelligence

The American people have a reputation for having unusual intelligence. Many of the inhabitants of the world look toward America with a sort of envy, hearing of her schools and colleges and her general knowledge and wisdom. But we who live in the United States know that the people here, in some respects, are among the most stupid in the world.

Floods

Nothing illustrates this better than the flood situation which is again calling the attention of the whole nation and of the world. Have you ever seen the Mississippi, the Missouri and Ohio? Great sprawling masses of muddy water sluggishly flowing from the extreme north to the extreme south, carrying away in their filthy bosom the best and most fertile soil of the nation and dumping it in to the gulf so as to obstruct shipping and transportation? This has been going on for decades and for centuries; it is still going on. In addition to this in the late winter and early spring when the snow melts the waters rise. They spread far out over the land so that one looks down upon vast lakes of mud and refuse. They overflow and destroy the crops; they ruin the homes; they drive the people out and kill them by the hundreds; they destroy the trees and make just holes. They make life on or near the river banks so uncertain that communities become festering slums where a few people living far beyond normal standards of life perch for a while between floods in the midst of disease and malaria. Flood Control If this were a new thing; if this were something unusual and unheard of; we could perhaps regain our sense of decency and knowledge. But this has been happening since the beginning of time, and certainly has recurred successively from the beginning of the United States. What do we do about it? We raise little mounds of mud to keep the water in its path so that when it gets down by New O rleans one looks up to the river rather than down into it. We know perfectly well that this mud is going to float away and melt ~~before~~ with the next flood. Nevertheless we appropiate now and then a few millions to make work for people who ~~can~~ could do much more important things and few people suggest that there is any remedy for this state of affairs. Yet there is a remedy which all intelligent people know. We know that the floods of these rivers could be held back by dams; could be restrained into reservoirs so as to furnish irrigation for the desert, water for power, cheap electricity for homes, all over the land. We could have a transformation of life and consequent raising of wages and standards of living if we wanted it; if we had sense enough to realize what has been done in the Tennessee Valley.

35-1-276

¶ Not only do we do nothing about this; but the great Republican Party and its allies among the Democrats cut down the appropation for the Tennessee Valley and refused to make appropiations for the Missouri and the Mississippi. Yet as I say we call ourselves intelligent; we are looked upon as leaders of civilization. We are doing this because it is denominated free enterprise; we want to make certain persons who can monopolize and sell land and power rich beyond the dreams of avarice. ~~based upon what we call free enterprise.~~ ¶ What is this enterprise? Free Enterprise It is the enterprise of doing nothing when we know exactly what ought to be done. It is freedom to take from the poor that which will make them more poverty-stricken and to add to the rich that which they do not need and cannot use. Once in a flash of knowledge and burst of indignation we rose up and struck the power trust between the eyes; we ~~made~~ stopped the super-trust of profit makers who ~~are~~ were trying to monopolize public power of water and electricity and ~~who threw~~ drove its chief protagonist to his death. Then we went to sleep again; we forgot all about the power trust. But they did not forget because the prizes were too great and too vast and they are working overtime in the muddy floods of the West today.

The Atom Bomb

There is a wide misunderstanding concerning atomic energy. Most persons regard it primarily as a new weapom of death and destruction. This is as false as it would be to think of electricity as primarily a force to electrocute murderers. That, to be sure, is a way of using the electric current, but the least important and beneficent of its wide uses for mankind. The great and primary use of electricity is for heat and light, power and energy, telephone and radio, and a thousand other helps to higher standards of living and broader life. So atomic energy is the discovery of one of the greatest sources of power and well-being man has ever known. It is incidental and accidental that its first discovery came through war and its first use was to kill thousands of men, women and children who were taking no part in war.

Atomic Energy.

If the men of science in the world were free to develop this amazing discovery of a new and inexhaustible source of power, we might in our day revolutionize human life on earth. We have at hand universal source of power which can easily supersede coal, steam, water-power and most other sources of energy now in use, and at a cost below anything dreamed of, since manufactured power began to replace the brute toil of human muscles. The world is face to face with a miracle which can replace human effort and raise the standard of living among men to a height of which we have seldom dared to dream. All the vast cost of transportation of goods, running of automobiles, giving power to factories farms and homes; digging in the earth, exploring the seas---all this and a thousand other matters could be cheaply, cleanly and quickly done, at the cost of one day of world war. We need no longer have dirty, dangerous mines; noisy factories, child-labor instead of schools, brutish toil instead of leisure for music and art. We could in our day have universal medical service and hospitalization and security for old age and misfortune. In other words the power and energy which now enslaves us could be cut to less than half its present cost if we developed atomic energy.

35-1-278

War.

Instead of this, we are talking of atomic energy as though its only use was murder. That it can be used for distruction on hitherto unheard of scale, Hiroshima has proven. What then should mankind do? Outlaw the use of atomic energy for bombs. Do that and do it now and first. This is what Russia has proposed a year ago and is still proposing. To this the United States has answered, through Big Business Man Baruch: We have the Atomic Bomb and we are going to keep it and continue to manufacture it, until in our judgment a proper world-wide inspection system has been established, to whose activities no nation can interpose a veto. Then and not until then, will we stop manufacturing bombs and share our knowledge of atomic energy. Such a demand is fantastic; it asks the world to trust us while we remain suspicious and distrustful of all mankind; and in the meantime we hold the threat of ultimate and awful war over the world. To strengthen this, we want to conscript and draft youth t is land over for this ultimate war.

Big Business

What is the real reason back of this campaign for ultimate and continous war? It is the fear of Big Business, that atomic energy, if developed, will interfere with present profits and investments and break the hold of industrial monoply on the world of industry. Technique is being deliberately retarded, as has often been the case in the past, in order to keep down the worker and prevent his ability through high wage and union activity to control the democratic processes of this and other lands. The whole attention of men is being diverted from atomic energy as a remedy for poverty, to its use as a weapon for war. Every discussion of the matter from the President to Lilienthal, from Compton and most of the college presidents, persists in jumbling together and making no distinction between atomic energy and the atomic bomb. America, who first made and used the bomb and who alone is manufaturing it is trying to make the world believe that Russia is the culprit. We, who want to retard the development of atomic energy until Big Business can monopolize it, are the guilty parties before the intelligence of the world.

Big Business

WINDS OF TIME
by

POVERTY IS UNNECESSARY. Most intelligent people today, even in the most civilized parts of the earth believe that it is normal and necessary that most human beings should not have enough to eat and wear and insufficient shelter; and that because of this inevitable poverty most human beings must be ignorant, diseased and to a large extent criminal. The persons who believe this mythical witchcraft are ignorant of the plain teaching of science and industrial technique especially in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. They still think and act in accord with the beliefs of primitive ages, when scarcity of food, difficulties of technique, ignorance of natural forces, made the world a desperate fight between human beings for survival, in which murder, war, cheating and stealing were the only paths to survival for most of the human species. Despite the fact that we have moved far beyond such a situation, we still talk and think and act as though war was inevitable, early death by disease natural, crime congenital, and lack of food and housing normal.

WASTE Yet we know better or could know bet er if we would use the brains with which even the most stupid are endowed. To be specific, we know that the present floods in the Missouri and Mississippi valleys are due simply to carelessness and greed: we could dam these waters, store them in reservoirs, and use them for cheap irrigation and power production for a cost not one-tenth as great as the annual toll of dead farmers, lost crops and property; and ruined rich soil which is annually taken from corn and wheat fields and deposited in the gulf of Mexico to obstruct shipping. We know that annually ten times as many persons die of tuberculosis, cancer and heart disease, as need to if we would apply our present medical knowledge: and that the lost value of their work would pay to society five times as much as our present medical care sosts us. We know that the money which we refuse for schools and teachers, does not amount to a tenth of what we are compelled to pay for police, jails, courts and insane asylums, to take wretched care of the crime of ignorant young people who we neglect as children, leave in ignorance during youth and imprison and hang before they are thirty. If we were really trying to relieve the wants of men, we would not have to destroy potatoes, burn corn, let food rot in warehouses or prevent men from buying wool from areas where w wool can be raised cheapest and best. In a land like this where most of our land surface is empty unused space, and where wood, iron and coal are more plentiful than anywhere else on earth, it is simply a monument to our stupidity that we should have and continue to have a housing shortage.

THE NEW TECHNIQUE To turn from the specific to the general: We tax poor much more heavily than the rich; we can make endless masses of goods but we refuse to pay workers enough to buy them; we have unlimited natural power in water, electricity, steam and gas, and yet by monopoly and legal restrictions, we make the cost of these free gifts of nature so high that most men cannot reap the advantage of their use. Today on the threshold of the vastest gift of natural power production of which man ever dreamed, we refuse to develop Atomic Energy and talk wildly of bombs for murder in order to save the invested capital of corporations who fear competition.

In fine, while it was true a thousand years ago, that human toil and energy was unable to feed, clothe and shelter all mankind, this has not been the case since the beginning of the nineteenth century; and today, with what we know of natural forces; with the land and labor at our disposal, with the known technique of processing materials and transport of goods, there is no adquate reason why a single human being on earth should not have sufficient food, clothing and shelter for healthy life.

At San Francisco

When I was in San Francisco at the meeting of the United Nations Organization I was anxious to have a statement concerning colonies adopted. After a great deal of difficulty such a statement was made in the well-known Section 73 of the Charter. However, this was in part contradicted by the stern affirmation in the earlier part of the charter that there must be no interference in the internal affairs of the United Nations.

Before Section 73 had been adopted, I had written out a statement which I showed to Judge Proskauer of Philadelphia, leader of one of the organizations fighting for the rights of Jews. Mr. Proskauer assented to the validity of the statement, but when finally the consultants petitioned that something be done concerning minority rights the statement was ignored, which I regard as so great a mistake that I venture to print it again.

A Statement on Race and Colonies

The main groups of mankind, commonly called races, are essentially equal in capability of progress and deserve equality of treatment, opportunity and respect.

In the eye of both science and religion, all men are brothers, with rights to freedom of thought, belief and expression; freedom of domicile, movement and communication; justice before the courts and equal civil, economic, political and social rights. The first duty of civilization is to see to it that no human being is deprived of these rights because of poverty, disease or ignorance.

The colonial system of government, however deeply rooted in history and custom, is today undemocratic, socially dangerous and a main cause of wars. The United Nations recognizing democracy as the only just way of life for all people make it a first statute of international law that at the earliest practical moment no nation nor group shall be deprived of effective voice in its own government. An international colonial commission on which colonial peoples shall have representation should have power to investigate the facts and implement this declaration under the Security Council.

35-1-283

The N A A C P

This statement I am still sure is much stronger and more to the point than even Section 73 of the United Nations' Charter. Moreover it does not dodge behind the problem of the internal affairs of each State. As I have said it was not adopted; it still remains merely a statement, but it is a statement worth studying and worth learning in order that one may be sure of the scientific bases of the demands for the abolition of colonies in the modern world. For this reason, at the thirty-eight annual conference of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, I sought further, to carry out this idea, by laying down and defending these propositions, as follows: (I) Poverty is unnessary. (2) Colonies and quasi-colonial regions are the most poverty-stricken portions of the earth and most human bei gs live in them. (3) Socialism is an at ack on poverty. (4) The United Nations is the greatest hope of abolishing colonialism and thus abolishing poverty throughout the world.

1947 Colonialism and Race (?)

The colonial system of government, however deeply rooted in history and custom, is today undemocratic, socially dangerous and a main cause of wars. The United Nations recognizing democracy as the only just way of life for all peoples make it a first statute of international law that at the earliest practical moment no nation nor group shall be deprived of effective voice in its own government. The Atlanta Negro library [April 5?]

In my column for April 15, 1947, I critized Negro library facilities in Atlanta. A few days later the colored librarian of the Auburn Branch wrote me complaining and said. "Many of your fellow workers, students, friends and acquaintances wonder why you made such a statement, and have called or talked with me concerning it. Of course I think I know the answer."

In case the known answer should be inadequate, here are facts concerning the Negro library service in Atlanta. ~~You~~ Remember that Atlanta has a population of three hundred thousand of which a third is colored. The total appropiation for the library department of Atlanta, 1947, is $268,215. Of this there was appropriated for Negro library service in salaries, books and binding $13, 886. Also something was given to the Negroes for "heating, lighting, shelving, furniture and equipment, repairs, operating supplies, etc." But these items were thoughtfully not broken down as to race in the printed report. If we assume that as much was appropriated to the Negroes for these as was appropriated for salaries and bo ks, which was unlikely, nevertheless even then Negroes received not more than one-tenth as much as was appropriated for the whites. At the beginning of the year 1945-46, the white high schools had 83,000 volumes, the colored high schools twelve thousand. During the year the white high schools received $6,000 while the colored high schools received $1,600 for new books; the total expenditures for the libraries in the white high schools amounted to $10,000 while the colored high school received $2,000. Four hundred and fifty thousand students used the white high school libraries and two hundred and seven thousand the colored school libraries.

What a Librarian Says

In addition to this, a trained librarian made a personal visit to the colored libraries of Atlanta in 1947. He writes me as follows: "You are right as right can be. The colored public library is dead, oh, so dead! I looked at the collection thoroughly and I agree with everything you say. I pulled out book after book and most of them had not circulated for twenty years. Imagine a library with such books! There were sets and sets of old books which no one would ever use. I thought that I was going into a tomb."

35-1-285

The Librarian

I am not blaming the colored librarian for this discrimination. I know that under the circumstances, she is doing the best she can, with inadequate facilities. But she must not excuse the city of Atlanta. As my dead friend, Henry Hunt, used to say "I can keep still in seven different languages!" So the Negro librarian of Atlanta is not compelled to rush into print in order to defend something which is indefensible.

From the past I remember the opening of the first public library in Atlanta, the dedication of the building where the bust of Andrew Carnegie is set in front between Shakespeare and Dante! I remember being one of a committee which went to the trustees of the library. We did not bite our tongues. I was the spokesman. I asked that colored citizens and tax payers of Atlanta have every right that white citizens and tax payers had. The board angrily refused and for more than ten years Negroes had no library facilities at all. Then a branch "colored" library was established; today a second and perhaps a third branch are contemplated; but even with this, the discrimination against Negro citizens of Atlanta in Library facilities is nothing less than contemptible.

Economic Illiteracy

Every once in a while, some American of intelligence and even of prominence comes forward with a statement which reveals how tragic is our ignorance of the present economic organization of the world. This time it is the President of the United States, Harry Truman, who speaking at the home of Thomas Jefferson in Virginia has said; "Certain nations today are withholding their support of reconstruction plans on the ground that this would mean interference by some nations in the internal affairs of others. This is as fallacious as the refusal of a man to enter a profitable business partnership on the ground that it would involve interference in his private affairs."

Private Property

It does not occur to President Truman that it would be logical for a man to refuse to enter a "profitable"business partnership; or that such partnership would involve any "interference with his private affairs" to which he could possibly object. Yet the revolution which is sweeping the modern world turns precisely upon the fact that intelligent human beings today are refusing to enter "profitable" business partnerships because such partnerships today are "interfering" not only with the private affairs of individuals but with the public affairs of nations and groups of nations. What is a "profitable" business? It is an organization of work and wealth which brings profit to somebody and the only criterion of its success is the amount of profit which it brings. In addition to "profit" it may bring to thousands and even millions of men, poverty, disease, ignorance and crime. But the success of the enterprise is judged not by these misfortunes, but by its profit. Moreover, men like President Truman do not ask where the profit goes, and why they are willing to let it go to any person who has the power to seize it; and goes not in accordance with any rule of ethics or of justice.

Nowhere has this been proven more completely than right here in the United States. Fritz Sternberg writes in The Nation of June 28th that in 1913, Europe accounted for 53 per cent of world production. In 1938 the holdings of the 250 largest manufacturing corporations in the United States, 31 are controlled by 5 financial groups, for the most part, the traditional giants of American industry.

35-1-287

Our Imperial Rulers

"If these industrial giants finally acquire the plants on which they have purchased options, their holdings will come to $38,500,000,000, or 66.5 per cent of total usable facilities in America." Today these 250 corporations control two-thirds of American industry. Today with European industry hampered by lack of material, plant, and buying power and by the destruction of war, the 250 American giants can produce as much as the rest of world industry wit in and outside of the United States.

This is the concentration of industrial and economic power which is today ruling the United States. Without its consent no law can be passed or if passed enforced. If there is any nation in the world which is not afraid of the ultimate imperial power of such an organization of individuals, then that nation lacks ordinary common sense.

Marshall Plan

What is the Marshall Plan? I doubt if one American in a hundred has any clear idea. The usual way of stating it is Europe "needs dollars". This is, of course, nonsense. What Europe needs is coal, iron, steel, machines, automobiles, tools; and especially food like wheat and potatoes, and fibers like cotton. Now it happens that in most of these things we have not only plenty but a surplus; and so far as machines and tools are concerned, we have a productive organization geared to make an even larger amount than we are now making. Moreover, unless we can sell the things that we are making and raise our output for the things that we are prepared to make, we shall have to cut down our industrial organization, discharge employees, and slip into the well-known and often repeated industrial crisis.

Foreign Trade

Now in order to sell our goods, we must buy the goods of foreign nations. There is no international money; all international trade is barter, exchange of goods for goods. The question is then what has Europe for which we could trade our goods? We can get from Europe, either directly or through their trade with other lands, furs, tobacco, wool, diamonds and precious stones, tea, coffee, and cocoa, fish, wines and liquors, vegetable oil, metals like tin and copper, chemicals, cloth, clocks and watches. There are many more things which Europe used to sell, but which on account of war destruction they are not able to manufacture today. In view of the fact that sometime she will be able to manufacture a host of other things which the United States wants, Europe can give us in return for present goods her promises for future payments, with interest to pay for the delay. Here then is a chance for a good economic bargain. It is no matter of philanthropy; we need to sell to Europe, just as much as she needs to buy from us.

35-1-289

Prices

But in bargaining, there is of course, the question of the rate of exchange: how many fur-pelts or diamonds or watches will sell for how much wheat, steel, or automobiles? There is nor can be no absolute scientific rate of exchange. Basically things ought to exchange roughly in accordance with the amount of labor it takes to get them. In reality they sell for what their scarcity compels people to offer. Now it happens that the scarcity in Europe for food, clothing and tools, is so tragically intense, that the United States can put almost any price upon her exports which she wants to; and the prices of goods in the United States are already at fantastic heights; yet coal which sells for $9.00 a ton here in the United States can be sold for $20.00 in Europe. The United States therefore has the whip-hand. This explains what has happened in the case of the vast sum of money we loaned England. United States prices have gone up so, that this sum cannot today purchase half what it could have purchased when the loan was made. In this way and in others private interests in the United States have been making profit beyond the dreams of avarice, and driving financial bargains which promise fabulous profits to the future.

Taxing Americans

Moreover organized industry is making profit not simply from the goods sold Europe but principally from goods sold in the United States.

And if goods raised or made in the United States, can be furnished us cheaper by European countries, then the industrial barons of our country demands that either these goods be excluded or that the consumer here be taxed so as to maintain their profits at the former or even higher level. Anyone can see that all this is pointing straight towards disaster.

Says Mr. Marshall

Here comes then the Marshall Plan which promises nothing; but simply says to European countries: "What kind of goods can you raise or make for export?" And when we know "perhaps we can arrange to buy them." To which Russia naturally answers: "On what terms are you going to buy? And when this bargain is struck, who will control buying and prices?" The United States and Great Britian reply that is nobody's business, and they proceed to sit down and talk, with Russia absent. Now we must await the pay off; if the profiteers of the United States are determined, just as they were after the First World War, to bleed Europe and the world for the last cent of profit, they are heading for the same disaster which we met in 1929 and the ensuing decade. If, on the other hand, they are going to see how cheaply they can sell American goods for the goods and promises-to-pay of Europe, then there is light in the world.

Preaching

This week I regret to say I feel called to preach. It is a bad habit which grows on one and is a sure sign of advancing years. But at times it is quite unavoidable. My text is "Gum". You know that stuff which America chews incessantly. This text was thrust upon me while I was sitting before the Lincoln Memorial awaiting the Presidential ukase. Mr. Truman had on a nice new suit and a distracting tie. But what I was really looking at was the audience. To me there is nothing so fascinating as a crowd of colored folk: the colors of skin and clothes, the carriage, the manners always thrill me. There is plenty to critisize, to laugh at, but in all it is an uplift and a satisfaction. I sat ignoring the sonorous "And I mean all Americans!" watching a slim teen-age girl! she was dark brown, velvet-skinned, with a smart hair-do, a well-fittin dress and sparklin eyes; and then I saw her mouth and I stiffened. Chewing with open mouth! My somewhat alarmed companion stared at me. I held myself firmly in hand and spoke with but a slight tremor in well-modulated voice: "I am willing to concede a point in the argument," I said. "It may at times be imperative for a certain type of human constitution, in reminiscence of past gastronomical joys, or in fervent anticipation of future meals, to exe cise her jaws vigorously in the manufacture of a flow of perpetual saliva by champing modified rubber. I admit for the sake of argument that, to a certain sort of human being this seems absolutely necessary. But I ask earnestly and in the name of High Heaven, is it--is it, also imperative that in this essentially private rite, she should open her insides to the world and chew in public with her mouth stretched wide open? I am firmly of the opinion that if every gum-chewer could be suddenly faced by a mirror, revealing not only a hunk of worried rubber, but the teeth and tonsils protruding between slobbering lips, she (it is I regret to say usually SHE) would swear hereafter to chew gum with closed mouth as a mere matter of decent regard for the weak stomachs of their friends and astonished onlookers."

Gum In General

Having now relieved my spleen at this extreme case of an essentially filthy habit may I be permitted now to attack the basic matter of the habit of chewing when eating. I not only admit, but rush to declaim, the advisability of chewing when eating; a habit which many Americans with astonishing perversity refuse to adopt; imitating cows when eating and swallowing vast gobs hastily at meals, apparently with the intention of chewing later, which they often forget letting the unchewed morsel become stomach ulcers, etc. There was once a man named Fletcher, who make a fad and a good living by imploring Americans for their digestions sake, to chew as well as eat while eating.

But chewing without eating has been an American foible for generations--probably Freud would discover in the habit the subconscious endeavor of a nation to finish an unfinished job. For that reason perhaps Americans took up chewing tobacco;while hungry and dipping snuff flourished in the seventeenth century in elegant snuff-boxes which in part atoned for th nasty habit but finally degenerated into a handy stick of wood in the South. I can remember when no Pullman car was complete without a reeking spittoon in at least every other berth, and saloons were spitteons surrounded by liquor. I am aware that certain blood-relatives of mine in Africa and Asia, chew the betel nut with astonishing vigor and persistence, and with results even worse than the tobacco and snuff habits of the Western World. This simply proves that such signs of degener tion are by no means racial but characteristic of morons in every age and land. A search in the ancient world would reveal what the Greeks and Romans chewed between meals and similar habits among Ethiopians and Chinese. Here is a place for scores of Ph.D. theses, with pointed morals a mile long.

Prospectus

35-1-293

I return to my mutton: in my mother's house there was no chewing of gum; in my primary grade Miss Cross would have unhesitatingly eaten raw any little wretch who had brought a wad of gum into the room. I remember no college mate who chewed anything less manly than tobacco, and was a bit ashamed of that. But today civilization is being disrupted by gum. It ruins chairs, clothes and carpets and disfigures faces; it promotes universal indigestion bad breath; and it leads to bankruptcy. How? A guy takes a cent's worth of chickle; and another cents worth of scent and colored paper. He adds to this one million dollars for advertising and sells two million dollars worth of Fruity Juice. We spend fifty million dollars a year for chickle to make gum, while the world starves and goes insane and bankrupt.

Our Economic Program

What Negroes need in America is an economic program; a carefull planned way of earning a living. This does not mean giving up the fight for the ballot--rather renewed efforts for the right to vote. It does not mean surrender in the pressure for civil rights and social equality; no, it means to keep fighting for all human rights. But not to stop there or even rest, we must be able to earn a living and to earn it not by joining in the exploitation of our own poor--not by trying desperately to "make money" in the same way that white America does, but to seek out and adopt for ourselves, the new organization of industry which the British Labor Party, the French Socialists and the Russian communists are following. We must not be scared by the calling of names.

ECONOMIC PIONEERING

We, American Negroes lack the pioneer spirit for obvious reasons. We are hereded by ourselves into cities; we are sticking close to everything that the white American does. We must try economic pioneering; we must branch out the new ways of doing things and helping ourselves. The first matter is this question of group production and them comes the distribution of these goods and services among the people who consume them, without the intervention of the middleman. That is industrial democracy; the carrying out of the consumers ccoperative can lead us into a knowledge of what political democracy really is. We tried to envisage a modern democracy as political; it is not, so far as it succeeds; and where it succeeds it is and must be economic. We must take our first steps in independent cooperation with the world along such paths.

PLANNING

There is little disposition among American Negroes to strike out boldly in thought or action toward new or unusual lines for solving the problem of their place in the modern world. To most of us it seems enough if we

"keep up with the Joneses", who are average Americans and do what they do. We distrust our ability to do more than this. But suppose that Americans get on the wrong track as all folk sometimes do; and suppose that we see things from a different point of view just because we have been so terribly disadvantaged in this land? Take for instance this matter of "individual initiative" and "free enterprise." To a New England white boy of the middle class; to a vigorous young white westerner, whether of German, Scandinavian, or Irish descent, these phrases make sense; they have seen men start at scratch and become executives, millionaires, senators, presidents. They can easily forget or never know of the vast numbers even of these stalwarts who have become underpaid laborers, crippled drudges, paupers, bums, beggars and criminals.

We Negroes cannot ignore these, because we know that only by exception and bull-necked luck does even the gifted Negro get a fair chance in America today. We get by and up, now and then, but our enterprise in not free to act and our initiative is heavily handicapped.

What can we do to free our own ability and make it easier for the average colored boy to succeed? Manifestly such action must be social; it must be planned by the group; it must strike out in new and untried ways. It will not be enough to imitate America, especially just at the time when the old American ways are breaking down, and social planning is unpopular. No, we must think and plan for ourselves, with faith and independence.

POVERTY

It is characteristic of our modern scientific civilization, that while we want exact facts when we study stones and trees and even animals, we are nevertheless content to talk about human beings without knowing the facts. For instance we talk about Poverty. Everybody knows that Poverty not only is, but always has been, the great human problem. Now what we ought to know, first of all, is just how poor people are and how many people are poor. This unfortunately, we only know indirectly, and more or less by guess-work.

Suppose we wanted to arrange the families of the United States in a scale according to their annual income; we could not do this today; we have not the data. If we could use all of the figures collected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue for income-tax purposes, even then the income of most of the people, being below the figure necessary for income tax returns, would be unknown. But even for those who do pay income-tax, it is illegal for these figures to be used. Certain figures concerning very high incomes are published, but otherwise we must remain ignorant. If we do not know the income of the people of the Unites States, or know only vaguely, we cannot make final conclusions; and if we try to, we can be immediately contradicted by people who assert, and they are largely speaking the truth, that we are basing our conclusions upon guess-work.

TEPOZLAN

It happens that there has recently been published a study of a little Mexican village, Dr. Oscar Lewis of Washington University has been down in this village of 3,580 persons in 853 families, to try to find out as carefully and accurately as possible what the income of these is.

RICH AND POOR

In this lettle village in 1944 the minimum property ownership for a self-sustaining farm family of five, would be ten acres of land, a plow, a team of oxen, a horse, a cow, two hogs, two plum trees and a sewing machine. Of the inhabitants of this little town 80% or three fourths do not have this minimum for self-sufficient living. This is a well-known pattern of poverty in the whole world.

Eighteen per cent of the families belong to the "rich and well-to-do;" they include the better artisans, most of the merchants and the well-to-do farmers. They wear store clothes, send their children to high school and have a fairly high standard of living. The wealthy group among these are a little over four percent; they own considerable land which usually they have inherited; they eat more meat, milk, eggs and bread and live in better houses than others. They wear shoes and sleep on a bed instead of on the floor. They have hired help; but they are not a leisure class, but work beside their help.

On the other hand, down at the bottom of the scale are 511 families owning almost no land, but working the barren land belonging to the community on the mountain side. For a living they burn charcoal, sell wood, and follow various haphazard lines of labor. Usually they own their own small homes, and about 40% have some income from plum trees; about a third of them have hogs, less than a third own a mule, a horse, or a donkey.

Here then in microcosm is a picture of the poverty of the world; it is not the worst poverty imaginable; these people get food to eat; they have something of clothing and shelter; but three fourths of them do not get enough to be healthy or send their children to school. We ought to know more facts like this, for the great majority of the people of the world, accuratly and in detail. Then we would have a firm statring-point at which we could say: what is wrong with this Civilization? With our work, with our technique, our distribution of wealth? Why is it that the great majority of the people of the world in this heyday of civilization, in this day of mounting wealth, luxury and power---why is it, that the vast majority of the people of the world are desperately, and as it seems to most of us, inexcusably poor?

WINDS OF TIME

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

THE FORGOTTEN POOR

We use to have glib explanation for poverty. In the first place we had a way, which we still fol ow, of ignoring the poor people as though they did not exist; we say for instance of the city of New York that most of the people are "gone away during the summer." This is an astonishing lie! Of the seven million people in and around New York City, six and a half million at least are still there during the hottest of the summer. The great department stores trim their windows with dresses which people "wear at the seaside and on the mountains"; when most New Yorkers visit neither. In the winter, they change that trimming and show what people are "wearing in Florida, and Southern California." But the vast majority of people summer and winter are right in the places where they usually live the year round. Of course our ignoring of the poor today is nothing as compared with hat people use to do in the 17th or 18th centuries. Then they deliberately talked of the rich, the well-born, the aristocrats, forming much less than a tenth of the nation, as bein the only part of the nation for which civiliz tion existed. Today we are trying to think of the masses as being the real people of the world and yet w studiously ignore their actual condition; we do not know just how little they have to live on, and we refuse to study it.

AMERICAN NEGROES

This is true among American Negroes, even when they look upon th their own condition. There are a great many of us who think of the well-to-do Negroes of Detroit, Atlanta and Los Angeles as being the real Negroes;while the poor ignored, semi-criminal and desperate, are regarded as not "typical" of the race. Yet in a wide sense, they are typical, because they represent the majority of American Negroes. The real problem is why do they represent us? Why are we so poor?

Here again we used to blame ourselves bitterly; we used to talk about those among us who were lazy and careless, who did not save, who would not work regularly, who wandered around from place to place; we almost persuaded ourselves that the only people who were poor and criminal were Negroes. Of course we knew better than that; we knew that when you carefully study the situation, no group of people have raised themselves more quickly than American Negroes. But we also know they have not raised themselves faster than large numbers of other people in the world; and that most people in the world are poor and will remain poor so long as the present organization of work and income continues.

WHAT POVERTY MEANS

35-1-300

Realizing this we try to think of poverty as an ethical problem: most people are poor because most people are inefficient, lazy and ignorant; therefore the distribution of the wealth of the world is roughly a map of human desert. This was the nineteenth century answer to the problem of poverty. It was wrong. We are beginning to realize that it was wrong. There is no human being today who looking around at the world can see the people who are good and industrious and saving as the rich and the people who are poor as the wastrels, the lazy, improvident and the evil. There are plenty of poor people who are criminal; there are plenty of rich people who have worked hard for the wealth which they own. But on the other hand, there are rich people who are rascals and there are poor people who are saints. By no manner of argument can it be shown that the wealth of the world is distributed according to the deserts of the workers. The distribution of income in the modern world is a fantastic contradiction, and the first duty of religion and science is to try to bring reason and right into the remuneration which a human being gets for his exertions. This is admittedly a hard task, but no matter how difficult, it is the first task of civilization.

The Race And Nation

There is a change of emphasis going on in the consideration of social problems of which many people are unaware. During the last generation we talked about nations and about races, so that in the United States the problem of Negroes became specifically "a race problem" if not "the race problem;" having to do with questions concerning what many newspapers called "the race."

35-1-301

Now it happens that during the twentieth century, there is a change in meaning and attitude so far as races and nations are concerned. Science has shown us that the conventional idea of race is wrong; that you cannot divide mankind into biologically separate races, and that there is no such thing as racial unity; beyond that, we have found that nations instead of being the natural unit of political life, are only natural as they become unified economically; that is as they produce and consume, buy and sell, so as to be self-supporting; without such economic self-sufficiency they can never be independent nations. In the absence of economic unity, national patriotism, national political life, has led to war in the past and will lead to war in the future. So that both the names and the ideas back of them, of race and nation, are falling into disuse.

Group Culture

On the other hand, it is perfectly true that groups of human beings live and work together; that they remember things in common, have common experiences and act in common; and that this common group action is the greatest dynamic force which civilization knows. It is this working and acting together, that is today called a "Culture". So that instead of speaking of the white "race" and the British "Nation" we are speaking of European culture and English culture. So in our thinking of American Negroes, we have got to remember, as has often been pointed out, that we are not a race, and certainly not a nation. There are nations of Negroes like Haiti, Liberia and Ethiopia. There are nations with large proportions of Negroes. There are also great groups of Negroes reaching out toward nationhood, which they may eventually attain, like Nigeria and the Gold Coast in West Africa, and the West Indian Confederation which has long been talked of, and steps toward which have been taken.

But quite outside and beyond the conception of race, there is distinctly an American Negro Culture; this is using the word in its sociological sense, and not in its popular sense of manners and education. A Culture is a Way of Life; a set of habits, by which we meet the every-day problems of living: birth and death; marriage and work; home and contact with our fellows. In this sense of the word, there has grown up in the United States a broad and interesting culture which carries a literature and an art, a history, and a political and social life.

American Negro Culture

~~But out of these various influences as is continually growing~~ The new cultural complex which is American Negro. It consists of the various and interesting ways by which this group of people, of varying descent and varying blood, have been thrown together so as to establish folk-ways by which they solve the particular problems of their living today in the United States of America and in the modern western European world. The study of these facts has been neglected; in some respects we are not conscious of them; and yet they are perhaps one of the most interesting developments of the modern world. The time will come when a course in American Negro culture will be a scentral study of students of sociology, not only in Negro colleges but in white colleges and in the universities of the world. ~~It involves a most interesting application~~

1. Illiteracy

The United States had great difficulty in fighting the second World War because so many of its young men were illiterate.. This is an astonishing statement for a country which has yelled itself red in the face concerning its extraordinary educational system. Herbert Aptheker has brought out the facts concerning this situation in the January 1947 number of the Journal of Negro Education. He shows us that of all the men regristered in the army before Pearl Harbor, 347,000 could not write their names and of these 125,000 were white and 220,000 Negroes. Thereupon new regulations were introduced declaring that no one could be registered in the army who had not completed the fourth grade of an American Elementary School..

2. Special Training

Six weeks after this rule, 55,000 registrants were deferred because they were illiterate and by September this number had increased to 140,000 of whom 60,000 were white and 80,000 Negroes; by October 1942 the Senate was informed that the army had inducted 135,000 Americans who could not read and write. Thereupon an experiment of special training, intended for eight to thirteen weeks, was given in order to do away with illiteracy. The classes were small the expenses were not limited. Negro teachers were employed extensivly for Negro students.

3. Schools

In these classes from June 1943 to October 1944 180,000 men were placed, and 150,000 completed their training and attained a basic degree of literacy. Of these, 96,670 were Negroes. The evidence was as General Hersey said, that the higher rate of Negroes as compared with white existed not because Negroes could not be educated but because educational opportunities had not been made available for them. This was proven in these special schools; 87% of the Negroes successfully completed the work, while among the whites the percentage was 84%; of the Negroes 71.7% completed the training in less than sixty days and among the whites the percentage was 75.6%. As a result of these figures, it is clear: first, we have a wretched system of public schools; secondly, the children of the nation, white and Negro, are not attending them regularly, and third, the attempt to do away with illiteracy among Negroes in the United States has never been thoroughly attempted and is not being attempted today. Discrimination in education by race and color is a serious and despicable thing but denial of education is worse and that is the problem which faces American Negroes.

4 Federal Aid

We have plenty of money for war. We have money to give to Germany, Greece and China. We have funds for military training and exprimen[e]t but we have only a pittance for Federal Aid to Schools. In 1948, vote neither for Taft or Truman, Dewey or Eisenhower. Vote for Schools with funds distributed without discrimination as to race.

Popular America

If the American people think that they are the most popular nation on earth, they should read what European papers and commentators are saying about them. They wil not read this in the so-called "free-press" of the United States.

35-1-305

Back in April, the British New Statesman and Nation declared that the break-down of the Moscow conference was inevitable after the President's message to Congress on Greece and Turkey. It declared that Secretary Marshall at Moscow was "as obstructive as a Communist Commissar;" and that no subject was discussed with any reference to its merits. "The American people, responding to a well-organized propaganda campai n, is now possessed by an anti-Communist hysteria, far stonger than any disapproval of ermany which it displayed durin the war." In July, at the British National Union of Mine Workers, the President, Will Lawther, critized bitterly the so-called "American way of Life" he said, "the dynamic ideas of Communism, could not be suppressed by atomic bombs."

Free Enterprise

Lately Earnest Bevin, British Foreign Minister, has openly smeared American "Free Enterprise" which he said was illustrated in the depres ion of the thirties. Great Britain is again and openly trying to organize trade with Russia and nobody but Americans believes that the Marshall Plan is philanthropy. hat the Marshall Plan is , is an attempt to arrange for keepin up our sale of goods and ra materials to Europe at the hi hest price that we can obtain by treaty; and the object of Western Europe is to see if prices of necessary American goods cannot be reduced to a decent level.

Because of the high price which can be obtained for exports today the American consumer is being charged twice as much as there is ny reason for his paying. One of these days exports are going to be uddenly and largely cut off. The prices then of raw materials and manufactured goods in the United States is bound to fall. Industrialists will begin to discharge workers by the wholesale and their "free enterprise" will be efforts to get the United States Government in various ways to cover their losses.

35-1-306

World Socialism

In the meantime, everywhere but in the United States the socialization of industry is proceeding: in Great Britain, the nation owns the great bank of England, all the railways and transport and the coal mines; and it is going to own sometime the manufacture of steel. In France the government has long since owned railroads and telegraphs and is enlarging as fast as it can, its ownership of industry.

In every other European country it is recognized as the first principle of economics that any great industry which has grown through monopoly to be nation-wide, should for just that reason be taken over by the state. The whole world is thus moving in the direction of socialism with almost the sole exception of the United States.

Penalizing Thought

The United States has started out to drive anybody who dares believe in Socialism out of the Civil Service; to turn over the housing of the people to monopolistic real estate dealers and masters of the building trade; and to keep profits as high as possible, and then deny that the rate of profit has anything to do with prices.

If we were not one of the most stupid people on earth we could not for a moment let a movement of this sort go so widely uncontradicted and uncontested, as this silly yelling about "free enterprise" and "private initiative" has gone in the United States. We will not learn by the lessons of history, we will not remember that after the First World War, we tried exactly this kind of foolishness and collapsed and dragged down the whole world about our ears.

And the second tragic World War was due principally to this American greed, and the attempt of American business to make money out of the distress of the world. What we are trying today, is not only to repeat this tragedy, but to put in jail or what is the same thing to put out of a job, anybody that dares critize it or call it to the attention of the world. Most of the thinkers of the United States today are silent; most of those who know what is going on, are scared to say a word; and when a man like Henry Wallace points this our, our only answer is to sing the "Star-Spangled Banner."

Character

One contrast which I note between the nineteenth and twentieth centuries has to do with the emphasis on our own character and on the action of others.

In the nineteenth century we paid a great deal of attention as to how we acted and how we ought to act. We talked about the "training of character." In the twentieth century, we rather tend to emphasize how other people ought to act, and how much they should be blamed for not acting in the right way. Both attitudes have their truth, but we must not forget the attempt at character-building in the nineteenth century. We must today think of our attitude toward other people and especially guard ourselves against envy and jealousy and the spreading of ill-natured gossip.

Gossip and Envy

We must remember that gossip is the peculiar weakness of depressed classes of people. It is naturally the weakness of Negroes in the United States. Unless they take care and forethought, they become bitterly inimical to any advancement made by their fellows. They look upon the rise of one Negro as a sort of slap in the face of all others. It would be interesting, for instance, after the announcement of the Rosenwald Scholarships and the Guggenheim Fellowships to know whether the amount of congratulation for accomplishment was equally or exceeded by bitter disappointment and even hatred of the lucky ones among those who did not succeed. Among the large number of our teachers, any promotion or increase in salary on the part of their fellows, gives rise to a wave of criticism; in the case of our children, the success of one child, by good marks, or appointment at commencement, or in the class-play, raises so much bitterness, that often the principals and authorities are loathe to have any open competition at all.

209

Injustice

It can and will be said that much of this criticism comes from the fact that selections are not fair; that rewards in this world are not always distributed according to ability; and that above all income, seems to have very little to do with honesty or hard work. But even granted, that much that comes to human beings does not come because of desert, we must for our own souls salvation avoid what the Germans so aptly called "Schaden-Freude" joy at ill; uplift because somebody else has suffered.

We Negroes mean the same thing when we talk about "dishing dirt," we know how often in card parties and in visits and meetings of all sorts, the true joy that some people seem to get out of this contact with their fellowmen is to tell mean stories and gossip about each other. This sometimes happens almost in the persons' faces, if they leave the room and suddenly re-enter. Now all this is bad, not only for the person libeled with idle gossip, but it is fatal for the person who allows himself to think on this line; who instead of being glad when a friend succeeds, finds himself almost naturally feeling a tinge of distaste. They ought immediately to take hold of such feeling; they ought to go and visit the successful; write and talk about their work particularly if it is a success deserved, as certainly large numbers of successes are.

In Japan

I remember once standing before a great temple in Japan, beautifully carved in age-old wood. Over the door were the well-known effigies of three monkeys, whose replicas have been sent all over the world. One, with his hands on his eyes said "See no evil" One with his hands on his ears, said "Hear no evil" One with his hands on his mouth, said "Speak no evil!"

We should cultivate the will to believe in good because there is good in the world. We should not let that darken our scientific knowledge of truth, of evil as well as good; but it should be our main business to spread the Good and not always to gossip exclusively about the Evil.

About Free Masonry

W. E. B. Du Bois

Sometime ago we spoke of the History of free masonry among Negroes in merica, by Harry E. Davis, now member of the Senate of the state of Ohio. There has been an interesting development following his study and that of other historians in this field. It is, of course, common knowledge that hitherto white masons have refused to recognize Negro masonry, not only by declining to initiate Negroes, but by declaring that their lodges were not legitimate. On November 25, 1946, a committee of the White Grand Lodge of Massachusetts made a report in which it said: "The Committee appointed by you to consider and report on the subject of Negro Freemasonry in Massachusetts, begs leave to submit the following report:

35-1-217

"It has been a full half century since our Grand Lodge has considered the subject of Negro Freemasonry. Then, and in all previous studies of the subject, attention was directed primarily, if not solely, to the question of the technical regularity of the origins and early history of Negro Freemasonry. In the light of the evidence then available, it was believed that it could not according to Masonic Law, be regarded as legitimate Freemasonry. On the same evidence the same conclusions would presumably have been reached--and perhaps even more emphatically--if the individuals and lodges in question had been white instead of colored."

"In the intervening half century, Masonic historical research has made much progress, and the emphasis has changed considerably in Masonic thinking, with respect to some of the factors involved in any such inquiry. The legality and regularity of each organizational act is now tested according to the law and customs of its date rather than by those of the present.

Negro Origin Legitimate Your Committee finds that according to the then prevailing Masonic law and custom, the origin, early procedures and subsequent development of the so-called Prince Hall (Negro) Freemasonry in this Common-Wealth have been and are, regular and legitimate. Moreover, there is reliable and uncontradicted documentary evidence, dated June 30, 1784 that African Lodge, of which Prince Hall was Master was, in 1776, granted a "Permet" by John Rowe of Boston (then Provincial Grand Master over North America where no other Provincial was appointed) "to walk on St. John's day and Bury our dead in form," etc. Rowe succeeded Henry Price in 1768.

35-1-218

"Thus for 170 years African Lodge and its successors have been functioning in Massachusetts in good faith and with the justifiable belief that their origin and procedure were as regular and legitimate as we have thought ours to be."

On March 12, 1947, this report was "accepted, approved and recorded by unanimous vote of the Grand Lodge. Thus for the first time in American history the legitimacy of Negro Freemasonry at least in the jurisdiction of Massachusetts is openly admitted.

Permit saved from fire The "Permet" granted by the Grand Lodge of England and referred to above is still in existence, although mutiliated. This warrent number 459 was granted September 29, 1784 and delivered April 29. The African Grand Lodge number 459 was organized May 6, 1787, the warrant was kept rolled in a metal tube in the safe deposit vault of a Boston bank; later it was laid out flat between two thick plates of glass and moulded together. In 1869 a fire destroyed Grand Lodge Headquarters and the charter then in its metal tube was saved from the flames by Grand Master Kendall, who crawled in the burning building at the peril of his life. It has taken a long time for Negro Masons to secure this recognition but steady research, careful records and determination have at least accomplished this result.

Barter of Beliefs

To my mind the most serious ~~rot~~ Rift in the moral fiber of the United States is the fraud buying and selling of belief and opinions. There was a time in our history, when this was regarded as one of the lowest forms of dishonesty. What a man wrote or said was regarded as his version of what he believed to be true. It might not be accepted as truth by other persons; it might be attacked in various ways and for various reasons; but so far as the author was concerned, it was either his honest opinion, or a joke or a lie. Today that is changed and we do not seem to realize the change and the implications of it. For instance recently one of the greatest coorporations publishing magazines in the United States, with aggreate circulation running into eight figures, was in conference with its staff writers on the question as to wherher those writers had any right, outside of their employment on these magazines, to express their own opinions. The plain implication was that while they were in the employ of the magazine and writing for them they were naturally expressing not their opinions, but the opinions which their employers hired them to express.

Selling Souls

This is not only true in this particular case, it is true in the case of a vast number of magazine writers, columnists on newspapers and radio broadcasters. Men of ability today are hired to express the opinion of the persons who hire them. Of course, probably in most cases only those persons are hired to express these opinions who themselves believe them. Nevertheless the distinction is a delicate matter: if a man wishes to keep his job, he will say what he is hired to say.

Less than a generation ago this was not true. Men wrote their opinions and sent them to magazines and most reputable periodicals advertised and gloried in the fact that they represented diverse but honest opinions of men who were writing what they believed. This is no longer so today. Today the Magazine has a policy. It either picks out an honest man who believes in this policy and asks him to write, or , with increasing frequency, it hires a man of ability who is willing to write no matter whether he believes what he writes or not.

The Dirty Dailies

In the daily press this began years ago when a rich playboy from the west established a chain of daily newspapers, without morals or ideals, splashed their front pages with news of crime, dirt, calamity and deliberate lies, and then made that press one of the widest circulated disseminators of news in America, by deliberately hiring the best writers in America. At first there were some writers who could not be had for this work at any price. But more and more down to our day, the number who resist this sale of their opinions and beliefs is smaller and smaller.

35-1-221

I once knew a young white man. He came out of the South and thought and spoke strongly and bravely on the race problem. He became managing editor on one of the liberal weekly magazines. Suddenly he was hired by the greatest publisher of magazines in America and given a salary of $25,000 a year. I do not think that when he accepted this, he realized that he was selling his soul. I do not know just what happened, but certainly within less than a year, this man gave up that salary and deliberately walked into oblivion, rather than sell himself for gold. It was a maganificent act. Few people knew any of the facts, perhaps none knew all; but here was the kind of sacrifice that makes for heroes.

Time and Tide

A memorandum of the magazine called Time was recently sent to the New York Newspaper Guild detailing the conditions under which writers could do outside work for themselves. It said that if anything which a staff member wrote "deviates so as to be in opposition to Time policy, the management will discuss the matter with the author and if the differences are not resolved and the author goes ahead with the publication," then he will lose his job. The Newspaper Guild replied in the voice of one writer: "It is hard to keep one's sanity after reading the proposed policy on writing and speaking. If ever I saw a charter of utter mental slavery this is it." This is the present situation, this is the depth to which creative writing in the United States is sinking.

An Inventor

The SCIENTIFIC MONTHLY, has recently published a new statement and estimate of the Negro scientist Norbert Rillieux. Rillieux was a quadroon born in New Orleans March 7, 1806 and baptized in St. Louis Cathedral. His father was an engineer and inventor and operated a cotton baling press on Poydras Street. Norbert was sent to Paris for his education. He showed rare ability and at the age of 24 was an instructor in applied mechanics at L'Ecole Centrale in Paris. In 1830, he published papers on steam engine work and steam economy. In 1812 a man named Howard invented a vacuum-pan for boiling sugar solutions. Effort was immediately made to extend this invention, and Rillieux's invention came as an improvement upon Howard's. He enclosed condensing coils in a vacuum chamber and employed the vapor from the first chamber for evaporating the juice in a second chamber under higher vacuum, and thus "laid the foundation for all modern industrial evaporation."

For 20 years he tried to interest French manufacturers, but finally was called to New Orleans to be chief engineer of a sugar refinery.

The First Sugar Evaporator

In 1834, the first practical evaporator was built but failed on account of the financial crisis of 1837. In 1843, Rillieux again installed an evaporator which operated with complete success in 1845, and this was the first factory-scale multiple effect vacuum evaporator. A patient was taken out in 1846 (United States 4,879) and thus the machine is officially described:

"A series of vacuum pans, or partial vacuum pans, have been so combined together as to make use of the vapor of the evaporation of the juice in the first, to heat the juice in the second and the vapor from this to heat the juice in the third, which latter is in connection with a condenser, the degree of pressure in each successive one being less.... The number of sirup-pans may be increased or decreased at pleasure so long as the last of the series is in conjunction with the condenser." The manufacture and refining of sugar was thus revolutionized. The new system in 1846 was established in other factories and prizes were awarded.

The Color Line

Rillieux, while prosperous and popular, suffered many difficulties on account of his color and eventually, because of the attempt to reduce all persons of Negro blood practically to slavery just before the Civil War, he left Louisiana and went back to France. He was living there in 1861. In France he gave up his interest in sugar machinery and took up the study of Egyptology---decipering hieroglyphics at the Bibliotheque Nationale. He died October 8, 1894 and was buried in Pere la Chaise.

Soldier's Children

A Year or more ago I spoke in this column of the illegitimate children of Negro soldiers, by white English mothers, who are a problem in the present day England. Recently, the English journal, MOTHER AND CHILD, has discussed this matter. The problem of illegitimacy is wide in England, as in all countries after wars; but the illegitimate child whose mother is white and whose father is colored is a peculiarly pressing problem. The paper says frankly: "The present trend of public opinion in countries predominately inhabited by white people is definitely against coloured peoples; and the somewhat large increase in Britain's coloured population creates a problem which is bound to tax the patience and genius of sociologists, educationists and social workers. The main consideration is, of course, that so many people are disinclined to face the question of intermarriage squarely and they show a definite objection to association between Negro and white people; more than ever they resent marriages between the two peoples. The problem now engaging attention is that of the children born of white mothers and the American Negro troops who were stationed in England during the war."

The Present Problem

A report, published by the League of Coloured Peoples, reveals that the total number of these children is about 550. This report is the result of a study made in a number of counties and boroughs throughout England and Wales where coloured American troops were known to have been stationed. It was found that some 544 children were born to 536 mothers, 89 of whom were known to have been married, 95 unmarried and the marital status of the remaining 352 unrevealed. The main point, however, is what is to be done to assist these mothers to look after their children and what methods should be adopted to integrate this new coloured population into the community in such a way as would remove from the minds of the children the handicap of illegitimacy, which is sure to act as a hindrance to their progress.

England's Plans

MOTHER AND CHILD says, "We are already convinced, that so far as school life is concerned little difficulty is ever ixperienced, because children mix quite freely. The problem arises when they leave school and have to enter industry. The present state of public opinion in the countries predominatly white is such that these children are subject to social disadvantages which illegitimate children of pure white parents will never experience." The paper goes on th say that one suggestion is that the child be sent to its coloured parent; another, that it be sent to the West Indies. But that these children are British, and that Great Britain must see that they are properly cared for, and that careful inquiry ought to be made before they are sent to foster-parents abroad. Especially it would be difficult to ensure their safety and proper selection of foster-parents if they were sent to America. Another suggestion, is that a segregated home be established for them, but that would not be wise, the paper finally concludes. The only reasonable solution, therefore, is to develop a foster-parent plan in Britain and subsidize those white persons who are willing to adopt a coloured child into their homes. "The subsidy should provide ample financial assistance to enable t ose children who show an aptitude for school work to proceed further, and there is no doubt that a good many of them would, with such opportunity, be a credit to the community in which they are brought up."

Marshall Plan

THE REPORT OF the European conference on the Marshall Plan, brings forward again the role of colonies. If we are not careful we will fail to realize how the value of the raw material in colonies in this new era of capitalism, may easily stop the broad plan for colonial emancipation laid down by the charter of the United Nations at San Francisco.

The text of this report said, for instance, "The extension of the war into southeast Asia upset Europe's trade balance with the United States, which was partly financed by exports from southeast Asia. And goes on to say: "Early in 1947, indeed, it became clear that the effect of the war had been to upset the balance between the productive power and resources of the Western Hemisphere and those of the rest of the world." And finally British statesmen have recently said frankly, "We got 50 millions from West African cocoa and a hundred million from other products in West Africa during the war."

Colonial Exploitation

ALL THIS SHOWS that a system of trade which was of great benefit to Europe has been broken up by the war. This trade system consisted of using cheap colonial labor in Asia and Africa to raise raw material; this raw material transported to Europe was priced at the lowest; then it was processed and manufactured and sold for high prices all over the world. In this way the exploitation of men and materials in the colonies supported Europe in luxury.

Then came the second World War, Japan cut off the tribute from Asia. The tribute from Africa still poured into Europe and England and through them was used to purchase needed goods in America. But the war raised labor unrest in Africa; strikes in the copper mines, organization of the cocoa farmers and demand for independence and autonomy in other regions. The reorganization of the world has come and Europe practically says to America, "we have been deprived, at least temporarily, from the income which we derived from colonial regions; we want you to loan us money until we restore that flow of income."

The new colonial question, therefore, is how far capitalism from America, and in time, from Europe, is going to re-establish a system by which through low wages and underpriced material, Europe can grow rich.

Wage and Price

When we fight for colonial freedom in the United Nations and in public opinion, we must keep these newer aspects in mind. If the world needs colonial produce, and it certainly does,--rubber from Asia and Africa, quinine and rope from Asia, and a dozen different other valuable articles---then it is the business of modern men to insist that these countries be paid, and paid adequately for what they raise. That in the first place, decent modern wages be paid for their labor, so that this labot with adequate income can support its own social services, especially in education and helath. In addition to that, the price of this raw material must not be set by the people to whose interest it is to make it as low as possible. A fair division of value between the colonial farmer and the European and American manufacturer must be worked out on a humanitarian basis.

25-1-317

Votes and Poverty

If we face this fundamental economic aspect of the colonial problems, we must insist not simply on political power, for there can be no adequate expression of political power on the part of the people who are receiving like the Egyptian peasantry, $17.00 a year. If we give these people the right to vote and give them no income so that they can establish and control their schools and pay for social services, then education in the hands of employers will be directed toward building up a subservient body of artisans and an emasculated civil service.

You will get no free expres ion of independent citizens in democratic countries. That is the reason that we in America should look askance upon the new proposal of American capital to enter Liberia. Capital can do a great deal for Liberia but its first step must be toward adeuqate payment of Liberian labor, decent valuation of Liberian products, and the establishment in Liberia of a mass of citizens who can acquire education and earn decent wages. Any other program is a delusion and a snare.

Union Labor

The long fight of the Negro to enter the ranks of Union Labor is not finished, but is well begun. At first the Negroes had to be persuaded that they had any interest in union labor. They had forgotten the path that began with Crispus Attucks, who may have represented organized labor of his time, in his fight against the British. But after his time there came the long way in which the Negro as a slave had no part in organized work. Artisans were organized not only without friendly cooperation with blacks, but usually in opposition to them because they represented slavery. After the Civil War, organized labor began to recognize that the Negro worker ought to be called in or he would become a competitor, replacing and undercutting the wages of the whites.

Efforts to this end were made until after Reconstruction, and then, although the Knights of Labor largely excluded them, until finally the rule for successful union labor was the exclusion of the Negro worker. This was first attacked on a large scale by the organization of the CIO. Since then, gradually the Negro has been integrated. But the best st tement of his present status in labor is summed up by Abner W. Berry, in the Daily Worker.

The Last Ten Years

"During the last ten years Negro workers have very generally expressed their sympathy with the American Labor movement; nevertheless, there are still five American Federation of Labor International Unions which exclude Negroes; seven other unions accept members, but only in segregagated locals without membership rights. Other groups like the carpenters and painters, airplane pilots, the switchmen's union, the railway carmen, and boilermakers, exclude Negroes in various ways.

"The status of the American Negro worker in the CIO is higher than it is in the AFL. Nevertheless, even in the CIO he is welcome as a general laborer and yardman, but very few have been accepted as tool and die workers in the automobile factories, or as machine operators in foundries. The electrical divisions of General Electric and General Motors are practically all white, and this is true of the textile mills.

"Of the 15,000,000 organized workers in the CIO and AFL, about 1,000,000 are Negroes but there are only 17 National officers--6 in the AFL and 11 in the CIO. In the Packing House Workers Union, with half of its membership Negro, there is only one Negro who is an international officer. There is none in the Automobile Workers nor the Electrical Workers Unions despite the large Negro membership."

35-1-320

This means, of course, that while great progress has been made in the labor movement, there is still wide discrimination on the part of white laborers and their leaders to exclude Negroes from the movement; w which is to say the least, a suicidal policy.

The Firemen

Another development along this line is the long fight of the Negro fireman in the South to retain their status in the Union. Gradually by white union effort and collusion of the railroads, these workers have been pushed out of employment and even attacked by assassins. But they obtained not long ago a decision of the courts which recognized their right to employment and to defense by the white labor union which had become their representative for bargaining, and had tried to bargain them out of employment. A suit is now pending to settle this difficulty. On the whole, the advance of the Negro in the labor movement, which means advance in democracy, is slowly but surely making desirable progress, but white labor does not yet fully realize that democracy cannot stop at lines of race, sex, or creed.

Ebony

It is unfortunate that a Negro magazine so excellent in many respects as EBONY should allow itself to print a good editorial like that on Negro Labor in its December issur, and then support it by such lousy reasoning. The main thesis of advocating more Negroes in skilled trades especially the building trades is excellent. But most of its arguments are idiotic. For instance: (1) That I have opposed industrial training and want Negroes to crowd the professions. (2) That our losses in the building trades and other skills is due to failure to continue teaching them. (3) That a person should choose the best-paid work as his vocation. (4) That it is a disgrace for a Negro Ph.D. to teach in a Negro college.

Industrial Teaching

I have always advocated training in industries; I said in 1903 "So far as Mr. Washington preaches Thrift, Patience, and Industrial Training for the masses, we must hold up his hands and strive with him, rejoicing in his honors and glorying in the strength of this Joshua called of God and of man to lead the headless host." I vehemently opposed and still oppose an educational program which would confine our training to industrial skills. As I said 35 years ago, "The object of Education is not to make Men Carpenters; it is to make Carpenters, Men." The mass of men cannot learn to read and write make shoes, build houses and work steel, unless also the group has trained teachers, good physicians, honest lawyers, moral clergymen and skilled engineers. Even more than the rich and powerful whites, we poor and ignorant Negroes need men of trained brains and wide scholarship to guide us as we work, and guard us from exploitation and slavery.

Skilled Trades

Our undoubted losses in the skilled trades are not due solely to lack of industrial teaching in our schools; they are mainly due to changes in industrial technique and discrimination by employers and trade unions. Shoes are no longer made by cobblers at benches, but by expensive shoe machinery; carpentry is done by costly planing mills; steel-working is carried on in vast plants. No school can teach such technique. It must be learned on the job and in the mill. The marvellous German training in industry was not done in schools but by apprenticeship in the factory with regular pay and security for the learner. Mass production has utterly revolutionized most of the simple hand work of former generations which could be learned at home or at school.

35-1-228

When the black boy has learned to read and write, and knows something of science and history, taught by "Negro Ph.D's in Negro schools" then he is ready to learn a trade, as well as to become an intelligent citizen and voter. But when he tries to enter a trade and learn on the job, the trade union, to which perhaps his father belongs, refuses to accept him as an apprentice; the factory or shop refuses to employ him; the great electric or chemical plant will not promote him to the lucrative and interesting departments. There is where the exclusion works and not at Hampton or Tuskegee.

Income and Career

The argument for work at trades is not that of income alone. It is silly to argue that a man should become a carpenter because carpenters earn more than dentists. That line of stupid logic would lead us to train our sons to enter the "Numbers" racket or send our daughters into the lucrative vocation of prostitution. TNo! The work of the carpenter is in itself as interesting and valuable as that of the dentist for the man who has a bent for it; the steelmaker has a career as fascinating as the physician if he likes that kind of work. The criterion for a life work is what one likes and is fitted for, and not simply what one gets for his work.

Buick starved to death and Jesus Christ was hanged. Yet their lives were not failures.

Negro Teachers

I am bitterly incensed at the reiteration of the lie, that it is disgraceful for Negroes to teach in Negro schools; for clergymen to serve Negro congregations; for black men of the highest training to give their lives and talents to the enslaved and despised and segregated people of their own race, who have often given their own heart's blood to educate these men of talent. It is a disservice for EBONY to sneer at such workers and join the silly chorus of those who seem to think that the only goal for Negro intellectuals is to teach white people. I see no reason to commit suicide because no white university has ever offered me a chair. That is their loss not mine. I have spent a quarter of a century teaching Negro students in Negro schools. I am proud of it.

Big Inch and Little Inch

An extraordinary story of free enterprise and individual initiative as practised in the United States has recently been revealed in the papers. Sometime ago someone thought of the brilliant idea of transporting oil and gas by pipelines, instead of by railroad tank cars. It was a simple idea, and if it could be realized, it meant tremendous savings and greater efficiency. Its realization depended upon the building of such tubes, legal rights of way, the use of steel and concrete, and ways of insuring continued efficiency and removing obstructions.

Our much vaunted "private enterprise" did not want to undertake it, but the government built these two lines, Big Inch and Little Inch, from Texas to the East and across the Mississippi valley and over the Allegheny Mountains, at a cost of $145,000,000. Recently a Texas company bid $143,000,000 cash for these pipelines, paid five million dollars cash to bind the bargain. Then it looked around to finance this operation, that is, to get hold of one hundred thirty-eight million dollars cash.

Finance

Now what does "financing" mean? First, for $150,000 cash this banking syndicate bought a million shares, or thirty per cent of the Texas companys' common stock at fifteen cents a share, giving it practically control of the sooperation. They offered to American investors at $9.50 a share. Of this $9.50 a share they take $1.00 a share for themselves as "commission", giving them something over a million dollars for $150,000. This is only the beginning. Through the ownership of this million shares they control three and a half million shares and the sale of these at $9.50 a share will put thirty million dollars in the companys' treasury, which added to $130,000,000 from the first mortage on pipeline bonds will pay the government for the sale of the pipelines. In addition to this, $9.50 a share is a very small price for a profitable undertaking; in the long run the shares which the original investors got for $150,000 maybe worth ten or twenty times as much as that.

Private Initiative

This is what is currently called "private initiative", but as a matter of fact it is a way of making the public pay for private profits sums out of all proportion to the service rendered, without any question the person who conceives the idea of a pipeline and laid it deserves pay. Those persons who invested $150,000 deserve to get, as you and I get, three, four, or five per cent on their investment. They do not deserve to get ten times as much as they invested because they were on the inside of a so-called "financial" deal.

35-1-226

This is the argument against what is miscalled "private initiative". It is asummed by many people that these millions of dollars created out of nothing cost nobody anything, and therefore should not be a matter of envy. On the other hand, it must be remembered that this income is going to be payed for out of current production; that what these people get for nothing is coming out of the wages and earnings of the people of the United States, one third of whom today do not earn enough to live decently.

Racial Names

Every once in a while I receive letters like this which came recently from Honolulu. "I am in the dark concerning the word 'Negro' I would like to know why people born on the United States mainland that are not white, are 'Negroes'. I was born in Pennsylavnia. My father born in slavery, and his father came from Africa; my mother was born free in West Virginia, and her mother was one-half French and one-half Senegalese. They came from Canada. I would like to know if my racial extraction shouldn't be Afro-American, and not American Negro?"

"And again from around the world, I note in the SUN of Capetown, which is the organ of the Colored people, the following paragraph. "I see writers to the local press have again taken up that hoary subject--a distinct name to define the Coloured people of South Africa. One suggested 'Midafricans', whilst another was at pains to point out that even the term 'Eurafrican', prevalent in the Transvaal, was unsuitable as it implied only a mixture of European and African blood, whereas many Coloured persons were descended from Batavians, Javanese and Asiatics. I wonder whether he was trying to suggest something by signing the letter--'Euafasian'? My view is that the Coloured people as Union nationals can only be South Africans."

Names are Symbols

It is queer how people insist upon regarding names as scientific descriptions of what they stand for, they are nothing of the sort; if we tried that sort of thing we would never get satisfactory names. Names are symbols agreed upon; all they do is to convey to the person who uses them and hears them a definite idea. If that definite idea is conveyed the name is suitable, if not it is not. As I have said elsewhere, we could call American Negroes "Pantofagoi" and, if when the name pantofagoi was used in itself and so far as its derivation is concerned, the name is nonsense but it is the understanding that counts. So in the case of "American Negro" when that phrase is used, it means a definite thing; a person of Negro descent but not necessarily wholly of Negro descent. He may have more white English blood, he may have Asiatic blood, he may be Scandinavian, Dutch, or German also by descent. But if to the mass of intelligent people the word "American Negro" brings up definitely the idea of this well known group, then it is a good word and it is to be used. Moreover, the name in itself carries no absolute conclusions. Every once in a while some crazy person writes me with the thesis that if we called ourselves something else besides Negroes the whole problem would be settled. He thinks that all we have got to do is to call ourselves Americans, and then there will be no Negro problem; or any name which does not bring in the stigma of past memories of slavery, of present poverty and ignorance would automatically make people different from what they are; this is, of course, arrant nonsense.

35-1-322

People Make the Name

The name does not make people, people give significance to the name. There was a time when "Quaker" was a name of derision, a name from which many of the Friends shrank, and concerning which there was endless controversy. Today "Quaker" is a name of distinction. What has happened? There has been a change in the sort of person that was designated as Quaker. Once he was a simple, untrained, religious fanatic. Today he is a well-to-do, educated philanthropist. The name did not make the change, the people designated made the change. There was a time in the days of my grandfather when to be called a Negro made any decent Colored man furious because it meant to the minds of most people everything low and disgraceful. Today no man need be ashamed to be called a Negro because it means a far different thing, and in the future the time will come when men will be proud to say that they were descended from Negroes. The change will come in the people, not in the name.

The Grand Mufti

Recently I have received a letter from the Grand Mufti of the Western United States, sent from the Mosque at Sacramento, California. This official is head of the persons professing Mohammedanism in the West. He writes as follows: "Some years ago I came into contact with your writings for the first time. Your work on colonies was of particular interest to me. At the time of the United Nations conference in San Francisco I was fortunate enough to hear you speak in the auditorium of the University High School, which has since been closed due to the fact that large numbers of the school population transferred to other schools with the influx of a large colored population and the school was underpopulated.

"The framing of an appeal to the United Nations seems to me to be particularly well timed and important to the cause of the Negro and other colored people of our great country. The situation here compares only to the situation in the Union of South Africa and Kenya colony, and seems to me to be entwined with the colonial problems in every section of the world.

"Moslem peoples have always led the fight against slavery and it was the holy Qur-an that first took steps toward the liberating of slaves. While all of Europe was in slavery until the French Revolution, and in some places until the early part of our own centry, the people of Moslem countries managed to escape any racial consciousness at all. The slavery that was known in Islam, in its early days, often produced Caliphs and rulers and leaders, and surely after he had been 'free' for a hundred years he was no longer set aside and discriminated against. Gandhi, the Hindu leader, says that the one thing the whites of Africa fear most is the leveling influence of Islam.

"You will find Moslem peoples always sympathetic with peoples who are being discriminated against. I have written to the ambassadors and ministers of Moslem states in Washington and have urged them to exert all possible influence with their home governments in the name of Islam to bring the Negro problem before the United Nations at once.

"My sincerest regards and the prayer that God will grant success to your great and noble work."

Mohammedanism and Race

I am very glad to have received this letter, and I have written to the Grand Mufti thanking him. There is no question that in the vast Mohammedan world there has never been a color line or racial distinctions. As I have said in my recent book, THE WORLD AND AFRICA, "Mohammedanism arose in the Arabian deserts, starting from Mecca which was in that part of the world which the Greeks called Ethiopia and regarded as part of the African Ethiopia. It must from earliest time have had a large population of Negroids.

35-1-326

"The two greatest colored figures in the history of Islam are Bilal-i-Habesh (Bilal of Ethiopia) and Tarik-bin-Ziad: Bilal-i-Habesh was Mohammed's liberated slave and closest friend to whom he gave precedence over himself in Paradise. The Prophet liberated all his slaves and they were all well-known figures in the early Islamic history. He adopted as his own son another Negro, Zayd bin Harity, his third convert, who rose to be one of his greatest generals. Later, to show his regard for Zayd, he took one of Zayd's wives, the beautiful Zainab, as his own. But Bilal stands out in greatest relief. Apart from his services in the cause of Islam, it was through him t at the Moslems decided to use the human voice instead of bells to call the Moslems to prayer. He had evidently a marvelous voice and was the first who called for prayers in Islam".

The difficulty with Mohammedanism has not been race prejudice, it has been the economic organization which in most Mohammedan lands still leaves at the bottom of social organization a mass of poverty and disease concerning which there has been all too little effort to remove. It is my fervent hope that in Egypt and the Middle East the uplift of the mass of people will be the next step in the development of the Mohammedan world.

Senator Taft

Senator Robert A. Taft, of Ohio is an avowed candidate for the Presidency in 1948. Negroes must watch him and interrogate him on two points: the FEPC, and national aid to education. He stands committed to a fair employment practices program but has advocated a bill without teeth, a bill which amounts simply to advice and provides no compulsion or penalty. This is not sufficient, and we should not allow him to pose as a friend of colored people or of the working man unless he is willing to go further than this. On federal aid to education he is even more untrustworthy. Like his father, the former president, he has been flirting with the South. We Negroes will not easily forget that speech which President Taft made in Birmingham, Alabama, where he promised to appoint no officials in the South who did not have the approval of the white South. He not only kept his word, but he set an example for all presidents who have succeeded him.

On Federal Aid to Education

Now Robert Taft comes forward in favor of national aid to education; but he says that he would oppose any federal plan to aid in providing opportunity for education which did not leave "complete control up to the state and local governments." He is apparently in favor of this because of "an alarming trend toward totalitarianism" and cites nazi Germany as an example.

It is to be presumed that Mr. Taft knows what would be done with federal funds by the educational authorities in the South. At best they would give the Negro some part of the proportion which his number in the community and his lack of education entitles him to, but he would not get his just proportion unless the whole present allocation of funds is taken away from present authorities and placed under a different set of persons. For this we have no reason in the world to hope the same men or the same sort of men are going to distribute federal funds in the south who are today distributing state funds. And what is the fact about that distribution of funds? Let us look at some figures for 1945 in the 17 states and the District of Columbia where separate schools are maintained by law:

In the value of school property per pupil enrolled whites received $224 and Negroes $52, or the whites were 430 per cent higher. For the amount spent per pupil in elementary schools, Negroes received $32.46 and whites $73.67, or nearly two and one-half times as much. The average white elementary school teacher was paid $1,307, while the Negro instructor received $959, or 40 per cent less.

35-1-320

What Senator Taft proposes then is to give the South a large sum of money which it can distribute in any way that it pleases among the educable people of that section. There will be no federal control, no way in which the government or the people can see to it that those children in the South who most need education get the benefit of this contribution from the United States government. This is worse than no contribution at all, and Robert Taft ought to be made to realize this. If, and when, he does know and realize it, he still stands for federal aid to education without elimination of race discrimination, then he deserves no Negro votes and should get none.

Write to Wallace

I wonder how many of my friends and readers will join me in a New Years Message to Henry Wallace, asking him to run for President on a Third Party ticket in the next Presidential election? Tell him that we are asking this for selfish reasons, because we Americans of Negro descent do not want to be put in the embarrassing position of having to choose between fools and demogogues, or giving up our right to vote in 1948?

Candidates

There is not before us a single candidate for whom a Negro can vote with self respect. There is no dependence to put upon President Truman; what he says today has nothing to do with what he said yesterday, or what he may say tomorrow. He is simply devoid of that understanding of public affairs which gives him any right to speak or act for a great nation. If we turn from him to the other candidates, what do we see?

There is Robert Taft of Ohio, who is following in the footsteps of his father and trying to appease the South. He is willing to give the South money for education to let them spend 5 times as much on whites as on Negroes. He wants an F. E. P. C. without teeth.

There is Dewey of New York, a complete opportunist politican, saying just as little as possible about anything that is of moment to the American people, so as to get into the Presidency without commitments and without revealing his lack of knowledge of the great questions fronting the country.

There is a small and voluble politician from Minnesota, Stassen, who is trying to capitalize upon the provincialism of the Middle West by every possible caper, and thus stem the world tide of Socialism which is overflowing the world and is a part of our own organization of industry.

One Man, One World

In this great crisis of the history of the world, there stands forth in America one man, and one man alone, who is worthy of leadership and of support and that is Henry Wallace. Suppose we admit without argument that the chances for Mr. Wallace to carry the country in the next election are about nil, and that, not because the country does not want him, but chiefly because of the "rotten burrough" system which we have in the South, by which the will of the people cannot be expressed in any national election; a situation in which this great country, as leader of democratic methods of government, cannot and will not govern itself in a democratic way.

35-2-44

Third Party

Nevertheless, we can protest even if our protests put a reactionary Republican in the white house or a Southern-supported Democrat. At least we can let the country and the nations know that there are people in the United States who are not stupid, who are not to be brought with graft or fooled with lies. It would be infinitely better for us to throw our votes away upon a great man who stands for real democracy than to shame ourselves, our people, or our country by voting for the impossible group of candidates who are trying to jostle and yell themselves into the Presidency.

Conference on China

There is to be held in New York, January 24-25, a national c ence on American Policy in China and the Far East. It is an endeav to form public opinion with regard to the help that the United State can and should give to China. It is to examine the right of Chiang Kai Shek to represent the Chinese people, and to use the methods which he is using to reduce one of the greatest nations in the world into subjection to a venal and selfish set of exploiters. It is enough to drive honest Americans insane to see the way in which since the last awful war, we have persistently aligned ourselves with the forces of graft and exploitation, in Poland, in Korea, in Yugoslavia and, above all, in China. We have persistently fought the forces of elightenment and understanding. We are now about to take money taken from the pockets of poor Americans and give it to the control of the regime which is now ruling China.

Money for Graft

We have put hundreds of milions of dollars into the hands of these grafters. We are about to put more. It is time that Public Opinion should array itself on the side of decency and refuse to be stampeded by the silly yell of "Communist," and try to give the great and long suffering Chinese people a chance to have real voice in their own government and to develop their own land. The propaganda, in favor of the Soone sisters and of Chiang Kai Shek, has been wide in the United States and as has been recently said, our own money is now being used to support a gang of propagandists who are at work in Washington.

The conference about to be held in New York is a protest against this. It is not a conference which is going to be asked to suscribe to a ready-made declaration or a preconceived program; but taking the facts which are available to the world, we are going to ask sensible citizens from all over the country to sit down and consider them and make careful declaration of what we think is right and just to ourselves, to the Chinese people, and to the great continent of Asia. There will be programs and speeches, but chiefly this is to be a real conference where the rank and file are going to talk and carefully consider the present and future. The address of the National Conference on American Policy in China and the Far East, is, 111 West 42nd Street New York 18, New York.

The Guilt of the Cane

When I attended the Friedrich Wilhelm's University in Berlin in 1892 tol893, the insignia of a student which were absolutely compulsory were gloves and cane. There I acquired the cane habit and have carried one ever since. It is useless and silly, but also harmless and cheap. So I still carry a cane, an incorrigable habit. Once as I was revisiting Germany, I found in a little shop on the Friedrichstrasse, now in ghastly ruins, an enticing umbrella cane, It was a thin silk umbrella with a removable wooden outer sheath. I bought it forthwith and carried it for years until it wore out.

On 45th Street, New York

Recently, in an old umbrella shop on forty-fifth street, New York, what did I see but an umbrella cane almost a replica of my old one! I enquired the price--it was much too high and I left. But the temptation was irresistible. Twice I returned and finally I bought it at a ridiculous price, which I then increased by equipping it with a silver band engraved with name and address. I took singular satisfaction in this toy. It renewed my youth; it brought back a land and culture forever dead; it healed and revived memories.

Union Station, Chicago

I fared west, talking to groups of varied complexions of mind and body; easing a delicious Thanksgiving dinner with my friends the Lochard's; seeing Des Moines again 51 years after my wedding, at Cedar Rapids, and finally landing in Union Station, Chicago, on my way home. Here is a restaurant, where I have a favorite seat, pushing the Third World War firmly into the background, I had a trout from the North Woods, an appetizing salad, a small bottle of sauterne (albeit Californian), and a demi-tasse in a dainty cup--not a bowl. I then strolled leisurely to my sleeping-car, at peace with a cock-eyed world, until I laid my precious cane-umbrella on the bed: the cane sheath was missing! It was made of turned wood from Sweden and folded sweetly into a warm brown roll. I had the umbrella. I had the engraved silver address but the cane-cover was gone. I had dropped it! I had lost it ! It was irreplacable! I had the sick feeling which, whether it rises from the f ll of the world or the flick of a finger, spells doom. Suddenly a whole group of memories, experiences, hopes, triumphs and failures of fifty years, rose and curled themselves around that lost cane-cover. To the porter's astonishment, I rushed out and began to search the depot floors and platforms.

Searching the World

As you may know, the Chicago Union Station occupies upwards of two acres, fairly full of feet and travelling bags. I threaded doggedly through passengers, lo king in vain, and porters eyed me askance. I finally flew back to the pullman and again searched there. It was still gone. Ah! I remembered, the restaurant! I hurried there. It was closed! The connecting lunch counter was open however. I rushed in there and laid my case feelingly before the pretty counter-girl and the sympathetic head waitress. I was led on to the closed restaurant and searched the check-room. No trace! "But", said the waitress brightly: "How about the Lost and Found?" In vain! There was nothing there but a yellow stick with a ribbon! My time was running short. I began to have that f elin , not simply of loss, but of loss of nothing, which still seemed of fundamental importance, because it linked to this world the dream of another that had been born and died--I was unbelievably and illogically dejected and disillusioned. After all, what was the use--and just then I saw it! It lay quietly folded in its soft, brown roll, cunningly hidden under the desk of the Pullman agent, where I had checked in an hour since.

I fell upon it. I rubbed it gently and slipped it carefully in place. I became suddenly quite voluble. I explained to the Pullman agent, the Gate-man, the Pullman porter--until finally I began to sense obscurely but definitely that to none of these did the matter seem of that cosmic importance which it did to me. Then I went to bed.

Harold Stassen Speaks

Mr. Harold Stassen, self-supported candidate for the presidency, is doing some fancy foot-work these days which we ought to watch carefully. In a speech made before the Young Republicans in New York, January 6, Mr. Stassen laid down several of his planks and explained them. He said that "the overshadowing question of our time is that of a future world war or world peace," and he proposes to meet t is by calling a United Nations convention in 1950 for the purpose of amending and rewriting the charter. He notes that this convention can be called without a veto.

This is perfectly true, but also it is true, and Mr. Stassen does not mention this, that no amendment can be adopted or new charter proclaimed without the right of the 5 great powers, Russia, Britain, the United States, China, or France, to veto this change. He wants also "new steps toward the rule of law in special problems and in Human Rights on a world wide level."

Views on Human Rights

He does not, however, touch the matter of human rights in the United States. Indeed, so far as Mr. Stassen is concerned, during the whole of his campaign, he has, so far as I can learn, utterly ignored the fourteen million Negroes in the United States. He has said nothing about them, nothing about their rights, nothing about their disabilities, and has made absolutely no promise that in the very unlikely event of his being elected to the presidency they would receive any more at ention after his election than they have before.

Capitalism vs. Socialism

This is a reason why we should give attention to Mr. Stassen and be careful not to vote for him, in case we have the opportunity. Mr. Stassen is in favor of capitalism and against socialism. But although he stated this boldly in the West, he tapers off a bit when he talks in the East. It seems that our "free economy" in America is due to its "modern peoples capitalism with high production and excellent distribution;" just what Mr. Stassen means by a capitalism which is "modern" and which is controlled "by the people", we do not know; nor do we understand what he means by "excellent distribution". The present distribution of the great income of the United States is nothing less than disgraceful and the greatest menace to our future liberties.

No country in the world with anything like similar production has so unfair a distribution of the results of industry. This, of course, Mr. Stassen knows perfectly well. But he is trying to impress his audience that there is something peculiarly "modern" about our capitalism, and that the capital "belongs" to the people. Nevertheless, he has to admit that something has got to be done about this "excellent" distribution; that the government has got to come in to curb excessive credit, to decrease inflation, to supervise exports, to limit hoarding, to check booms, and avoid depression, and Mr. Stassen is compelled to notice that there should be some supplementary action on housing and health and education. This has got to be done by the government, and all this is, of course, nothing less than socialism.

Of Concern To Negroes

But we must do this in the United States "while maintaining that precious individual economic freedom" which we have not got and which we are steadily and increasingly losing. Further, we must maintain a st strong military position, and above all we must start on an expensive and world wide compaign to combat the propaganda of Communistic Russia. And the object of this campaign would be to advocate, explain, and inspire individual freedom for men everywhere. Presumably "everywhere" includes the United States. But what Mr. Stassen is going to do to increase the freedom of human beings in the United States, particularly if they happen to be of dark complexion, is not specified in this excellent and progressive speech. The finest propaganda which Mr. Stassen could support would be an anti-lynching bill, an anti-poll tax bill, a Federal FEPC, and Federal Aid to Education without discrimination as to race, color or religion. Of this Mr. Stassen says nothing. But he does have a beautiful picture of the future. He sincerely hopes that by 1950 we will see continued success of the American exonomic system, progress in rebuilding Europe and at the same time "continued low production and poor living standards in Russia."

One could hardly believe that a man of any responsibility today could give voice to such a terrible hope. But here it is in his own words. One thing, therefore, is certain for every Negro American voter in 1948, and for every other voter, that Harold Stassen should never be president of the United States.

Socialism

The world is going Socialistic. No amount of lying or hysteria can contradict this clear fact. England has a Socialistic government and is socializing industry and wealth as fast as her difficult post-war conditions will allow. France has been and still is a socialistic state, owning railroads, telegraphs and telephones, and regulating industry. The same is true of Italy. Mussolini's facisism was socialism under a dictatorship, but socialism just the same. All of east Europe is socialistic. Franco's Spain has adopted a wide socialists program.

The United States

Even the United States, despite Mr. Stassen and other experts, is today socialistic. The New York Times in an editorial recently pointed out: "Through the Federal Reserve System the Government of the United States was regulating the conditions of private credit in this country long before the British Labor Party thought of nationalizing the Bank of England. Government in Industry

We may add to this that the United States government carries on business enterprises; carrying mail and express packages, building dams like Boulder, Grand Coulee, and T. V. A. , and irrigation projects, and manufacturing. It publishes books and pamphlets in vast quantities. What do people mean by saying that the United States is given over to the anarchy of free enterprise, or represents only "individual initiative?"

Truman on Discrimination

No president has spoken fairer on race discrimination than President Truman and few presidents have done less to implement their sayings. What Truman said, in his annual message, leaves nothing to be desired. But Truman has said this before, and it is going to cost him nothing to say it again. He knows perfectly well that the main backing of his own party in the South will not stand behind him in legislation, and that the Republicans cannot be expected to take any action. He is, therefore, quite free to make a true, and even flamboyant expression, knowing that in all probability he will not be called upon to implement it. It is a characteristic Missouri politician's gesture.

We can await with interest the recommendation for action in the special message which he promises, but we know perfectly well what will happen. This has been a characteristic gesture toward Negroes on the part of Republicans for years, and on the part of Democrats in the last few years. It is assumed that Negroes do not have sense enough to see the utter futility and meaninglessness of this sort of action.

Republicans vs. Democrats

The Republicans promise an FEPC, an Anti-lynching Bill, and Federal aid to Education without race discrimination. They do nothing about it. They did not intend to do anything when they said so. In the same way, the Democrats are willing that Mr. Truman should make promises, but they were bitterly unwilling when Franklin D. Roosevelt actually tried to put into action some of these promises.

Just so today, Henry Wallace, and the petition of the NAACP to the United Nations have made the Administration speak out. But that does not mean action.

The only way in which we will get action is to have men like Franklin D. Roosevelt and Henry Wallace in the White House, and then to have the right congressmen. If we cannot get Wallace there, we can at least let the world know that we want him there by giving him our vote. With every consideration for Mr. Truman, we must remember that tomorrow he may contradict what he said today, and that if he does not contradict it in words he will contradict it by action or inaction. On the other hand, Henry Wallace has never wavered; he has gone all out in meeting and combatting segregation in the South, and particularly in standing against universal military training which will only continue the semi-slavery of American Negroes.

Socialism

We are a socialistic state, not entirely or completely, but sufficiently so as to take our stand with the leading states of the world in planning and controlling industry, and regulating private profit for the interests of the mass of American citizens.

This, of course, brings up again the question of what socialism is? It is a vague and general term, and means generically, the attempt to regulate the activities of men for the good of the mass of people, instead of letting government or industry be run for the benefit of certain individuals. It arose as a philosophy and a distinct body of social thought during the 18th and 19th centuries, when the freedom for exploitation or hiring labor through wage contracts, which kept the income of the laboring class low. And against the idea that industry was for private profit and not for social welfare, many plans for socializing the state arose with different degrees of completeness, and with different ways in which the government was brought in to control interests.

The Function of Government

The most extreme proposal of Socialism was that of Communism, which is socialism based on dictatorship and force, and designed to introduce immediately the complete socialistic state. But there are other varieties of socialism, and there is no modern state which does not to some degree adopt socialistic methods. All this means is that instead of regarding the state as we used to, as a limited field of narrow control, which was to have small part in the general life of men, we are increasingly convinced that government must plan and to a certain degree control industry, that we have got to own a considerable part of capital, that we have got to limit profits, and limit individual initiative and private enterprise, whenever they interfere with the common good. This is a plain fact which cannot be denied by honest people. It would be most unfortunate if we entered the next campaign with any idea that the world today is divided into two parts; the one of which stands for individual freedom, and the other for government control. We all stand for government control. Although the degree of that control varies in different nations and among different thinkers.

Great Socialists

35-2-21

Among the great thinkers who have thought and written about socialism are: Godwin, and Robert Owen of England; Saint Simon, Fourier, Proudhon, and Louis Blanc of France. Among the Germans are Marx and Engels: and recent writers such as George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, and Harold Lasky. No one has any right to discuss socialism without having some acquaintanceship with the work of these leaders of modern thought. Their books can be found in any public library.

Planned Industry

All industry is and must be planned, but instead of the planning today in great countries, like the United States, being primarily in the hands of the government, it is largely in the hands of private citizens and the planning is directed toward the maximum of individual profit and not toward the maximum of social welfare. The real fight then, is whether industrial organization shall be planned by private persons for their own benefit, or planned by the public through democratic control for the benefit of the state.

The Bandwagon Tradition

There is a peculiar assumption among Americans, that they must never be caught backing a losing cause or an uncertain venture; that they must always be on the Bandwagon; they must always be successful; that no matter how great and good any plan may be, if they see that it is not sure to succeed, it is their business to give it up immediately and to scramble on the side of those who are about to be successful.

Of course, no sooner does one express an idea of this sort than its utter stupidity is clear. No cause would ever triumph if no one dared to advocate it, or temporarily lose it. No temporary defeat ever settles a great question. It may postpone its answer, but insofar as the problem is really important and the right answer is in sight, a defeat is simply a postponement, nothing more. How American Negroes can believe anything else when they remember the abolition controversy is difficult for me to see. Some can talk of a vote for Wallace as being "thrown away". Some could vote for Taft or Dewey just because they are afraid that one of these reactionaries might be president of the United States. What difference does that make? Abraham Lincoln was a poor bet in 1880. If that is true in our own history, how much more has it been true in the history of the world?

The Fight For The Franchise

There was a time in England when if a man stopped work because he was unwilling to be whipped and starved, he was promply thrown into jail. Striking was against the law. There was a time when if a man objected to the religious superstitions under which he was compelled to act and his children were trained, he was liable to be burned publicly at the stake as a heretic. The people that strove against this kind of thing may have been called fools by some folk, but history proved that they were exceedingly wise. Then we came to the time where we proposed that a man should have the opportunity to say how he should be ruled and what the laws were to be as to his work and conditions of work. In other words, we adopted among civilized nations almost universally the right to vote. There was a bitter opposition to it. There was every kind of cheating and violence to keep votes from being given to the ignorant mob. But the ignorant mob gained the right to vote, not entirely even today, but so largely that no one dares question it.

35-2-4

That did not mean that the millenium was voted in for next election; it did not mean that when we wanted free schools and free religion, and higher wages, that we got them at the first election. We did not, but we voted for them, and in the long run we won something of what we wanted. The same kind of problem faces us today. There is only one candidate for the presidency that any honest, intelligent Negro American who is free to vote his opinion can vote for without stultifying himself. Now of course, a good many of us are not free, some of us want to keep our enrollment in our parties, because in that way we expect to make better bread and butter in the future.

Negroes Should Vote For Wallace

There are others who are afraid that if they should vote for Wallace, they might lose their jobs. There are others who are just simply afraid. But as I say, the American Negro who is free, has simply got no other candidate for whom he can possibly vote honestly. To vote for Mr. Taft--did you notice what Taft said about the denial of Civil Rights to American Negroes in his answer to Trumans message? He said just exactly nothing! And that is just what he would do. Have you ever heard Harold Stassen say anything that would indicate that he was aware that there were any Negroes in the United States? No! And you won't! He is much too modest for that.

Is Mr. Dewey going to do anything for Negroes? Not unless he is kicked into it, as he was into the New York FEPC, which he tried desperately to kill before he was finally forced to assent to it.

35-2-5

On the other hand, Wallace has put his neck out. He did not have to say anything about Negroes. He did not have to write that speech for the Alpha Phi Alpha at Tulsa. He did not have to take a stand against "Jim Crow". He might have used very fair language so far as white people are concerned and the double-tongue for Negroes. He did not. He is a brave man. He is a worthy successor of Franklin Roosevelt. We ought to vote for him whether he can win or not. If he does not win in 1948, there is every chance in the world that the principles for which he stands will win in 2048. But whether they will win then or not depends on what we do now. If we vote for Wallace and his beliefs, they will have a chance to win; if we do not, we will set the world back to Dewey, Stassen, and Taft.

MR. PAULEY—HIS PHILOSOPHY

MR. ED. PAULEY has resigned as assistant to the head of our armed forces. He says that his only fault was doing business in the usual American way. He has a point there, and let us examine it. Mr. Pauley made a million dollars by playing the market in grain. Just what does that mean? It does not mean that he raised more wheat in the world wheat. There was no when he got through with his operation than before. He does not pretend that he produced new wealth or added to the store of the wealth in the world. Still he made a million dollars. He made that million dollars by what is usually called "betting."

There is a great deal of wealth in the United States that individuals have accumulated in this way. Some of the betting is frowned upon, when it has to do with stock-market "numbers" and is called "policy." (Sacred name.) Other gambling is permitted, when it has to do with horse racing, if it is done at the track. But in the case of the stock market, this betting is looked upon as highly respectable; but is it? Of course, everyone objects when he sees bedlam based on "inside knowledge."

A man possesses "inside knowledge" when he knows what changes in prices are going to take place, and Mr. Pauley might have had such knowledge. He says that he did not have it; but quite outside of that, what ought to be the attitude of the public toward betting? Remember that when a man makes a million dollars on the stock market he adds nothing to the wealth of the world, but he does add to his own power.

He gains a right to services, materials and labor to an extent which makes him a little king as compared to people who are working 'r a few dollars a day or for a moderate salary.

PECULATION AND DISTRIBUTION

What services has Mr. Pauley rendered for his million dollars? There are some people who say that stock market manipulations arrange the amount of wealth we have so that it is better distributed among the people who want it, than would be the case if stock market manipulation did not take place. But this is not necessarily true.

What speculation in the stock market does is to see that the wheat is held and bought by people who will pay the highest price for it; but are these the people who need it most? Ask the starving children of Europe this fool question. No, in the long run stock market speculation does not distribute goods in the most valuable or beneficent way. It distributes power, on the other hand, where it never ought to rest.

Then, too, when people read of how government officials and members of Congress have speculated in the "staff of life" while the world is starving, they get a curious idea of what work means in the world They begin to realize that the process of making money in America and making it fast, is not by taking off your coat and rolling up your sleeves and going out and plowing a furrow.

It is not by going into the steel mills and sweating, and striving to the point of exhaustion. It is not by going into Madam's kitchen and preparing fine food for the people who are invited to eat it, and who do not get enough exercise to enjoy it when it is eaten. No, not in work but in gambling come the great rewards of free enterprise and individual initiative.

THE WORKER—BASIS OF PRODUCTION

This, of course, is a perversion of the truth. No matter who by manipulation, by law, and by common consent gets the wealth of the stock market, neverthless, that wealth is made by the worker, and the worker ought to have a voice into how it is distributed; and the worker is not simply the man who works with his hands, although he is a large and very large part.

He is the man who plans not simply for gain but for the economcal use of wealth; for the invention of machinery, for the direction of work, for the distribution of the results of work. All workers, whether they work by brain or by hand, have a real part in the great result of production, but the man who simply bets and manipulates, the man who sits and gambles on the way in which prices rise and fall is not a worker.

He is worse than the thief who steals money on the street. He is worse than the man who cheats and lies; because he not only does a wrong thing, but he does it because the public does not realize what it is that he is doing. This is the reason that there rises the attack upon Wall Street.

WALL STREET CONDEMNED

There are things that Wall Street can and may do for the advantage of the nation. It can arrange so that the capital which is needed in farming and not needed in paper making or steel manufacture can be transferred without loss to the place where it is needed.

It can arrange so that the man who needs capital can borrow it from the man who does not need it at the present. There are all sorts of banking and financial arrangements that Wall Street can attend to and does. But beyond this, with far greater advertisement and often with far greater activity, Wall Street is the greatest center of gambling in the world, and as such it deserves universal condemnation.

The Southern Liberal

We Negroes spend a good deal of time being sorry for ourselves and we are without doubt largely justified; but once in a while we begin to realize how difficult and almost impossible it is for other people to be themselves, especially if they happen to want to fight on our side. I think I have always had a great deal of sympathy for the young Southern white man who wants to be honest, and I know there are such persons. I remember that one of first experiences in the South was witnessing the driving out of a liberal white professor from a North Carolina University because he had the temerity to say in print that thetwo greatest figures in the South since the Civil War, were Robert E. Lee and Booker T. Washington. He did not suffer mob violence, but he found that the climate of Massachusetts was a great deal pleasenter for him after that. He went there and finished his life work there.

Every time I see a young white Southern Liberal say something fair and decent on the Negro problem, I watch him. Pretty soon the pay-off is bound to come. After a while he either becomes silent and you gradually forget everything he said, or he begins slowly and deftly to walk backwards. He tries rather desperately to maintain his small reputation as a liberal, as one representing the forward-looking South, but gradually you begin to place him. He is a Southerner who has liberal instincts, but no courage. I do not for a moment say that these people were not honest in what they said. But I do say that when they realize that what the cost in the South is for a person who is liberal on the Negro problem, they usually do not have the courage to go forward. They either stand still or they walk backwards. And the reason for all this is shown perhaps most clearly today in the case of Don West.

Don West

Don West is a fine young Southern white man, born and reared in Georgia and choosing Georgia as the place of his life's work. On my way from Atlanta to New York, I used to drive through the little town called Lulu in North Georgia, where Don West became a school teacher. I did not know him at that time, I did not meet him there. I met him when he was in New York on a scholarship, and heard him talk bravely and finely. I hoped that he would keep it up and be among that small and scattering vanguard which is trying to bring modern civilization to the South. But I knew it was going to cost him something.

Now today we can see what it is costing. Don West is a poet. He has published several little volumes; one of which is called; CLODS OF SOUTHERN EARTH, and one of the poems in that book dealt with Harlan, Kentucky. Everybody knows that Harlan, Kentucky is one of the nastiest places on earth for workers, black or white. It is in the hands of a consciousless monopoly and anybody who thinks liberally or talks liberally would better keep away from Harlan. Now Don West had this little school in North Georgia and did some rather fine things in making the people think straight on the Negro problem. Then he became Professor of English and Southern Folk-Lore at Oglethorpe University in Atlanta. Oglethorpe is not much of a school. It used to be celebrated chiefly for wholesale distribution of honorary degrees torich Northerners, who could npt get them in any other way. It has low standards and difficulty in keeping going; and this probably was in part the reason that Don West taught at Oglethorpe.

Charlie Lewallen

The Cocoa Cola University in Atlanta would not have had him on a golden salver, not with the economic liberalism that he talked about. There are not many other institutions in the South who wanted him and I do not know, but I have a suspicion, that the school board at Lulu began to look at him with a certain disfavor. At any rate Don West came to Atlanta, and then a libel suit for $10,000 was brought against him. In one of the poems in his book he had used a purely fictitious name "Charley Lewellen". Somebody in Georgia who claimed to have that name sued Don West for libel.

Now there is no way of proving that this man was not lying. Georgia does not keep birth records to any extent. If a man says his name is "Lewallen" or "Chigureus" than thats' his name. So this man sues Don West. He probably has no case in any real court, but what he or his backers can do in Georgia, and indeed in most of the United States, is to keep Don West on the hot-seat. He can make him spend money, as he already has for a year, fighting a case, which at best in nonsense and in its worse aspects, simply persecution of a man in Georgia who dares to be liberal. Back of this man undoubtedly is the power of the Ku Klux Klan, the power of the unspeakable Talmadge and of other bigots.

If you are interested in helping white people in the South, and God knows you ought to be, send a dollar to S. T. Capps, a teacher in the Atlanta School System and buy Don West's book.

Europe:

John Strawroom, lecturing in England in August, 1947, spoke of Europe in world History. He said in part: "In early times Europe was far from being the most important region in the world. Wherever mankind originated it was not in Europe. The Garden of Eden was not located in this part of the world. When civilizations arose, it was not in Europe, but in the great river valleys of the East and the Middle East. The Mediterranean civilizations of Greece and Rome, presented by so many European historians as European civilizations, were not really European at all, and their attention was focused not on Europe but on the Middle East. It was eastward that Alexander the Great marched; and when he reached India he is reputed to have cried like a child for he had conquered the whole world...a world that included the Middle East, and not Europe.

Rome

"So with the Roman civilization. The interest shown by Caesar in Egypt was not restricted to an interest in Cleopatra. When Almighty God sent His son into the world to save us, He sent Him to Palestine, not to Europe, indicating a correct knowledge of geoplotics in Heavenly circles. All the religions have started outside Europe. Europe, in fact, was what we would now call a colonial region, a place for settlement and exploitation by the waves of peoples who came from the east and settled as their descendants centuries later were to go and settle in America and Africa and Australia. The centers of world culture were Egypt, in Persia, in India, in China, not in Europe. The course of world history was shaped not by the Europeans butby the Arabs, the Mongols, and the powers of Asia. Europe was a region in turmoil, a region of permanent crisis, under the pressure of almost continuous attack by Arabs, Mongols, and Turks.

The Middle Ages

"European society in the Dark Ages and the Middle Ages was a society in a state of siege. The feudal system was not a system at all, but the legalized rule of military bosses, governing Europe by gangster law and levying 'protection money' in the manner imitated in Chicago several centuries later. It is said that religion flourishes in ti es of crisis. If that is so, then this is sufficient explanation for the growth and the dominant position in society held by the Catholic Church in the Middle Ages, an age of permanent crisis. Throughout the whole of early times, then, Europe was a backward region, and world history was made elsewhere. No wonder there is no 'pattern' in the histories of Europe which read the present into the past and try to explain early European history without reference to the outside world where all the most important things were happening."

MS 2 M 00

Cultured Africa

Frobenius reminded us that "The revelations of fifteenth and seventeenth century navigators furnish us with certain proof that Negro Africa, which extended south of the Sahara desert zone, was still in full bloom, in the full brilliance of harmonious and well-formed civilizations. In the last century the superstition ruled that all high culture of Africa came from Islam. Since then we have learned much, and we know today that the beautiful turbans and clothes of the Sudanese folk were already used in Africa before Mohammed was even born or before Ethiopian culture reached inner Africa. Since then we have learned that the peculiar organization of the Sudanese states existed long before Islam and that all of the art of building and education, of city organization and handwork in Negro Africa, were thousands of years older than those of Middle Europe.

"Thus in the Sudan old real African warm-blooded cultures existed and could be found in Equatorial Africa, where neither Ethiopian thought, Hamitic blood, or European civilization had drawn the pattern."

Truman

In the next election there will be some Negroes who will vote for Mr. Truman; a few of them will believe that he is the best candidate, but not many. Others will remember that he has appointed some Negroes to office and that is important; but they will also be sure that in the future he will make other appointments. In this case, however, we must not overvalue appointments. They are good things for the man appointed; they are not necessarily good for the fourteen million Negro people. There will be some who will be very thankful to Mr. Truman for his message on Civil Rights, but those will remember that what Mr. Truman says today has nothing to do with what he will say or do tomorrow. The revolt in the South is going to make him at least tone down his demands, and perhaps utterly forget them. The revolt in the South is ominous for his candidacy. For these reasons, and others, a few Negroes will vote for Truman.

Republicans

As to the Republicans, there is nothing in the record of Taft or Stassen to attract any Negro voters, except that Mr. Taft is a rich man. He did not earn his money, he inherited it. In the case of Mr. Dewey, he has some things to his credit, but very little. He is not a politician upon whom earnest men build their hopes. Of course, it may be that a dark horse will be nominated by the Republicans, but in that case do not let the fact that you know nothing against him lead you to think that he is a friend. The great thing, I regret to say, that is going to attract votes for any Republican candidate in the next election is money.

Money

There is going to be a lot of money put into this next campaign. Newspapers who want funds are going to get them. Individuals of any influence whatsoever will get hand-outs of various sorts. Persons of any prominence or position will be able to bring out of this campaign good fat sums. This is a thing we hate to admit, but it is true. It is not to our credit, but it is true.

Wallace

Now outside of these persons who will vote Republican or Democratic, what candidate or prospective candidate has the stature of Henry Wallace? He is not a politician. He has nothing like the nimble flair for publicity of little Mr. Stassen, nor the canny silences of Mr. Dewey, Nor the flat-footed stubborness of Taft. He is not such careless a talker as Harry Truman. But he is a man, an honest and sincere man whom everybody, even his enemies, like. Moreover, his popularity is great and it is growing.

I have noticed this in many parts of the country. I am going to watch it. Of course, the press and the periodicals are going to play him down. They are going to use their strongest card of trying not to mention him. Then next they are going to misrepresent deliberately what he stands for. Those people who are influenced by this kind of tactic on the part of the American press have simply to remember the case of the Literary Digest. Here was one of the most widely circulated periodicals in the United States, which bet its pants on the defeat of Roosevelt and lost. It simply folded up and went out of business.

The Press

How many times in the last twelve years has Roosevelt been absolutely defeated according to the editorials in the press? Remember just one thing---the chances are against Henry Wallace, not on account of his lack of popularity or his program, but simply because of disfranchisement in the South and the rotten borough defeat of democracy in that part of the land. Nevertheless, remember this: Henry Wallace has a chance, he may be the next president of the United States! If American Negroes could accomplish this, they would do more for the triumph of democracy in the United States for all people, than any group of people in the last century. Therefore, forgetting the office-seekers, and forgetting the money-men, let the mass of American Negroes, north, south, east, and west, cast their votes for Henry Wallace in 1948.

Persons of any prominence or position will be able to bring out of this campaign good fat sums. This is a thing we hate to admit, but it is true. It is not to our credit, but it is true.

Wallace

How outside of these persons who vote Republican or Democratic, what candidate or prospective candidate has the stature of Henry Wallace? He is not a politician. He has nothing like the nimble flair for publicity of little Mr. Stassen, nor the canny silence of Mr. Dewey, nor the flat-footed stubbornness of Mr. Taft. He is not such a careless talker as Harry Truman. But he is a man, an honest and sincere man whom everybody, even his enemies, like. Moreover, his popularity is great and it is growing.

I have noticed this in many parts of the country. I am going to watch it. Of course, the press and the periodicals are going to play him down. They are going to use their strongest card of trying not to mention him. Then next they are going to misrepresent deliberately what he stands for. These people who are influenced by this kind of tactics on the part of the American press have simply to remember the case of the LITERARY DIGEST. Here was one of the most widely circulated periodicals in the United States, which bet its pants on the defeat of Roosevelt and lost. It simply folded up and went out of business.

The Press

How many times in the last twelve years has Roosevelt been absolutely defeated according to the editorials in the press? Remember just one thing-the chances are against Henry Wallace, not on account of his lack of popularity or his program, but simply because of disfranchisement in the South and the rotten borough defeat of democracy in that part of the land. Nevertheless, remember this: Henry Wallace has a chance, he may be the next president of the United States! If American Negroes could accomplish this, they would do more for the triumph of democracy in the United States for all people, than any group of people in the last century. (Over)

Geneva: The Commission on Human Rights

Just what happened in Geneva in connection with human rights, discrimination, and the protection of minorities? After some difficulty with the official reports, I have been able to extract some continuity in the story. The Commission on Human Rights opened its second session in Geneva, December 2-17, 1947. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt was chairman. Eighteen nations were represented and three specialized agencies, including the International Labor Organization and UNESCO. There were also present consultants representing the AFL, the Inter-Parlimentary Union, the Catholics, the Jews, the Red Cross, the International Council of Woman, Business and Professional Women, the World Federation of United Nations, and some other organizations. There was no consultant representing Negroes or any group of colored people, except those belonging to independent nations.

Attitude Towards Petitions

The organization showed by its first action its attitude toward petitions. They were presumably regarded as secret matters of information from "subversive" organizations. The Secretary General furnished a "confidential list of communications" without divulging the identity of the authors. It was suggested that the Secretary General might in the future compile two lists of communications: one, non-confidential for persons who were willing to give their names, and the other, a confidential list without names.

The Commission then began to discuss an international bill of rights and ran into all sorts of difficulties. First, the matter of length; second the matter of detail; and third, the question of enforcement. Mrs. Roosevelt insisted that the United Nations was not in a position to take action upon petitions, and, therefore, she did not once mention the document, which the NAACP had sent to the international organization. The Commission requested that the Secretariat appoint a committee to proceed "in private session" to examine petitions and conduct negotiations. A sub-committee was also suggested to examine the receivability of petitions. Finally there was suggested an international court on human rights. Mrs. Roosevelt, however, felt that such a proposal must be considered very seriously and that it could not be put into effect in the forseeable future.

The Sub-Commission on Discrimination

At the same time that this commission on human rights was meeting, there occurred the first session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. It met from November 24 to December 5. This commission was determined upon March 28, 1947, and its functions were to examine principles in the field of discrimination. The members of this sub-commission were from Australia, Belgium, China, Ecuador, France, Haiti, India, Iran, Sweden, the Soviet Republics, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America. The representative from the United States was a Southern white man, Jonathan Daniels of North Carolina.

The American Proposal

At the meeting of the sub-commission, November 24, 1947, Mr. Daniels, the Southern white man who was the United States representative, proposed the following procedure. First a proposal for handling petitions received on these subjects, and secondly, handling petitions brought to their attention by any member of the United Nations or the Secretariat, or a specialized agency. Of course, this would have excluded such a petition as that of the NAACP. The sub-commission, if it thought that the particular case warranted consideration, should appoint a committee to examine the matter. This committee working in collaboration with the Secretariat for the prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. This was really a proposal of indefinite delay.

WINDS OF TIME

What happened in Geneva? We have at long last an official report from persons connected with the Commission on Human Rights and the sub-commission on Discrimination and Minorities. A statement of what actually happened at Geneva. Our information begins with this admission from a delegate: "The simply fact is that the NAACP petition was one of the many petitions which had been piling up unread and unconsidered in the United Nations." ~~On the first day~~ The Commission on Human Rights made the initial mistake of starting with what was essentially an eighteenth century process, that is, it tried to make a declaration of human rights. There was no call for this. Declarations of human rights have been made time and time again, excellent in subject and content.

It is not neccessary today to restate what the Declaration of Independence, and the Declaration of the Rights of Man stated a hundred years and more ago. The modern procedure is scientific effort is to start with a particular case and make a study and from the facts proceed to action and general statement. This, the Human Rights Commission has not done, specially with hesitation and distaste, received various petitions and hid them from public knowledge and use. When the sub-commission met in Geneve, the American representatives, a southern white man, Jonathan Daniels

More About Geneva

On December 1, 1947, there was a meeting of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, with the representative from Sweden in the chair and Mr. Roy of Haiti as vice chairman. The other members represented Belgium, Australia, China, Ecuador, France, India, Iran, the USSR, the United Kingdom, and the United States. At this meeting there was a significant proposal by the representative from the Soviet Union.

The Russian Proposal

This Draft Resolution said: "The Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, having taken into consideration the principle clearly stated in the Articles of the Charter of the United Nations that equality must be assured to all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, having taken into consideration the resolution of the General Assembly No. 103 (1) of the 19th of November , 1946, which was carried unanimously and the text of which is as follows:

> The General Assembly of the United Nations declares that it is in the highest interests of humanity to put an immediate end to religious and so-called racial prosecution and discrimination, and calls on the governments and responsible authorities to conform both to the latter and and to the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations, and to take the most prompt and energetic steps towards that end.

Having taken into consideration that a year has passed since then and no measures have been taken for an effective prevention of racial discrimination, the Sub-Commission recommends:

1. To consider at its meetings the petition presented to the United Nations twice since 1946 by fifteen million Negroes residing in the United States of America, who are subjected to discrimination on racial grounds, and the Document of the International Democratic Federation of Women concerning the discrimination of women on the ground of their sex.

2. To set up a commission consisting of members of the United Nations for studying on the spot the facts of discrimination to which the native population is subjected in colonies on the grounds of race, sex, language or religion."

The Proposal is Discussed

The chairman, Mr. Ekstrand of Sweden, proposed that a vote should be taken upon this proposal. But Mr. Masani of India proposed a modified resolution. The representative from Iran declared that the Sub-Commission had no power to hear petitions, and the representative from Haiti agreed with him on that. He said that the Commission on Human Rights had no power either to consider or deal with such petitions.

A woman from the United Kingdom, Miss Monroe, thought it was premature for the Sub-Commission to consider petitions until there was an international convention concerning rights. Mr. Masani also said that the Sub-Commission had no power to pass upon petitions, but they could act as conciliators. The representative from Iran said it was a duty of the Sub-Commission not to receive petitions indirectly, but as experts to make recommendations to the Commission on Human Rights. Mr. McNamara, of Australia, said that legal technicalities should not stop the Sub-Commission from taking effective steps up to the point of intervention. He suggested that the Sub-Commission could transmit documents, act as conciliators, and, by voting, demonstrate public opinion.

Additional Reports from Geneva

Mr. Roy, of Haiti, admitted that the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and theProtection of Minorities could study petitions before they were discussed by the Commission on Human Rights. Mr. Daniels, of the United States, supported his own proposal of November 24, and said it was a duty of the Sub-Commission to recommend to the Commission on Human Rights, principles to be applied against discriminations. The composite resolution of Mr. Masani was then put to the vote, with ten votes in favor, one against, and one abstention. The chairman then asked for avote on Mr. Daniels' motion to insert the following paragraph,among others:

> The Sub-Commission, in considering procedures for carrying out its terms of reference in connection with the making of recommendations to the Commission on urgent problems in the fields of Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, has concluded that the Secretary-General of the United Nations should be requested to examine petitions received on these subjects, and to communicate to the Sub-Commission those which he considers to indicate the existence of 'urgent problems'. He should also be authorized, at his discretion , to circulate such petitions to members of the Sub-Commission in advance of its sessions.

There were three in favor of inserting this paragraph, five against and four abstentions. The chairman then put to vote the proposal of Mr. Daniels, somewhat similiar to the one already proposed/. There were five votes in favor and seven against. Mr. Daniels concluded that according to this vote, the Sub-Commission could not receive any communications relating to petitions. Then,for sometime, the body discussed the question of including the matter concerning women and this was finally laid aside.

Treatment of Minority Problems

Mr. Borisov now proposed that the Sub-Commission should vote on his original proposal. Mr. Masani of India said, in his opinion a study by the Sub-Commission of the problems of Negroes, and Indians, and colonial peoples would be hindered by the absence of any official petitions before them. He said that his proposed amendment would procure from the Sub-Commission official documents as a basis for study. Miss Monroe, of the United Kingdom, supported his proposal. She considered that it was the duty of the Sub-Commission to promote in all ways the welfare of colored peoples but it would be invidious to give priority of consideration to the particular groups suggested. The member from Ecuador doubted that the Sub-Commission could take any action concerning the Negroes until a declaration had been adopted. He suggested that territories other than colonies would be considered, pointing out that there were 30,000,000 Indians in Latin America who were in need of social and politicial reform.

Mr. Daniels, of the United States, said that he was aware of the problem of Negroes in the United States and that the President himself had authorized a comprehensive investigation. He suggested, however, that it would be invidious to take isolated action on this particular problem, and he supported the setting up of machinery for the receipt by the Sub-Commission of petitions from all types of minorities.

Russia Speaks

At a meeting on December 3, 1947, Mr. Borisov, of Russia, spoke and said: ~~He supported~~

> He supported the chairman's suggestion to vote upon his proposal first. He said that there was a fundamental difference between his text and the text of the composite resolution. He considered that it was the duty of the Sub-Commission to consider petitions and not to submit them to other bodies. He pointed out that he had proposed consideration both of the Negro problem in the United States of America, and of the question of Discrimination of Women because relevant documents were available. He said that he was ready to consider any other petitions if the documentary evidence was available.

He agreed that it was impossible to approach all the problems at once, and said that he had mentioned in his proposal the tow that he considered most urgent.

GENEVA: FURTHER REPORTS

Mr. McNamara of Australia proposed an amendment to Mr. Masani's amendment to Mr. Borisov's proposal. He suggested adding the words, "and from other similiar or comparable groups" after the word "Colored People." Mr. Masani did not want to accept that. Mr. Daniels pointed out that the sub-committee had rejected his proposal on the previous day when he had suggested setting up machinery to deal with all petitions. The chairman put to vote the first paragraph of Mr. Masani's proposal as amended by Mr. McNamara; "that the Economic and Social Council be moved to instruct that petitions received from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and from other similiar or comparable groups be circulated to Members of this Sub-Commission and resolves that their consideration be placed on the agenda of the next meeting of this Sub-Commission." This proposal was rejected by a vote of five to one, with five abstentions. The delegate from France explained that he had abstained from voting because he had only been given the English text of the proposal. Mr. Roy of Haiti, abstained because he objected to the amendment and to Mr. McNamara's addition.

The chairman put Mr. Masani's amendment and this was rejected five to three with four abstentions.

THE RUSSIAN PROPOSAL AGAIN

Mr. Borisov's proposal was now taken up and the first paragraph voted on, to consider at ~~the~~ this meeting the NAACP petition presented to the United Nations twice since 1946 by 15 million Negroes residing in the United States of America who are subjected to discrimination on racial grounds. The proposal was rejected by four votes to one, with seven abstentions. The woman from Great Britain, Miss Monroe, explained that she abstained from voting because she felt it was unjust to emphasize a petition from one particular group of colored people, and the other members of the Sub-Commission, who voted against the motion or abstained, said they had done so for the same reason.

35-2-15

Finally, by a vote of ten in favor, ten against, and one abstention, discussion was discontinued. Then again, the chairman put to vote Mr. Borisov's proposal as amended, and there was one vote in favor, five against, and six abstentions. Thus the matter ended so far as this Geneva meeting was concerned.

SOME IMPLICATIONS

The net result, so far as anyone can speak of a result, was fear of all petitions, so far as the Human Rights Commission was concerned; and an attempt to make an over-all statement of human rights, instead of considering specific examples of discrimination. And the refusal of the Sub-Commission to consider the two specific petitions which were before them, or to adopt any general rule as to dealing with petitions and discriminations. This is certainly an unfortunate beginning.

It should be added that, Mr. Daniels in a private letter defends himself. He says: "The simple fact is that the NAACP petition was one of the many petitions which have been piling up unread and unconsidered in the United Nations," He adds:

"I think it can be fairly stated that the vote represented the feeling of the Sub-Commission that no one petition, pressed for obviously political motives by one nation against another, should be taken up by the Sub-Commission when the Sub-Commission had declined to consider on their merits all the petitions now before the United Nations in this field."

The difficulty, of course, with this proposal is the wholly gratitudious assumption that the Russian proposal was merely political; or suppose we grant that it was. What about the Negroes who made their petition? Certainly they did not have Russia in mind when they talked about lynching and disfranchisement in the United States.

Universal Military Training

Universal military training is universal Jim Crow. Selective Service is selective segregation. To these methods of choosing soldiers the American Negro is opposed. His opposition is based on long and bitter experience. There is first, the basic principle: that a man, and particularly a growing youth, who is asked to put life, health and career in jeopardy, has a right to expect to be treated as the same kind of man as his fellows, and not herded like an alien animal nor segregated like a leper. The experience of black men in the United States army and navy has usually involved this.

When the American colonies started to fight for liberty from the British industrial monopoly, the army of George Washington announced frimly that no slaves nor free Negroes were wanted. But the British governor of Virginia, the largest and richest colony, had other ideas. He invited Negroes to join the British forces and offered them freedom and land. Negroes immediately began to pour into his forces. Alarmed, the Americans had a change of heart. They received Negroes into their ranks and black men fought at Bunker Hill, starved at Valley Forge, and helped vote in independence.

The War Of 1812

In 1812, Negro sailors fought on the Great Lakes and on the high seas, and Andrew Jackson begged and praised their aid at the Battle of New Orleans. But the wave of emancipation now slowed up and a new pattern began to appear and spread. America stopped regarding Negro slavery as an evil forced on reluctant colonies by rapacious English merchants and began to realize that slaves and cotton were a paying investment. Emancipation halted at Mason and Dixon's line--the line which marked the beginning of lucrative cotton culture. A fatal fifty years changed the face of American civilization. Negroes were no longer unfortunate victims; they were fortunate inferiors, born to serve. Free Negroes were systematically ~~eliminated~~ eliminated and color caste reigned.

When free white labor began to fight for free land, the slaveholders bitterly disputed their clams and went to war. But both sides indignantly repudiated the idea that slavery was the issue. The North defended slavery and promised not to disturb it. The South averred it was fighting for "freedom" and not for slavery. Black soldiers were not wanted by either-- it was a "White Man's War!"

A White Man's War

But the white men couldn't finish it. The North resisted the draft. The poor whites deserted the Southern armies. Two long bitter years of stalemate followed, and then the Negro was invited to fight; first by the North, and then by the South. But he was invited to take arms not as a man but as a half man: in segregated units, with lower pay, and with the prospect of being killed like a mad dog if captured alive. He bowed to all this humiliation, because emancipation was the real reward. This he gained, because not only his actual fighting, but the threat of revolt of the whole laboring class of the South forced her to surrender.

35-2-24

The War With Spain

In the Spanish War, Negroes were again segregated and Negro officers eliminated in the National Guard. Even at San Juan Hill, the Negro fighters got almost no credit even when they rescued the Rough Riders and Teddy Roosevelt.

In the First World War, the complete segregation of Negroes became a national policy. Northern Negro recruits had to be shifted all over the country until Negro units could be found. All Negroes were trained in the South and made to submit to Southern Jim Crow patterns. Training as officers was at first refused all Negroes until the uproar compelled one officers training camp. And of the price we paid to fight for our country in 1917 and later in 1941, let me say more next week.

THE CHICAGO DEFENDER revised 4-16-48 4-16

Fort Des Moines

The establishment of a Negro officers training camp at Fort Des Moines did not settle the controversy. It was decided that no Negro could be made a field officer; and even when 700 cadets qualified for commissions, the War Office in Washington hesitated. Pressure was brought to bear. I secured an interview with Secretary of War, Newton Baker. He looked at me coldly: "We are not trying to settle the Negro Problem in this war," he said. "But", I answered, "you are surely trying to settle as much of this problem as interferes with winning the war!"

Negro officers of field rank in the National Guard were nearly all eliminated before embarkation. As many Negro units as possible were kept from combat service and used as stevedores and laborers, where they furnished America's real contribution toward winning the war. But Negro officers were hounded, and Negro troops always liable to violence from white American troops.

In the French Army

Some of the Negro divisions however got a break, when at the urgent request of the French, they were hurried ahead and integrated with the French army. They were greeted by the French army and people with open arms. They were sent into the front combat lines and praised and decorated. The French cables sent word of thier exploits around the world.

The Americans resented this treatment of Negroes. The officials of the American liaison unit sent a secret request to the French command, asking that Negroes be no longer treated on terms of equality. They said that America disliked this. Particularly they were angry to see white women and black soldiers on the streets or pictured in the press. They asked French officers not to shake hands with Negroes or receive them socially.

35-2-26

In the U. S. Army

The American army held its black combat troops in the rear, making their camp life as disagreeable as possible; refusing them leave when there was any possibility of their mingling with the French; hauling them before courts-martial on trumped up charges of "rape"; decorating one of their camps with large concrete dice; and finally sending them into battle in the Argonne with neither maps nor directives. Because of alleged failure in their objectives here, a score of Negro officers were court-martialed; but President Wilson intervened and released them. One unit was deliberately sent into battle after the armistice had already been signed but not announced, although the commanding officers knew it. Scores were killed. In returning the soldiers all manner of discriminations cropped out. First, a few Negro units were rushed home so as to get them out of French racial patterns as soon as possible. But their enthusiastic reception in New York stopped that policy. The rest were kept cooped up in detention camps, with few leaves or amusements. It was a bitterly disillusioned body of Negroes that returned to the United States after the First World War.

Second World War.

The Jim Crow pattern of the Second World War was changed in some respects. The over-all policy of separating the troops by color and race was maintained. But officer training was open to all with a minimum of discrimination. In the Navy, Negroes were given opportunity to get commissions, and in one school granted unprecedented chances of work and promotion. There were cases in the Army where mixed unites of black and white soldiers were permitted; but these were few in number. In general, race segregation was rigidly maintained, with much consequent friction and bad feeling. Since the close of the war, attempts to break down segregation by army regulation, or in obedience to state law has been firmly resented by the High Command.

For Negroes then, the prospect of a third world war is made all the more terrible by the prospect of "Jim Crow Forever," even before Stars and Stripes!

Cities

There can be little doubt but that San Francisco is the most beautiful city in the United States. I have often thought of Charleston, South Carolina, and New Orleans as standing foremost. The beauty of Charleston is undeniable; but its charm is confined to the Battery, the Sea Islands, and the historic buildings like St. Michaels, where the "slave steps forth a man!" Its further claim to interest is historic and includes the old Slave Mart. This, and the hopeless color prejudice, makes it difficult for a Negro to appreciate a city otherwise so full of interest and real grace.

New Orleans is not so beautiful as arresting; its long and gripping history gives it an individuality possessed by few American cities. Old Man River floats in dominance above it; Lake Pontchartrain curls about it, and long streets and avenues tell of old and secret sorrows and joys. And then below Canal Street lives an ancient world, where the color line fades and soft French displaces harsh American speech.

San Francisco

But San Francisco is beautiful in every right. Its great hills sweep arrogantly up and down, covered by white-walled homes. They stand on every curve and slant; they repeat themselves endlessly with every change of form and height. The green and color of flowers surge between. Main street is Market, and at one side instead of in the center. Then there are the Waters--the unending, puzzling waters, with oceans that are bays and bays oceans; with cities crowding on cities, until the city itself is lost amid its far-flung children. Yonder sweeps the Pacific; here is the bay of San Francisco, and yet above the other bay. Riding over all swing the amazing bridges, dwarfing even the magnificent Huey Long Bridges of Louisiana. Small wonder the Romans called their chief magistrate, The Greatest Bridge-builder--"Pontifex Maximus"; yet how their stone arches cower beneath these miracles of steel.

Climate and People

Then there is the climate. There is no climate I have ever seen that can be compared to that of San Francisco. The eternal flowers contradict your umbrella and overcoat. You shiver amid a shower of blooms. You are never hot and seldom cold. You cannot describe the weather as beautiful, nor yet as disagreeable. It is simply unique.

But a city is not streets and hills; it is not bays and bridges; it is not inexplicable cable cars and plunging autos. It is also people. It may justly be argued that people are not exactly a part of a city's scenery; and too, Charleston has its shades of skin and contours of countenance; while in New Orleans search for the Color Line is an out-door sport. But San Francisco is the least color-conscious of any city in the United States. Historically, this arises from the fact that slavery never existed here and the sub-stratum of low-paid labor was Chinese with only a few Negroes. To these colored folk have been added in time, Japanese, Mexicans, Filipinos, some Negroes in the past, and a flood of Negroes since the last war. Some of the darker folk have been trained and well-to-do. So that no legend tying color absolutely to poverty has arisen. Moreover, recently ties between the colored groups and between white and colored have been knitted. The labor unions have been foremost in this--the CIO leading; the AFL following. Workingmen realize that unless workers of all colors stand together, the backs of each will be broken by the other.

But beyond this, a spirit of inter-racial justice, and friendship between individuals of different racial origin, seems to me more widespread in San Francisco than in any other city in North America.

Finally, there is in San Francisco a political freedom and consciousness of the power of the vote which recalls old New England. It makes for division and "isms," but it makes also for independance. The demagogue flourishes on such soil but he is annual, not perennial.

We Negroes have much to complain of. The slave trade and its three hundred years of greed and cruelty. American slavery and its exploitation of human toil for the sake of white civilization. Color caste which today makes us second-class citizens in the United States and members of a lower caste throughout the civilized world. But facing all this, it must be admitted that the plight of the Jews throughout the world has been even harder and more desperate than anything that Negroes have passed through in modern times.

It seems almost incredible that a country like the United States should join with Great Britain in making the sheer survival of the Jewish race a matter of desperate chance. So much of Jewish history is forgotten and distorted that we must continually bring it to mind in order to think clearly and justly. Here is a comparatively small group of people noted even in ancient history for their high religious concepts, for their clear thinking, and the splendid results of their family life. They have met opposition for thousands of years, not on account of laziness and inefficiency, but on account of thier determined will to survive and to be spiritually free.

They escaped the tentacles of Egyptian theocracy. They survived in a barren land east of the Mediterranean by hard work, self-criticism, and magnificent self-expression. They were beaten down by the vast power of the Roman Empire, they were dispersed over the world and those who fled into Europe found themselves without rights and without liberty.

They could not own land, they could not enter the professions, naturally they could not and would not become a part of the all-powerful Church. Their one salvation lay in peddling goods, finance and merchandising in the new and growing trade and industry of a world passing into economic revolution. They became gradually the bankers and financiers of Europe and eventually they entered the professions. They eventually became artists and scientists. In many cases they led the world in thought and creation. And this, despite all kinds of repression and personal humilation; yet their very success brought disaster.

Religious fanaticism dogged them. Time and time again they became objects of lying and slander. They gained and lost, and lost and gained; political and social rights, and only with the greatest difficulty retained the basic right to their religious belief.

Finally, in the 19th century, it seemed as though the world was coming to its senses and that a man could believe in the one God of the Jews and if he conducted himself as a man, could be a citizen of the world. Jews rose to preferment in all of the leading countries of civilization. But when in the 20th century there came the frantic rivalry between a few great nations to dominate the world, one of them seized upon the ancient prejudice against the Jews to destroy them in order to gain the following of certain elements in Germany. The result was a slaughter so vast and cruel that we will not be able to realize what happened to six million human beings in Eastern Europe during the Second World War until years have gone by.

There was one refuge, a little thing, a little corner of the world where the Jews anciently had lived. Early in the 19th century, some Jews had proposed to rebuild Zion in Palestine; but many Jews themselves refused and said, "why segregate ourselves, when a free world is open for us?" However, with the systematic murder of Hitler and the attitude of civilized people elsewhere over the world, there came after the Second World War a demand that the British aid in the establishment of a Jewish nation in Palestine in accordance with the former clear promise of the British Empire. Then when this was to be put into practice, the British Empire repudiated its promise for sordid commercial reasons, and the United States government under President Truman first called and demanded for the fulfillment of this promise. Then almost unbelievably took back its word, refused to fulfill its promise, and is today letting the remnant of six thousand homeless Jews rot in Europe while the United States discusses unworkable possibilities for the partition of Palestine.

If there is one act for which President Truman and his advisors can be utterly and finally condemned and refused the support of all decent thinking perople, it is this reversal of stand in the matter of Palestine.

News

When I founded the CRISIS in 1910, my chief criticism of the Negro papers and periodicals of that time was that they did not pay enough attention to the collection of news; and at the same time their editorial opinion was based on too narrow a realization of what was going on in the world. To correct this, I established a department in the magazine called at first "The Horizon" and then afterward "Along the color Line," which consisted of small paragraphs giving the actual facts with dates and references, of news which I thought colored people ought to know. This proved the most popular part of the magazine and was responsible for its increase in circulation. Since that day, American Negro newspapers and periodicals have greatly widened and perfected their coverage of Negro news.

Franklin Frazier

Nevertheless, now and then, an item of great importance is missed. In the case which I have in mind, the election of E. Franklin Frazier as president of the American Sociological Society was an epoch-making event. I have not seen a single mention of the matter in any colored newspaper or magazine. Of course, I may have missed something, but certainly the occasion has not been noted as its importance deserves. For a long time it has been the hope and belief of American Negroes that the breaking of the color bar would take place first in Art and Sciences. To some extent, we have been justified, but not entirely. In science, particularly, the bars still placed before persons because of race and color are high and difficult to break.

Earnest Just

Some years ago the American Society of Zoologists elected Earnest Just as Vice President. According to precedent he should have been finally made president, but the Zoologists did not have the guts to do this. He never reached that honor. In no other one of the great scientific associations has a Negro been honored by election to the highest office, save in the case of The American Sociological Society. This is an organization of some two thousand professors, and instructors, white and black, North and South, in the leading institutions of learning in the United States. E. Franklin Frazier was elected third vice president, and then second, finally he was made first vice president. I watched the development with interest. There was no argument or mention of the matter so far as I have seen or heard. Quietly and without remark, E. Franklin Frazier became president of The American Sociological Society last October; and now stands at the head of the Sociologists of America, representing every single great university and college in the United States. It is an epoch-making event.

It was a fine triumph of the American tradition of dessert despite race, which is so often flouted and forgotten in this country. There was no argument, no word of dissent; the election took place in the same smoothe and uneventful way as other elections in the past. Nevertheless, the American Negro Press ought to have noted the event with quiet dignity, so that no colored child would be able to forget this great step toward democracy which has been taken in America.

Franklin's Qualifications

Most Negroes, of course, and many whites know of E. Franklin Frazier. He has taught at the Atlanta University School of Social Work and Fisk University. He has for years been head of the Department of Sociology at Howard University. But the distinctive thing about [redacted] is that he has maintained his standing as a scientist; he has not sought notoriety; has not sought executive work or power. He has been a sociologist. He has studied social science, he has written books and papers, he has attended the professional meetings. As a result he has been asked to lecture and to teach at some of the leading institutions of America, and has a standing and reputation unrivaled in his field. His book on The Negro Family in the United States is a classic, not only for knowledge of the Negro, but as an exemplification of scientific method.

The most interesting occurrence in Negro educational history is the birth, June 2nd, of Prairie View University. On that day Governor Stephenson of Texas signed the bill "changing the name of Prairie View State Normal and Industrial College for Negro Teachers to Prairie View University, and providing for the establishment of courses of law, medicine, engineering, pharmacy, journalism, or any other recognized college course taught at the University of Texas whenever there is any demand for such courses."

Not only that, but the budget appropriated $850,804 for the expense of Prairie View University during the next two years. This represents an increase of about 85% over the budget for 1943-45. About the same time Florida A. F. & M. Colored College got an appropriation of about a million dollars next year with additional money for building.

This emphasizes the fact that in the South the only colored colleges which are receiving adequate support are the Negro state institutions. They not only receive Federal funds under various laws, but also increased appropriations from the Legislature. They are not yet getting the Negro's equitable share, but they are progressing toward it. Their physical plants have grown enormously in the last 10 years. The great Negro institutions of higher learning today are those at Petersburg, Virginia; Greensboro, North Carolina; Tallahassee, Florida; Montgomery Alabama; Scotlandville, Louisiana; Nashville, Tennessee; Institute, West Virginia; and Prairie View, Texas. Compared with the private institutions like Fisk, Atlanta, Talladega, Dillard, Hampton and Tuskegee, these state institutions are superior in most of their physical accommodations.

For the most part, they still lag behind the private institutions in salaries, teachers, and creative scholarship; but even in these respects they are rapidly catching up and with increased salaries and increased intelligence and independence on the part of their governing boards, these institutions are bound to make a tremendous contribution to the education of the Negro in the near future.

The greatest handicap to Negro education in these public colleges, as well as in the private colleges, is the public school system of the South. And neither set of institutions is giving enough attention to this serious matter. I firmly believe that today a majority of Negro children in the South, and certainly in the country districts of the South, do not have the opportunity to learn to read and write; and throughout the institutions of higher education for Negroes the fact that the student entering and studying there cannot read intelligently and think clearly is the greatest handicap of the educational problem.

The reason for this is that the public schools are without an adequate number of teachers, without teachers thoroughly and sufficiently trained, without teachers decently paid, with limited terms and even in the best cities with double sessions for elementary children; which means that these children go to school half the time that the schedule indicates. Nine-tenths of the stuff that has been published concerning Negro ability to learn and accomplishment in science and literature is simply reiterating the fact that our elementary schools are failing miserably in their work, and that therefore the pupils who go up for higher training cannot read, write and reason.

For several years I tried to make the basic attack upon this position by organizing the Negro Land-Grant Colleges into a cooperative agency for studying the facts concerning Negroes, each in his own state. If and when this is carried through, these colleges will be able to present an accumulated mass of testimony concerning conditions in th public schools, conditions in housing, health and other matters of public concern. No other organization in the world has the opportunity to do this splendid, continuous piece of social study. Atlanta University foolishly let the opportunity to lead this movement, go. By my efforts it is nowin the hands of Howard University and I trust that that great institution will lead these growing and developing state institutions into a cooperative study of social conditions, particularly in education, which will be the first step toward reform.

The work of Lester Walton as American Minister to Liberia has not been appreciated because most of us misunderstood the Liberian situation.

In the first place, there is the assumption that a caste of American Negroes consisting of a few thousand families are ruling the natives without reference to native needs. As a matter of fact there is no caste of "American Negroes" in Liberia. The descendants of perhaps 5,000 Negroes from America who have settled in Liberia are today completely swamped by native blood, and are today in nearly every case more native African than American. The President is a full-blooded native, the last Vice-President was a full-blooded native, and there isn't a single family in Liberia that is not overwhelmingly of native descent.

The people of Liberia, however, can be divided into the mass who still live under tribal conditions, and those who by education and contact are living under modern conditions. The relationship between the comparatively small group of the latter and the tribes has in the past followed similar relationships between white rulers and colored natives in African colonies. To some extent it had to follow that pattern because the tribal government could not meet on terms of modern political equality with European peoples.

On the other hand, if the small governing class of Liberians, or of any other African or Asiatic colony, try to govern the masses primarily for the good of the masses, they find certain great difficulties. The first is the difficulty of the elite making a living according to modern standards. Their standard of living must be raised above the tribal standards. They have to maintain an expensive government. They have to finance a system of education. They have to live, dress and eat like modern men.

We have no idea here in America how difficult that is in Africa. It poses, of course, the temptation for successful rulers to achieve their standard of living at the expense of the masses. But this does not mean that all of them do this. Liberia has been noted for the unselfish men like Johnson, Roberts and Arthur Barclay who have worked for the masses of the people and made great personal sacrifices.

The greatest objective which they have tried to achieve is making a living through exports and imports. They tried raising sugar successfully until tariff legislation in the United States drove them out of the business. They tried raising fibers like piassava until monopoly freight rates ruined their markets. They still raise coffee and palm oil but in competition with countries that have better machinery and methods, and therefore their products get better prices.

The last effort of the Liberians has been in the raising of rubber, begun by the English, carried on by the Liberians and then taken over by the Americans under Firestone. It is a successful experiment but the danger is that with economic success Firestone insists more and more on political power.

Against this, Lester Walton with his great influence as American Minister has stood like a rock and with success. Now, however, comes another danger. The United States Navy has moved in, is going to build a great harbor and is going to use Liberia as an air base for international traffic. This means that not only the American rubber industry but also the American Government are going to infringe upon the real political independence of Liberia. It is significant that at just this time Mr. Walton is being withdrawn. This is a calamity if he is followed by a colored man who does not thoroughly understand the situation and who assumes that Liberians are simply selfish exploiters. Then industry and the Navy will have their way unhindered. If Walton is succeeded by a white man who is sympathetic with American aspirations, the case will be worse. Our only hope lies in the appointment of an American Negro who either knows Liberia or has the will, carefully and sympathetically, to study her extremely difficult situation.

At the Pan African Congress a delegate said yesterday that the mosquito saved West Africa; it kept whites from seizing the lands; a monument should be erected to the mosquito.

In East Africa, on the contrary, and particularly in Kenya, the highlands made white settlement possible, and the English, especially the great aristocratic families seized huge slices of land. Lord Delamere got two hundred thousand acres at one penny per acre; the Cavendish family, the Scotts and others took similar slices, driving the natives to the desert and vesting ownership even of that land in the Crown.

The representative of Ethiopia was bitter in his demand for the restoration of Somaliland and Eritrea to Ethiopia, and of ports to the sea; he declared that the British were today seizing and holding the best grain lands. They had loaned Ethiopia eight million dollars and then paid half of it back in salaries to English officials driven out of Burma and the East.

It was urged that Great Britain fears the development of a free and independent Ethiopia and that UNRRA is offering no help to the first victim of Italian fascism.

A fraternal delegate told an extraordinary tale about Cyprus. Cyprus is Greek and has been a British Colony for seven years, but if a Cypriot flies a Greek flag today, he is put in jail.

Unions and political parties are illegal and during the war the people have lived on grass; ordinarily, the workers get meat once a year. Wages before the war were 2/- per day for skilled workers, while imported British labor got one pound per day. Unions have been organized underground, and the Colonial Office appealed to daily. Meantime, the Cypriots sent help both to Spain and China.

A delegate to the Congress from India spoke yesterday and represented not the intelligentsia, but the ordinary Indian worker. This man was a seaman and had worked with Negroes more often than with any other nationality. He brought the sympathy of India to Africa.

1946

The Case of the Pan African Congress

Twenty-eight years ago last November, the first World War ended. The directors of the N.A.A.C.P. asked me immediately to go to France to try to get information and documents on the treatment of colored soldiers abroad. We were in receipt of many complaints from them and others.

I had already in mind a visit to France in order that I might do something concerning the future of Africa before the coming peace conference. I had sent to President Wilson the memorandum suggesting that the German colonies be made an independent region under the general supervision of the allied countries giving the natives the right to self-control with the help of missionaries and philanthropists. I wanted to call a Pan African congress in Paris. With these two plans, I asked for passage on the Creel boat which was to take newspaper correspondents to Paris. There had been a good deal of hesistation as to whether American correspondents would be allowed to go but finally the vessel Orizaba was allowed to take correspondents under the general supervision of Mr. Creel, who was in charge of government information services.

I received my passport, but when I presented myself at the boat there was some consternation because those in charge thought I was too radical to make a trip of this sort, and provision had already been made for R. R. Moton of Tuskegee to go as a personal representative of President Wilson; he was to ask the Negroe soldiers to behave when they returned to America.

A Harvard classmate declined to share my cabin, but Moton did share it and we had a pleasant voyage over. When I landed in France, I found that martial law was still in control and everybody assured me that no meeting or public effort at propoganda would be allowed. I had in mind a meeting of a congress of persons from Africa and peoples interested in Africa to formulate plans for the future of the German colonies and the future of all African colonies.

The government representatives of the United States like Walter Lippman and others discouraged me. I tried to see President Wilson but only got as far as his representative Colonel House, who expressed interest but took no action. But I went directly to the most prominent Negro in France Blaise Diagne who wal a member of the French Assembly and had been special commissioner for enlisting colored troops in West Africa. He was interested and said of course we could hold a Pan African Congress; but despite all my efforts the matter lagged; I had arrived early in December; December passed and January before I got action. I remember the weather of Paris in January and February, rainy and cold. I remember the dark little Hotel de Cloitres where I stayed. Then at last, Clemenceau, Prime Minister of France, gave permission to hold the congress. He said " Don't advertise it - but go ahead" . I immediately began corresponding with various colonies in Africa and countries in Europe and America, in order to get delegates. Here I met a second rebuff. Even the British Government would not allow the white secretary of the Aborgines Protection Society to come. They and other governments refused passports to African delegates. The American Secretary of State refused to visa passports of American Negroes. So that for a while it seemed as though I was going to hold my congress without any delegates. I found, however, finally that there were considerable number of Negroes in Paris: some Negro officers of the United States A.E.F.; the Negro Consul at Lyons; several women connected with the Y.W.C.A. canteens, and various French and Belgian officials.

A prominent French woman, Madam Calman-Levy, widow of a well-known publisher, helped me. She introduced me to two Belgians, officials, Senator LaFontaine and another; and in that way got in touch with many prominent Frenchmen.

Thus it happened finally that in February at the Grand Hotel in Paris right near the Opera, we opened the first Pan African Congress. There were fifty-seven delegates from fifteen countries including Abyssinia, Liberia, the West Indies, Egypt, the Belgian Congo and Algeria. Diagne presided; King, afterward President of Liberia, spoke; three French deputies were there and the French chairman of Foreign Affairs; William English Walling and Charles Edward Russell spoke and Madame Siegfried, President of the French National Association for the Rights of Women. We sent a petition to the peace conference and indirectly out of that petition came the legislation for the madate commission over the former colonies in Africa. I remember the feeling of triumph when my congress actually opened. It had three or four subsequent sessions in Europe and America larger and more representative; but none that gave the satisfaction of this first effort.

WINDS OF TIME
by

W. E. B. Du Bois

Sweetness and Light

Since the Gentle Reader has scared the editor into a "Sunshine Edition", I am only too pleased to assist, so as to prove that I too am quite often swathed in grins and not the person of tears and gloom that I am too often painted. I shall choose a subject at once innocent and gay, yet familiar to all from earliest childhood: namely that rare classic, "Mary had a little lamb." I am sure none can cavil at the gentle humor and sweet reasonableness of this touching bit of literature. It is free, I firmly believe, from any suggestion of Communism.

FIRST VERSE

Mary had a little lamb.
Its fleece was white as snow.
And everywhere that Mary went,
That lamb was sure to go.

Mary, naturally, was golden-haired and blue eyed and never, never played with the Jews, Darkies and Dagoes, in the neighborhood. Also may I call your attention to the fact that the lamb too was white. There are as you doubtless know, black lambs: dirty creatures who do not bathe and whose wool has to be handled in separate fleece banks. None of these for Mary. Her lamb was daily washed by the colored maid, ~~and was "white as snow."~~ It slunk along sheepishly tethered to a chain and avoided looking at restaurants advertising stew. Mary also was gowned in white, with a blue (not red) ribbon in her hair. Neighbors cried as she passed, "Lawsie me, ain't that lil' white chile sweet!"

SECOND VERSE

It followed her to school one day,
Which was against the rule;
It made the children laugh and play
To see the lamb at school.

Now as everyone knows, school is not for laughing and playing, as rule number 56 of the Board of Education clearly says, to the harassed and underpaid teacher, who keeps her job, teach them arithmetic, spelling and putting scratches on the blackboard. This will leave no time for laughing and playing among sixty half-fed children, most of them too dumb to know a lamb from a dog unless it was spelled out on the board. Something naturally had to be done and quick, before the principal came snooping around. "Get that mut out of here," Mary Lubinsky, the teacher, yelled, "and don't do it again!"

THIRD VERSE

And so the teacher turned it out
But still it lingered near
And waited patiently about
Til Mary did appear

Which was natural, seeing that it did not know the way home and was afraid of the dogs, trucks and men, especially with lamb chops at a dollar a pound. It loafed placidly about with one eye on the school door and the other on the rocks which the alley imps were tossing at it periodically. This naturally gave the pests in school a chance for their everlasting pastime of asking questions, in order to consume time and avoid arithmetic.

FOURTH VERSE

"What makes the lamb love Mary so?"
The eager children cry;
"Why, Mary loves the lamb, you know!"
The teacher did reply.

Which was of course just what the teacher had to say, according to rule number 102 laid down by the Board od Education; but she certainly took a lot for granted. And if the darling children had possessed any common-sense, which is also forbidden, they would have asked the lamb, not the teather; and the lamb as soon as he got the query through his thick head, would have replied in the plainest English at his command: "Love? Hell, she feeds me don't she? She gives me a place to sleep, and all the clothes I need! I get a bath everyday, which is more than you do, because there are no bathrooms in most of your flats. What's more, we're moving to a more exclusive neighborhood as soon as Mary's old man steals enough dough. I ain't got a thing to complain about. I don't care a damn whether she loves me or not as long as this keeps up, and I can't meet up with a sheep or a nice goat. Believe it or not, all I have to do for board and lodging is to yell "Ba-ba!".

All of which goes to show that nobody who has enough to eat and wear ought to complain; and that this the best possible world for them; and that the world is ruled by muttonheads who were originally lambs led around by Marys. Also that the aforesaid lambs were white.
